The fideicommissarius, who was thus only a vehicle to pass on the inheritance to another fideicommissarius, could not retain a fourth for himself, if the heir had already retained a fourth. The object of the lex Falcidia was merely to secure an heir, not in all cases to give a fourth to the person who virtually had the inheritance; but when the heir entered on the inheritance by order of the prætor, and therefore did not retain a fourth, then the fideicommissarius stood in the place of the heir, so far as to be able to apply the lex Falcidia, as if representing the heir, against legatees, but not against a second fideicommissarius. (D. xxxvi. 1. 63. 11.)

12. Et quia prima fideicommissorum cunabula a fide heredum pendente et tam nomen quam substantiam acceperunt et ideo divus Augustus ad necessitatem juris ea detraxit: nuper et nos, eundem principem superare contententes, ex facto, quod Tribonianus vir excelsus, quæstor sacri palatii, suggestit, constitutionem fecimus, per quam disposuimus: si testator fidei heredis sui commisit, ut vel hereditatem vel speciale fideicommissum restituat, et neque ex scriptura neque ex quinque testium numero, qui in fideicommissis legitimus esse noscitur, res possit manifestari, sed vel pauciores quam quinque vel nemo penitus testis intervenerit, tunc sive pater heredis sive alius quicumque sit, qui fidem elegit heredis et ab eo aliquid restitui voluerit, si heres perfidia tentus adimplere fidem recusat negando, rem ita esse subsecutam, si fideicommissarius iussurandum ei detulerit, cum prius ipse

12. Originally all fiduciary gifts depended only upon the good faith of the heir: whence they took their name as well as their character. To remedy this, the Emperor Augustus made them obligatory in law, and we have lately endeavoured to surpass that prince; and, on the occasion of a case brought to our notice by the most eminent Tribonian, quæstor of our sacred palace, we have enacted by a constitution, that (if a testator has entrusted to the faith of his heir the restoration of an inheritance, or any particular thing, and the fact cannot be proved either by any writing or by five witnesses (the legal number in such cases), there having been fewer, or perhaps no witnesses present, then, whether it is his father who has thus trusted to the good faith of the heir, and begged him to restore the inheritance, or whether it is any one else, if the heir perfidiously refuses to carry out the trust and denies the whole transaction, the fideicommissarius, having previde calumnia juraverit, necesse eum habere vel iurandum subire, quod nihil tale a testatore audivit, vel recusantem ad fideicommissi vel universitatis vel specialis solutionem coartari, ne deperat ultima voluntas testatoris fidei heredis commissa. Eadem observari censuimus et si a legatario vel fideicommissario aliquid similiter relictum sit. Quodsi is, a quo relictum dicitur, confiteatur quidem aliquid a se relictum esse, sed ad legis subtilitatem decurrat, omnimodo cogendus est solvere.

ously himself sworn to his own good faith, may put the heir to his oath; and thus force him either to deny upon oath having received any such trust, or to fulfil it, whether it relate to the whole inheritance or to some particular thing; and this is allowed, lest the last wishes of a testator, committed to the faith of an heir, should be defeated. The same process may be adopted against a legatee, or a fideicommissarius charged with a restitution. And if any one so charged admits the trust, but endeavours to shelter himself in the subtleties of the law, he may in all cases be compelled to perform his duty.

C. vi. 42. 32.

De calumnia juraverit, that is, he must swear beforehand that he is acting bona fide, and not inventing a ground of litigation.

TIT. XXIV. DE SINGULIS REBUS PER FIDEICOMMISSUM RELICTIS.

Potest autem quis etiam singulas res per fideicommissum relinquere, veluti fundum, hominem, vestem, argentum, pecuniam numeratam, et vel ipsum heredem rogare, ut alicui restituat, vel legatarium, quamvis a legatario legari non possit.

A person may also leave particular things by a fideicommissum, as a piece of land, a slave, a garment, gold, silver, pieces of money; and he may request either his heir to give them over, or a legatee, although a legatee cannot be charged with a legacy.

GAI. ii. 260, 271.

1. Potest autem non solum proprias testator res per fideicommissum relinquere, sed et heredis aut legatarii aut fideicommissarii aut cujuslibet alterius. Itaque et legatarius et fideicommissarius non solum de ea re rogari potest, ut eam alicui restituat, quæ ei relicta sit, sed etiam de alia, sive ipsius sive aliena sit. Hoc solum observandum est, ne plus quisquam rogetur alicui restituere, quam ipse ex testamento ceperit; nam quod amplius est, inutiliter relinquitur. Cum autem aliena res per fideicommissum relinquitur, necesse est ei, qui rogatus est, aut ipsam redimere et præstare aut æstimationem ejus solvere.

1. A testator may leave by fideicommissum, not only his own property, but also that of his heir, of a legatee, of a fideicommissarius, or of any other person; so that a legatee or fideicommissarius may not only be requested to give what has been left to him, but also something else, whether his own or the property of another. The only rule to be observed is, that no one shall be requested to give over more than he has received under the testament: for as to the excess the disposition is ineffectual. And, when the property of another is left by a fideicommissum, the person requested to give it over is obliged either to purchase and deliver the thing itself, or to pay its estimated value.

GAI. ii. 261, 262; D. xxxvi. 1. 1. 17.

Ulpian (Reg. 25. 5) expresses the power of disposal by fidei-

de calumnia juraverit, necesse eum habere vel iusjurandum subire, quod nihil tale a testatore audivit, vel recusantem ad fideicommissi vel universitatis vel specialis solutionem coartari, ne depercat ultima voluntas testatoris fidei heredis commissa. Eadem observari censuimus et si a legatario vel fideicommissario aliquid similiter relictum sit. Quodsi is, a quo relictum dicitur, confiteatur quidem aliquid a se relictum esse, sed ad legis subtilitatem decurrat, omnimodo cogendus est solvere.

ously himself sworn to his own good faith, may put the heir to his oath; and thus force him either to deny upon oath having received any such trust, or to fulfil it, whether it relate to the whole inheritance or to some particular thing; and this is allowed, lest the last wishes of a testator, committed to the faith of an heir, should be defeated. The same process may be adopted against a legatee, or a fideicommissarius charged with a restitution. And if any one so charged admits the trust, but endeavours to shelter himself in the subtleties of the law, he may in all cases be compelled to perform his duty.

C. vi. 42. 32.

De calumnia juraverit, that is, he must swear beforehand that he is acting bona fide, and not inventing a ground of litigation.

TIT. XXIV. DE SINGULIS REBUS PER FIDEICOMMISSUM RELICTIS.

Potest autem quis etiam singulas res per fideicommissum relinquere, veluti fundum, hominem, vestem, argentum, pecuniam numeratam, et vel ipsum heredem rogare, ut alicui restituat, vel legatarium, quamvis a legatario legari non possit.

A person may also leave particular things by a fideicommissum, as a piece of land, a slave, a garment, gold, silver, pieces of money; and he may request either his heir to give them over, or a legatee, although a legatee cannot be charged with a legacy.

GAL. ii. 260, 271.

1. Potest autem non solum proprias testator res per fideicommissum relinquere, sed et heredis aut legatarii aut fideicommissarii aut cujuslibet alterius. Itaque et legatarius et fideicommissarius non solum de ea re rogari potest, ut eam alicui restituat, quæ ei relicta sit, sed etiam de alia, sive ipsius sive aliena sit. Hoc solum observandum est, ne plus quisquam rogetur alicui restituere, quam ipse ex testamento ceperit; nam quod amplius est, inutiliter relinquitur. Cum autem aliena res per fideicommissum relinquitur, necesse est ei, qui rogatus est, aut ipsam redimere et præstare aut æstimationem ejus solvere.

1. A testator may leave by fideicommissum, not only his own property, but also that of his heir, of a legatee, of a fideicommissarius, or of any other person; so that a legatee or fideicommissarius may not only be requested to give what has been left to him, but also something else, whether his own or the property of another. The only rule to be observed is, that no one shall be requested to give over more than he has received under the testament: for as to the excess the disposition is ineffectual. And, when the property of another is left by a fideicommissum, the person requested to give it over is obliged either to purchase and deliver the thing itself, or to pay its estimated value.

GAL. ii. 261, 262; D. xxxvi. 1. 1. 17.

Ulpian (Reg. 25. 5) expresses the power of disposal by fidei-

commissum, by saying that everything could be disposed of in that way, that could be given by a legacy per damnationem.

Quod amplius est, inutiliter relinquitur. If, however, the thing which the fideicommissarius was to give belonged to himself, he was obliged to give it, whatever might be its value, if he accepted what was given to him by the fideicommissum, as he was considered to have had an opportunity of exercising his judgment, and not to have valued his own thing more highly than that which he received. (D. xl. 5. 24. 12.)

2. *Libertas quoque servo per fideicommissum dari potest, ut heres eum rogetur manumittere vel legatarius vel fideicommissarius. Nec interest, utrum de suo proprio servo testator roget, an de eo, qui ipsius heredis aut legatarii vel etiam extranei sit. Itaque alienus servus redimi et manumitti debet: quodsi dominus eum non vendat, si modo nihil ex iudicio ejus, qui reliquit libertatem, percepit, non statim extinguatur fideicommissaria libertas, sed differtur, quia possit tempore procedente, ubicumque occasio redimendi servi fuerit, praestari libertas. Qui autem ex causa fideicommissi manumittitur, non testatoris fit libertus, etiamsi testatoris servus sit, sed ejus, qui manumittit: at is, qui directo testamento liber esse jubetur, ipsius testatoris fit libertus, qui etiam orcinus appellatur. Nec alius ullus directo ex testamento libertatem habere potest, quam qui utroque tempore testatoris fuerit, et quo faceret testamentum et quo moreretur. Directo autem libertas tunc dari videtur, cum non ab alio servum manumitti rogat, sed velut ex suo testamento libertatem ei competere vult.*

2. Freedom may also be conferred upon a slave by a fideicommissum: for an heir, legatee, or fideicommissarius may be requested to enfranchise him; nor does it signify whether it is of his own slave that the testator requests the manumission, or of the slave of his heir, or of a legatee, or of a stranger; and therefore, when a slave is not the testator's own property, he must be bought and enfranchised. But, if the proprietor of the slave refuses to sell him, as he may, if he has taken nothing under the testament, yet the freedom given by the fideicommissum is not extinguished, but deferred only, as it may be possible in the course of time, on any occasion offering of purchasing the slave, to effect his enfranchisement. The slave who is enfranchised in pursuance of a fideicommissum, does not become the freedman of the testator, although he was the testator's own slave, but he becomes the freedman of that person who enfranchises him. But a slave who receives his liberty directly from the testament becomes the freedman of the testator, and is said to be orcinus; and no one can obtain liberty directly by testament, unless he was the slave of the testator, both at the time of the testator's making his testament, and also at that of his death. Liberty is given directly, when a testator does not request that freedom be given to his slave by another, but gives it himself by virtue of his own testament.

GAI. ii. 263-267; C. vii. 4. 6, 7.

It was the opinion of Gaius, that if the master of the slave refused to sell the slave, the fideicommissum perished, because liberty was a thing not admitting of computation in money. (GAI. ii. 265.) Justinian, in accordance with a rescript of the Emperor Alexander (C. vii. 4. 6), decides that it is only delayed.

If a testator enfranchised directly a slave that could not be

commissum, by saying that everything could be disposed of in that way, that could be given by a legacy per damnationem.

Quod amplius est, inutiliter relinquitur. If, however, the thing which the fideicommissarius was to give belonged to himself, he was obliged to give it, whatever might be its value, if he accepted what was given to him by the fideicommissum, as he was considered to have had an opportunity of exercising his judgment, and not to have valued his own thing more highly than that which he received. (D. xl. 5. 24. 12.)

2. *Libertas quoque servo per fideicommissum dari potest, ut heres eum rogetur manumittere vel legatarius vel fideicommissarius. Nec interest, utrum de suo proprio servo testator roget, an de eo, qui ipsius heredis aut legatarii vel etiam extranei sit. Itaque alienus servus redimi et manumitti debet: quodsi dominus eum non vendat, si modo nihil ex iudicio ejus, qui reliquit libertatem, percepit, non statim extinguatur fideicommissaria libertas, sed differtur, quia possit tempore procedente, ubicumque occasio redimendi servi fuerit, praestari libertas. Qui autem ex causa fideicommissi manumittitur, non testatoris fit libertus, etiamsi testatoris servus sit, sed ejus, qui manumittit: at is, qui directo testamento liber esse jubetur, ipsius testatoris fit libertus, qui etiam orcinus appellatur. Nec alius ullus directo ex testamento libertatem habere potest, quam qui utroque tempore testatoris fuerit, et quo faceret testamentum et quo moreretur. Directo autem libertas tunc dari videtur, cum non ab alio servum manumitti rogat, sed velut ex suo testamento libertatem ei competere vult.*

2. Freedom may also be conferred upon a slave by a fideicommissum: for an heir, legatee, or fideicommissarius may be requested to enfranchise him; nor does it signify whether it is of his own slave that the testator requests the manumission, or of the slave of his heir, or of a legatee, or of a stranger; and therefore, when a slave is not the testator's own property, he must be bought and enfranchised. But, if the proprietor of the slave refuses to sell him, as he may, if he has taken nothing under the testament, yet the freedom given by the fideicommissum is not extinguished, but deferred only, as it may be possible in the course of time, on any occasion offering of purchasing the slave, to effect his enfranchisement. The slave who is enfranchised in pursuance of a fideicommissum, does not become the freedman of the testator, although he was the testator's own slave, but he becomes the freedman of that person who enfranchises him. But a slave who receives his liberty directly from the testament becomes the freedman of the testator, and is said to be orcinus; and no one can obtain liberty directly by testament, unless he was the slave of the testator, both at the time of the testator's making his testament, and also at that of his death. Liberty is given directly, when a testator does not request that freedom be given to his slave by another, but gives it himself by virtue of his own testament.

GAI. ii. 263-267; C. vii. 4. 6, 7.

It was the opinion of Gaius, that if the master of the slave refused to sell the slave, the fideicommissum perished, because liberty was a thing not admitting of computation in money. (GAI. ii. 265.) Justinian, in accordance with a rescript of the Emperor Alexander (C. vii. 4. 6), decides that it is only delayed.

If a testator enfranchised directly a slave that could not be so enfranchised, the gift of liberty would be as valid as a fideicommissum.

Orcinus, from Orcus; because he is the freedman of a dead person.

3. Verba autem fideicommissorum hæc maxime in usu habeantur: peto, rogo, volo, mando, fidei tuæ committo. Quæ perinde singula firma sunt, atque si omnia in unum congesta essent.

3. The terms generally used in making fideicommissa are the following: I request, I ask, I desire, I commit, I entrust to thy good faith; and each of them is of as much force separately as all of them placed together.

GAL. ii. 249.

Antoninus Pius decided by rescript that commendo would not suffice (D. xxxii. 11. 2); but, in the time of Justinian, the expressions by which a fideicommissum was created were quite immaterial, provided that the wishes of the testator could be ascertained.

TIT. XXV. DE CODICILLIS.

Ante Augusti tempora constat jus codicillorum non fuisse, sed primus Lucius Lentulus, ex cujus persona etiam fideicommissa cœperunt, codicillos introduxit. Nam cum decederet in Africa, scripsit codicillos testamento confirmatos, quibus ab Augusto petiit per fideicommissum, ut faceret aliquid: et cum divus Augustus voluntatem ejus implesset, cujus deinceps reliqui auctoritatem secuti, fideicommissa præstabant et filia Lentuli legata, quæ jure non debebat, solvit, dicitur Augustus convocasse prudentes, inter quos Trebatium quoque, cujus tunc auctoritas maxima erat, et quæsisse, an possit hoc recipi nec absonans a juris ratione codicillorum usus esset: et Trebatium suasisse Augusto, quod diceret, utilissimum et necessarium hoc civibus esse propter magnas et longas peregrinationes, quæ apud veteres fuissent, ubi, si quis testamentum facere non posset, tamen codicillos posset. Post quæ tempora cum et Labeo codicillos fecisset, jam nemini dubium erat, quin codicilli jure optimo admitterentur.

Codicils were certainly not recognised by law before the reign of Augustus; for Lucius Lentulus, to whom also the origin of fideicommissa may be traced, was the first who introduced codicils. When dying in Africa, he wrote codicils, which were confirmed by his testament; and in these he requested Augustus by a fideicommissum to do something for him. The emperor complied with the request, and, following his example, the other persons joined with him carried out the fideicommissa entrusted to them, and the daughter of Lentulus paid legacies which in strictness of law were not due from her. It is said that Augustus, having called together upon this occasion persons learned in the law, and among others Trebatius, whose opinion was of the greatest authority, asked whether codicils could be admitted, and whether they were not repugnant to the principles of law. Trebatius advised the emperor to admit them, as they were most convenient and necessary to citizens, on account of the great and long journeys which the ancients were frequently obliged to take, during which a man who could not make a testament, might be able to make codicils. And subsequently, Labeo himself having made codicils, no one afterwards doubted their perfect validity.

Before Augustus no codicils

Lucius Lentulus was first who introduced them

Trebatius advised Augustus to admit them from Labeo it was the custom then so enfranchised, the gift of liberty would be as valid as a fideicommissum.

Orcinus, from Orcus; because he is the freedman of a dead person.

3. Verba autem fideicommissorum hæc maxime in usu habentur: peto, rogo, volo, mando, fidei tuæ committo. Quæ perinde singula firma sunt, atque si omnia in unum congesta essent.

3. The terms generally used in making fideicommissa are the following: I request, I ask, I desire, I commit, I entrust to thy good faith; and each of them is of as much force separately as all of them placed together.

GAL. II. 249.

Antoninus Pius decided by rescript that commendo would not suffice (D. xxxii. 11. 2); but, in the time of Justinian, the expressions by which a fideicommissum was created were quite immaterial, provided that the wishes of the testator could be ascertained.

TIT. XXV. DE CODICILLIS.

Ante Augusti tempora constat jus codicillorum non fuisse, sed primus Lucius Lentulus, ex cujus persona etiam fideicommissa cœperunt, codicillos introduxit. Nam cum decederet in Africa, scripsit codicillos testamento confirmatos, quibus ab Augusto petiit per fideicommissum, ut faceret aliquid: et cum divus Augustus voluntatem ejus impleisset, ejus deinceps reliqui auctoritatem secuti, fideicommissa præstabant et filia Lentuli legata, quæ jure non debebat, solvit, dicitur Augustus convocasse prudentes, inter quos Trebatium quoque, ejus tunc auctoritas maxima erat, et quæsisse, an possit hoc recipi nec absonans a juris ratione codicillorum usus esset: et Trebatium suasisse Augusto, quod diceret, utilissimum et necessarium hoc civibus esse propter magnas et longas peregrinationes, quæ apud veteres fuissent, ubi, si quis testamentum facere non posset, tamen codicillos posset. Post quæ tempora cum et Labeo codicillos fecisset, jam nemini dubium erat, quin codicilli jure optimo admitterentur.

Codicils were certainly not recognised by law before the reign of Augustus; for Lucius Lentulus, to whom also the origin of fideicommissa may be traced, was the first who introduced codicils. When dying in Africa, he wrote codicils, which were confirmed by his testament; and in these he requested Augustus by a fideicommissum to do something for him. The emperor complied with the request, and, following his example, the other persons joined with him carried out the fideicommissa entrusted to them, and the daughter of Lentulus paid legacies which in strictness of law were not due from her. It is said that Augustus, having called together upon this occasion persons learned in the law, and among others Trebatius, whose opinion was of the greatest authority, asked whether codicils could be admitted, and whether they were not repugnant to the principles of law. Trebatius advised the emperor to admit them, as they were most convenient and necessary to citizens, on account of the great and long journeys which the ancients were frequently obliged to take, during which a man who could not make a testament, might be able to make codicils. And subsequently, Labeo himself having made codicils, no one afterwards doubted their perfect validity.

Before Augustus no codicils

Lucius Lentulus was first who introduced them

Trebatius advised Augustus to admit them from law it was the custom then

Codicilli were small tablets on which memorandums or letters were written. A testator might naturally address a short letter giving short directions to his heir. When fideicommissa came to be enforced, these letters or directions were enforced as creating fideicommissa. As under the Roman law a testator could make no alteration in his testament without making an entirely new testament, the use of codicils was obviously great. Codicils might be made without there being any testament at all. They were then directions addressed to the heredes ab intestato. But if there was a testament, they were always considered as attached to it: if the testamentary dispositions failed, they failed also, and all their provisions were taken with reference to the time when the testament was made. (D. xxix. 7. 2. 2 and 3. 2.)

A testator, by inserting an express clause to that effect, termed by commentators clausula codicillaris, might provide that his testament, if invalid as a testament, should take effect in the way of codicils. (C. vi. 36. 8. 1).

As to Labeo and Trebatius, see Introd. sec. 20.

It is to be noticed that codicilli does not mean, like the English word 'codicil,' a supplement to a will; but 'directions by tablets,' and that directions so made should be held obligatory constituted an innovation as great in the form of testamentary disposition as the recognition of fideicommissa constituted in the latitude of testamentary power.

1. Non tantum autem testamento facto potest quis codicillos facere, sed et intestatus quis decedens fidei-committere codicillis potest. Sed cum ante testamentum factum codicilli facti erant, Papinianus ait, non aliter vires habere, quam si speciali postea voluntate confirmentur. Sed divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt, ex his codicillis, qui testamentum præcedunt, posse fideicommissum peti, si appareat, eum, qui postea testamentum fecerat, a voluntate, quam codicillis expresserat, non recessisse.

1. Not only a person who has already made his testament, may make codicils, but even a person dying intestate may create fideicommissa by codicils. But when codicils are made before a testament, they cannot take effect, according to Papinian, unless confirmed by a special disposition in the testament. But the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by rescript, that a thing, left in trust by codicils, made before a testament, may be demanded by the fideicommissarius, if it appears that the testator has not abandoned the intention which he expressed in the codicils.

GAI. II. 270.

There was a distinction between codicils confirmed by testament, and those not so confirmed; for if codicils were confirmed by testament, their provisions could operate to give legacies or appoint a tutor, and not only to create fideicommissa. A testator could, by anticipation, confirm in his testament any codicils he might thereafter make. (D. xxix. 7. 8. pr.)

2. Codicillis autem hereditas neque dari neque adimi potest, ne confundatur jus testamentorum et

2. An inheritance can neither be given nor taken away by codicils, as the different effect of testaments and

Codicilli were small tablets on which memorandums or letters were written. A testator might naturally address a short letter giving short directions to his heir. When fideicommissa came to be enforced, these letters or directions were enforced as creating fideicommissa. As under the Roman law a testator could make no alteration in his testament without making an entirely new testament, the use of codicils was obviously great. Codicils might be made without there being any testament at all. They were then directions addressed to the heredes ab intestato. But if there was a testament, they were always considered as attached to it: if the testamentary dispositions failed, they failed also, and all their provisions were taken with reference to the time when the testament was made. (D. xxix. 7. 2. 2 and 3. 2.)

A testator, by inserting an express clause to that effect, termed by commentators clausula codicillaris, might provide that his testament, if invalid as a testament, should take effect in the way of codicils. (C. vi. 36. 8. 1).

As to Labeo and Trebatius, see Introd. sec. 20.

It is to be noticed that codicilli does not mean, like the English word 'codicil,' a supplement to a will; but 'directions by tablets,' and that directions so made should be held obligatory constituted an innovation as great in the form of testamentary disposition as the recognition of fideicommissa constituted in the latitude of testamentary power.

1. Non tantum autem testamento facto potest quis codicillos facere, sed et intestatus quis decedens fidei-committere codicillis potest. Sed cum ante testamentum factum codicilli facti erant, Papinianus ait, non aliter vires habere, quam si speciali postea voluntate confirmentur. Sed divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt, ex his codicillis, qui testamentum præcedunt, posse fideicommissum peti, si appareat, eum, qui postea testamentum fecerat, a voluntate, quam codicillis expresserat, non recessisse.

1. Not only a person who has already made his testament, may make codicils, but even a person dying intestate may create fideicommissa by codicils. But when codicils are made before a testament, they cannot take effect, according to Papinian, unless confirmed by a special disposition in the testament. But the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by rescript, that a thing, left in trust by codicils, made before a testament, may be demanded by the fideicommissarius, if it appears that the testator has not abandoned the intention which he expressed in the codicils.

GAI. II. 270.

There was a distinction between codicils confirmed by testament, and those not so confirmed; for if codicils were confirmed by testament, their provisions could operate to give legacies or appoint a tutor, and not only to create fideicommissa. A testator could, by anticipation, confirm in his testament any codicils he might thereafter make. (D. xxix. 7. 8. pr.)

2. Codicillis autem hereditas neque dari neque adimi potest, ne confundatur jus testamentorum et

2. An inheritance can neither be given nor taken away by codicils, as the different effect of testaments and codicillorum, et ideo nec exheredatio scribi. Directo autem hereditas codicillis neque dari neque adimi potest: nam per fideicommissum hereditas codicillis jure relinquitur. Nec condicionem heredi instituto codicillis adicere neque substituere directo potest.

codicils would be thereby confounded, and of course, therefore, no heir can be disinherited by codicils. But it is only directly that an inheritance can neither be given nor taken away by codicils, for it may be legally disposed of in codicils by means of a fideicommissum. Nor, again, can a condition be imposed on an heir instituted by testament, nor can a direct substitution be made, by codicils.

GAI. ii. 273; D. xxix. 7. 6. pr.

3. Codicillos autem etiam plures quis facere potest: et nullam sollemnitatem ordinationis desiderant.

3. A person may make several codicils, and no formality is requisite in making them.

D. xxix. 7. 6. 1.

Codicils were not originally subjected to any rules determining the mode in which they were made. But by a constitution of Theodosius, added to by Justinian, they were to be made in presence of five witnesses, and, if made in writing, which was not necessary, the witnesses were to subscribe them. If codicils were not so made, then the fideicommissarius could, after having sworn to his own good faith, call on the heir to deny them on oath. (C. vi. 36. 8. 3.)

codicillorum, et ideo nec exheredatio scribi. Directo autem hereditas codicillis neque dari neque adimi potest: nam per fideicommissum hereditas codicillis jure relinquitur. Nec condicionem heredi instituto codicillis adicere neque substituere directo potest.

codicils would be thereby confounded, and of course, therefore, no heir can be disinherited by codicils. But it is only directly that an inheritance can neither be given nor taken away by codicils, for it may be legally disposed of in codicils by means of a fideicommissum. Nor, again, can a condition be imposed on an heir instituted by testament, nor can a direct substitution be made, by codicils.

GAI. ii. 273; D. xxix. 7. 6. pr.

3. Codicillos autem etiam plures quis facere potest: et nullam sollemnitatem ordinationis desiderant.

3. A person may make several codicils, and no formality is requisite in making them.

D. xxix. 7. 6. 1.

Codicils were not originally subjected to any rules determining the mode in which they were made. But by a constitution of Theodosius, added to by Justinian, they were to be made in presence of five witnesses, and, if made in writing, which was not necessary, the witnesses were to subscribe them. If codicils were not so made, then the fideicommissarius could, after having sworn to his own good faith, call on the heir to deny them on oath. (C. vi. 36. 8. 3.)

LIBER TERTIUS.

TIT. I. DE HEREDITATIBUS, QUÆ AB INTESTATO DEFERUNTUR.

Intestatus decedit, qui aut omnino testamentum non fecit aut non jure fecit aut id, quod fecerat, ruptum irritumve factum est aut nemo ex eo heres extitit.

A person dies intestate, who either has made no testament at all, or has made one not legally valid; or if the testament he has made is revoked, or made ineffectual; or if no one becomes heir under it.

D. xxxviii. 16. 1. pr.

If a person died without a testament, the law regulated the succession to the inheritance. So also it did, if he left a testament that was fatally defective in form (non jure factum), or if his testament was revoked, or, in the language of Roman law, broken (ruptum), or if it was set aside as inofficious, or made ineffectual by a change of status in the testator (irritum), or if no heir would accept the inheritance under it.

If there was no testament to determine the succession, the law of the Twelve Tables gave the inheritance first to the sui heredes, who were also necessarii heredes, that is, could not refuse to accept the inheritance; then to the agnati; and then, if the deceased was a member of a gens, to the gentiles. In default of agnati, the prætor called to the inheritance the cognati, or blood-relations. (See Introd. sec. 45.) Perhaps the succession of gentiles lasted to a time later than the introduction of this prætorian succession of the cognati; but at any rate, it did not outlast the Republic, and therefore, speaking of the times when we are most familiar with Roman law, we may say that the succession was given first to the sui heredes, then to the agnati, then to the cognati. But some complication was introduced into the rules of succession, by certain classes of persons being, by different changes in the law, raised from the rank of agnati to that of sui heredes, and from the rank of cognati to that of agnati. These changes are not, however, very difficult to follow, if we divide them according as they were effected (1) by the prætor, (2) by senatusconsulta, and imperial enactments pre-

LIBER TERTIUS.

TIT. I. DE HEREDITATIBUS, QUÆ AB INTESTATO DEFERUNTUR.

Intestatus decedit, qui aut omnino testamentum non fecit aut non jure fecit aut id, quod fecerat, ruptum irritumve factum est aut nemo ex eo heres extitit.

A person dies intestate, who either has made no testament at all, or has made one not legally valid; or if the testament he has made is revoked, or made ineffectual; or if no one becomes heir under it.

D. xxxviii. 16. 1. pr.

If a person died without a testament, the law regulated the succession to the inheritance. So also it did, if he left a testament that was fatally defective in form (non jure factum), or if his testament was revoked, or, in the language of Roman law, broken (ruptum), or if it was set aside as inofficious, or made ineffectual by a change of status in the testator (irritum), or if no heir would accept the inheritance under it.

If there was no testament to determine the succession, the law of the Twelve Tables gave the inheritance first to the sui heredes, who were also necessarii heredes, that is, could not refuse to accept the inheritance; then to the agnati; and then, if the deceased was a member of a gens, to the gentiles. In default of agnati, the prætor called to the inheritance the cognati, or blood-relations. (See Introd. sec. 45.) Perhaps the succession of gentiles lasted to a time later than the introduction of this prætorian succession of the cognati; but at any rate, it did not outlast the Republic, and therefore, speaking of the times when we are most familiar with Roman law, we may say that the succession was given first to the sui heredes, then to the agnati, then to the cognati. But some complication was introduced into the rules of succession, by certain classes of persons being, by different changes in the law, raised from the rank of agnati to that of sui heredes, and from the rank of cognati to that of agnati. These changes are not, however, very difficult to follow, if we divide them according as they were effected (1) by the prætor, (2) by senatusconsulta, and imperial enactments previous to Justinian, (3) by Justinian himself. The first Title treats of the succession of sui heredes, and of those ranked among the sui heredes; the second and two following Titles treat of the succession of agnati, and of those ranked among agnati. At the end of this Title will be found a short summary of the changes in the law relative to the succession of sui heredes; at the end of the fourth Title one will be found of the changes relative to the succession of agnati.

Justinian altered the whole mode of succession to intestates by the 118th and 127th Novels. This change, being effected several years after the publication of the Institutes, should not be allowed to interfere with the consideration of the law of succession existing when the Institutes were published. But as it is too remarkable and too well known a part of Justinian's legislation to remain wholly unnoticed, a short account of it will be given at the end of the ninth Title, which closes the part of the Institutes treating of successions ab intestato.

Before we enter on the details of intestate succession, it may be useful to consider generally the position of the heir under an intestacy, according as there was (1) no will at all, nor any expression of last wishes; (2) no will, but codicilli creating a fideicommissum; (3) a will under which the appointed heir or heirs would not enter.

1. If there was no will, the sui heredes, being necessarii, had, under the old law, to accept the inheritance with all its burdens. The prætor, however, allowed them the beneficium abstinendi (see Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 2 note), but any act by which they mixed themselves up with the inheritance terminated their power of abstaining. If there were no sui heredes, or those who were sui heredes refused, then all others, whether ranked by the prætor with sui heredes, or in a lower grade of succession, were in the position of extranei heredes, and had the inheritance offered to them according to their priorities, and had to make their decision within a given time (cretio: see Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 5) to accept or not, any act by which they behaved as heirs (pro herede gerere) being regarded as a sign of acceptance.

2. If there was no will, but a fideicommissum was cast upon the heir under the intestacy by codicilli, the heir had the choice of abstaining if a sui heres, or of accepting if an extraneus heres; and if he accepted he had, after satisfying creditors, to carry out the fideicommissum, retaining a fourth for himself, or if he was compelled to enter he was protected against all loss. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 23. 7.)

3. If there was a will, but neither the testamentary heirs nor, failing them, any heir in the line of intestate succession would enter under the will, and the fiscus would not accept (see Tit. 9. 3 note), the inheritance might be assigned to any one who was willing to give security for the satisfaction of the claims of creditors, in order that gifts of freedom to slaves might be sustained, and that the reputation of the deceased might not suffer. (See Tit. 11.)

vious to Justinian, (3) by Justinian himself. The first Title treats of the succession of sui heredes, and of those ranked among the sui heredes; the second and two following Titles treat of the succession of agnati, and of those ranked among agnati. At the end of this Title will be found a short summary of the changes in the law relative to the succession of sui heredes; at the end of the fourth Title one will be found of the changes relative to the succession of agnati.

Justinian altered the whole mode of succession to intestates by the 118th and 127th Novels. This change, being effected several years after the publication of the Institutes, should not be allowed to interfere with the consideration of the law of succession existing when the Institutes were published. But as it is too remarkable and too well known a part of Justinian's legislation to remain wholly unnoticed, a short account of it will be given at the end of the ninth Title, which closes the part of the Institutes treating of successions ab intestato.

Before we enter on the details of intestate succession, it may be useful to consider generally the position of the heir under an intestacy, according as there was (1) no will at all, nor any expression of last wishes; (2) no will, but codicilli creating a fideicommissum; (3) a will under which the appointed heir or heirs would not enter.

1. If there was no will, the sui heredes, being necessarii, had, under the old law, to accept the inheritance with all its burdens. The prætor, however, allowed them the beneficium abstinendi (see Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 2 note), but any act by which they mixed themselves up with the inheritance terminated their power of abstaining. If there were no sui heredes, or those who were sui heredes refused, then all others, whether ranked by the prætor with sui heredes, or in a lower grade of succession, were in the position of extranei heredes, and had the inheritance offered to them according to their priorities, and had to make their decision within a given time (cretio: see Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 5) to accept or not, any act by which they behaved as heirs (pro herede gerere) being regarded as a sign of acceptance.

2. If there was no will, but a fideicommissum was cast upon the heir under the intestacy by codicilli, the heir had the choice of abstaining if a suus heres, or of accepting if an extraneus heres; and if he accepted he had, after satisfying creditors, to carry out the fideicommissum, retaining a fourth for himself, or if he was compelled to enter he was protected against all loss. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 23. 7.)

3. If there was a will, but neither the testamentary heirs nor, failing them, any heir in the line of intestate succession would enter under the will, and the fiscus would not accept (see Tit. 9. 3 note), the inheritance might be assigned to any one who was willing to give security for the satisfaction of the claims of creditors, in order that gifts of freedom to slaves might be sustained, and that the reputation of the deceased might not suffer. (See Tit. 11.)

The heir under the intestacy might accept when he was insolvent, with a view of profiting by the estate of the deceased to the detriment of creditors, and then the creditors might ask that the property of the deceased should be kept distinct from the proper property of the heir (beneficium separationis, see Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 1 note).

The heir under an intestate succession, as also the heir under a will, enforced his civil rights to the inheritance by a petitio hereditatis which was heard before the centumviri (see Introd. sec. 92; Bk. ii. Tit. 18. pr. note; Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 28), and his prætorial rights by applying to the prætor for an interdict, which was ordinarily that termed quorum bonorum (see Introd. sec. 107; Tit. 1 note).

1. Intestatorum autem hereditates ex lege duodecim tabularum primum ad suos heredes pertinent.

1. The inheritances of intestat by the law of the Twelve Tables belong in the first place to the heredes.

GAL. iii. 1.

2. Sui autem heredes existimantur, ut et supra diximus, qui in potestate morientis fuerunt: veluti filius filia, nepos neptisve ex filio, pronepos proneptisve ex nepote filio nato prognatus prognatave. Nec interest, utrum naturales sunt liberi an adoptivi. Quibus connumerari necesse est etiam eos, qui ex legitimis quidem matrimoniis non sunt progeniti, curiis tamen civitatum dati secundum divalium constitutionum, quæ super his positæ sunt, tenorem suorum jura nanciscuntur: nec non eos, quos nostræ amplexæ sunt constitutiones, per quas jussimus, si quis mulierem in suo contubernio copulaverit non ab initio affectione maritali, eam tamen, cum qua poterat habere conjugium, et ex ea liberos sustulerit, postea vero affectione procedente etiam nuptialia instrumenta cum ea fecerit filiosque vel filias habuerit: non solum eos liberos, qui post dotem editi sunt, justos et in potestate esse patribus, sed etiam anteriores, qui et his, qui postea nati sunt, occasionem legitimi nominis præstiterunt: quod optinere censuimus, etiamsi non progeniti fuerint post dotale instrumentum confectum liberi vel etiam nati ab hac luce subtrahi fuerint. Ita demum tamen nepos neptisve et pronepos proneptisve suorum heredum numero sunt, si præcedens persona desierit in potestate parentis esse, sive morte

2. And, as we have observed before, those are sui heredes who, at the death of the deceased, were under his power; as a son or a daughter, grandson or a granddaughter by a son, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter by a grandson born of a son; and does it make any difference whether these children are natural or adopted? We must also reckon among the sui heredes those who, though not born in lawful wedlock, nevertheless, according to the tenor of the imperial constitution acquire the rights of sui heredes when being presented to the curiæ of the cities; as also those to whom our constitutions refer, which enact that if any person has lived with a woman not originally intending to marry her, but whom he is not prohibited from marrying, and shall have children with her, and shall afterwards, feel towards her the affection of a husband, enter into an act of marriage with her, and have by her sons and daughters, not only those born after the settlement of the dowry shall be legitimate, and in the power of the father, but also those born before who gave occasion to the legitimacy of the children born after. And the rule shall obtain, although no children are born subsequent to the making of the dotal act, or those born after all dead. But a grandson or granddaughter, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter, is not reckoned among the sui heredes, unless the person pro-

The heir under the intestacy might accept when he was insolvent, with a view of profiting by the estate of the deceased to the detriment of creditors, and then the creditors might ask that the property of the deceased should be kept distinct from the proper property of the heir (beneficium separationis, see Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 1 note).

The heir under an intestate succession, as also the heir under a will, enforced his civil rights to the inheritance by a petitio hereditatis which was heard before the centumviri (see Introd. sec. 92; Bk. ii. Tit. 18. pr. note; Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 28), and his prætorial rights by applying to the prætor for an interdict, which was ordinarily that termed quorum bonorum (see Introd. sec. 107; Tit. 1 note).

1. Intestatorum autem hereditates ex lege duodecim tabularum primum ad suos heredes pertinent.

1. The inheritances of intestat by the law of the Twelve Tables belong in the first place to the heredes.

GAL. iii. 1.

2. Sui autem heredes existimantur, ut et supra diximus, qui in potestate morientis fuerunt: veluti filius filia, nepos neptivæ ex filio, pronepos proneptivæ ex nepote filio nato prognatus prognatave. Nec interest, utrum naturales sunt liberi an adoptivi. Quibus connumerari necesse est etiam eos, qui ex legitimis quidem matrimoniis non sunt progeniti, curiis tamen civitatum dati secundum divalium constitutionem, quæ super his positæ sunt, tenorem suorum jura nanciscuntur: nec non eos, quos nostræ amplexæ sunt constitutiones, per quas jussimus, si quis mulierem in suo contubernio copulaverit non ab initio affectione maritali, eam tamen, cum qua poterat habere conjugium, et ex ea liberos sustulerit, postea vero affectione procedente etiam nuptialia instrumenta cum ea fecerit filiosque vel filias habuerit: non solum eos liberos, qui post dotem editi sunt, justos et in potestate esse patribus, sed etiam anteriores, qui et his, qui postea nati sunt, occasionem legitimi nominis præstiterunt: quod optinere censuimus, etiamsi non progeniti fuerint post dotale instrumentum confectum liberi vel etiam nati ab hac luce subtracti fuerint. Ita demum tamen nepos neptivæ et pronepos proneptivæ suorum heredum numero sunt, si præcedens persona desierit in potestate parentis esse, sive morte

2. And, as we have observed before, those are sui heredes who, at the death of the deceased, were under his power; as a son or a daughter, grandson or a granddaughter by a son, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter by a grandson born of a son; and does it make any difference whether these children are natural or adopted? We must also reckon among the sui heredes those who, though not born in lawful wedlock, nevertheless, according to the tenor of the imperial constitution, acquire the rights of sui heredes when being presented to the curiæ of the cities; as also those to whom our own constitutions refer, which enact that if any person has lived with a woman not originally intending to marry her, but whom he is not prohibited from marrying, and shall have children with her, and shall afterwards, feeling towards her the affection of a husband, enter into an act of marriage with her, and have by her sons or daughters, not only those born after the settlement of the dowry shall be legitimate, and in the power of the father, but also those born before who gave occasion to the legitimacy of the children born after. And the rule shall obtain, although no children are born subsequent to the making of the dotal act, or those born after all dead. But a grandson or granddaughter, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter, is not reckoned among the sui heredes, unless the person per-

id acciderit sive alia ratione, veluti emancipatione: nam si per id tempus, quo quis moreretur, filius in potestate ejus sit, nepos ex eo suus heres esse non potest. Idque et in ceteris deinceps liberorum personis dictum intellegimus. Postumi quoque, qui, si vivo parente nati essent, in potestate futuri forent, sui heredes sunt.

ceding them in degree has ceased to be under the power of the ascendant, either by death or some other means, as by emancipation. For, if a son, when the grandfather died, was under the power of his father, the grandson cannot be suus heres of his grandfather; and so with regard to all other descendants. Posthumous children, also, who would have been under the power of the ascendant if they had been born in his lifetime, are sui heredes.

GAI. iii. 2; C. v. 27. 3, 10, 11.

The sui heredes were the children, whether natural, adoptive, or made legitimate (see Bk. i. Tit. 10. 13), in the power of the deceased at the time of his death. We must not confuse persons made sui heredes by the later legislation, as these legitimated children were, with those permitted to rank with sui heredes.

3. Sui autem etiam ignorantes fiunt heredes et, licet furiosi sint, heredes possunt existere: quia quibus ex causis ignorantibus adquiritur nobis, ex his causis et furiosis adquiri potest. Et statim morte parentis quasi continuatur dominium: et ideo nec tutoris auctoritate opus est in pupillis, cum etiam ignorantibus adquiritur suis heredibus hereditas: nec curatoris consensu adquiritur furioso, sed ipso jure.

3. Sui heredes may become heirs, without their knowledge, and even though insane; for in every case in which inheritances may be acquired without our knowledge, they may also be acquired by the insane. At the death of the father, ownership in an inheritance is at once continued; accordingly, the authority of a tutor is not necessary, since an inheritance may be acquired by sui heredes even without their knowledge; neither does an insane person acquire by assent of his curator, but by operation of law.

D. xxxviii. 16. 14.

Directly the succession ab intestato commenced, which it did when the deceased died if there was no testament, and as soon as it was ascertained that the testament was ineffectual if a testament had been made, the suus heres became at once heir without any act of his own. We may, however, apply here what we have already said of the power to abstain altogether from the inheritance given him by the prætor. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 2.)

5. Interdum autem, licet in potestate mortis tempore suus heres non fuit, tamen suus heres parenti efficitur, veluti si ab hostibus quis reversus fuerit post mortem patris sui: jus enim postliminii hoc facit.

4. But sometimes a child becomes a suus heres, although he was not under power at the death of his parent; as when a person returns from captivity after the death of his father. He is then made a suus heres by the jus postliminii.

5. Per contrarium evenit, ut, licet quis in familia defuncti sit mortis tempore, tamen suus heres non fiat, veluti si post mortem suam pater judicatus fuerit reus perduellionis ac per hoc memoria ejus damnata

5. On the contrary, it may happen that a child who, at the death of his parent, was under his power, is not his suus heres: as when a parent, after his decease, is adjudged to have been guilty of treason, and his memory is

id acciderit sive alia ratione, veluti emancipatione: nam si per id tempus, quo quis moreretur, filius in potestate ejus sit, nepos ex eo suus heres esse non potest. Idque et in ceteris deinceps liberorum personis dictum intellegimus. Postumi quoque, qui, si vivo parente nati essent, in potestate futuri forent, sui heredes sunt.

ceding them in degree has ceased to be under the power of the ascendant, either by death or some other means, as by emancipation. For, if a son, when the grandfather died, was under the power of his father, the grandson cannot be suus heres of his grandfather; and so with regard to all other descendants. Posthumous children, also, who would have been under the power of the ascendant if they had been born in his lifetime, are sui heredes.

GAI. iii. 2; C. v. 27. 3, 10, 11.

The sui heredes were the children, whether natural, adoptive, or made legitimate (see Bk. i. Tit. 10. 13), in the power of the deceased at the time of his death. We must not confuse persons made sui heredes by the later legislation, as these legitimated children were, with those permitted to rank with sui heredes.

3. Sui autem etiam ignorantes fiunt heredes et, licet furiosi sint, heredes possunt existere: quia quibus ex causis ignorantibus adquiritur nobis, ex his causis et furiosis adquiri potest. Et statim morte parentis quasi continuatur dominium: et ideo nec tutoris auctoritate opus est in pupillis, cum etiam ignorantibus adquiritur suis heredibus hereditas: nec curatoris consensu adquiritur furioso, sed ipso jure.

3. Sui heredes may become heirs, without their knowledge, and even though insane; for in every case in which inheritances may be acquired without our knowledge, they may also be acquired by the insane. At the death of the father, ownership in an inheritance is at once continued; accordingly, the authority of a tutor is not necessary, since an inheritance may be acquired by sui heredes even without their knowledge; neither does an insane person acquire by assent of his curator, but by operation of law.

D. xxxviii. 16. 14.

Directly the succession ab intestato commenced, which it did when the deceased died if there was no testament, and as soon as it was ascertained that the testament was ineffectual if a testament had been made, the suus heres became at once heir without any act of his own. We may, however, apply here what we have already said of the power to abstain altogether from the inheritance given him by the prætor. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 19. 2.)

5. Interdum autem, licet in potestate mortis tempore suus heres non fuit, tamen suus heres parenti efficitur, veluti si ab hostibus quis reversus fuerit post mortem patris sui: jus enim postliminii hoc facit.

4. But sometimes a child becomes a suus heres, although he was not under power at the death of his parent; as when a person returns from captivity after the death of his father. He is then made a suus heres by the jus postliminii.

5. Per contrarium evenit, ut, licet quis in familia defuncti sit mortis tempore, tamen suus heres non fiat, veluti si post mortem suam pater judicatus fuerit reus perduellionis ac per hoc memoria ejus damnata

5. On the contrary, it may happen that a child who, at the death of his parent, was under his power, is not his suus heres: as when a parent, after his decease, is adjudged to have been guilty of treason, and his memory is fuert: suum enim heredem habere non potest, cum fiscus ei succedit. Sed potest dici, ipso jure esse suum heredem, sed desinere.

thus made infamous. He can then have no suius heres, as it is the fiscus that succeeds to his estate. In this case it may be said that there has in law been a suius heres, but that he has ceased to be so.

D. xxxviii. 16. 1. 3.

As a general rule, if the accused died before conviction, the prosecution was at an end. His succession went to his heirs by testament or in law. But to this there was one exception. If a person charged with perduellio (treason against the state or emperor) died before conviction, the prosecution was continued, and if he was found guilty, his memory was said to be condemned (memoria damnata fuit), and, his sentence having a retrospective effect, his property was confiscated exactly as if he had been condemned in his lifetime. (D. xlviii. 4. 11.)

6. Cum filius filiae et ex altero filio nepos neptisve extant, pariter ad hereditatem vocantur nec qui gradu proximior est, ulteriorem excludit: æquum enim esse videtur, nepotes neptesque in patris sui locum succedere. Pari ratione et si nepos neptisque sit ex filio et ex nepote pronepos proneptisve, simul vocantur. Et quia placuit, nepotes neptesque, item pronepotes proneptesque in parentis sui locum succedere, conveniens esse visum est, non in capita, sed in stirpes hereditatem dividi, ut filius partem dimidiam hereditatis habeat et ex altero filio duo pluresve nepotes alteram dimidiam. Item si ex duobus filiis nepotes extant et ex altero unus forte aut duo, ex altero tres aut quattuor, ad unum aut duos dimidia pars pertinet, ad tres vel ad quattuor altera dimidia.

6. A son, or a daughter, and a grandson or granddaughter by another son, are called equally to the inheritance; nor does the nearer in degree exclude the more remote; for it seems just that grandsons and granddaughters should succeed in the place of their father. For the same reason, a grandson or granddaughter by a son, and a great-grandson or great-granddaughter by a grandson, are called together. And since grandsons and granddaughters, great-grandsons and great-granddaughters, succeed in place of their parent, it appeared to follow that inheritances should not be divided in capita, but in stirpes; so that a son should possess one half, and the grandchildren, whether two or more, of another son, the other half of an inheritance. So, where there are grandchildren by two sons, one or two perhaps by the one, and three or four by the other, the inheritance will belong, half to the grandchild or the two grandchildren by the one son, and half to the three or four grandchildren by the other son.

GAI. iii. 7, 8.

The expressions 'in stirpes' and 'in capita' may be rendered, 'by the stock' and 'by the head.' An inheritance is divided 'by the head' when each head or person of those who take has an equal share in it; it is divided 'by the stock' when one share is distributed among all who are descended from one stock, i.e. are descended from the person who would, if he had been living, have taken the whole share.

fuert: suum enim heredem habere non potest, cum fiscus ei succedit. Sed potest dici, ipso jure esse suum heredem, sed desinere.

thus made infamous. He can then have no suius heres, as it is the fiscus that succeeds to his estate. In this case it may be said that there has in law been a suius heres, but that he has ceased to be so.

D. xxxviii. 16. 1. 3.

As a general rule, if the accused died before conviction, the prosecution was at an end. His succession went to his heirs by testament or in law. But to this there was one exception. If a person charged with perduellio (treason against the state or emperor) died before conviction, the prosecution was continued, and if he was found guilty, his memory was said to be condemned (memoria damnata fuit), and, his sentence having a retrospective effect, his property was confiscated exactly as if he had been condemned in his lifetime. (D. xlviii. 4. 11.)

6. Cum filius filiae et ex altero filio nepos neptisve extant, pariter ad hereditatem vocantur nec qui gradu proximior est, ulteriorem excludit: æquum enim esse videtur, nepotes neptesque in patris sui locum succedere. Pari ratione et si nepos neptisque sit ex filio et ex nepote pronepos proneptisve, simul vocantur. Et quia placuit, nepotes neptesque, item pronepotes proneptesque in parentis sui locum succedere, conveniens esse visum est, non in capita, sed in stirpes hereditatem dividi, ut filius partem dimidiam hereditatis habeat et ex altero filio duo pluresve nepotes alteram dimidiam. Item si ex duobus filiis nepotes extant et ex altero unus forte aut duo, ex altero tres aut quattuor, ad unum aut duos dimidia pars pertinet, ad tres vel ad quattuor altera dimidia.

6. A son, or a daughter, and a grandson or granddaughter by another son, are called equally to the inheritance; nor does the nearer in degree exclude the more remote; for it seems just that grandsons and granddaughters should succeed in the place of their father. For the same reason, a grandson or granddaughter by a son, and a great-grandson or great-granddaughter by a grandson, are called together. And since grandsons and granddaughters, great-grandsons and great-granddaughters, succeed in place of their parent, it appeared to follow that inheritances should not be divided in capita, but in stirpes; so that a son should possess one half, and the grandchildren, whether two or more, of another son, the other half of an inheritance. So, where there are grandchildren by two sons, one or two perhaps by the one, and three or four by the other, the inheritance will belong, half to the grandchild or the two grandchildren by the one son, and half to the three or four grandchildren by the other son.

GAI. iii. 7, 8.

The expressions 'in stirpes' and 'in capita' may be rendered, 'by the stock' and 'by the head.' An inheritance is divided 'by the head' when each head or person of those who take has an equal share in it; it is divided 'by the stock' when one share is distributed among all who are descended from one stock, i.e. are descended from the person who would, if he had been living, have taken the whole share.

7. Cum autem queritur, an quis suus heres existere potest: eo tempore querendum est, quo certum est, aliquem sine testamento decessisse: quod accidit et destituto testamento. Hac ratione si filius exheredatus fuerit et extraneus heres institutus est, filio mortuo postea certum fuerit, heredem institutum ex testamento non fieri heredem, aut quia noluit esse heres aut quia non potuit: nepos avo suus heres existet, quia quo tempore certum est, intestatum decessisse patrem-familias, solus invenitur nepos. [Et hoc certum est.]

7. When it is asked, whether such a person is a suius heres, we must look to the time at which it is certain that the deceased died without a testament, including therein the case of no heir claiming under the testament. Thus, if a son is disinherited and a stranger is instituted heir, and after the death of the son it becomes certain that the instituted heir will not be heir, because he is either unwilling or unable to be so, in this case the grandson of the deceased becomes the suius heres of his grandfather; for, at the time when it was certain that the deceased died intestate, there exists only the grandchild. Of this there can be no doubt.

D. xxxviii. 16. 1. 8.

8. Et licet post mortem avi natus sit, tamen avo vivo conceptus, mortuo patre ejus posteaque deserto avi testamento, suus heres efficitur. Plane si et conceptus et natus fuerit post mortem avi, mortuo patre suo desertoque postea avi testamento, suus heres avo non existit, quia nullo jure cognationis patrem sui patris tetigit. Sic nec ille est inter liberos avo, quem filius emancipatus adoptaverat. Hi autem cum non sunt quantum ad hereditatem liberi, neque bonorum possessionem petere possunt quasi proximi cognati. Hæc de suis heredibus.

8. And although a child is born after the death of his grandfather, yet, if he was conceived in the lifetime of his grandfather, he will, if his father is dead, and his grandfather's testament is abandoned by the heir, become the suius heres of his grandfather. Obviously a child both conceived and born after the death of his grandfather, cannot become the suius heres, although his father should die and the testament of his grandfather be abandoned; because he has never been connected with his grandfather by any tie of relationship. Neither is a person adopted by an emancipated son to be reckoned among the children of the father of his adoptive father. And not only are these adoptive children of an emancipated son incapable of taking the inheritance as children of the deceased grandfather, but they cannot demand possession of the goods as the nearest cognati. Thus much concerning sui heredes.

D. xxxviii. 16. 6, 7.

9. Emancipati autem liberi jure civili nihil juris habent: neque enim sui heredes sunt, quia in potestate esse desierunt parentis, neque alio ullo jure per legem duodecim tabularum vocantur. Sed prætor naturali æquitate motus dat eis bonorum possessionem unde liberi, perinde ac si in potestate parentis mortis tempore fuissent, sive soli sint sive cum suis heredibus concurrant. Itaque duobus liberis extantibus,

9. Emancipated children by the civil law have no right to the inheritance of their ascendant; being no longer under his power, they are not his sui heredes, nor are they called to inherit by any other right under the law of the Twelve Tables. But the prætor, obeying natural equity, grants them the possession of goods called unde liberi, as if they had been under the power of their ascendant at the time of his death, and this, whether

7. Cum autem quæritur, an quis suus heres existere potest: eo tempore quærendum est, quo certum est, aliquem sine testamento decessisse: quod accidit et destituito testamento. Hac ratione si filius exheredatus fuerit et extraneus heres institutus est, filio mortuo postea certum fuerit, heredem institutum ex testamento non fieri heredem, aut quia noluit esse heres aut quia non potuit: nepos avo suus heres existet, quia quo tempore certum est, intestatum decessisse patrem-familias, solus invenitur nepos. [Et hoc certum est.]

7. When it is asked, whether such a person is a suius heres, we must look to the time at which it is certain that the deceased died without a testament, including therein the case of no heir claiming under the testament. Thus, if a son is disinherited and a stranger is instituted heir, and after the death of the son it becomes certain that the instituted heir will not be heir, because he is either unwilling or unable to be so, in this case the grandson of the deceased becomes the suius heres of his grandfather; for, at the time when it was certain that the deceased died intestate, there exists only the grandchild. Of this there can be no doubt.

D. xxxviii. 16. 1. 8.

8. Et licet post mortem avi natus sit, tamen avo vivo conceptus, mortuo patre ejus posteaque deserto avi testamento, suus heres efficitur. Plane si et conceptus et natus fuerit post mortem avi, mortuo patre suo desertoque postea avi testamento, suus heres avo non existit, quia nullo jure cognationis patrem sui patris tetigit. Sic nec ille est inter liberos avo, quem filius emancipatus adoptaverat. Hi autem cum non sunt quantum ad hereditatem liberi, neque bonorum possessionem petere possunt quasi proximi cognati. Hæc de suis heredibus.

8. And although a child is born after the death of his grandfather, yet, if he was conceived in the lifetime of his grandfather, he will, if his father is dead, and his grandfather's testament is abandoned by the heir, become the suius heres of his grandfather. Obviously a child both conceived and born after the death of his grandfather, cannot become the suius heres, although his father should die and the testament of his grandfather be abandoned; because he has never been connected with his grandfather by any tie of relationship. Neither is a person adopted by an emancipated son to be reckoned among the children of the father of his adoptive father. And not only are these adoptive children of an emancipated son incapable of taking the inheritance as children of the deceased grandfather, but they cannot demand possession of the goods as the nearest cognati. Thus much concerning sui heredes.

D. xxxviii. 16. 6, 7.

9. Emancipati autem liberi jure civili nihil juris habent: neque enim sui heredes sunt, quia in potestate esse desierunt parentis, neque alio ullo jure per legem duodecim tabularum vocantur. Sed prætor naturali æquitate motus dat eis bonorum possessionem unde liberi, perinde ac si in potestate parentis mortis tempore fuissent, sive soli sint sive cum suis heredibus concurrant. Itaque duobus liberis extantibus,

9. Emancipated children by the civil law have no right to the inheritance of their ascendant; being no longer under his power, they are not his sui heredes, nor are they called to inherit by any other right under the law of the Twelve Tables. But the prætor, obeying natural equity, grants them the possession of goods called unde liberi, as if they had been under the power of their ascendant at the time of his death, and this, whether they stand alone, or whether there are also others, who are sui heredes. Thus, when there are two children, one emancipated, and the other under power at his father's death, the latter, by the civil law, is alone the heir, and alone the sui heres; but, as the emancipated son, by the indulgence of the prætor, is admitted to his share, the sui heres becomes heir only of a part.

emancipato et qui mortis tempore in potestate fuerit, sane quidem is, qui in potestate fuerit, solus jure civili heres est, id est solus suus heres est: sed cum emancipatus beneficio prætoris in partem admittitur, evenit, ut suus heres pro parte heres fiat.

GAI. iii. 19, 25, 26; D. xxxviii. 6. 1. 9.

Not only emancipated children, but, if they themselves were dead, their children conceived after the emancipation, had the possessio bonorum given them by the prætor (D. xxxvii. 4. 5); and a grandchild conceived before the emancipation, and who remained in the power of the grandfather, was allowed to succeed to the inheritance of the emancipated son (D. xxxvii. 4. 6. pr.). The prætor could not give these persons the title of 'heir,' as that belonged only to those who received it from the jus civile; but he gave them possessio bonorum unde liberi (see Tit. 9. 3 note). If the emancipated son had children who remained in the power of the emancipator, he shared the inheritance with them, instead of excluding them. (D. xxxvii. 8. 1. pr. and l.) Emancipated children were, however, obliged to bring into, and add to, the inheritance all the property they themselves possessed at the time of the father's death, except peculium castrense and quasi-castrense (collatio bonorum); because, if they had remained in the family, all that they had acquired would have been acquired for the paterfamilias, and thus have formed part of the inheritance; and a married daughter succeeding as heres suus had to bring into the inheritance her dos (collatio dotis). (C. vi. 20. 4.) When a person, after a capitis deminutio, was restitutus in integrum, he also had the possessio bonorum given him, and received what he would have had if his disability had not prevented him from succeeding as sui heres. (D. xxxvii. 4. 1. 9.)

10. At hi, qui emancipati a parente in adoptionem se dederunt, non admittuntur ad bona naturalis patris quasi liberi, si modo, cum is moretur, in adoptiva familia sint. Nam vivo eo emancipati ab adoptivo patre perinde admittuntur ad bona naturalis patris, ac si emancipati ab ipso essent nec umquam in adoptiva familia fuissent: et convenienter, quod ad adoptivum patrem pertinet, extraneorum loco esse incipiunt. Post mortem vero naturalis patris emancipati ab adoptivo et quantum ad hunc æque extraneorum loco fiunt et, quantum ad naturalis parentis bona pertinet, nihilo magis

10. But those, who after emancipation have given themselves in adoption, are not admitted as children to the possession of the effects of their natural father, that is, if, at the time of his death, they are still in their adoptive family. But if, in the lifetime of their natural father, they have been emancipated by their adoptive father, they are then admitted to the possession of the goods of their natural father exactly as if they had been emancipated by him, and had never entered into the adoptive family. Accordingly, with regard to their adoptive father, they become from that moment strangers to him. But if they stand alone, or whether there are also others, who are sui heredes. Thus, when there are two children, one emancipated, and the other under power at his father's death, the latter, by the civil law, is alone the heir, and alone the suius heres; but, as the emancipated son, by the indulgence of the prætor, is admitted to his share, the suius heres becomes heir only of a part.

emancipato et qui mortis tempore in potestate fuerit, sane quidem is, qui in potestate fuerit, solus jure civili heres est, id est solus suus heres est: sed cum emancipatus beneficio prætoris in partem admittitur, evenit, ut suus heres pro parte heres fiat.

GAL. iii. 19, 25, 26; D. xxxviii. 6. 1. 9.

Not only emancipated children, but, if they themselves were dead, their children conceived after the emancipation, had the possessio bonorum given them by the prætor (D. xxxvii. 4. 5); and a grandchild conceived before the emancipation, and who remained in the power of the grandfather, was allowed to succeed to the inheritance of the emancipated son (D. xxxvii. 4. 6. pr.). The prætor could not give these persons the title of 'heir,' as that belonged only to those who received it from the jus civile; but he gave them possessio bonorum unde liberi (see Tit. 9. 3 note). If the emancipated son had children who remained in the power of the emancipator, he shared the inheritance with them, instead of excluding them. (D. xxxvii. 8. 1. pr. and 1.) Emancipated children were, however, obliged to bring into, and add to, the inheritance all the property they themselves possessed at the time of the father's death, except peculium castrense and quasi-castrense (collatio bonorum); because, if they had remained in the family, all that they had acquired would have been acquired for the paterfamilias, and thus have formed part of the inheritance; and a married daughter succeeding as heres suus had to bring into the inheritance her dos (collatio dotis). (C. vi. 20. 4.) When a person, after a capitis deminutio, was restitutus in integrum, he also had the possessio bonorum given him, and received what he would have had if his disability had not prevented him from succeeding as suius heres. (D. xxxvii. 4. 1. 9.)

10. At hi, qui emancipati a parente in adoptionem se dederunt, non admittuntur ab bona naturalis patris quasi liberi, si modo, cum is moretur, in adoptiva familia sint. Nam vivo eo emancipati ab adoptivo patre perinde admittuntur ad bona naturalis patris, ac si emancipati ab ipso essent nec umquam in adoptiva familia fuissent: et convenienter, quod ad adoptivum patrem pertinet, extraneorum loco esse incipiunt. Post mortem vero naturalis patris emancipati ab adoptivo et quantum ad hunc æque extraneorum loco fiunt et, quantum ad naturalis parentis bona pertinet, nihilo magis

10. But those, who after emancipation have given themselves in adoption, are not admitted as children to the possession of the effects of their natural father, that is, if, at the time of his death, they are still in their adoptive family. But if, in the lifetime of their natural father, they have been emancipated by their adoptive father, they are then admitted to the possession of the goods of their natural father exactly as if they had been emancipated by him, and had never entered into the adoptive family. Accordingly, with regard to their adoptive father, they become from that moment strangers to him. But if they are emancipated by their adoptive father after the death of their natural father, they are equally considered as strangers to their adoptive father; and yet do not gain the position of children with regard to the inheritance of their natural father. This has been so laid down, because it was unreasonable that it should be in the power of an adoptor to determine to whom the inheritance of a natural father should belong, whether to his children, or to the agnati.

liberorum gradum nanciscuntur: quod ideo sic placuit, quia iniquum erat, esse in potestate patris adoptivi, ad quos bona naturalis patris pertinerent, utrum ad liberos ejus an ad adgnatos.

D. xxxvii. 4. 6. 4.

Until the time of Justinian, an adopted son, during his continuance in his adoptive family, had no right of succession to his natural father, but was a suius heres of his adoptive father. If he left the adoptive family before the death of his natural father, he was called by the prætor to the succession of his natural father as a suius heres, but had, of course, no claim on the adoptive father. If he left the adoptive family after the death of his natural father, he had no claim to the succession of either natural or adoptive father, except as a cognatus of his natural father. Justinian, as we have seen in the First Book (Tit. 11. 2), altered this, and the adopted son, unless adopted by an ascendant, never lost his right to the succession of his natural father, although he gained a right to the succession ab intestato of his adoptive father. (See paragr. 14.) Justinian, it will be observed, does not in the text speak of the case of children given in adoption by their natural father, the changes he had made having altered their position. He speaks of children emancipated, and then giving themselves by arrogation to an adoptive father, and their position was not changed by his system. What is said in the text may, however, be applied to children given in adoption before the legislation of Justinian. What the text describes as unreasonable is that, after the natural father is dead, the adoptive father should have power to alter the succession of the natural father.

11. Minus ergo juris habent adoptivi filii quam naturales. Namque naturales emancipati beneficio prætoris gradum liberorum retinent, licet jure civili perdunt: adoptivi vero emancipati et jure civili perdunt gradum liberorum et a prætore non adjuvantur. Et recte: naturalia enim jura civilis ratio perimere non potest neque, quia desinunt sui heredes esse, desinere possunt filii filiæve aut nepotes neptesve esse: adoptivi vero emancipati extraneorum loco incipiunt esse, quia jus nomenque filii filiæve, quod per adoptionem consecuti sunt, alia

11. The rights of adopted children are therefore less than those of natural children, who, even after emancipation, retain the rank of children by the indulgence of the prætor, although they lose it by the civil law. But adopted children, when emancipated, lose the rank of children by the civil law, and are not aided by the prætor. And the distinction is very proper, for the civil law cannot destroy natural rights; and children cannot cease to be sons or daughters, grandsons or granddaughters, by ceasing to be sui heredes. But adopted children, when emancipated, become instantly stran-

liberorum gradum nanciscuntur: quod ideo sic placuit, quia iniquum erat, esse in potestate patris adoptivi, ad quos bona naturalis patris pertinerent, utrum ad liberos ejus an ad adgnatos.

they are emancipated by their adoptive father after the death of their natural father, they are equally considered as strangers to their adoptive father; and yet do not gain the position of children with regard to the inheritance of their natural father. This has been so laid down, because it was unreasonable that it should be in the power of an adoptor to determine to whom the inheritance of a natural father should belong, whether to his children, or to the agnati.

D. xxxvii. 4. 6. 4.

Until the time of Justinian, an adopted son, during his continuance in his adoptive family, had no right of succession to his natural father, but was a suus heres of his adoptive father. If he left the adoptive family before the death of his natural father, he was called by the prætor to the succession of his natural father as a suus heres, but had, of course, no claim on the adoptive father. If he left the adoptive family after the death of his natural father, he had no claim to the succession of either natural or adoptive father, except as a cognatus of his natural father. Justinian, as we have seen in the First Book (Tit. 11. 2), altered this, and the adopted son, unless adopted by an ascendant, never lost his right to the succession of his natural father, although he gained a right to the succession ab intestato of his adoptive father. (See paragr. 14.) Justinian, it will be observed, does not in the text speak of the case of children given in adoption by their natural father, the changes he had made having altered their position. He speaks of children emancipated, and then giving themselves by arrogation to an adoptive father, and their position was not changed by his system. What is said in the text may, however, be applied to children given in adoption before the legislation of Justinian. What the text describes as unreasonable is that, after the natural father is dead, the adoptive father should have power to alter the succession of the natural father.

11. Minus ergo juris habent adoptivi filii quam naturales. Namque naturales emancipati beneficio prætoris gradum liberorum retinent, licet jure civili perdunt: adoptivi vero emancipati et jure civili perdunt gradum liberorum et a prætore non adjuvantur. Et recte: naturalia enim jura civilis ratio perimere non potest neque, quia desinunt sui heredes esse, desinere possunt filii filiæve aut nepotes neptesve esse: adoptivi vero emancipati extraneorum loco incipiunt esse, quia jus nomenque filii filiæve, quod per adoptionem consecuti sunt, alia

11. The rights of adopted children are therefore less than those of natural children, who, even after emancipation, retain the rank of children by the indulgence of the prætor, although they lose it by the civil law. But adopted children, when emancipated, lose the rank of children by the civil law, and are not aided by the prætor. And the distinction is very proper, for the civil law cannot destroy natural rights; and children cannot cease to be sons or daughters, grandsons or granddaughters, by ceasing to be sui heredes. But adopted children, when emancipated, become instantly strangers; for the rights and title of son or daughter, which they have only obtained by adoption, may be destroyed by another institution of the civil law, that, namely, of emancipation.

civili ratione, id est emancipatione, perdunt.

GAI. ii. 136, 137. See Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 4.

12. Eadem hæc observantur et in ea bonorum possessione, quam contra tabulas testamenti parentis liberis præteritis, id est neque heredibus institutis neque, ut oportet, exheredatis, prætor pollicetur. Nam eos quidem, qui in potestate parentis mortis tempore fuerunt, et emancipatos vocat prætor ad eam bonorum possessionem: eos vero, qui in adoptiva familia fuerunt per hoc tempus, quo naturalis parens moreretur, repellit. Item adoptivos liberos emancipatos ab adoptivo patre sicut ab intestato, ita longe minus contra tabulas testamenti ad bona ejus admittit, quia desinunt in liberorum numero esse.

12. The same rules are observed in the possession of goods which the prætor gives contra tabulas to children who have been passed over, that is, who have neither been instituted heirs, nor properly disinherited. For the prætor calls to this possession of goods those children under the power of their ascendant at the time of his death, and those also who are emancipated; but he excludes those who were in an adoptive family at the decease of their natural ascendant. So, too, adopted children emancipated by their adoptive father, as they are not admitted to succeed their adoptive father ab intestato, much less are they admitted to possess the goods of their adoptive father contrary to his testament, for they cease to be included in the number of his children.

D. xxxviii. 6. 1. 6; D. xxxvii. 4. 6. 4.

When a testament was made, but a person who was a suus heres, or who was raised to the rank of a suus heres, was not expressly disinherited in the testament, the prætor gave him the possessio bonorum contra tabulas, i.e. contrary to the testament. Such a person is not raised to the rank of a suus heres so much as maintained in his position of suus heres.

13. Admonendi tamen sumus, eos, qui in adoptiva familia sunt quive post mortem naturalis parentis ab adoptivo patre emancipati fuerint, intestato parente naturali mortuo, licet ea parte edicti, qua liberi ad bonorum possessionem vocantur, non admittantur, alia tamen parte vocari, id est qua cognati defuncti vocantur. Ex qua parte ita admittuntur, si neque sui heredes liberi neque emancipati obstant neque adgnatus quidem ullus interveniat: ante enim prætor liberos vocat tam suos heredes quam emancipatos, deinde legitimos heredes, deinde proximos cognatos.

13. It is, however, to be observed that children still remaining in an adoptive family, or who have been emancipated by their adoptive father, after the decease of their natural father, who dies intestate, although not admitted by the part of the edict calling children to the possession of goods, are admitted by another part, by which the cognati of the deceased are called. They are, however, only thus admitted in default of sui heredes, emancipated children, and agnati. For the prætor first calls the children, both the sui heredes and those emancipated, then the legitimi heredes, and then the nearest cognati.

GAI. iii. 31; D. xxxviii. 8. 1. 4.

14. Sed ea omnia antiquitati quidem placuerunt: aliquam autem

14. Such were the rules that formerly obtained; but they have re-civili ratione, id est emancipatione, perdunt.

gers; for the rights and title of son or daughter, which they have only obtained by adoption, may be destroyed by another institution of the civil law, that, namely, of emancipation.

GAI. ii. 136, 137. See Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 4.

12. Eadem hæc observantur et in ea bonorum possessione, quam contra tabulas testamenti parentis liberis præteritis, id est neque heredibus institutis neque, ut oportet, exheredatis, prætor pollicetur. Nam eos quidem, qui in potestate parentis mortis tempore fuerunt, et emancipatos vocat prætor ad eam bonorum possessionem: eos vero, qui in adoptiva familia fuerunt per hoc tempus, quo naturalis parens moreretur, repellit. Item adoptivos liberos emancipatos ab adoptivo patre sicut ab intestato, ita longe minus contra tabulas testamenti ad bona ejus admittit, quia desinunt in liberorum numero esse.

12. The same rules are observed in the possession of goods which the prætor gives contra tabulas to children who have been passed over, that is, who have neither been instituted heirs, nor properly disinherited. For the prætor calls to this possession of goods those children under the power of their ascendant at the time of his death, and those also who are emancipated; but he excludes those who were in an adoptive family at the decease of their natural ascendant. So, too, adopted children emancipated by their adoptive father, as they are not admitted to succeed their adoptive father ab intestato, much less are they admitted to possess the goods of their adoptive father contrary to his testament, for they cease to be included in the number of his children.

D. xxxviii. 6. 1. 6; D. xxxvii. 4. 6. 4.

When a testament was made, but a person who was a suus heres, or who was raised to the rank of a suus heres, was not expressly disinherited in the testament, the prætor gave him the possessio bonorum contra tabulas, i.e. contrary to the testament. Such a person is not raised to the rank of a suus heres so much as maintained in his position of suus heres.

13. Admonendi tamen sumus, eos, qui in adoptiva familia sunt quive post mortem naturalis parentis ab adoptivo patre emancipati fuerint, intestato parente naturali mortuo, licet ea parte edicti, qua liberi ad bonorum possessionem vocantur, non admittantur, alia tamen parte vocari, id est qua cognati defuncti vocantur. Ex qua parte ita admittuntur, si neque sui heredes liberi neque emancipati obstant neque adgnatus quidem ullus interveniat: ante enim prætor liberos vocat tam suos heredes quam emancipatos, deinde legitimos heredes, deinde proximos cognatos.

13. It is, however, to be observed that children still remaining in an adoptive family, or who have been emancipated by their adoptive father, after the decease of their natural father, who dies intestate, although not admitted by the part of the edict calling children to the possession of goods, are admitted by another part, by which the cognati of the deceased are called. They are, however, only thus admitted in default of sui heredes, emancipated children, and agnati. For the prætor first calls the children, both the sui heredes and those emancipated, then the legitimi heredes, and then the nearest cognati.

GAI. iii. 31; D. xxxviii. 8. 1. 4.

14. Sed ea omnia antiquitati quidem placuerunt: aliquam autem

14. Such were the rules that formerly obtained; but they have re-

emendationem a nostra constitutione acceperunt, quam super his personis posuimus, quæ a patribus suis naturalibus in adoptionem alii dantur. Invenimus etenim nonnullos casus, in quibus filii et naturalium parentum successionem propter adoptionem amittebant et, adoptione facile per emancipationem soluta, ad neutrius patris successionem vocabantur. Hoc solito more corrigentes, constitutionem scripsimus, per quam definivimus, quando parens naturalis filium suum adoptandum alii dederit, integra omnia jura ita servari, atque si in patris naturalis potestate permansisset nec penitus adoptio fuerit subsecuta: nisi in hoc tantummodo casu, ut possit ab intestato ad patris adoptivi venire successionem. Testamento autem ab eo facto neque jure civili neque prætorio aliquid ex hereditate ejus persequi potest neque contra tabulas bonorum possessione agnita neque inofficiosi querela instituta, cum nec necessitas patri adoptivo imponitur vel heredem eum instituere vel exheredatum facere, utpote nullo naturali vinculo copulatum: neque si ex Sabiniano senatusconsulto ex tribus maribus fuerit adoptatus; nam et in hujusmodi casu neque quarta ei servatur nec ulla actio ad ejus persecutionem ei competit. Nostra autem constitutio exceptus est is, quem parens naturalis adoptandum susceperit: utroque enim jure tam naturali quam legitimo in hanc personam concurrente, pristina jura tali adoptioni servavimus, quemadmodum si paterfamilias sese dederit adrogandum. Quæ specialiter et singillatim ex præfate constitutionis tenore possunt colligi.

ceived some emendation from our constitution relating to persons given in adoption by their natural fathers. For cases have occurred in which sons have lost by adoption their succession to their natural ascendants, and, the tie of adoption being easily dissolved by emancipation, have lost the right of succeeding to either father. Correcting, therefore, as usual, what is wrong, we have promulgated a constitution enacting that, when a natural father has given his son in adoption, the rights of the son shall be preserved exactly as if he had still remained in the power of his natural father, and no adoption had taken place; except only in this, that the person adopted may succeed to his adoptive father, if he dies intestate. But, if the adoptive father makes a testament, the adopted son can neither by the civil law nor under the prætorian edict obtain any part of the inheritance, whether he demands possession of the effects contra tabulas, or alleges that the testament is inofficious; for an adoptive father is under no obligation to institute or disinherit his adopted son, there being no natural tie between them, not even if the adopted son has been chosen among three brothers, according to the senatusconsultum Sabinianum, for even in this case the son does not obtain the fourth part of his adoptive father's effects, nor has he any action whereby to claim it. But persons adopted by an ascendant are excepted in our constitution; for, as natural and civil rights both concur in their favour, we have thought proper to preserve to this adoption its effect under the old law, as also to the arrogation of a paterfamilias. But this, in all its details, may be collected from the tenor of the above-mentioned constitution.

C. viii. 47. 10. pr. 1, 2, 3.

Theophilus, in his Paraphrase, tells us that when a person adopted one of three male children, he was obliged, by the senatusconsultum Sabinianum, to leave him a fourth part of his property, but gives no reason for the rule, and we have no means of ascertaining what the true reason was. Justinian did away with the provision of the senatusconsultum, because it was not, under his legislation, necessary to protect specially the person thus chosen, inasmuch as no adopted child lost his share of his inheritance of his natural father. (Bk. i. Tit. 11. 2.)

emendationem a nostra constitutione acceperunt, quam super his personis posuimus, quæ a patribus suis naturalibus in adoptionem alii dantur. Invenimus etenim nonnullos casus, in quibus filii et naturalium parentum successionem propter adoptionem amittebant et, adoptione facile per emancipationem soluta, ad neutrius patris successionem vocabantur. Hoc solito more corrigentes, constitutionem scripsimus, per quam definivimus, quando parens naturalis filium suum adoptandum alii dederit, integra omnia jura ita servari, atque si in patris naturalis potestate permansisset nec penitus adoptio fuerit subsecuta: nisi in hoc tantummodo casu, ut possit ab intestato ad patris adoptivi venire successionem. Testamento autem ab eo facto neque jure civili neque prætorio aliquid ex hereditate ejus persequi potest neque contra tabulas bonorum possessione agnita neque inofficiosi querela instituta, cum nec necessitas patri adoptivo imponitur vel heredem eum instituere vel exheredatum facere, utpote nullo naturali vinculo copulatum: neque si ex Sabiniano senatusconsulto ex tribus maribus fuerit adoptatus; nam et in hujusmodi casu neque quarta ei servatur nec ulla actio ad ejus persecutionem ei competit. Nostra autem constitutione exceptus est is, quem parens naturalis adoptandum susceperit: utroque enim jure tam naturali quam legitimo in hanc personam concurrente, pristina jura tali adoptioni servavimus, quemadmodum si paterfamilias sese dederit adrogandum. Quæ specialiter et singillatim ex præfatæ constitutionis tenore possunt colligi.

ceived some emendation from our constitution relating to persons given in adoption by their natural fathers. For cases have occurred in which sons have lost by adoption their succession to their natural ascendants, and, the tie of adoption being easily dissolved by emancipation, have lost the right of succeeding to either father. Correcting, therefore, as usual, what is wrong, we have promulgated a constitution enacting that, when a natural father has given his son in adoption, the rights of the son shall be preserved exactly as if he had still remained in the power of his natural father, and no adoption had taken place; except only in this, that the person adopted may succeed to his adoptive father, if he dies intestate. But, if the adoptive father makes a testament, the adopted son can neither by the civil law nor under the prætorian edict obtain any part of the inheritance, whether he demands possession of the effects contra tabulas, or alleges that the testament is inofficious; for an adoptive father is under no obligation to institute or disinherit his adopted son, there being no natural tie between them, not even if the adopted son has been chosen among three brothers, according to the senatusconsultum Sabinianum, for even in this case the son does not obtain the fourth part of his adoptive father's effects, nor has he any action whereby to claim it. But persons adopted by an ascendant are excepted in our constitution; for, as natural and civil rights both concur in their favour, we have thought proper to preserve to this adoption its effect under the old law, as also to the arrogation of a paterfamilias. But this, in all its details, may be collected from the tenor of the above-mentioned constitution.

C. viii. 47. 10. pr. 1, 2, 3.

Theophilus, in his Paraphrase, tells us that when a person adopted one of three male children, he was obliged, by the senatusconsultum Sabinianum, to leave him a fourth part of his property, but gives no reason for the rule, and we have no means of ascertaining what the true reason was. Justinian did away with the provision of the senatusconsultum, because it was not, under his legislation, necessary to protect specially the person thus chosen, inasmuch as no adopted child lost his share of his inheritance of his natural father. (Bk. i. Tit. 11. 2.)

Children adopted by a stranger were not, under Justinian's legislation, properly speaking, placed in the rank of sui heredes, but remained sui heredes, for the adoption had no effect on their position in their natural family. The effect of adoption was destroyed, not specially provided against.

15. Item vetustas, ex masculis progenitos plus diligens, solos nepotes vel neptes, qui ex virili sexu descendunt, ad suorum vocabat successionem et juri adgnatorum eos anteponebat: nepotes autem, qui ex filiabus nati sunt, et pronepotes ex neptibus cognatorum loco numerans, post adgnatorum lineam eos vocabat tam in avi vel proavi materni quam in aviae vel proaviae sive paternae sive maternae successionem. Divi autem principes non passi sunt talem contra naturam injuriam sine competentem emendatione relinquere: sed cum nepotis et pronepotis nomen commune est utrisque, qui tam ex masculis quam ex feminis descendunt, ideo eundem gradum et ordinem successionis eis donaverunt: sed ut aliquid amplius sit eis, qui non solum naturæ, sed etiam veteris juris suffragio muniuntur, portionem nepotum et neptium vel deinceps, de quibus supra diximus, paulo minuendam esse existimaverunt, ut minus tertiam partem acciperent, quam mater eorum vel avia fuerat acceptura, vel pater eorum vel avus paternus sive maternus, quando femina mortua sit, cujus de hereditate agitur, hisque, licet soli sint, adeuntibus adgnatos minime vocabant. Et quemadmodum lex duodecim tabularum filio mortuo nepotes vel neptes vel pronepotes et proneptes in locum patris sui ad successionem avi vocat: ita et principalis dispositio in locum matris suæ vel avia eos cum jam designata partis tertiæ deminutione vocat.

15. The ancient law, favouring descendants from males, called only grandchildren so descended to the succession as sui heredes, in preference to the agnati, while grandchildren born of daughters, and great-grandchildren born of granddaughters, were reckoned among cognati, and succeeded only after the agnati to their maternal grandfather and great-grandfather, or to their grandmother or great-grandmother, maternal or paternal. But the emperors would not suffer such a violence against nature to continue without an adequate alteration; and inasmuch as the name of grandchild and great-grandchild is common to descendants both by females and by males, they gave all the same right and order of succession. But, that persons whose privileges rest not only on nature, but also on the ancient law, might enjoy some peculiar advantage, they thought it right that the portions of grandchildren, great-grandchildren, and other lineal descendants of a female, should be somewhat diminished, so that they should not receive so much by a third part as their mother or grandmother would have received, or, when the succession is to the inheritance of a woman, as their father or grandfather, paternal or maternal, would have received; and, although there were no other descendants, if they entered on the inheritance, the emperors did not call the agnati to the succession. And as, upon the decease of a son, the law of the Twelve Tables calls the grandchildren and great-grandchildren, male and female, to represent their father in the succession to their grandfather, so the imperial legislation calls them to take in succession the place of their mother or grandmother, subject only to the above-mentioned deduction of a third part.

C. vi. 55. 9.

This section contains the substance of a constitution of the Emperors Theodosius, Valentinian, and Arcadius. (Cod. Theod. v. 5.) Justinian here says, that when there were descendants by a

Children adopted by a stranger were not, under Justinian's legislation, properly speaking, placed in the rank of sui heredes, but remained sui heredes, for the adoption had no effect on their position in their natural family. The effect of adoption was destroyed, not specially provided against.

15. Item vetustas, ex masculis progenitis plus diligens, solos nepotes vel neptes, qui ex virili sexu descendunt, ad suorum vocabat successionem et juri adgnatorum eos anteponebat: nepotes autem, qui ex filiabus nati sunt, et pronepotes ex neptibus cognatorum loco numerans, post adgnatorum lineam eos vocabat tam in avi vel proavi materni quam in aviae vel proaviae sive paternae sive maternae successionem. Divi autem principes non passi sunt talem contra naturam injuriam sine competentem emendatione relinquere: sed cum nepotis et pronepotis nomen commune est utrisque, qui tam ex masculis quam ex feminis descendunt, ideo eundem gradum et ordinem successionis eis donaverunt: sed ut aliquid amplius sit eis, qui non solum naturae, sed etiam veteris juris suffragio muniuntur, portionem nepotum et neptium vel deinceps, de quibus supra diximus, paulo minuendam esse existimaverunt, ut minus tertiam partem acciperent, quam mater eorum vel avia fuerat acceptura, vel pater eorum vel avus paternus sive maternus, quando femina mortua sit, cujus de hereditate agitur, hisque, licet soli sint, advenitibus adgnatos minime vocabant. Et quemadmodum lex duodecim tabularum filio mortuo nepotes vel neptes vel pronepotes et proneptes in locum patris sui ad successionem avi vocat: ita et principalis dispositio in locum matris suae vel aviae eos cum jam designata partis tertiae deminutione vocat.

15. The ancient law, favouring descendants from males, called only grandchildren so descended to the succession as sui heredes, in preference to the agnati, while grandchildren born of daughters, and great-grandchildren born of granddaughters, were reckoned among cognati, and succeeded only after the agnati to their maternal grandfather and great-grandfather, or to their grandmother or great-grandmother, maternal or paternal. But the emperors would not suffer such a violence against nature to continue without an adequate alteration; and inasmuch as the name of grandchild and great-grandchild is common to descendants both by females and by males, they gave all the same right and order of succession. But, that persons whose privileges rest not only on nature, but also on the ancient law, might enjoy some peculiar advantage, they thought it right that the portions of grandchildren, great-grandchildren, and other lineal descendants of a female, should be somewhat diminished, so that they should not receive so much by a third part as their mother or grandmother would have received, or, when the succession is to the inheritance of a woman, as their father or grandfather, paternal or maternal, would have received; and, although there were no other descendants, if they entered on the inheritance, the emperors did not call the agnati to the succession. And as, upon the decease of a son, the law of the Twelve Tables calls the grandchildren and great-grandchildren, male and female, to represent their father in the succession to their grandfather, so the imperial legislation calls them to take in succession the place of their mother or grandmother, subject only to the above-mentioned deduction of a third part.

C. vi. 55. 9.

This section contains the substance of a constitution of the Emperors Theodosius, Valentinian, and Arcadius. (Cod. Theod. v. 5.) Justinian here says, that when there were descendants by a female who entered on the inheritance, the agnati were not called to the succession. We gather, however, from the Code itself, that the agnati had, under this constitution, a fourth part of the inheritance, as a sort of Falcidia. (See next paragr.)

16. Sed nos, cum adhuc dubitatio manebat inter adgnatos et memoratos nepotes, partem quartam defuncti substantiæ adgnatis sibi vindicantibus ex cujusdam constitutionis auctoritate, memoratam quidem constitutionem a nostro codice segregavimus neque inseri eam ex Theodosiano codice in eo concessimus. Nostra autem constitutione promulgata toti juri ejus derogatum est et sanximus, talibus nepotibus ex filia vel pronepotibus ex nepte et deinceps superstitibus, adgnatos nullam partem mortui successionis sibi vindicare, ne hi, qui ex transversa linea veniunt, potiores his habeantur, qui recto jure descendunt: quam constitutionem nostram optinere secundum sui vigorem et tempora et nunc sancimus. Ita tamen quemadmodum inter filios et nepotes ex filio antiquitas statuit non in capita sed in stirpes dividi hereditatem, similiter nos inter filios et nepotes ex filia distributionem fieri jubemus, vel inter omnes nepotes et neptes et alias deinceps personas, ut utraque progenies matris suæ vel patris, aviæ vel avi portionem sine ulla diminutione consequantur, et, si forte unus vel duo ex una parte, ex altera tres aut quattuor extent, unus aut duo dimidiam, alteri tres aut quattuor alteram dimidiam hereditatis habeant.

16. But, as there still remained matter of dispute between the agnati and the above-mentioned grandchildren, the agnati claiming the fourth part of the estate of the deceased by virtue of a constitution, we have rejected this constitution, and have not permitted it to be inserted into our code from that of Theodosius. And in the constitution we have ourselves promulgated, we have completely departed from the provisions of this former constitution, and have enacted that agnati shall take no part in the succession of the deceased, when there are grandchildren born of a daughter, or great-grandchildren born of a granddaughter, or any other descendants from a female in the direct line; so that those in a collateral line may not be preferred to direct descendants. This constitution is to prevail from the date of its promulgation in its full force, as we here again enact. And as the old law ordered, that between the sons of the deceased and his grandsons by a son, every inheritance should be divided in stirpes, and not in capita, so we also ordain, that a similar distribution shall be made between sons and grandsons by a daughter, and between grandsons and granddaughters, great-grandsons and great-granddaughters, and all other descendants in a direct line; so that the children of either branch may receive the share of their mother or father, their grandmother or grandfather, without any diminution; and, if of the one branch there should be one or two children, and of the other branch three or four, then the one or two shall have one half, and the three or four the other half, of the inheritance.

C. vi. 55. 12.

Those who, not being sui heredes, were admitted to rank as such, were not necessarii. They could accept the inheritance or not, which they only acquired when they entered on it, his advenitibus. (Paragr. 15.)

The principal changes in the succession of the sui heredes were these:—

1. Those at the time of his death in the power of the de cujus

female who entered on the inheritance, the agnati were not called to the succession. We gather, however, from the Code itself, that the agnati had, under this constitution, a fourth part of the inheritance, as a sort of Falcidia. (See next paragr.)

16. Sed nos, cum adhuc dubitatio manebat inter adgnatos et memoratos nepotes, partem quartam defuncti substantiæ adgnatis sibi vindicantibus ex cujusdam constitutionis auctoritate, memoratam quidem constitutionem a nostro codice segregavimus neque inseri eam ex Theodosiano codice in eo concessimus. Nostra autem constitutione promulgata toti juri ejus derogatum est et sanximus, talibus nepotibus ex filia vel pronepotibus ex nepte et deinceps superstitibus, adgnatos nullam partem mortui successionis sibi vindicare, ne hi, qui ex transversa linea veniunt, potiores his habeantur, qui recto jure descendunt: quam constitutionem nostram optinere secundum sui vigorem et tempora et nunc sancimus. Ita tamen quemadmodum inter filios et nepotes ex filio antiquitas statuit non in capita sed in stirpes dividi hereditatem, similiter nos inter filios et nepotes ex filia distributionem fieri jubemus, vel inter omnes nepotes et neptes et alias deinceps personas, ut utraque progenies matris suæ vel patris, aviæ vel avi portionem sine ulla diminutione consequantur, et, si forte unus vel duo ex una parte, ex altera tres aut quattuor extent, unus aut duo dimidiam, alteri tres aut quattuor alteram dimidiam hereditatis habeant.

16. But, as there still remained matter of dispute between the agnati and the above-mentioned grandchildren, the agnati claiming the fourth part of the estate of the deceased by virtue of a constitution, we have rejected this constitution, and have not permitted it to be inserted into our code from that of Theodosius. And in the constitution we have ourselves promulgated, we have completely departed from the provisions of this former constitution, and have enacted that agnati shall take no part in the succession of the deceased, when there are grandchildren born of a daughter, or great-grandchildren born of a granddaughter, or any other descendants from a female in the direct line; so that those in a collateral line may not be preferred to direct descendants. This constitution is to prevail from the date of its promulgation in its full force, as we here again enact. And as the old law ordered, that between the sons of the deceased and his grandsons by a son, every inheritance should be divided in stirpes, and not in capita, so we also ordain, that a similar distribution shall be made between sons and grandsons by a daughter, and between grandsons and granddaughters, great-grandsons and great-granddaughters, and all other descendants in a direct line; so that the children of either branch may receive the share of their mother or father, their grandmother or grandfather, without any diminution; and, if of the one branch there should be one or two children, and of the other branch three or four, then the one or two shall have one half, and the three or four the other half, of the inheritance.

C. vi. 55. 12.

Those who, not being sui heredes, were admitted to rank as such, were not necessarii. They could accept the inheritance or not, which they only acquired when they entered on it, his adeuntibus. (Paragr. 15.)

The principal changes in the succession of the sui heredes were these:—

1. Those at the time of his death in the power of the de cujus

(i.e. the person of whose inheritance we are speaking), and becoming sui juris by his death, succeeded as sui heredes under the law of the Twelve Tables.

2. The prætor, by giving them the possessio bonorum, placed in the rank of sui heredes the following classes of persons: (1) emancipated children; (2), if the emancipated father was dead, grandchildren conceived after his emancipation, or (3), if the de cuius was the emancipated son, his unemancipated children conceived before the emancipation; (4) sui heredes deprived of the power of inheriting by a capitis deminutio, but afterwards restituti in integrum; and (5) adopted children emancipated by the adoptive father during the life of the de cuius, their natural father.

3. A constitution of Theodosius permitted the children and descendants of deceased daughters to succeed to the portion their mother would have received as suus heres, giving up one-third of it to other sui heredes, if there were any, and, if not, one-fourth to the agnati.

4. Under Justinian, adoption by a stranger ceased to have any effect upon the position of the person adopted in his natural family; and the persons referred to in the constitution of Theodosius just mentioned succeeded to the whole share of the deceased daughter without any deduction.

TIT. II. DE LEGITIMA ADGNATORUM SUCCESSIONE.

Si nemo suus heres vel eorum, quos inter suos heredes prætor vel constitutiones vocant, extat et qui successionem quoquo modo amplectatur: tunc ex lege duodecim tabularum ad adgnatum proximum hereditas pertinet.

When there is no suus heres, nor any of those persons called by the prætor or the constitutions to inherit with sui heredes, to take the succession in any way, the inheritance, according to the law of the Twelve Tables, belongs to the nearest agnatus.

GAL. iii. 9.

All persons were agnati who, descended from a common ancestor, would, if that ancestor had been living, and they themselves not emancipated, have been in his power. The sui heredes were thus agnati; but as they had the title of sui heredes peculiar to themselves, only those agnati received the name of agnati who were connected with the de cuius by a collateral line.

1. Sunt autem adgnati, ut primo quoque libro tradidimus, cognati per virilis sexus personas cognatione juncti, quasi a patre cognati. Itaque eodem patre nati fratres adgnati sibi sunt, qui et consanguinei vocantur, nec requiritur, an etiam eandem matrem habuerint. Item patruus fratris filio et invicem is illi adgnatus est. Eodem numero sunt fratres

1. Agnati, as we have explained in the First Book, are those cognati who are related through males, that is, are cognati by the father; and therefore brothers, who are the sons of the same father, are agnati to each other (they are also called consanguinei), and it is not asked whether they have the same mother. An uncle is also agnatus to his brother's son, and

(i.e. the person of whose inheritance we are speaking), and becoming sui juris by his death, succeeded as sui heredes under the law of the Twelve Tables.

2. The prætor, by giving them the possessio bonorum, placed in the rank of sui heredes the following classes of persons: (1) emancipated children; (2), if the emancipated father was dead, grandchildren conceived after his emancipation, or (3), if the de cuius was the emancipated son, his unemancipated children conceived before the emancipation; (4) sui heredes deprived of the power of inheriting by a capitis deminutio, but afterwards restituti in integrum; and (5) adopted children emancipated by the adoptive father during the life of the de cuius, their natural father.

3. A constitution of Theodosius permitted the children and descendants of deceased daughters to succeed to the portion their mother would have received as suus heres, giving up one-third of it to other sui heredes, if there were any, and, if not, one-fourth to the agnati.

4. Under Justinian, adoption by a stranger ceased to have any effect upon the position of the person adopted in his natural family; and the persons referred to in the constitution of Theodosius just mentioned succeeded to the whole share of the deceased daughter without any deduction.

TIT. II. DE LEGITIMA ADGNATORUM SUCCESSIONE.

Si nemo suus heres vel eorum, quos inter suos heredes prætor vel constitutiones vocant, extat et qui successionem quoquo modo amplectatur: tunc ex lege duodecim tabularum ad adgnatum proximum hereditas pertinet.

When there is no suus heres, nor any of those persons called by the prætor or the constitutions to inherit with sui heredes, to take the succession in any way, the inheritance, according to the law of the Twelve Tables, belongs to the nearest agnatus.

GAL. iii. 9.

All persons were agnati who, descended from a common ancestor, would, if that ancestor had been living, and they themselves not emancipated, have been in his power. The sui heredes were thus agnati; but as they had the title of sui heredes peculiar to themselves, only those agnati received the name of agnati who were connected with the de cuius by a collateral line.

1. Sunt autem adgnati, ut primo quoque libro tradidimus, cognati per virilis sexus personas cognatione juncti, quasi a patre cognati. Itaque eodem patre nati fratres adgnati sibi sunt, qui et consanguinei vocantur, nec requiritur, an etiam eandem matrem habuerint. Item patruus fratris filio et invicem is illi adgnatus est. Eodem numero sunt fratres

1. Agnati, as we have explained in the First Book, are those cognati who are related through males, that is, are cognati by the father; and therefore brothers, who are the sons of the same father, are agnati to each other (they are also called consanguinei), and it is not asked whether they have the same mother. An uncle is also agnatus to his brother's son, and

patrueles, id est qui ex duobus fratribus procreati sunt, qui etiam consobrini vocantur. Qua ratione etiam ad plures gradus adgnationis pervenire poterimus. Hi quoque, qui post mortem patris nascuntur, nanciscuntur consanguinitatis jura. Non tamen omnibus simul adgnatis dat lex hereditatem, sed his, qui tunc proximo gradu sunt, cum certum esse coeperit, aliquem intestatum decessisse.

conversely, the brother's son to his paternal uncle. So also fratres patrueles, that is, the children of brothers (also called consobrini), are likewise agnati. We may thus reckon many degrees of agnation. Children, too, who are born after the decease of their father, obtain the rights of consanguinity. The law does not, however, give the inheritance to all the agnati, but to those only who are in the nearest degree at the time that it becomes certain that the deceased has died intestate.

GAI. i. 156; iii. 10, 11.

2. Per adoptionem quoque adgnationis jus consistit, veluti inter filios naturales et eos, quos pater eorum adoptavit (nec dubium est, quin proprie consanguinei appellentur); item si quis ex ceteris adgnatis tuis, veluti frater aut patruus aut denique is, qui longiore gradu est, aliquem adoptaverit, agnatio inter vos esse non dubitatur.

2. The right of agnation arises also through adoption; thus the natural and the adopted sons of the same father are agnati. And such persons are without doubt properly included in the term consanguinei. Also, if one of your agnati, as, for example, a brother, a paternal uncle, or any other agnatus, however remote, adopts anyone, then there is undoubtedly agnation between you.

3. Ceterum inter masculos quidem adgnationis jure hereditas etiam longissimo gradu ultro citroque capitur. Quod ad feminas vero ita placebat, ut ipsæ consanguinitatis jure tantum capiant hereditatem, si sorores sint, ulterius non capiant: masculi vero ad eorum hereditates, etiam si longissimo gradu sint, admittantur. Qua de causa fratris tui aut patris tui filiae vel amitæ tuæ hereditas ad te pertinebat, tua vero ad illas non pertinebat. Quod ideo ita constitutum erat, quia commodius videbatur, ita jura constitui, ut plerumque hereditates ad masculos confluerent. Sed quia sane iniquum erat, in universum eas quasi extraneas repelli, prætor eas ad bonorum possessionem admittebat ea parte, qua proximitatis nomine bonorum possessionem pollicetur: ex qua parte ita scilicet admittuntur, si neque adgnatus ullus nec proximior cognatus interveniat. Et hæc quidem lex duodecim tabularum nullo modo introduxit, sed simplicitatem legibus amicam amplexa, simili modo omnes adgnatos sive masculos sive feminas cujuscumque gradus ad similitudinem suorum invicem ad successionem vocabat: media autem jurisprudentia, quæ

3. Agnation gives males, however distant in degree, reciprocal rights to the succession to inheritances. But it was thought right that females should only inherit by title of consanguinity if they were sisters, and not if in a more remote degree; while their male agnati, in however remote a degree, were admitted to succeed to them. Thus the inheritance of your brother's daughter, or of the daughter of your paternal uncle or aunt, would belong to you: but not your inheritance to them. This distinction was made, because it seemed expedient that the law should be so ordered, that inheritances should for the most part fall into the possession of males. But as it was contrary to equity that females should be thus almost wholly excluded as strangers, the prætor admits them to the possession of goods under the section of his edict giving possession of goods on account of proximity; but they are only admitted under this section if there is no agnatus, nor any nearer cognatus coming before them. The law of the Twelve Tables did not introduce any of these distinctions; but, with the simplicity proper to all legislation, called the agnati of either sex, or any degree, to a reciprocal succession, in the same

Right of agnation arises also through adoption

Thus the inheritance of your brother's daughter, or of the daughter of your paternal uncle or aunt, would belong to you: but not your inheritance to them.

Prætor

12th

patrueles, id est qui ex duobus fratribus procreati sunt, qui etiam consobrini vocantur. Qua ratione etiam ad plures gradus adgnationis pervenire poterimus. Hi quoque, qui post mortem patris nascuntur, nanciscuntur consanguinitatis jura. Non tamen omnibus simul adgnatis dat lex hereditatem, sed his, qui tunc proximo gradu sunt, cum certum esse coeperit, aliquem intestatum decessisse.

conversely, the brother's son to his paternal uncle. So also fratres patrueles, that is, the children of brothers (also called consobrini), are likewise agnati. We may thus reckon many degrees of agnation. Children, too, who are born after the decease of their father, obtain the rights of consanguinity. The law does not, however, give the inheritance to all the agnati, but to those only who are in the nearest degree at the time that it becomes certain that the deceased has died intestate.

GAI. i. 156; iii. 10, 11.

2. Per adoptionem quoque adgnationis jus consistit, veluti inter filios naturales et eos, quos pater eorum adoptavit (nec dubium est, quin proprie consanguinei appellentur); item si quis ex ceteris adgnatis tuis, veluti frater aut patruus aut denique is, qui longiore gradu est, aliquem adoptaverit, adgnatio inter vos esse non dubitatur.

2. The right of agnation arises also through adoption; thus the natural and the adopted sons of the same father are agnati. And such persons are without doubt properly included in the term consanguinei. Also, if one of your agnati, as, for example, a brother, a paternal uncle, or any other agnatus, however remote, adopts anyone, then there is undoubtedly agnation between you.

3. Ceterum inter masculos quidem adgnationis jure hereditas etiam longissimo gradu ultro citroque capitur. Quod ad feminas vero ita placebat, ut ipsæ consanguinitatis jure tantum capiant hereditatem, si sorores sint, ulterius non capiant: masculi vero ad eorum hereditates, etiam si longissimo gradu sint, admittantur. Qua de causa fratris tui aut patris tui filia vel amita tua hereditas ad te pertinebat, tua vero ad illas non pertinebat. Quod ideo ita constitutum erat, quia commodius videbatur, ita jura constitui, ut plerumque hereditates ad masculos confluerent. Sed quia sane iniquum erat, in universum eas quasi extraneas repelli, prætor eas ad bonorum possessionem admittebat ea parte, qua proximitatis nomine bonorum possessionem pollicetur: ex qua parte ita scilicet admittuntur, si neque adgnatus ullus nec proximior cognatus interveniat. Et hæc quidem lex duodecim tabularum nullo modo introduxit, sed simplicitatem legibus amicam amplexa, simili modo omnes adgnatos sive masculos sive feminas cujuscumque gradus ad similitudinem suorum invicem ad successionem vocabat: media autem jurisprudentia, quæ

3. Agnation gives males, however distant in degree, reciprocal rights to the succession to inheritances. But it was thought right that females should only inherit by title of consanguinity if they were sisters, and not if in a more remote degree; while their male agnati, in however remote a degree, were admitted to succeed to them. Thus the inheritance of your brother's daughter, or of the daughter of your paternal uncle or aunt, would belong to you: but not your inheritance to them. This distinction was made, because it seemed expedient that the law should be so ordered, that inheritances should for the most part fall into the possession of males. But as it was contrary to equity that females should be thus almost wholly excluded as strangers, the prætor admits them to the possession of goods under the section of his edict giving possession of goods on account of proximity; but they are only admitted under this section if there is no agnatus, nor any nearer cognatus coming before them. The law of the Twelve Tables did not introduce any of these distinctions; but, with the simplicity proper to all legislation, called the agnati of either sex, or any degree, to a reciprocal succession, in the same

Right of agnation

inheritance

or no cognate

Prætor

12th

erat lege quidem duodecim tabularum junior, imperiali autem dispositione anterior, subtilitate quadam excogitata, præfatam differentiam inducebat et penitus eas a successione agnatorum repellebat, omnia alia successione incognita, donec prætores, paulatim asperitatem juris civilis corrigentes sive, quod deest, adimplentes, humano proposito alium ordinem suis edictis addiderunt et, cognationis linea proximitatis nomine introducta, per bonorum possessionem eas adjuvabant et pollicebantur his bonorum possessionem, quæ unde cognati appellatur. Nos vero legem duodecim tabularum sequentes et ejus vestigia in hac parte conservantes, laudamus quidem prætores suæ humanitatis, non tamen eos in plenum causæ mederi invenimus: quare etenim, uno eodemque gradu naturali concurrente et agnationis titulis tam in masculis quam in feminis æqualiter constitutis, masculis quidem dabatur ad successionem venire omnium agnatorum, ex agnatis autem mulieribus nullis penitus nisi soli sorori ad agnatorum successionem patebat aditus? Ideo in plenum omnia reducentes et ad jus duodecim tabularum eandem dispositionem exequantes, nostra constitutione sanximus, omnes legitimas personas, id est per virilem sexum descendentes, sive masculini sive feminini generis sunt, simili modo ad jura successionis legitimæ ab intestato vocari secundum gradus sui prærogativam nec ideo excludendas, quia consanguinitatis jura sicuti germanæ non habent.

manner as sui heredes. It was an intermediate jurisprudence, posterior to the law of the Twelve Tables, but prior to the imperial constitutions, that in a spirit of subtle ingenuity introduced this distinction, and entirely excluded females from the succession of agnati, no other method of succession being then known, until the prætors, correcting by decrees the asperity of the civil law, or supplying what was deficient, were led by their feeling of equity to add in their edicts a new order of succession. The line of cognati was admitted according to the degrees of proximity, and relief was thus afforded to females by the prætor giving them the possession of goods called unde cognati. But we, turning to the law of the Twelve Tables, and following in its steps in our legislation on this point, praise the kind feeling of the prætors, but cannot think they have provided a complete remedy for the evil. Why, indeed, when males and females are placed in the same degree of natural relationship, and have equally the title of agnation, should males be permitted to succeed to all their agnati, while females, with the single exception of sisters, are entirely excluded? We therefore, bringing back everything to what it was, and conforming our scheme to that of the Twelve Tables, have declared by our constitution, that all legitima persona, that is descendants from males, whether themselves male or female, shall be equally called to the rights of legal succession ab intestato, according to the proximity of their degree, and shall not be excluded on the ground that they have not the right of consanguinity which sisters have.)

GAI. iii. 14, 23, 29; C. vi. 58. 14.

The media jurisprudentia here spoken of consisted of the opinions of the jurisprudentes, who extended the principle of the lex Voconia, which limited the succession of females under a testament, to their succession ab intestato. Femine ad hereditates legitimas ultra consanguineas successiones non admittuntur. Idque jure civili Voconiana ratione videtur effectum. (PAUL. Sent. 4. 8. 22.) Thus a distinction was made among the agnati themselves and the consanguinei, that is, agnati in the second degree; or, in other words, brothers and sisters, natural or adoptive, of the de cognis, were made into a class apart and distinguished from the agnati properly so called. Consan- erat lege quidem duodecim tabularum junior, imperiali autem dispositione anterior, subtilitate quadam excogitata, præfatam differentiam inducebat et penitus eas a successione agnatorum repellabat, omnia alia successione incognita, donec prætores, paulatim asperitatem juris civilis corrigentes sive, quod deest, adimplentes, humano proposito alium ordinem suis edictis addiderunt et, cognationis linea proximitatis nomine introducta, per bonorum possessionem eas adjuvabant et pollicebantur his bonorum possessionem, quæ unde cognati appellatur. Nos vero legem duodecim tabularum sequentes et ejus vestigia in hac parte conservantes, laudamus quidem prætores suæ humanitatis, non tamen eos in plenum causæ mederi invenimus: quare etenim, uno eodemque gradu naturali concurrente et agnationis titulis tam in masculis quam in feminis æqualiter constitutis, masculis quidem dabatur ad successionem venire omnium agnatorum, ex agnatis autem mulieribus nullis penitus nisi soli sorori ad agnatorum successionem patebat aditus? Ideo in plenum omnia reducetes et ad jus duodecim tabularum eandem dispositionem exæquantes, nostra constitutione sanximus, omnes legitimas personas, id est per virilem sexum descendentes, sive masculini sive feminini generis sunt, simili modo ad jura successionis legitimæ ab intestato vocari secundum gradus sui prærogativam nec ideo excludendas, quia consanguinitatis jura sicuti germanæ non habent.

manner as sui heredes. It was an intermediate jurisprudence, posterior to the law of the Twelve Tables, but prior to the imperial constitutions, that in a spirit of subtle ingenuity introduced this distinction, and entirely excluded females from the succession of agnati, no other method of succession being then known, until the prætors, correcting by degrees the asperity of the civil law, or supplying what was deficient, were led by their feeling of equity to add in their edicts a new order of succession. The line of cognati was admitted according to the degrees of proximity, and relief was thus afforded to females by the prætor giving them the possession of goods called unde cognati. But we, turning to the law of the Twelve Tables, and following in its steps in our legislation on this point, praise the kind feeling of the prætors, but cannot think they have provided a complete remedy for the evil. Why, indeed, when males and females are placed in the same degree of natural relationship, and have equally the title of agnation, should males be permitted to succeed to all their agnati, while females, with the single exception of sisters, are entirely excluded? We therefore, bringing back everything to what it was, and conforming our scheme to that of the Twelve Tables, have declared by our constitution, that all legitimate persons, that is descendants from males, whether themselves male or female, shall be equally called to the rights of legal succession ab intestato, according to the proximity of their degree, and shall not be excluded on the ground that they have not the right of consanguinity which sisters have.)

GAI. iii. 14, 23, 29; C. vi. 58. 14.

The media jurisprudentia here spoken of consisted of the opinions of the jurisprudentes, who extended the principle of the lex Voconia, which limited the succession of females under a testament, to their succession ab intestato. Femine ad hereditates legitimas ultra consanguineas successiones non admittuntur. Idque jure civili Voconiana ratione videtur effectum. (PAUL. Sent. 4. 8. 22.) Thus a distinction was made among the agnati themselves and the consanguinei, that is, agnati in the second degree; or, in other words, brothers and sisters, natural or adoptive, of the de cuius, were made into a class apart and distinguished from the agnati properly so called. Consan- guineus, when used to mark off a particular class of the agnati, merely means children of the same father, without any reference to the mother.

4. Hoc etiam addendum nostræ constitutioni existimavimus, ut transferatur unus tantummodo gradus a jure cognationis in legitimam successionem, ut non solum fratris filius et filia secundum quod jam definivimus, ad successionem patris sui vocentur, sed etiam germanæ consanguinæ vel sororis uterinæ filius et filia soli et non deinceps personæ una cum his ad jura avunculi sui perveniant et mortuo eo, qui patruus quidem est fratris sui filius, avunculus autem sororis suæ suboli, simili modo ab utroque latere succedant, tanquam si omnes ex masculis descendentes legitimo jure veniant, scilicet ubi frater et soror superstites non sunt (his etenim personis præcedentibus et successionem admittentibus ceteri gradus remanent penitus semoti): videlicet hereditate non in stirpes, sed in capita dividenda.

4. We have also thought fit to add to our constitution, that one whole degree, but only one, shall be transferred from the line of cognati to the legal succession. Not only the son and daughter of a brother, as we have just explained, shall be called to the succession of their paternal uncle, but together with them the son or daughter of a sister, though she is only by the same father or only by the same mother (but no one in a more distant degree than a son and daughter of such a sister), shall also be admitted to the succession of their maternal uncle. Thus, when a person dies who is a paternal uncle to the children of his brother, and maternal uncle to the children of his sister, then the children of either branch succeed exactly as if they were all descendants from males, and had a right by law to the succession. But this is only if the deceased leaves no brother or sister, for if he leaves any, and they accept the inheritance, the more remote degrees are entirely excluded from the inheritance, as it is to be divided in capita and not in stirpes.

C. vi. 58. 14. 6, 7.

The children of a sister, although only consanguinea, that is, having the same father, or uterina, having the same mother, were thus admitted to the succession as agnati. We might gather from this that uterine brothers and sisters themselves were admitted, although it is not expressed in the text. The code contains a constitution of Justinian (C. vi. 56. 7) expressly admitting them. The changes in the law with respect to the admission of brothers and sisters and their children as agnati were as follows:—In A.D. 498 Anastasius gave the rights of agnation to emancipated brothers and sisters, except that they only received one half of what they would have had if they had remained in the family. (See Tit. 5. 1.) The children of emancipated brothers and sisters still remained cognati only. Justinian gave the rights of agnation, in A.D. 528, to uterine brothers and sisters (C. vi. 56. 7); and in A.D. 531, to the children of uterine sisters (C. vi. 58. 14. 6); and though the children of uterine brothers are not mentioned in the constitution, they must undoubtedly have been placed in the same position. Finally, in a constitution dated October, A.D. 534 (C. vi. 58. 15), and therefore subsequent to the promulgation of the Institutes, Justinian admitted as agnati emancipated brothers and sisters guineus, when used to mark off a particular class of the agnati, merely means children of the same father, without any reference to the mother.

4. Hoc etiam addendum nostræ constitutioni existimavimus, ut transferatur unus tantummodo gradus a jure cognationis in legitimam successionem, ut non solum fratris filius et filia secundum quod jam definivimus, ad successionem patris sui vocentur, sed etiam germanæ consanguinæ vel sororis uterinæ filius et filia soli et non deinceps personæ una cum his ad jura avunculi sui perveniant et mortuo eo, qui patruus quidem est fratris sui filius, avunculus autem sororis suæ suboli, simili modo ab utroque latere succedant, tanquam si omnes ex masculis descendentes legitimo jure veniant, scilicet ubi frater et soror superstites non sunt (his etenim personis præcedentibus et successionem admittentibus ceteri gradus remanent penitus semoti): videlicet hereditate non in stirpes, sed in capita dividenda.

4. We have also thought fit to add to our constitution, that one whole degree, but only one, shall be transferred from the line of cognati to the legal succession. Not only the son and daughter of a brother, as we have just explained, shall be called to the succession of their paternal uncle, but together with them the son or daughter of a sister, though she is only by the same father or only by the same mother (but no one in a more distant degree than a son and daughter of such a sister), shall also be admitted to the succession of their maternal uncle. Thus, when a person dies who is a paternal uncle to the children of his brother, and maternal uncle to the children of his sister, then the children of either branch succeed exactly as if they were all descendants from males, and had a right by law to the succession. But this is only if the deceased leaves no brother or sister, for if he leaves any, and they accept the inheritance, the more remote degrees are entirely excluded from the inheritance, as it is to be divided in capita and not in stirpes.

C. vi. 58. 14. 6, 7.

The children of a sister, although only consanguinea, that is, having the same father, or uterina, having the same mother, were thus admitted to the succession as agnati. We might gather from this that uterine brothers and sisters themselves were admitted, although it is not expressed in the text. The code contains a constitution of Justinian (C. vi. 56. 7) expressly admitting them. The changes in the law with respect to the admission of brothers and sisters and their children as agnati were as follows:—In A.D. 498 Anastasius gave the rights of agnation to emancipated brothers and sisters, except that they only received one half of what they would have had if they had remained in the family. (See Tit. 5. 1.) The children of emancipated brothers and sisters still remained cognati only. Justinian gave the rights of agnation, in A.D. 528, to uterine brothers and sisters (C. vi. 56. 7); and in A.D. 531, to the children of uterine sisters (C. vi. 58. 14. 6); and though the children of uterine brothers are not mentioned in the constitution, they must undoubtedly have been placed in the same position. Finally, in a constitution dated October, A.D. 534 (C. vi. 58. 15), and therefore subsequent to the promulgation of the Institutes, Justinian admitted as agnati emancipated brothers and sisters without any deduction of a fourth, uterine brothers and sisters, and nephews and nieces being the children either of emancipated or uterine brothers and sisters. After that constitution there were not, therefore, any but agnati in the second degree, nor any in the third degree except the uncles and aunts of the de cuius.

Agnatorum hereditates dividuntur in capita. (Ulp. Reg. 26.

4.) There was no division per stirpes, which was originally only a consequence of the patria potestas, in the succession of agnati. If one of those in any degree of relationship was dead, his representatives did not take his share. He was entirely passed over, and the others in that degree of relationship were alone called to the succession.

Agnati were spoken of as legitimi heredes (cf. legitimi tutores, Bk. i. Tit. 15. pr.), because the inheritance was given to them by the law of the Twelve Tables, whereas the cognati only received it from the prætor.

5. Si plures sint gradus agnatorum, aperte lex duodecim tabularum proximum vocat: itaque si verbi gratia sit frater defuncti et alterius fratris filius aut patruus, frater potior habetur. Et quamvis singulari numero usa lex proximum vocet, tamen dubium non est, quin et, si plures sint ejusdem gradus, omnes admittantur: nam et proprie proximus ex pluribus gradibus intellegitur et tamen dubium non est, quin, licet unus sit gradus agnatorum, pertineat ad eos hereditas.

5. When there are many degrees of agnati, the law of the Twelve Tables expressly calls the nearest; if, for example, there is a brother of the deceased, and a son of another brother, or a paternal uncle, the brother is preferred. And, although the law of the Twelve Tables calls the nearest agnatus (in the singular number), yet without doubt, if there are several in the same degree, they ought all to be admitted. And, although properly by the nearest degree must be understood the nearest of several, yet, if all the agnati are in the same degree, the inheritance undoubtedly belongs to them all.

GAI. iii. 15.

6. Proximus autem, si quidem nullo testamento facto quisque decesserit, per hoc tempus requiritur, quo mortuus est is, cujus de hereditate queritur. Quodsi facto testamento quisquam decesserit, per hoc tempus requiritur, quo certum esse coeperit, nullum ex testamento heredem extaturum: tum enim proprie quisque intellegitur intestatus decessisse. Quod quidem aliquando longo tempore declaratur: in quo spatio temporis sæpe accidit, ut proximior mortuo proximus esse incipiat, qui moriente testatore non erat proximus.

6. When a man dies without a testament, the nearest agnatus is the agnatus who is nearest at the time of the death of the deceased. But, if he dies after having made a testament, then he is the nearest who is so when it becomes certain that there will be no testamentary heir; for it is only then, that a man who has made a testament can be said to have died intestate, and this sometimes is uncertain for a long time. Meanwhile, the nearest agnatus may die, and some one become the nearest who was not so at the death of the testator.

GAI. iii. 18.

7. Placebat autem, in eo genere percipiendarum hereditatum successionem non esse, id est quamvis proximus, qui secundum ea, quæ

7. But it was settled that in this order of succession there should be no devolution, that is to say, that if the nearest agnatus, called in the manner without any deduction of a fourth, uterine brothers and sisters, and nephews and nieces being the children either of emancipated or uterine brothers and sisters. After that constitution there were not, therefore, any but agnati in the second degree, nor any in the third degree except the uncles and aunts of the de cuius.

Agnatorum hereditates dividuntur in capita. (ULP. Reg. 26.

4.) There was no division per stirpes, which was originally only a consequence of the patria potestas, in the succession of agnati. If one of those in any degree of relationship was dead, his representatives did not take his share. He was entirely passed over, and the others in that degree of relationship were alone called to the succession.

Agnati were spoken of as legitimi heredes (cf. legitimi tutores, Bk. i. Tit. 15. pr.), because the inheritance was given to them by the law of the Twelve Tables, whereas the cognati only received it from the prætor.

5. Si plures sint gradus adgnatorum, aperte lex duodecim tabularum proximum vocat: itaque si verbi gratia sit frater defuncti et alterius fratris filius aut patruus, frater potior habetur. Et quamvis singulari numero usa lex proximum vocet, tamen dubium non est, quin et, si plures sint ejusdem gradus, omnes admittantur: nam et proprie proximus ex pluribus gradibus intellegitur et tamen dubium non est, quin, licet unus sit gradus adgnatorum, pertineat ad eos hereditas.

5. When there are many degrees of agnati, the law of the Twelve Tables expressly calls the nearest; if, for example, there is a brother of the deceased, and a son of another brother, or a paternal uncle, the brother is preferred. And, although the law of the Twelve Tables calls the nearest agnatus (in the singular number), yet without doubt, if there are several in the same degree, they ought all to be admitted. And, although properly by the nearest degree must be understood the nearest of several, yet, if all the agnati are in the same degree, the inheritance undoubtedly belongs to them all.

GAL. iii. 15.

6. Proximus autem, si quidem nullo testamento facto quisque decesserit, per hoc tempus requiritur, quo mortuus est is, cujus de hereditate queritur. Quodsi facto testamento quisquam decesserit, per hoc tempus requiritur, quo certum esse coeperit, nullum ex testamento heredem extaturum: tum enim proprie quisque intellegitur intestatus decessisse. Quod quidem aliquando longo tempore declaratur: in quo spatio temporis sæpe accidit, ut proximior mortuo proximus esse incipiat, qui moriente testatore non erat proximus.

6. When a man dies without a testament, the nearest agnatus is the agnatus who is nearest at the time of the death of the deceased. But, if he dies after having made a testament, then he is the nearest who is so when it becomes certain that there will be no testamentary heir; for it is only then, that a man who has made a testament can be said to have died intestate, and this sometimes is uncertain for a long time. Meanwhile, the nearest agnatus may die, and some one become the nearest who was not so at the death of the testator.

GAL. iii. 13.

7. Placebat autem, in eo genere percipiendarum hereditatum successionem non esse, id est quamvis proximus, qui secundum ea, quæ

7. But it was settled that in this order of succession there should be no devolution, that is to say, that if the nearest agnatus, called in the manner

diximus, vocatur ad hereditatem, aut spreverit hereditatem aut, antequam adeat, decesserit, nihilo magis legitimo jure sequentes admittuntur. Quod iterum prætores imperfecto jure corrigentes, non in totum sine adminiculo relinquebant, sed ex cognatorum ordine eos vocabant, utpote agnationis jure eis recluso. Sed nos nihil deesse perfectissimo juri cupientes, nostra constitutione sanximus, quam de jure patronatus, humanitate suggerente, protulimus, successionem in agnatorum hereditatibus non esse eis denegandam, cum satis absurdum erat, quod cognatis a prætore apertum est, hoc agnatis esse reclusum, maxime cum in onere quidem tutelarum et primo gradu deficiente, sequens succedit et, quod in onere optinebat, non erat in lucro permissum.

we have mentioned, to the inheritance, either refused it, or died before he entered on it, those following him in agnatic succession were not thereby admitted to succeed him. Here, too, the prætors, though not introducing a complete reform, did not leave the agnati wholly without relief, but ordered that they should be called to the inheritance as cognati, since they were debarred from the rights of agnation. But we, desirous that our law should be as complete as possible, by our constitution, which we were prompted by regard for equity to publish concerning the right of patronage, have decided that a devolution in the succession shall not be denied to agnati. It was indeed absurd to refuse them a right which the prætor gave to cognati, especially as the burden of tutelage devolved on the remoter degree of agnati, if there was a failure of the nearer, and thus the principle of devolution was admitted to impose burdens, and was not admitted to confer advantages.

GAL. ii. 12, 22, 25, 28.

In hereditate legitima successioni locus non est. (PAUL. Sent. 4. 8. 23.) The sui heres or sui heredes in the nearest degree became heirs by force of law. But as to those who were only allowed to rank among the sui heredes without being, strictly speaking, sui heredes, if those in the nearest degree refused to accept the inheritance, or died before entering on it, the succession did not devolve upon any other sui heredes, but went at once to the agnati. (D. xxxviii. 16. 1. 8.) If, in this case or any other, the nearest agnatus refused or died before entering on the inheritance, the succession passed to the cognati without first devolving on any of the more remote agnati. Justinian alters this; and under his system there was a devolution of the succession to the agnati, and therefore probably to those ranked among the sui heredes.

8. Ad legitimam successionem nihilo minus vocatur etiam parens, qui contracta fiducia filium vel filiam, nepotem vel neptem ac deinceps emancipat. Quod ex nostra constitutione omnimodo inducitur, ut emancipationes liberorum semper videantur contracta fiducia fieri, cum apud antiquos non aliter hoc optinebat, nisi specialiter contracta fiducia parens manumisisset.

8. An ascendant also is called to the legal succession who has emancipated a son, a daughter, a grandson, a granddaughter, or other descendant under a fiduciary agreement. And by our constitution, every emancipation of children is now considered to have been made under such an agreement, while among the ancients the ascendant was never called to the succession unless he had expressly made this agreement at the time of the emancipation.

D. xxxviii. 16. 10; C. viii. 48. 6.

diximus, vocatur ad hereditatem, aut spreverit hereditatem aut, antequam adeat, decesserit, nihilo magis legitimo jure sequentes admittuntur. Quod iterum prætores imperfecto jure corrigentes, non in totum sine adminiculo relinquebant, sed ex cognatorum ordine eos vocabant, utpote adgnationis jure eis recluso. Sed nos nihil deesse perfectissimo juri cupientes, nostra constitutione sanximus, quam de jure patronatus, humanitate suggerente, protulimus, successionem in adgnatorum hereditatibus non esse eis denegandam, cum satis absurdum erat, quod cognatis a prætore apertum est, hoc adgnatis esse reclusum, maxime cum in onere quidem tutelarum et primo gradu deficiente, sequens succedit et, quod in onere optinebat, non erat in lucro permissum.

we have mentioned to the inheritance either refused it, or died before he entered on it, those following him in agnatic succession were not thereby admitted to succeed him. Here, too, the prætors, though not introducing a complete reform, did not leave the agnati wholly without relief, but ordered that they should be called to the inheritance as cognati, since they were debarred from the rights of agnation. But we, desirous that our law should be as complete as possible, by our constitution, which we were prompted by regard for equity to publish concerning the right of patronage, have decided that a devolution in the succession shall not be denied to agnati. It was indeed absurd to refuse them a right which the prætor gave to cognati, especially as the burden of tutelage devolved on the remoter degree of agnati, if there was a failure of the nearer, and thus the principle of devolution was admitted to impose burdens, and was not admitted to confer advantages.

GAL. ii. 12, 22, 25, 28.

In hereditate legitima successioni locus non est. (PAUL. Sent. 4. 8. 23.) The sui heres or sui heredes in the nearest degree became heirs by force of law. But as to those who were only allowed to rank among the sui heredes without being, strictly speaking, sui heredes, if those in the nearest degree refused to accept the inheritance, or died before entering on it, the succession did not devolve upon any other sui heredes, but went at once to the agnati. (D. xxxviii. 16. 1. 8.) If, in this case or any other, the nearest agnatus refused or died before entering on the inheritance, the succession passed to the cognati without first devolving on any of the more remote agnati. Justinian alters this; and under his system there was a devolution of the succession to the agnati, and therefore probably to those ranked among the sui heredes.

8. Ad legitimam successionem nihilo minus vocatur etiam parens, qui contracta fiducia filium vel filiam, nepotem vel neptem ac deinceps emancipat. Quod ex nostra constitutione omnimodo inducitur, ut emancipationes liberorum semper videantur contracta fiducia fieri, cum apud antiquos non aliter hoc optinebat, nisi specialiter contracta fiducia parens manumisisset.

8. An ascendant also is called to the legal succession who has emancipated a son, a daughter, a grandson, a granddaughter, or other descendant under a fiduciary agreement. And by our constitution, every emancipation of children is now considered to have been made under such an agreement, while among the ancients the ascendant was never called to the succession unless he had expressly made this agreement at the time of the emancipation.

D. xxxviii. 16. 10; C. viii. 48. 6.

Under the old law the ascendant had nothing to do with the succession ab intestato of his descendant; for if the descendant was in the power of the ascendant, the latter took all the property of which the former could dispose, but did not, as belonging to him by right of his patria potestas. If the descendant was emancipated, he was no longer in the family of the ascendant. The emancipated son, in short, had no agnati; and in default of sui heredes the inheritance went to his patron, that is, to the person who had emancipated him. This was the fictitious purchaser (see Introd. sec. 42), unless the ascendant who emancipated him made an agreement (contracta fiducia) with the purchaser by which the purchaser made himself a trustee of the right of patronage for the ascendant. If this was done, the ascendant succeeded in default of sui heredes.

By the later imperial constitutions three changes were made in the position of the ascendant. First, by a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (C. vi. 61. 3), and subsequently of Leo and Anthemius (C. vi. 61. 4), and lastly of Justinian (C. vi. 59. 11), in the case of goods coming to a son from his mother, the order of succession was thus fixed: 1st, his children and other descendants were admitted; 2ndly, his brothers and sisters, whether of the whole or the half blood; 3rdly, his ascendants, the father being preferred to his grandfather, and so on.

Secondly, Justinian, as we have seen in the 12th Title of the Second Book (pr.), arranged the order of succession to the peculium of a son, placing first the children, then the brothers and sisters, and lastly the father. But in this case the father was not preferred to the grandfather; for the ascendant did not really take in this instance ab intestato, but 'jure communi;' i.e. the claims of the patria potestas had been deferred to let in the children and brothers; but if there were no children or brothers, the ascendant, who is at the time the paterfamilias, took the peculium.

Lastly, the succession of emancipated sons was altered by the constitution of Justinian, which made a fiduciary contract implied in every emancipation. The ancestor thus retained all his rights of succession as patron to the emancipated son, and would properly have succeeded immediately after the sui heredes; but Justinian admitted the brothers and sisters before him, and the ascendant who emancipated the son had thus the third place in the order of succession. (C. vi. 56. 2.)

TIT. III. DE SENATUSCONSULTO TERTULLIANO.

Lex duodecim tabularum ita stricto jure utebatur et præponebat masculorum progeniem et eos, qui per feminini sexus necessitudinem sibi junguntur, adeo expellebat, ut ne quidem inter matrem et filium filiamve ultro citroque hereditatis

Such was the rigour of the law of the Twelve Tables, so decided the preference given by it to the issue of males, and the exclusion of those related by the female line, that the right of reciprocal succession was not permitted between a mother and her mother

here
children

Under the old law the ascendant had nothing to do with the succession ab intestato of his descendant; for if the descendant was in the power of the ascendant, the latter took all the property of which the former could dispose, but did not, as belonging to him by right of his patria potestas. If the descendant was emancipated, he was no longer in the family of the ascendant. The emancipated son, in short, had no agnati; and in default of sui heredes the inheritance went to his patron, that is, to the person who had emancipated him. This was the fictitious purchaser (see Introd. sec. 42), unless the ascendant who emancipated him made an agreement (contracta fiducia) with the purchaser by which the purchaser made himself a trustee of the right of patronage for the ascendant. If this was done, the ascendant succeeded in default of sui heredes.

By the later imperial constitutions three changes were made in the position of the ascendant. First, by a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (C. vi. 61. 3), and subsequently of Leo and Anthemius (C. vi. 61. 4), and lastly of Justinian (C. vi. 59. 11), in the case of goods coming to a son from his mother, the order of succession was thus fixed: 1st, his children and other descendants were admitted; 2ndly, his brothers and sisters, whether of the whole or the half blood; 3rdly, his ascendants, the father being preferred to his grandfather, and so on.

Secondly, Justinian, as we have seen in the 12th Title of the Second Book (pr.), arranged the order of succession to the peculium of a son, placing first the children, then the brothers and sisters, and lastly the father. But in this case the father was not preferred to the grandfather; for the ascendant did not really take in this instance ab intestato, but 'jure communi;' i.e. the claims of the patria potestas had been deferred to let in the children and brothers; but if there were no children or brothers, the ascendant, who is at the time the paterfamilias, took the peculium.

Lastly, the succession of emancipated sons was altered by the constitution of Justinian, which made a fiduciary contract implied in every emancipation. The ancestor thus retained all his rights of succession as patron to the emancipated son, and would properly have succeeded immediately after the sui heredes; but Justinian admitted the brothers and sisters before him, and the ascendant who emancipated the son had thus the third place in the order of succession. (C. vi. 56. 2.)

TIT. III. DE SENATUSCONSULTO TERTULLIANO.

Lex duodecim tabularum ita stricto jure utebatur et præponebat masculorum progeniem et eos, qui per feminini sexus necessitudinem sibi junguntur, adeo expellebat, ut ne quidem inter matrem et filium filiamve ultro citroque hereditatis

Such was the rigour of the law of the Twelve Tables, so decided the preference given by it to the issue of males, and the exclusion of those related by the female line, that the right of reciprocal succession was not permitted between a mother and her

here
mother
children

capiendæ jus daret, nisi quod prætores ex proximitate cognatorum eas personas ad successionem bonorum possessione unde cognati accommodata vocabant.

children. The prætors, however, admitted such persons, but only in their rank as cognati, to the possession of goods called unde cognati.

GAL. iii. 24, 25.

Until the senatusconsultum Tertullianum was made a mother and her children had no right of succession to each other, except that which the prætor gave them as cognati. The children were not in the power of the mother, and were, therefore, not her sui heredes; they were not in her family, and were, therefore, not her agnati. If, indeed, the mother at her marriage passed in manum viri, she became, in the eye of the law, the daughter of her husband, and as she was thus of the same family with her children, she and they were agnati to each other. But even in the later days of the Republic, a marriage cum conventione in manum had probably become comparatively unusual.

1. Sed hæ juris angustię postea emendatę sunt. Et primus quidem divus Claudius matri ad solatium liberorum amissionum legitimam eorum detulit hereditatem.

2. Postea autem senatusconsulto Tertulliano, quod divi Hadriani temporibus factum est, plenissime de tristi successione matri, non etiam avię deferenda cautum est: ut mater ingenua trium liberorum jus habens, libertina quattuor ad bona filiorum filiarumve admittatur intestatorum mortuorum, licet in potestate parentis est, ut scilicet, cum alieno juri subjecta est, jussu ejus adeat, cujus juri subjecta est.

1. But this strictness of the law was afterwards mitigated. The Emperor Claudius was the first who gave the legal inheritance of deceased children to a mother, to console her grief for their loss.

2. Afterwards, the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian, established the general rule that mothers, but not grandmothers, should have the melancholy privilege of succeeding to their children; so that a mother, born of free parents, having three children, or a freedwoman having four, should be admitted, although in the power of an ascendant, to the goods of her intestate children. Except that a mother in the power of another can only enter upon the inheritance of her children at the command of him to whom she is subject.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. pr.

This senatusconsultum was passed 158 A.D., in the time of Antoninus Pius, who is here called by his name of adoption. It was only an extension of the lex Papia Poppæa, which had conferred on free persons having three children, and freed persons having four, many exceptional advantages. Husbands and wives, for example, could, under these circumstances, leave to each other a larger share of their property than was otherwise permitted. (ULP. Reg. 15, 16.) This jus trium liberorum, as it was termed, was frequently conferred by special favour of the emperors on persons who had not the requisite number of children; and from a constitution of Honorius and Theodosius (C. viii. 59. 1) it appears that the privilege in the later Empire became universal.

capiendæ jus daret, nisi quod prætores ex proximitate cognatorum eas personas ad successionem bonorum possessione unde cognati accommodata vocabant.

children. The prætors, however, admitted such persons, but only in their rank as cognati, to the possession of goods called unde cognati.

GAI. iii. 24, 25.

Until the senatusconsultum Tertullianum was made a mother and her children had no right of succession to each other, except that which the prætor gave them as cognati. The children were not in the power of the mother, and were, therefore, not her sui heredes; they were not in her family, and were, therefore, not her agnati. If, indeed, the mother at her marriage passed in manum viri, she became, in the eye of the law, the daughter of her husband, and as she was thus of the same family with her children, she and they were agnati to each other. But even in the later days of the Republic, a marriage cum conventione in manum had probably become comparatively unusual.

1. Sed hæ juris angustię postea emendatę sunt. Et primus quidem divus Claudius matri ad solatium liberorum amissionum legitimam eorum detulit hereditatem.

2. Postea autem senatusconsulto Tertulliano, quod divi Hadriani temporibus factum est, plenissime de tristi successione matri, non etiam avię deferenda cautum est: ut mater ingenua trium liberorum jus habens, libertina quattuor ad bona filiorum filiarumve admittatur intestatorum mortuorum, licet in potestate parentis est, ut scilicet, cum alieno juri subjecta est, jussu ejus adeat, cujus juri subjecta est.

1. But this strictness of the law was afterwards mitigated. The Emperor Claudius was the first who gave the legal inheritance of deceased children to a mother, to console her grief for their loss.

2. Afterwards, the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian, established the general rule that mothers, but not grandmothers, should have the melancholy privilege of succeeding to their children; so that a mother, born of free parents, having three children, or a freedwoman having four, should be admitted, although in the power of an ascendant, to the goods of her intestate children. Except that a mother in the power of another can only enter upon the inheritance of her children at the command of him to whom she is subject.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. pr.

This senatusconsultum was passed 158 A.D., in the time of Antoninus Pius, who is here called by his name of adoption. It was only an extension of the lex Papia Poppæa, which had conferred on free persons having three children, and freed persons having four, many exceptional advantages. Husbands and wives, for example, could, under these circumstances, leave to each other a larger share of their property than was otherwise permitted. (ULP. Reg. 15, 16.) This jus trium liberorum, as it was termed, was frequently conferred by special favour of the emperors on persons who had not the requisite number of children; and from a constitution of Honorius and Theodosius (C. viii. 59. 1) it appears that the privilege in the later Empire became universal.

3. Præferuntur autem matri liberi defuncti, qui sui sunt quive suorum loco, sive primi gradus sive ulterioris. Sed et filia suæ mortuæ filius vel filia opponitur ex constitutionibus matri defunctæ, id est aviæ suæ. Pater quoque utriusque, non etiam avus vel proavus matri antepositur, scilicet cum inter eos solos de hereditate agitur. Frater autem consanguineus tam filii quam filia excludebat matrem: soror autem consanguinea pariter cum matre admittebatur: sed si fuerat frater et soror consanguinei et mater liberis honorata, frater quidem matrem excludebat, communis autem erat hereditas ex æquis partibus fratri et sorori.

3. The children, however, of the deceased son being sui heredes, or ranked as such, either in the first or a more remote degree, are preferred to the mother. And if it is a daughter who is dead, her son, or daughter, is preferred by the constitutions to her mother; i.e. to their grandmother. The father of the deceased is preferred to the mother; not so the grandfather or great-grandfather, at least when they and the mother are the only claimants of the inheritance. The brother by the same father, either of a son or a daughter, formerly excluded the mother; but the sister by the same father was admitted equally with the mother. If the deceased left a brother and a sister by the same father as himself, the brother excluded the mother, although rendered capable by the number of her children, and the inheritance was equally divided between the brother and sister.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 15, 18, 19; C. vi. 57. 1.

The mother was allowed to rank among the agnati by the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, but she had a relative rather than a definitive position, as being in a certain degree of agnation. What her exact position was at different periods of the law will be stated at the end of the Fourth Title.

usilian

4. Sed nos constitutione, quam in codice nostro nomine decorato posuimus, matri subveniendum esse existimavimus, respicientes ad naturam et puerperium et periculum et sæpe mortem ex hoc casu matribus illatam. Ideoque impium esse credidimus, casum fortuitum in ejus admitti detrimentum: si enim ingenua ter vel libertina quater non pepererit, immerito defraudabatur successione suorum liberorum; quid enim peccavit, si non plures, sed paucos pepererit? et dedimus jus legitimum plenum matribus sive ingenuis sive libertinis, etsi non ter enixæ fuerint vel quater, sed eum tantum vel eam, qui quæve morte intercepti sunt, ut et sic vocentur in liberorum suorum legitimam successionem.

4. But by a constitution, inserted in the code which bears our name, we have thought fit to come to the aid of the mother, from considering natural reason, as well as the pains of childbirth, the danger, and death itself, which they often suffer. We, therefore, have esteemed it highly unjust that the law should turn to their detriment what is in its nature purely fortuitous; for, if a married woman freeborn does not give birth to three children or a freedwoman to four, they do not therefore deserve to be deprived of the succession to their children. For how can it be imputed to them as a crime to have had few children? We, therefore, have given a full right to every mother, whether freeborn or freed, to be called to the legal succession of her children, although she may not have given birth to three or four children, or may not have had any other than the child whose inheritance is in question.

C. viii. 59. 2.

3. Præferuntur autem matri liberi defuncti, qui sui sunt quive suorum loco, sive primi gradus sive ulterioris. Sed et filia suæ mortuæ filius vel filia opponitur ex constitutionibus matri defunctæ, id est avia suæ. Pater quoque utriusque, non etiam avus vel proavus matri antepositur, scilicet cum inter eos solos de hereditate agitur. Frater autem consanguineus tam filii quam filia excludebat matrem: soror autem consanguinea pariter cum matre admittebatur: sed si fuerat frater et soror consanguinei et mater liberis honorata, frater quidem matrem excludebat, communis autem erat hereditas ex æquis partibus fratri et sorori.

3. The children, however, of the deceased son being sui heredes, or ranked as such, either in the first or a more remote degree, are preferred to the mother. And if it is a daughter who is dead, her son, or daughter, is preferred by the constitutions to her mother; i.e. to their grandmother. The father of the deceased is preferred to the mother; not so the grandfather or great-grandfather, at least when they and the mother are the only claimants of the inheritance. The brother by the same father, either of a son or a daughter, formerly excluded the mother; but the sister by the same father was admitted equally with the mother. If the deceased left a brother and a sister by the same father as himself, the brother excluded the mother, although rendered capable by the number of her children, and the inheritance was equally divided between the brother and sister.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 15, 18, 19; C. vi. 57. 1.

The mother was allowed to rank among the agnati by the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, but she had a relative rather than a definitive position, as being in a certain degree of agnation. What her exact position was at different periods of the law will be stated at the end of the Fourth Title.

Ulpian

4. Sed nos constitutione, quam in codice nostro nomine decorato posuimus, matri subveniendum esse existimavimus, respicientes ad naturam et puerperium et periculum et sæpe mortem ex hoc casu matribus illatam. Ideoque impium esse credidimus, casum fortuitum in ejus admitti detrimentum: si enim ingenua ter vel libertina quater non pepererit, immerito defraudabatur successione suorum liberorum; quid enim peccavit, si non plures, sed paucos pepererit? et dedimus jus legitimum plenum matribus sive ingenuis sive libertinis, etsi non ter enixæ fuerint vel quater, sed eum tantum vel eam, qui quæve morte intercepti sunt, ut et sic vocentur in liberorum suorum legitimam successionem.

4. But by a constitution, inserted in the code which bears our name, we have thought fit to come to the aid of the mother, from considering natural reason, as well as the pains of childbirth, the danger, and death itself, which they often suffer. We, therefore, have esteemed it highly unjust that the law should turn to their detriment what is in its nature purely fortuitous; for, if a married woman freeborn does not give birth to three children or a freedwoman to four, they do not therefore deserve to be deprived of the succession to their children. For how can it be imputed to them as a crime to have had few children? We, therefore, have given a full right to every mother, whether freeborn or freed, to be called to the legal succession of her children, although she may not have given birth to three or four children, or may not have had any other than the child whose inheritance is in question.

C. viii. 59. 2.

5. Sed cum antea constitutiones jura legitima perscrutantes partim matrem adjuvabant, partim eam prægravabant et non in solidum eam vocabant, sed in quibusdam casibus tertiam partem ei abstrahentes certis legitimis dabant personis, in aliis autem contrarium faciebant: nobis visum est, recta et simplici via matrem omnibus legitimis personis anteponi et sine ulla deminutione filiorum suorum successionem accipere, excepta fratris et sororis persona, sive consanguinei sint sive sola cognationis jura habentes, ut quemadmodum eam toto alio ordini legitimo præposuimus, ita omnes fratres et sorores, sive legitimi sint sive non, ad capiendas hereditates simul vocemus, ita tamen ut, si quidem solæ sorores cognatæ vel adgnatæ et mater defuncti vel defunctæ supersint, dimidiam quidem mater, alteram vero dimidiam partem omnes sorores habeant, si vero matre superstitite et fratre vel fratribus solis vel etiam cum sororibus sive legitima sive sola cognationis jura habentibus, intestatus quis vel intestata moriatur, in capita distribuatur ejus hereditas.

5. The constitutions of former emperors, relative to the right of succession, were partly favourable to mothers, and partly unfavourable. They did not always give the mothers the entire inheritance of their children, but in some cases deprived them of a third, which was given to certain agnati, and in other cases, doing just the contrary, gave a third. But it seems right to us that mothers should receive the succession of their children without any diminution, and that they should be decidedly and exclusively preferred before all legal heirs, except the brothers and sisters of the deceased, whether by the same father or having only the rights of cognation. And as we have preferred the mother to all other legal heirs, we call all brothers and sisters, legal or not, to the inheritance together with the mother, the following rule being observed. If there are living only sisters agnatæ or cognatæ, and the mother of the deceased, the mother shall have one half of the goods, and the sisters the other half. But if there are living the mother, and also a brother or brothers only, or brothers and also sisters, whether having agnatic rights, or only having the rights of cognati, then the inheritance of the intestate son or daughter shall be divided in capita.

C. vi. 56. 7.

In the code of Theodosius (v. 1. 1), we find two constitutions, one of Constantine, the other of Valentinian and Valens, which made the first change in the jus liberorum introduced by the lex Papia Poppæa. By these constitutions it was enacted that if there were persons in a certain degree of agnation with the deceased, namely, a paternal uncle, or a paternal uncle's son or grandson, or an emancipated brother, then the mother, instead of excluding them, as, if she had the jus liberorum, she would have done, divided the inheritance with them, taking two-thirds if she has the jus trium liberorum, and one-third if she had not. This enactment was, therefore, a gain to those who had not the jus liberorum, and a loss to those who had. Justinian did away altogether with the jus liberorum and the distinctions founded upon it.

6. Sed quemadmodum nos matri- bus prospeximus, ita eas oportet suæ suboli consulere: scituris eis, quod, si tutores liberis non petierint vel in locum remoti vel excusati intra annum petere neglexerint, ab eorum

6. And as we have thus taken care of the interests of the mothers, they ought in return to consult the welfare of their children. Let them know, then, that if they do not demand a tutor for their children, or neglect to

5. Sed cum antea constitutiones jura legitima perscrutantes partim matrem adjuvabant, partim eam prægravabant et non in solidum eam vocabant, sed in quibusdam casibus tertiam partem ei abstrahentes certis legitimis dabant personis, in aliis autem contrarium faciebant: nobis visum est, recta et simplici via matrem omnibus legitimis personis anteponi et sine ulla deminutione filiorum suorum successionem accipere, excepta fratris et sororis persona, sive consanguinei sint sive sola cognationis jura habentes, ut quemadmodum eam toto alio ordini legitimo præposuimus, ita omnes fratres et sorores, sive legitimi sint sive non, ad capiendas hereditates simul vocemus, ita tamen ut, si quidem solæ sorores cognatæ vel adgnatæ et mater defuncti vel defunctæ supersint, dimidiam quidem mater, alteram vero dimidiam partem omnes sorores habeant, si vero matre superstita et fratre vel fratribus solis vel etiam cum sororibus sive legitima sive sola cognationis jura habentibus, intestatus quis vel intestata moriatur, in capita distribuatur ejus hereditas.

5. The constitutions of former emperors, relative to the right of succession, were partly favourable to mothers, and partly unfavourable. They did not always give the mothers the entire inheritance of their children, but in some cases deprived them of a third, which was given to certain agnati, and in other cases, doing just the contrary, gave a third. But it seems right to us that mothers should receive the succession of their children without any diminution, and that they should be decidedly and exclusively preferred before all legal heirs, except the brothers and sisters of the deceased, whether by the same father or having only the rights of cognation. And as we have preferred the mother to all other legal heirs, we call all brothers and sisters, legal or not, to the inheritance together with the mother, the following rule being observed. If there are living only sisters agnatæ or cognatæ, and the mother of the deceased, the mother shall have one half of the goods, and the sisters the other half. But if there are living the mother, and also a brother or brothers only, or brothers and also sisters, whether having agnatic rights, or only having the rights of cognati, then the inheritance of the intestate son or daughter shall be divided in capita.

C. vi. 56. 7.

In the code of Theodosius (v. 1. 1), we find two constitutions, one of Constantine, the other of Valentinian and Valens, which made the first change in the jus liberorum introduced by the lex Papia Poppæa. By these constitutions it was enacted that if there were persons in a certain degree of agnation with the deceased, namely, a paternal uncle, or a paternal uncle's son or grandson, or an emancipated brother, then the mother, instead of excluding them, as, if she had the jus liberorum, she would have done, divided the inheritance with them, taking two-thirds if she has the jus trium liberorum, and one-third if she had not. This enactment was, therefore, a gain to those who had not the jus liberorum, and a loss to those who had. Justinian did away altogether with the jus liberorum and the distinctions founded upon it.

6. Sed quemadmodum nos matribus prospeximus, ita eas oportet suæ suboli consulere: scituris eis, quod, si tutores liberis non petierint vel in locum remoti vel excusati intra annum petere neglexerint, ab eorum

6. And as we have thus taken care of the interests of the mothers, they ought in return to consult the welfare of their children. Let them know, then, that if they do not demand a tutor for their children, or neglect to impuberum morientium successione merito repellentur.

ask within a year for the appointment of a new tutor in the place of one who has been removed or excused, they will be deservedly excluded from the succession of their children who may die before the age of puberty.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 43.

7. Licet autem vulgo quæsitus sit filius filiave, potest ad bona ejus mater ex Tertulliano senatusconsulto admitti.

7. Although a son or a daughter is born of an uncertain father, yet the mother may be admitted to succeed to their goods by the senatusconsultum Tertullianum.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 1.

The natural tie is all that is regarded in this case; this is equally strong between the mother and child, whoever may be the father.

TIT. IV. DE SENATUSCONSULTO ORPHITIANO.

Per contrarium autem ut liberi ad bona matrum intestatarum admittantur, senatusconsulto Orphitiano effectum est, quod latum est Orphito et Rufo consulibus, divi Marci temporibus. Et data est tam filio quam filie legitima hereditas, etiamsi alieno juri subjecti sunt: et preferuntur et consanguineis et adgnatis defunctæ matris.

Reciprocally children are admitted to the goods of their intestate mothers by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum, made in the consulship of Orphitus and Rufus, in the reign of the Emperor Marcus. By this senatusconsultum the legal inheritance is given both to the sons and daughters, although in the power of another, and they are preferred to the consanguinei and to the agnati of their deceased mother.

D. xxxviii. 17. 9; C. vi. 57. 1.

The senatusconsultum Orphitianum was made A.D. 178, in the time of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. Previously, children could not succeed to their mother, except as cognati. But by this senatusconsultum they were preferred to the consanguinei, that is, the brothers and sisters, natural or adoptive, as well as to all other agnati.

1. Sed cum ex hoc senatusconsulto nepotes ad aviæ successionem legitimo jure non vocabantur, postea hoc constitutionibus principalibus emendatum est, ut ad similitudinem filiorum filiarumque et nepotes et neptes vocentur.

1. But since grandsons and granddaughters were not called by this senatusconsultum to the legal succession of their grandmother, the omission was afterwards supplied by the imperial constitutions, so that grandsons and granddaughters are now called to inherit, just as sons and daughters are.

C. vi. 55. 9.

The constitution enacting this given in the Code is one of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius.

2. Sciendum autem est, hujusmodi successiones, quæ a Tertulliano

2. It must be observed that these successions, derived from the senatus- impuberum morientium successione merito repellentur.

ask within a year for the appointment of a new tutor in the place of one who has been removed or excused, they will be deservedly excluded from the succession of their children who may die before the age of puberty.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 43.

7. Licet autem vulgo quæsitus sit filius filiae, potest ad bona ejus mater ex Tertulliano senatusconsulto admitti.

7. Although a son or a daughter is born of an uncertain father, yet the mother may be admitted to succeed to their goods by the senatusconsultum Tertullianum.

D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 1.

The natural tie is all that is regarded in this case; this is equally strong between the mother and child, whoever may be the father.

TIT. IV. DE SENATUSCONSULTO ORPHITIANO.

Per contrarium autem ut liberi ad bona matrum intestatarum admittantur, senatusconsulto Orphitiano effectum est, quod latum est Orphito et Rufo consulibus, divi Marci temporibus. Et data est tam filio quam filiae legitima hereditas, etiamsi alieno juri subjecti sunt: et præferuntur et consanguineis et adgnatis defunctæ matris.

Reciprocally children are admitted to the goods of their intestate mothers by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum, made in the consulship of Orphitus and Rufus, in the reign of the Emperor Marcus. By this senatusconsultum the legal inheritance is given both to the sons and daughters, although in the power of another, and they are preferred to the consanguinei and to the agnati of their deceased mother.

D. xxxviii. 17. 9; C. vi. 57. 1.

The senatusconsultum Orphitianum was made A.D. 178, in the time of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. Previously, children could not succeed to their mother, except as cognati. But by this senatusconsultum they were preferred to the consanguinei, that is, the brothers and sisters, natural or adoptive, as well as to all other agnati.

1. Sed cum ex hoc senatusconsulto nepotes ad aviæ successionem legitimo jure non vocabantur, postea hoc constitutionibus principalibus emendatum est, ut ad similitudinem filiorum filiarumque et nepotes et neptes vocentur.

1. But since grandsons and granddaughters were not called by this senatusconsultum to the legal succession of their grandmother, the omission was afterwards supplied by the imperial constitutions, so that grandsons and granddaughters are now called to inherit, just as sons and daughters are.

C. vi. 55. 9.

The constitution enacting this given in the Code is one of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius.

2. Sciendum autem est, hujusmodi successiones, quæ a Tertulliano

2. It must be observed that these successions, derived from the senatus- et Orphitiano deferuntur, capitis deminutione non peremi propter illam regulam, qua novæ hereditates legitimæ capitis deminutione non pereunt, sed illæ solæ, quæ ex lege duodecim tabularum deferuntur.

consulta Tertullianum and Orphitianum, are not lost by a capitis deminutio. The rule is, that legal inheritances given by the later law are not destroyed by capitis deminutio, which affects those only that are given by the law of the Twelve Tables.

D. xxxviii. 17. 1. 8.

It is only the minima capitis deminutio which is here spoken of. Any one who sustained the maxima or media deminutio, as he ceased to be a citizen, ceased to have any rights of succession.

3. Novissime sciendum est, etiam illos liberos, qui vulgo quæriti sunt, ad matris hereditatem ex hoc senatusconsulto admitti.

3. Lastly, it must be observed, that even children born of an uncertain father are admitted by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum to the inheritance of their mother.

D. xxxviii. 17. 1. 2.

Justinian afterwards altered this, so as to exclude such children from taking anything, whether by will, or on intestacy, or by gift inter vivos from their mother, if she was of high rank (illustris), or if she had other children born in lawful marriage. (C. vi. 57. 5.)

4. Si ex pluribus legitimis heredibus quidam omiserint hereditatem vel morte vel alia causa impediti fuerint, quominus adeant: reliquis, qui adierint, adcreseit illorum portio et, licet ante decesserint, qui adierint, ad heredes tamen eorum pertinet.

4. When there are many legal heirs, and some renounce the inheritance, or are prevented by death, or any other cause, from accepting it, then the portions of such persons accrue to those who accept the inheritance; and if any of those who accept happen to die beforehand, the portions accruing to them will go to their heirs.

D. xxxviii. 16. 9.

This paragraph has nothing to do with the senatusconsultum Orphitianum. It refers to the right of accrual enjoyed by all heredes legitimi. If any of those called to share an inheritance did not take his share, it was divided among all those who entered on the inheritance; and, if any of those who had entered died before receiving the share that accrued to him, this accruing share passed to his heirs, his interest in it having become fixed, and made transmissible to his heirs by his entering on the inheritance.

The following were the principal changes in the law of the succession of the agnati. By the law of the Twelve Tables, agnati, i.e. collaterals in the same civil family, succeeded in default of sui heredes. Subsequently, different classes of persons were allowed to rank as agnati who were not so. 1. Emancipated brothers and sisters were allowed to rank as agnati by Anastasius, and their children were allowed to do so by Justinian. 2. Under Justinian, a peculiar order of succession was fixed on for persons emancipated; first came their children; secondly, their brothers and sisters;

et Orphitiano deferuntur, capitis deminutione non peremi propter illam regulam, qua novæ hereditates legitimæ capitis deminutione non pereunt, sed illæ solæ, quæ ex lege duodecim tabularum deferuntur.

consulta Tertullianum and Orphitianum, are not lost by a capitis deminutio. The rule is, that legal inheritances given by the later law are not destroyed by capitis deminutio, which affects those only that are given by the law of the Twelve Tables.

D. xxxviii. 17. 1. 8.

It is only the minima capitis deminutio which is here spoken of. Any one who sustained the maxima or media deminutio, as he ceased to be a citizen, ceased to have any rights of succession.

3. Novissime sciendum est, etiam illos liberos, qui vulgo quæsitæ sunt, ad matris hereditatem ex hoc senatusconsulto admitti.

3. Lastly, it must be observed, that even children born of an uncertain father are admitted by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum to the inheritance of their mother.

D. xxxviii. 17. 1. 2.

Justinian afterwards altered this, so as to exclude such children from taking anything, whether by will, or on intestacy, or by gift inter vivos from their mother, if she was of high rank (illustris), or if she had other children born in lawful marriage. (C. vi. 57. 5.)

4. Si ex pluribus legitimis heredibus quidam omiserint hereditatem vel morte vel alia causa impediti fuerint, quominus adeant: reliquis, qui adierint, ad crescit illorum portio et, licet ante decesserint, qui adierint, ad heredes tamen eorum pertinet.

4. When there are many legal heirs, and some renounce the inheritance, or are prevented by death, or any other cause, from accepting it, then the portions of such persons accrue to those who accept the inheritance; and if any of those who accept happen to die beforehand, the portions accruing to them will go to their heirs.

D. xxxviii. 16. 9.

This paragraph has nothing to do with the senatusconsultum Orphitianum. It refers to the right of accrual enjoyed by all heredes legitimi. If any of those called to share an inheritance did not take his share, it was divided among all those who entered on the inheritance; and, if any of those who had entered died before receiving the share that accrued to him, this accruing share passed to his heirs, his interest in it having become fixed, and made transmissible to his heirs by his entering on the inheritance.

The following were the principal changes in the law of the succession of the agnati. By the law of the Twelve Tables, agnati, i.e. collaterals in the same civil family, succeeded in default of sui heredes. Subsequently, different classes of persons were allowed to rank as agnati who were not so. 1. Emancipated brothers and sisters were allowed to rank as agnati by Anastasius, and their children were allowed to do so by Justinian. 2. Under Justinian, a peculiar order of succession was fixed on for persons emancipated; first came their children; secondly, their brothers and sisters;

children of brothers and sisters. V Ascendants emancipated change in law of 529

A 127
B 529
C 929

thirdly, the ascendant emancipator. 3. Justinian placed uterine brothers and sisters and their children on the same footing as consanguinei and their children. 4. The mother was allowed to succeed to her children by the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, and children to their mother by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum. As the position of the mother is a subject of some complexity, it is treated separately below. 5. Grandchildren succeeded to their grandmother by a constitution of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius (par. 1).

There were also two other points, besides the admission of these persons excluded by the strict definition of agnati, in which the law underwent alterations. First the Twelve Tables made no distinction of sex in the agnati; the prudentes limited the succession of females to the second degree. Justinian restored the law of the Twelve Tables on this point, and permitted no distinction of sex. (Tit. 2. 3.) Secondly, under the law of the Twelve Tables, there was no devolution among the agnati; if the nearest refused, the more remote could not come in their place; Justinian permitted such a devolution to take place. (Tit. 2. 7.)

To have a place in the succession under the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, the mother must have the jus liberorum, the privileges accorded to free persons having three or freed persons having four children, and she had not a definite place, but one varying according as there were or were not other persons to preclude or share her claim. The chief provisions of the law on this head may be stated as follows.

We will first consider the position of the mother, having the jus liberorum, when the father is dead. 1. If her son died leaving children, his children, if in his family, would succeed as sui heredes. But these children might be in an adoptive family, and so have no claim, previously to Justinian's legislation, to the inheritance of their natural father. If there were agnati of the deceased, then the conflict was between the mother and these agnati, and the mother excluded the adopted children. If there were no agnati, then the conflict was between the mother and the adopted children as cognati, and the children excluded the mother. (D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 9.) If her daughter died leaving children, they excluded her under the imperial legislation. (Tit. 3. 3. and C. vi. 57. 1.) 2. If her son or daughter died childless, and without brothers or sisters living, the mother took. If there was a brother of the deceased, he excluded the mother and shared with the sisters, if any. If there were no brothers, but there were sisters, the mother shared with them. (Tit. 3. 3.) Until we get to the legislation of Justinian, it is only of brothers and sisters by the same father, consanguinei, -ae, that we are speaking. 3. Under the later emperors, previously to Justinian, the position of the mother with regard to a paternal uncle, or a paternal uncle's son or grandson, or an emancipated brother of the deceased, was as follows: If the mother had not the jus liberorum, she was no longer

had no liberorum, not excluded by agnati
she had - she did include agnati

thirdly, the ascendant emancipator. 3. Justinian placed uterine brothers and sisters and their children on the same footing as consanguinei and their children. 4. The mother was allowed to succeed to her children by the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, and children to their mother by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum. As the position of the mother is a subject of some complexity, it is treated separately below. 5. Grandchildren succeeded to their grandmother by a constitution of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius (par. 1).

There were also two other points, besides the admission of these persons excluded by the strict definition of agnati, in which the law underwent alterations. First the Twelve Tables made no distinction of sex in the agnati; the prudentes limited the succession of females to the second degree. Justinian restored the law of the Twelve Tables on this point, and permitted no distinction of sex. (Tit. 2. 3.) Secondly, under the law of the Twelve Tables, there was no devolution among the agnati; if the nearest refused, the more remote could not come in their place; Justinian permitted such a devolution to take place. (Tit. 2. 7.)

To have a place in the succession under the senatusconsultum Tertullianum, the mother must have the jus liberorum, the privileges accorded to free persons having three or freed persons having four children, and she had not a definite place, but one varying according as there were or were not other persons to preclude or share her claim. The chief provisions of the law on this head may be stated as follows.

We will first consider the position of the mother, having the jus liberorum, when the father is dead. 1. If her son died leaving children, his children, if in his family, would succeed as sui heredes. But these children might be in an adoptive family, and so have no claim, previously to Justinian's legislation, to the inheritance of their natural father. If there were agnati of the deceased, then the conflict was between the mother and these agnati, and the mother excluded the adopted children. If there were no agnati, then the conflict was between the mother and the adopted children as cognati, and the children excluded the mother. (D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 9.) If her daughter died leaving children, they excluded her under the imperial legislation. (Tit. 3. 3. and C. vi. 57. 1.) 2. If her son or daughter died childless, and without brothers or sisters living, the mother took. If there was a brother of the deceased, he excluded the mother and shared with the sisters, if any. If there were no brothers, but there were sisters, the mother shared with them. (Tit. 3. 3.) Until we get to the legislation of Justinian, it is only of brothers and sisters by the same father, consanguinei, -ae, that we are speaking. 3. Under the later emperors, previously to Justinian, the position of the mother with regard to a paternal uncle, or a paternal uncle's son or grandson, or an emancipated brother of the deceased, was as follows: If the mother had not the jus liberorum, she was no longer

had no liberorum, not excluded by agnati
she had - she did include agnati

excluded by such agnati, but took one-third of the inheritance. If she had the ius liberorum, she no longer excluded them altogether, but only took two-thirds. (Tit. 3. 5.)

Secondly, we will take the case of the father as well as the mother having the ius liberorum being alive. The father took, if in the same family with the deceased child. But (1) the father might have been emancipated or given in adoption, and the deceased child not. Here, if there were agnati of the deceased, the father was excluded, and also the mother if there was a brother of the deceased among the agnati; if there was no brother, she shared with sisters, and excluded remoter agnati. If there were no agnati, or if the sisters disclaimed, then the conflict was between the father as one of the cognati and the mother, and then the father excluded the mother. (D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 17, 18.) (2) The deceased might have been emancipated, and then the father excluded the mother. There might, however, be living the father's father. He, if the father was alive, being preferred to the father, was also preferred to the mother. (D. xxxviii. 17. 5. 2.) The conflict was here not between the mother and the grandfather directly, but between the mother and the grandfather claiming through the father. But if the father was dead, then the conflict was directly between the mother and the grandfather (inter eos solos agitur, Tit. 3. 3), and the mother was preferred.

Justinian made the following changes affecting the position of the mother. 1. He entirely did away with the ius liberorum, and put all mothers on an equality. (Tit. 3. 5.) 2. He put emancipated and uterine brothers and sisters and their children on a level with consanguinei, -ae, and they therefore had to be taken into account when the mother's position had to be determined with regard to the brothers and sisters of the deceased.

Some other minor points as to the succession of mothers and children are worth noticing. (1) The rule as to there being no devolution among agnati did not apply to the mother. If the agnati who preceded her refused, she took; if she refused, the agnati whom she preceded took. (D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 9, 14, 20.) (2) The minima capitis deminutio did not interfere with successions under the senatusconsultum Tertullianum or Orphitianum (Tit. 4. 2); and (3) children born of an uncertain father inherited from their mother under the senatusconsultum Orphitianum (Tit. 4. 3), and their mother from them under the senatusconsultum Tertullianum. (Tit. 3. 7.) (4) Mothers were excluded from succeeding to their children dying under the age of puberty, if they had not provided them with tutors. (Tit. 3. 6.)

TIT. V. DE SUCCESSIONE COGNATORUM.

Post suos heredes eosque
inter suos heredes prætor et consti-
tutiones vocant, et post legitimos

After the sui heredes and those whom the prætor and the constitutions call to inherit among the sui

excluded by such agnati, but took one-third of the inheritance. If she had the ius liberorum, she no longer excluded them altogether, but only took two-thirds. (Tit. 3. 5.)

Secondly, we will take the case of the father as well as the mother having the ius liberorum being alive. The father took, if in the same family with the deceased child. But (1) the father might have been emancipated or given in adoption, and the deceased child not. Here, if there were agnati of the deceased, the father was excluded, and also the mother if there was a brother of the deceased among the agnati; if there was no brother, she shared with sisters, and excluded remoter agnati. If there were no agnati, or if the sisters disclaimed, then the conflict was between the father as one of the cognati and the mother, and then the father excluded the mother. (D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 17, 18.) (2) The deceased might have been emancipated, and then the father excluded the mother. There might, however, be living the father's father. He, if the father was alive, being preferred to the father, was also preferred to the mother. (D. xxxviii. 17. 5. 2.) The conflict was here not between the mother and the grandfather directly, but between the mother and the grandfather claiming through the father. But if the father was dead, then the conflict was directly between the mother and the grandfather (inter eos solos agitur, Tit. 3. 3), and the mother was preferred.

Justinian made the following changes affecting the position of the mother. 1. He entirely did away with the ius liberorum, and put all mothers on an equality. (Tit. 3. 5.) 2. He put emancipated and uterine brothers and sisters and their children on a level with consanguinei, -ae, and they therefore had to be taken into account when the mother's position had to be determined with regard to the brothers and sisters of the deceased.

Some other minor points as to the succession of mothers and children are worth noticing. (1) The rule as to there being no devolution among agnati did not apply to the mother. If the agnati who preceded her refused, she took; if she refused, the agnati whom she preceded took. (D. xxxviii. 17. 2. 9, 14, 20.) (2) The minima capitis deminutio did not interfere with successions under the senatusconsultum Tertullianum or Orphitianum (Tit. 4. 2); and (3) children born of an uncertain father inherited from their mother under the senatusconsultum Orphitianum (Tit. 4. 3), and their mother from them under the senatusconsultum Tertullianum. (Tit. 3. 7.) (4) Mothers were excluded from succeeding to their children dying under the age of puberty, if they had not provided them with tutors. (Tit. 3. 6.)

TIT. V. DE SUCCESSIONE COGNATORUM.

Post suos heredes eosque
inter suos heredes prætor et consti-
tutiones vocant, et post legitimos

After the sui heredes and those whom the prætor and the constitutions call to inherit among the sui

(quo numero sunt adgnati et hi, quos in locum adgnatorum tam supra dicta senatusconsulta quam nostra erexit constitutio) proximos cognatos prætor vocat.

heredes, and after the legal heirs, that is, the agnati and those whom the above-mentioned senatusconsulta and our constitution have placed among the agnati, the prætor calls the nearest cognati.

D. xxxviii. 15. 1; D. xxxviii. 7. 2. 4.

The law of the Twelve Tables recognised only the succession of (1) sui heredes; (2) agnati; (3) gentiles. If there were no gentiles, the inheritance lapsed to the state. In plebeian families, or rather in such plebeian families as were not parts of a plebeian gens, if there were no agnati, the inheritance would lapse at once.

The subject of gentilitas is too obscure, and repays investigation too little, to permit us to enter into it here. Probably the original notion of gentiles was that of members of some pure uncorrupted patrician stock, though not necessarily of the same descent, but bearing the same name, and having the same sacra. (See Introd. sec. 2.) Probably, also, freedmen and clients of gentiles were, in some degree, considered as themselves gentiles; probably if their property was not claimed by their patron, it went to the members of his gens, but they had not any claim on the property of any other gentilis. We know also that there were plebeian gentes, formed probably by the marriage of a patrician with a plebeian before the plebs received the connubium. Members of plebeian gentes would, we may suppose, have the rights of gentilitas towards other members of the same plebeian gens, and it would seem that they had them towards the members of the patrician gens, from which they were an offset (Cic. de Orat. i. 39). Of the mode in which the gentiles took the inheritance, we know nothing, nor at how late a period of history the gentes were still really in existence. Gaius (iii. 17) treats the subject as one of mere antiquarian interest. Probably at the time of the prætor's legislation there were few families that could boast a descent so pure and accurately known as to satisfy the requisites of gentilitas. At any rate, the prætors felt themselves at liberty to favour, in every way, the tie of blood, and they accordingly called the cognati to the succession. (See further, ORTOLAN, iii. 30 et seq.; HUNTER, 657.)

1. Qua parte naturalis cognatio spectatur. Nam adgnati capite deminuti quique ex his progeniti sunt, ex lege duodecim tabularum inter legitimos non habentur, sed a prætore tertio ordine vocantur, exceptis solis tantummodo fratre et sorore emancipatis, non etiam liberis eorum, quos lex Anastasiana cum fratribus integri juris constitutis vocat quidem ad legitimam fratris hereditatem sive sororis, non æquis tamen partibus, sed cum aliqua deminu-

1. It is the natural relationship that is here looked to; thus agnati who have undergone a capitis deminutio and their descendants are not included among the legal heirs by the law of the Twelve Tables, but they are called by the prætor in the third order. We must except an emancipated brother or sister, but not their children. For the lex Anastasiana calls an emancipated brother or sister, together with brothers whose rights still exist unaltered, to the legal succession of-not under deminutio

fratris emancipatis
sive sororis sed non liberis
solum

(quo numero sunt adgnati et hi, quos in locum adgnatorum tam supra dicta senatusconsulta quam nostra erexit constitutio) proximos cognatos prætor vocat.

heredes, and after the legal heirs, that is, the agnati and those whom the above-mentioned senatusconsulta and our constitution have placed among the agnati, the prætor calls the nearest cognati.

D. xxxviii. 15. 1; D. xxxviii. 7. 2. 4.

The law of the Twelve Tables recognised only the succession of (1) sui heredes; (2) agnati; (3) gentiles. If there were no gentiles, the inheritance lapsed to the state. In plebeian families, or rather in such plebeian families as were not parts of a plebeian gens, if there were no agnati, the inheritance would lapse at once.

The subject of gentilitas is too obscure, and repays investigation too little, to permit us to enter into it here. Probably the original notion of gentiles was that of members of some pure uncorrupted patrician stock, though not necessarily of the same descent, but bearing the same name, and having the same sacra. (See Introd. sec. 2.) Probably, also, freedmen and clients of gentiles were, in some degree, considered as themselves gentiles; probably if their property was not claimed by their patron, it went to the members of his gens, but they had not any claim on the property of any other gentilis. We know also that there were plebeian gentes, formed probably by the marriage of a patrician with a plebeian before the plebs received the connubium. Members of plebeian gentes would, we may suppose, have the rights of gentilitas towards other members of the same plebeian gens, and it would seem that they had them towards the members of the patrician gens, from which they were an offset (Cic. de Orat. i. 39). Of the mode in which the gentiles took the inheritance, we know nothing, nor at how late a period of history the gentes were still really in existence. Gaius (iii. 17) treats the subject as one of mere antiquarian interest. Probably at the time of the prætor's legislation there were few families that could boast a descent so pure and accurately known as to satisfy the requisites of gentilitas. At any rate, the prætors felt themselves at liberty to favour, in every way, the tie of blood, and they accordingly called the cognati to the succession. (See further, ORTOLAN, iii. 30 et seq.; HUNTER, 657.)

1. Qua parte naturalis cognatio spectatur. Nam adgnati capite deminuti quique ex his progeniti sunt, ex lege duodecim tabularum inter legitimos non habentur, sed a prætore tertio ordine vocantur, exceptis solis tantummodo fratre et sorore emancipatis, non etiam liberis eorum, quos lex Anastasiana cum fratribus integri juris constitutis vocat quidem ad legitimam fratris hereditatem sive sororis, non æquis tamen partibus, sed cum aliqua deminu-

1. It is the natural relationship that is here looked to; thus agnati who have undergone a capitis deminutio and their descendants are not included among the legal heirs by the law of the Twelve Tables, but they are called by the prætor in the third order. We must except an emancipated brother or sister, but not their children. For the lex Anastasiana calls an emancipated brother or sister, together with brothers whose rights still exist unaltered, to the legal succession of-

with undergen
deminutio
proli emancipatis brother or sister not their children

tione, quam facile est ex ipsius constitutionis verbis colligere, aliis vero adgnatis inferioris gradus, licet capitis deminutionem passi non sunt, tamen eos anteposit et procul dubio cognatis.

their brother or sister (not, indeed, giving them an equal share, but making a deduction set forth in the constitution), and prefers them to all agnati of an inferior degree, even though these agnati have undergone no capitis deminutio, and, of course, prefers them to all cognati.

GAI. iii. 21, 27; C. v. 30. 4.

We have already spoken of this lex Anastasiana in the note to Tit. 2. 4, and noticed the constitution of 534, by which Justinian admitted as agnati the children of emancipated brothers and sisters, and did away with the deduction mentioned in the text, namely, that of one-fourth.

2. Hos etiam, qui per feminini sexus personas ex transverso cognatione junguntur, tertio gradu proximitatis nomine prætor ad successionem vocat.

2. Collateral relations united only by the female line are also called by the prætor in the third order of succession, by title of their proximity.

GAI. iii. 30.

3. Liberi quoque, qui in adoptiva familia sunt, ad naturalium parentum hereditatem hoc eodem gradu vocantur.

3. Children, who are in an adoptive family, are likewise called in the third order of succession to the inheritance of their natural parents.

GAI. iii. 31.

Justinian's change in the law of adoption left the adoptive child, unless adopted by an ascendant, in his natural family, and, therefore, he could come in as a suus heres, or agnatus, and not merely as a cognatus. But the text would still be applicable to persons adopted by an ascendant and to persons sui juris, who arrogated themselves.

4. Vulgo quæritos nullum habere adgnatum, manifestum est, cum adgnatio a patre, cognatio sit a matre, hi autem nullum patrem habere intelleguntur. Eadem ratione nec inter se quidem possunt videri consanguinei esse, quia consanguinitatis jus species est adgnationis: tantum igitur cognati sunt sibi, sicut et matris cognatis. Itaque omnibus istis ea parte competit bonorum possessio, qua proximitatis nomine cognati vocantur.

4. It is manifest that children born of an uncertain father have no agnati, inasmuch as agnation proceeds from the father, cognation from the mother, and such children are looked upon as having no father. And, for the same reason, consanguinity cannot be said to subsist between these children, because consanguinity is a species of agnation. They can, therefore, only be related to each other as cognati by being so related by their mother; and it is for this reason that all such children are admitted to the possession of goods by that part of the edict which calls the cognati by title of their proximity.

D. xxxviii. 8. 2, 4.

5. Hoc loco et illud necessario admonendi sumus, adgnationis quidem jure admitti aliquem ad hereditatem

5. Here we may observe, that by right of agnation any one may be admitted to inherit, although in the tenth tionem, quam facile est ex ipsius constitutionis verbis colligere, aliis vero agnatis inferioris gradus, licet capitulis deminutionem passi non sunt, tamen eos anteponebat et procul dubio cognatis.

their brother or sister (not, indeed, giving them an equal share, but making a deduction set forth in the constitution), and prefers them to all agnati of an inferior degree, even though these agnati have undergone no capitis deminutio, and, of course, prefers them to all cognati.

GAI. iii. 21, 27; C. v. 30. 4.

We have already spoken of this lex Anastasiana in the note to Tit. 2. 4, and noticed the constitution of 534, by which Justinian admitted as agnati the children of emancipated brothers and sisters, and did away with the deduction mentioned in the text, namely, that of one-fourth.

2. Hos etiam, qui per feminini sexus personas ex transverso cognatione junguntur, tertio gradu proximitatis nomine prætor ad successionem vocat.

2. Collateral relations united only by the female line are also called by the prætor in the third order of succession, by title of their proximity.

GAI. iii. 30.

3. Liberi quoque, qui in adoptiva familia sunt, ad naturalium parentum hereditatem hoc eodem gradu vocantur.

3. Children, who are in an adoptive family, are likewise called in the third order of succession to the inheritance of their natural parents.

GAI. iii. 31.

Justinian's change in the law of adoption left the adoptive child, unless adopted by an ascendant, in his natural family, and, therefore, he could come in as a suus heres, or agnatus, and not merely as a cognatus. But the text would still be applicable to persons adopted by an ascendant and to persons sui juris, who arrogated themselves.

4. Vulgo quæritos nullum habere agnatum, manifestum est, cum agnatio a patre, cognatio sit a matre, hi autem nullum patrem habere intelleguntur. Eadem ratione nec inter se quidem possunt videri consanguinei esse, quia consanguinitatis jus species est agnationis: tantum igitur cognati sunt sibi, sicut et matris cognatis. Itaque omnibus istis ea parte competit bonorum possessio, qua proximitatis nomine cognati vocantur.

4. It is manifest that children born of an uncertain father have no agnati, inasmuch as agnation proceeds from the father, cognation from the mother, and such children are looked upon as having no father. And, for the same reason, consanguinity cannot be said to subsist between these children, because consanguinity is a species of agnation. They can, therefore, only be related to each other as cognati by being so related by their mother; and it is for this reason that all such children are admitted to the possession of goods by that part of the edict which calls the cognati by title of their proximity.

D. xxxviii. 8. 2, 4.

5. Hoc loco et illud necessario admonendi sumus, agnationis quidem jure admitti aliquem ad hereditatem

5. Here we may observe, that by right of agnation any one may be admitted to inherit, although in the tenth et si decimo gradu sit, sive de lege duodecim tabularum quaeramus, sive de edicto, quo prætor legitimis heredibus daturum se bonorum possessionem pollicetur. Proximitatis vero nomine his solis prætor promittit bonorum possessionem, qui usque ad sextum gradum cognationis sunt, et ex septimo a sobrino sobrinaque nato natæve.

degree, both by the law of the Twelve Tables, and by the edict in which the prætor promises that he will give the possession of goods to the legal heirs. But the prætor promises the possession of goods to cognati by title of their proximity only as far as the sixth degree of cognation, and in the seventh degree to those cognati who are the children of a second cousin.

D. xxxviii. 16. 2. 1; D. xxxviii. 8. 1. 3; D. xxxviii. 8. 9. pr.

The agnati were not limited by the tenth degree. (See Tit. 6. 12.) This degree is only given as an instance of how far the succession might go. But the sixth degree was the limit, with the exception given in the text, of the succession of cognati.

TIT. VI. DE GRADIBUS COGNATIONIS.

Hoc loco necessarium est exponere, quemadmodum gradus cognationis numerentur. Qua in re imprimis admonendi sumus, cognationem aliam supra numerari, aliam infra, aliam ex transverso, quæ etiam ex latere dicitur. Superior cognatio est parentum, inferior liberorum, ex transverso fratrum sororumve eorumque, qui ex his progenerantur, et convenienter patrui, amitæ, avunculi, materteræ. Et superior quidem et inferior cognatio a primo gradu incipit: at ea, quæ ex transverso numeratur, a secundo.

It is now necessary to explain how the degrees of cognation are computed; and first we must observe, that one cognation is reckoned by ascending, a second by descending, and a third by going transversely, or, as it is also called, collaterally. The cognation reckoned by ascending is that of ascendants; that reckoned by descending is that of descendants; that reckoned transversely is that of brothers and sisters, and their issue, and consequently that of uncles and aunts, whether paternal or maternal. In the ascending and descending cognation the nearest cognatus is in the first degree; in the transverse, the nearest is in the second.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. pr. and 1.

1. Primo gradu est supra pater, mater, infra filius, filia.

1. In the first degree are, ascending, a father or a mother; descending, a son or a daughter.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 3.

2. Secundo supra avus, avia, infra nepos, neptis, ex transverso frater, soror.

2. In the second degree are, ascending, a grandfather or a grandmother; descending, a grandson or granddaughter; in the collateral line, a brother or a sister.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 4.

3. Tertio supra proavus, proavia, infra pronepos, proneptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque filius, filia et convenienter patruus, amita, avunculus, matertera. Patruus est patris

3. In the third degree are, ascending, a great-grandfather or a great-grandmother; descending, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter; in the collateral line, the son or degree, both by the law of the Twelve Tables, and by the edict in which the prætor promises that he will give the possession of goods to the legal heirs. But the prætor promises the possession of goods to cognati by title of their proximity only as far as the sixth degree of cognation, and in the seventh degree to those cognati who are the children of a second cousin.

et si decimo gradu sit, sive de lege duodecim tabularum quaeramus, sive de edicto, quo prætor legitimis hereditibus daturum se bonorum possessionem pollicetur. Proximitatis vero nomine his solis prætor promittit bonorum possessionem, qui usque ad sextum gradum cognationis sunt, et ex septimo a sobrino sobrinaque nato natæve.

D. xxxviii. 16. 2. 1; D. xxxviii. 8. 1. 3; D. xxxviii. 8. 9. pr.

The agnati were not limited by the tenth degree. (See Tit. 6. 12.) This degree is only given as an instance of how far the succession might go. But the sixth degree was the limit, with the exception given in the text, of the succession of cognati.

TIT. VI. DE GRADIBUS COGNATIONIS.

Hoc loco necessarium est exponere, quemadmodum gradus cognationis numerentur. Qua in re imprimis admonendi sumus, cognationem aliam supra numerari, aliam infra, aliam ex transverso, quæ etiam ex latere dicitur. Superior cognatio est parentum, inferior liberorum, ex transverso fratrum sororumve eorumque, qui ex his progenerantur, et convenienter patrui, amitæ, avunculi, materteræ. Et superior quidem et inferior cognatio a primo gradu incipit: at ea, quæ ex transverso numeratur, a secundo.

It is now necessary to explain how the degrees of cognation are computed; and first we must observe, that one cognation is reckoned by ascending, a second by descending, and a third by going transversely, or, as it is also called, collaterally. The cognation reckoned by ascending is that of ascendants; that reckoned by descending is that of descendants; that reckoned transversely is that of brothers and sisters, and their issue, and consequently that of uncles and aunts, whether paternal or maternal. In the ascending and descending cognation the nearest cognatus is in the first degree; in the transverse, the nearest is in the second.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. pr. and 1.

1. Primo gradu est supra pater, mater, infra filius, filia.

1. In the first degree are, ascending, a father or a mother; descending, a son or a daughter.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 3.

2. Secundo supra avus, avia, infra nepos, neptis, ex transverso frater, soror.

2. In the second degree are, ascending, a grandfather or a grandmother; descending, a grandson or granddaughter; in the collateral line, a brother or a sister.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 4.

3. Tertio supra proavus, proavia, infra pronepos, proneptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque filius, filia et convenienter patrui, amitæ, avunculus, matertera. Patruus est patris

3. In the third degree are, ascending, a great-grandfather or a great-grandmother; descending, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter; in the collateral line, the son or frater, qui Græce πάππος vocatur; avunculus est matris frater, qui apud Græcos proprie μῆτρως appellatur: et promiscue θείος dicitur. Amita est patris soror, matertera vero matris soror: utraque θεία vel apud quosdam τηθίς appellatur.

daughter of a brother or sister; and so accordingly is an uncle or an aunt, whether paternal or maternal. Patruus is a father's brother, called in Greek πάππος; avunculus is a mother's brother, in Greek μῆτρως; θείος is applied indifferently to either; amita is a father's sister, matertera a mother's sister, and each is called in Greek θεία, indifferently, and sometimes τηθίς.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 5; D. xxxviii. 10. 10. 14.

4. Quarto gradu supra abavus, abavia, infra abnepos, abneptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque nepos, neptis et convenienter patruus magnus, amita magna (id est avi frater et soror), item avunculus magnus, matertera magna (id est avie frater et soror), consobrinus, consobrina (id est qui quæve ex fratribus aut sororibus progengerantur). Sed quidam recte consobrinos eos proprie putant dici, qui ex duabus sororibus progengerantur, quasi consororinos: eos vero qui ex duobus fratribus progengerantur, proprie fratres patruales vocari (si autem ex duobus fratribus filiae nascantur, sorores patruales appellantur): at eos, qui ex fratre et sorore propagantur, amitinos proprie dici (amitæ tuæ filii consobrinum te appellant, tu illos amitinos).

4. In the fourth degree are, ascending, a great-great-grandfather, or a great-great-grandmother; descending, a great-great-grandson, or a great-great-granddaughter; in the collateral line, the grandson or the granddaughter of a brother or a sister; as also a great-uncle or great-aunt, paternal, that is, the brother or sister of a grandfather; or maternal, that is, the brother or sister of a grandmother; and first cousins (consobrinus, -a), that is, the children of brothers or sisters; but to speak strictly, according to some, it is the children of sisters that are properly called consobrini, as if consororini; the children of brothers are properly fratres patruales, if males; sorores patruales, if females; the children of a brother and of a sister are properly amitini; the children of your amita (aunt by the father's side) call you consobrinus, and you call them amitini.

D. xxxvii. 10. 1. 6.

5. Quinto supra atavus, atavia, infra adnepos, adneptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque pronepos, proneptis et convenienter (propatruus, proamita) (id est proavi frater et soror), proavunculus, promatertera (id est proavie frater et soror), item (fratris patruelis, sororis patruelis), consobrini et consobrinæ, amitini, amitinae filius, filia, propius sobrino, sobrina (hi sunt patru magni, amitæ magnæ, avunculi magni, materteræ magnæ filius, filia).

5. In the fifth degree are, ascending, a great-grandfather's grandfather, or a great-grandfather's grandmother; descending, a great-grandson or a great-granddaughter of a grandson or granddaughter; in the collateral line, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter of a brother or sister, as also (a great-grandfather's brother or sister, or a great-grandmother's brother or sister), also, the son or daughter of a first cousin; that is, of a frater or soror patruelis, of a consobrinus or consobrina, or of an amitinus or amitina; also cousins who precede by a degree second cousins, that is, the son or daughter of a great-uncle or great-aunt, paternal or maternal.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 7.

frater, qui Græce *πάτρω*s vocatur; avunculus est matris frater, qui apud Græcos proprie *μήτρω*s appellatur: et promiscue θείος dicitur. Amita est patris soror, matertera vero matris soror: utraque θεία vel apud quosdam τηθίς appellatur.

daughter of a brother or sister; and so accordingly is an uncle or an aunt, whether paternal or maternal. Patruus is a father's brother, called in Greek *πάτρω*s; avunculus is a mother's brother, in Greek *μήτρω*s; θείος is applied indifferently to either; amita is a father's sister, matertera a mother's sister, and each is called in Greek θεία, indifferently, and sometimes τηθίς.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 5; D. xxxviii. 10. 10. 14.

4. Quarto gradu supra abavus, abavia, infra abnepos, abneptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque nepos, neptis et conveniēter patruus magnus (amita magna (id est avi frater et soror), item avunculus magnus, matertera magna (id est avie frater et soror), consobrinus, consobrina (id est qui quæve ex fratribus aut sororibus progengerantur). Sed quidam recte consobrinos eos proprie putant dici, qui ex duobus sororibus progengerantur, quasi consororinos: eos vero qui ex duobus fratribus progengerantur, proprie fratres patruelos vocari (si autem ex duobus fratribus filia nascuntur, sorores patruelos appellantur): at eos, qui ex fratre et sorore propagantur, amitinos proprie dici (amitæ tuæ filii consobrinum te appellant, tu illos amitinos).

4. In the fourth degree are, ascending, a great-great-grandfather, or a great-great-grandmother; descending, a great-great-grandson, or a great-great-granddaughter; in the collateral line, the grandson or the granddaughter of a brother or a sister; as also a great-uncle or great-aunt, paternal, that is, the brother or sister of a grandfather; or maternal, that is, the brother or sister of a grandmother; and first cousins (consobrinus, -a), that is, the children of brothers or sisters; but to speak strictly, according to some, it is the children of sisters that are properly called consobrini, as if consororini; the children of brothers are properly fratres patruelos, if males; sorores patruelos, if females; the children of a brother and of a sister are properly amitini; the children of your amita (aunt by the father's side) call you consobrinus, and you call them amitini.

D. xxxvii. 10. 1. 6.

5. Quinto supra atavus, atavia, infra adnepos, adneptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque pronepos, proneptis et conveniēter (propatruus, proamita) (id est proavi frater et soror), proavunculus, promatertera (id est proavie frater et soror), item (fratris patruelis, sororis patruelis), consobrini et consobrinæ, amitini, amitinae filius, filia, propius sobrino, sobrina (hi sunt patru magni, amitæ magnæ, avunculi magni, materteræ magnæ filius, filia).

5. In the fifth degree are, ascending, a great-grandfather's grandfather, or a great-grandfather's grandmother; descending, a great-grandson or a great-granddaughter of a grandson or granddaughter; in the collateral line, a great-grandson or great-granddaughter of a brother or sister, as also (a great-grandfather's brother or sister, or a great-grandmother's brother or sister) also, the son or daughter of a first cousin; that is, of a frater or soror patruelis, of a consobrinus or consobrina, or of an amitinus or amitina; also cousins who precede by a degree second cousins, that is, the son or daughter of a great-uncle or great-aunt, paternal or maternal.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 7.

Propior sobrino is, to use the exact equivalent, a first cousin once removed. He is one degree nearer (propius) than a sobrinius or second cousin.

6. Sexto gradu sunt supra tritavus, tritavia, infra trinepos, trineptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque abnepos, abneptis et convenienter abpatruus, abamita (id est abavi frater et soror), abavunculus, abmatertera (id est abaviae frater et soror), item sobriini sobrinaeque (id est qui quæve ex fratribus vel sororibus patruelibus vel consobrinis vel amitinis progenerantur).

6. In the sixth degree are, ascending, a great-grandfather's great-grandfather, or a great-grandfather's great-grandmother; descending, the great-grandson or great-granddaughter of a great-grandson or a great-granddaughter; in the collateral line, a great-great-grandson or a great-great-granddaughter of a brother or sister; as also, a great-great-grandfather's brother or sister, and a great-great-grandmother's brother or sister; also, (second cousins, that is, the sons and daughters of first cousins in general, whether the first cousins are sprung from two brothers or two sisters, or a brother and a sister.

D. xxxviii. 10. 3.

The list of the persons belonging to the sixth degree here given is not complete, as will be seen by looking at the accompanying table. To make the list complete we should have to insert, as Huschke inserts in the text after abaviae frater et soror, the following words:—‘Item propatruui, proamitæ, proavunculi, promaterteræ filius, filia, item fratris patruelis, sororis patruelis, consobrini, consobrinae, amitini, amitinae, nepos, neptis.’

7. Hactenus ostendisse sufficiet, quemadmodum gradus cognationis numerentur. Namque ex his palam est intellegere, quemadmodum ulterius quoque gradus numerare debemus, quippe semper generata quæque persona gradum adiciat, ut longe facilius sit respondere quoto quisque gradu sit, quam propria cognationis appellatione quemquam denotare.

7. It is sufficient to have shown thus far how degrees of cognation are reckoned; and from the examples given the more remote degrees may be computed; for each generation always adds one degree; so that it is much easier to express in what degree any person is related to another than to denote such person by his proper term of cognation.

D. xxxviii. 10. 10. 9.

8. Adgnationis quoque gradus eodem modo numerantur.

8. The degrees of agnation are reckoned in the same manner.

9. Sed cum magis veritas oculata fide quam per aures animis hominum infigitur, ideo necessarium duximus, post narrationem graduum etiam eos præsentem libro inscribi, quatenus possint et auribus et inspectione adulescentes perfectissimam graduum doctrinam adipisci.

9. But as truth is fixed in the mind much better by the eye than by the ear, we have thought it necessary to subjoin, to the account given of the degrees, a table of them, that the young student, both by hearing and by seeing, may gain a perfect knowledge of them.

This table is given in the opposite page.

Propior sobrino is, to use the exact equivalent, a first cousin once removed. He is one degree nearer (propius) than a sobrinnus or second cousin.

6. Sexto gradu sunt supra tritavus, tritavia, infra trinepos, trineptis, ex transverso fratris sororisque abnepos, abneptis et convenienter abpatruus, abamita (id est abavi frater et soror), abavunculus, abmatertera (id est abaviae frater et soror), item sobriini sobrinæque (id est qui quæve ex fratribus vel sororibus patruelibus vel consobrinis vel amitinis progenerantur).

6. In the sixth degree are, ascending, a great-grandfather's great-grandfather, or a great-grandfather's great-grandmother; descending, the great-grandson or great-granddaughter of a great-grandson or a great-granddaughter; in the collateral line, a great-great-grandson or a great-great-granddaughter of a brother or sister; as also, a great-great-grandfather's brother or sister, and a great-great-grandmother's brother or sister; also, (second cousins, that is, the sons and daughters of first cousins in general, whether the first cousins are sprung from two brothers or two sisters, or a brother and a sister.

D. xxxviii. 10. 3.

The list of the persons belonging to the sixth degree here given is not complete, as will be seen by looking at the accompanying table. To make the list complete we should have to insert, as Huschke inserts in the text after abaviae frater et soror, the following words:—‘Item propatruui, proamitæ, proavunculi, promaterteræ filius, filia, item fratris patruelis, sororis patruelis, consobrini, consobrinæ, amitini, amitinae, nepos, neptis.’

7. Hactenus ostendisse sufficiet, quemadmodum gradus cognationis numerentur. Namque ex his palam est intellegere, quemadmodum ulterius quoque gradus numerare debemus, quippe semper generata quæque persona gradum adiciat, ut longe facilius sit respondere quoto quisque gradu sit, quam propria cognationis appellatione quemquam denotare.

7. It is sufficient to have shown thus far how degrees of cognation are reckoned; and from the examples given the more remote degrees may be computed; for each generation always adds one degree; so that it is much easier to express in what degree any person is related to another than to denote such person by his proper term of cognation.

D. xxxviii. 10. 10. 9.

8. Adgnationis quoque gradus eodem modo numerantur.

8. The degrees of agnation are reckoned in the same manner.

9. Sed cum magis veritas oculata fide quam per aures animis hominum infigitur, ideo necessarium duximus, post narrationem graduum etiam eos præsentis libro inscribi, quatenus possint et auribus et inspectione adulescentes perfectissimam graduum doctrinam adipisci.

9. But as truth is fixed in the mind much better by the eye than by the ear, we have thought it necessary to subjoin, to the account given of the degrees, a table of them, that the young student, both by hearing and by seeing, may gain a perfect knowledge of them.

This table is given in the opposite page.

						VI. Trit- avus.	VI. Trit- avia.
						VI. Abpa- trus, abamita.	V. Ata- vus.	V. Ata- via.	VI. Abavun- culus, abmater- tera.
						VI. Propatru- i, proamita filius, filia.	V. Propa- trus, pro- amita.	IV. Ab- avus.	IV. Ab- avia.	V. Proavun- culus, pro- matertera.	VI. Proavun- culi, pro- matertera filius, filia.
						VI. Sobrinus, sobrina.	V. Propior sobrinus, sobrina.	IV. Patruus magnus, amita magna.	III. Pro- avus.	III. Pro- avia.	IV. Avun- culus magnus, mater- tera magna.	V. Propior sobrinus, sobrina.	VI. Sobrinus, sobrina.
						VI. Fratris et sororis pa- truelis, amitini, amitinae nepos, neptis.	V. Fratris et sororis pa- truelis, amitini, amitinae filius, filia.	IV. Fratres et sorores patruales, amitinus, amitina.	III. Patruus, amita.	II. Avus.	II. Avia.	III. Avun- culus, mater- tera.	IV. Frater con- sobrinus, soror con- sobrina.	V. Fratris consobrinus, sororis con- sobrina filius, filia.	VI. Fratris consobrinus, sororis consobrina nepos, neptis.
VI. Fratris abnepos, abneptis.	V. Fratris pronepos, proneptis.	IV. Fratris nepos, neptis.	III. Fratris filius, filia.	II. Frater.	I. Pater.	I. Mater.	II. Soror.	III. Sororis filius, filia.	IV. Sororis nepos, neptis.	V. Sororis pronepos, proneptis.	VI. Sororis abnepos, abneptis.
							I. Filius.	I. Filia.
							II. Nepos.	II. Neptis.
							III. Pro- nepos.	III. Pro- neptis.
							IV. Ab- nepos.	IV. Ab- neptis.
							V. Ad- nepos.	V. Ad- neptis.
							VI. Tri- nepos.	VI. Tri- neptis.

re d le to le e d r.

					VI. Trit- avus.	VI. Trit- avia.
					VI. Abpa- truus, abamita.	V. Ata- vus.	V. Ata- via.	VI. Abevun- culus, abmater- tera.
					VI. Propatruī, proamatē filius, filia.	V. Propa- truus, pro- amita.	IV. Ab- avus.	IV. Ab- avia.	V. Proavun- culus, proma- tertera.	VI. Proavun- culi, pro- matertera filius, filia.
					VI. Sobrius, sobrina.	V. Propior sobrinus, sobrina.	IV. Patrus magnus, amita magna.	III. Pro- avus.	III. Pro- avia.	IV. Avun- culus magnus, mater- tera magna.	V. Propior sobrinus, sobrina.	VI. Sobrinus, sobrina.
					VI. Fratris et sororis pa- truelis, amitini, amitinae nepos, neptis.	V. Fratris et sororis pa- truelis, amitini, amitinae filius, filia.	IV. Frates et sorores patrueles, amitiuus, amitinae.	III. Patrius, amita.	II. Avus.	II. Avia.	III. Avun- culus, mater- tera.	IV. Fratr con- sobrinus, soror con- sobrina.	V. Fratris consobrini, sororis con- sobrinae filius, filia.	VI. Fratris consobrini, sororis consobrince nepos, neptis.
VI. Fratris abnepos, abneptis.	V. Fratris pronepos, proneptis.	IV. Fratris nepos, neptis.	III. Fratris filius, filia.	II. Fratr.	I. Pater.	I. Mater.	II. Soror.	III. Sororis filius, filia.	IV. Sororis nepos, neptis.	V. Sororis pronepos, proneptis.	VI. Sororis abnepos, abneptis.
					I. Filius.	I. Filia.
					II. Nepos.	II. Neptis.
					III. Pro- nepos.	III. Pro- neptis.
					IV. Ab- nepos.	IV. Ab- neptis.
					V. Ad- nepos.	V. Ad- neptis.
					VI. Tri- nepos.	VI. Tri- neptis.

10. Illud certum est, ad serviles cognationes illam partem edicti, qua proximitatis nomine honorum possessio promittitur, non pertinere: nam nec ulla antiqua lege talis cognatio computabatur. Sed nostra constitutio, quam pro jure patronatus fecimus (quod jus usque ad nostra tempora satis obscurum atque nube plenum et undique confusum fuerat), et hoc, humanitate suggerente, concessimus, ut si quis in servili consortio constitutus liberum vel liberos habuerit sive ex libera sive servilis conditionis muliere, vel contra serva mulier ex libero vel servo habuerit liberos cujuscumque sexus, et ad libertatem his pervenientibus et hi, qui ex servili ventre nati sunt, libertatem meruerunt, vel dum mulieres liberae erant, ipsi in servitute eas habuerunt et postea ad libertatem pervenerunt, ut hi omnes ad successionem vel patris vel matris veniant, patronatus jure in hac parte sopito: hos enim liberos non solum in suorum parentum successionem, sed etiam alterum in alterius mutuum successionem vocavimus, ex illa lege specialiter eos vocantes, sive soli inveniantur, qui in servitute nati et postea manumissi sunt, sive una cum aliis, qui post libertatem parentum concepti sunt, sive ex eadem matre vel eodem patre sive ex aliis nuptiis, ad similitudinem eorum, qui ex justis nuptiis procreati sunt.

10. It is certain that the part of the edict in which the possession of goods is promised by title of proximity, does not apply to servile cognation, which was not recognised by any ancient law. But, by our constitution concerning the right of patronage, a right hitherto so obscure, so cloudy and confused, we have enacted, from a feeling of humanity, that if a male slave lives with, and has children by, a woman either free or a slave, or conversely, if a female slave has a child or children of either sex by a freeman or a slave, then if those of the parents who are not free are enfranchised, and the children, whose mother was a slave, are also made free; or if the mothers were originally free, but the fathers had lived with them after they had been reduced to a servile condition and afterwards both parents had been made free:—then in these cases, the children shall all succeed to their father or mother, the right of patronage as to this portion of it lying dormant. For we have called these children to succeed not only to their parents, but also mutually to each other, and that whether they have all been born in servitude and afterwards enfranchised, or whether they succeed with others who were conceived after the enfranchisement of their parents; and also whether they have all the same father and mother, or have a different father or mother, exactly as would be the case with the issue of parents legally married.

D. xxxviii. 8. 1. 2; C. vi. 4. 4.

The text here is very obscure. It is, perhaps, obvious that the children are to succeed to both their parents, and to inherit from each other without interference from the rights of patronage in the following cases:—(1) When the father and mother are slaves and they and the children have been enfranchised. (2) When the father is a slave and the mother a freewoman, and the father has been enfranchised. (3) When the father is a freeman, the mother a slave, and the mother and children have been enfranchised. But the text goes on to contemplate a further case in the words vel dum mulieres liberae erant ipsi in servitute eas habuerunt. The ordinary reading is eas, and then ipsi may probably be taken of their masters: but this is exactly the first of the above-mentioned cases over again, and has been stated in the words si quis in servili consortio constitutus liberum vel liberos habuerit ex libera muliere. Huschke reads eas, and suggests that the passage may refer to women who, under the senatusconsultum Claudianum

10. Illud certum est, ad serviles cognationes illam partem edicti, qua proximitatis nomine bonorum possessio promittitur, non pertinere: nam nec ulla antiqua lege talis cognatio computabatur. Sed nostra constitutio, quam pro jure patronatus fecimus (quod jus usque ad nostra tempora satis obscurum atque nube plenum et undique confusum fuerat), et hoc, humanitate suggerente, concessimus, ut si quis in servili consortio constitutus liberum vel liberos habuerit sive ex libera sive servilis conditionis muliere, vel contra serva mulier ex libero vel servo habuerit liberos cujuscumque sexus, et ad libertatem his pervenientibus et hi, qui ex servili ventre nati sunt, libertatem meruerunt, vel dum mulieres liberae erant, ipsi in servitute eas habuerunt et postea ad libertatem pervenerunt, ut hi omnes ad successionem vel patris vel matris veniant, patronatus jure in hac parte sopito: hos enim liberos non solum in suorum parentum successionem, sed etiam alterum in alterius mutuum successionem vocavimus, ex illa lege specialiter eos vocantes, sive soli inveniantur, qui in servitute nati et postea manumissi sunt, sive una cum aliis, qui post libertatem parentum concepti sunt, sive ex eadem matre vel eodem patre sive ex aliis nuptiis, ad similitudinem eorum, qui ex justis nuptiis procreati sunt.

10. It is certain that the part of the edict in which the possession of goods is promised by title of proximity, does not apply to servile cognation, which was not recognised by any ancient law. But, by our constitution concerning the right of patronage, a right hitherto so obscure, so cloudy and confused, we have enacted, from a feeling of humanity, that if a male slave lives with, and has children by, a woman either free or a slave, or conversely, if a female slave has a child or children of either sex by a freeman or a slave, then if those of the parents who are not free are enfranchised, and the children, whose mother was a slave, are also made free; or if the mothers were originally free, but the fathers had lived with them after they had been reduced to a servile condition and afterwards both parents had been made free:—then in these cases, the children shall all succeed to their father or mother, the right of patronage as to this portion of it lying dormant. For we have called these children to succeed not only to their parents, but also mutually to each other, and that whether they have all been born in servitude and afterwards enfranchised, or whether they succeed with others who were conceived after the enfranchisement of their parents; and also whether they have all the same father and mother, or have a different father or mother, exactly as would be the case with the issue of parents legally married.

D. xxxviii. 8. 1. 2; C. vi. 4. 4.

The text here is very obscure. It is, perhaps, obvious that the children are to succeed to both their parents, and to inherit from each other without interference from the rights of patronage in the following cases:—(1) When the father and mother are slaves and they and the children have been enfranchised. (2) When the father is a slave and the mother a freewoman, and the father has been enfranchised. (3) When the father is a freeman, the mother a slave, and the mother and children have been enfranchised. But the text goes on to contemplate a further case in the words vel dum mulieres liberae erant ipsi in servitute eas habuerunt. The ordinary reading is eas, and then ipsi may probably be taken of their masters: but this is exactly the first of the above-mentioned cases over again, and has been stated in the words si quis in servili consortio constitutus liberum vel liberos habuerit ex libera muliere. Huschke reads eas, and suggests that the passage may refer to women who, under the senatusconsultum Claudianum

(Tit. 12. 1), had been made the slaves of the masters of the fathers, and thus the fourth case would be that of children who were the issue of a slave by a mother originally free, but reduced to the position of a slave, and whose parents had been subsequently manumitted. This suggestion has the advantage of making out a fourth case, and is perhaps therefore to be adopted; but some violence has to be put on the Latin to carry it out, and it must be remembered that the senatusconsultum Claudianum was abrogated by Justinian.

11. Repetitis itaque omnibus, quæ jam tradidimus, apparet, non semper eos, qui parem gradum cognationis optinent, pariter vocari, eoque amplius nec eum quidem, qui proximior sit cognatus, semper potiore esse. Cum enim prima causa sit suorum heredum quosque inter suos heredes jam enumeravimus, apparet, pronepotem vel abnepotem defuncti potiore esse quam fratrem aut patrem matremque defuncti, cum alioquin pater quidem et mater, ut supra quoque tradidimus, primum gradum cognationis optineant, frater vero secundum, pronepos autem tertio gradu sit cognatus et abnepos quarto: nec interest, in potestate morientis fuerit an non fuerit, quod vel emancipatus vel ex emancipato aut ex feminino sexu propagatus est.

11. To recapitulate what we have said on this subject, it appears that those who are in the same degree of cognation are not always called equally to the succession; and further, that even the nearer in degree of cognation is not always preferred. For, as the first place is given to sui heredes, and to those who are numbered with them, it is evident that the great-grandson or great-grandson is preferred to the brother or even the father or mother of the deceased, although a father and mother (as we have before observed) are in the first degree of cognation, a brother in the second, a great-grandson in the third, and a great-grand-grandson in the fourth; neither does it make any difference whether the descendants were under the power of the deceased at the time of his death, or out of his power, either by being themselves emancipated, or by being the children of those who were so, nor whether they were descended by the female line.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 2.

12. Amotis quoque suis heredibus quosque inter suos heredes vocari diximus, adgnatus, qui integrum jus adgnationis habet, etiamsi longissimo gradu sit, plerumque potior habetur quam proximior cognatus: nam patrui nepos vel pronepos avunculo vel matertere præfertur. Totiens igitur dicimus aut potiore haberi eum, qui proximior gradum cognationis optinet, aut pariter vocari eos, qui cognati sint, quotiens neque suorum heredum jure quique inter suos heredes sunt, neque adgnationis jure aliquis præferri debeat secundum ea, quæ tradidimus, exceptis fratre et sorore emancipatis, qui ad successionem fratrum vel sororum vocantur, qui et si capite deminuti sunt, tamen præferuntur ceteris ulterioris gradus adgnatis.

12. But, when there are no sui heredes, nor any of those who are called with them, then an agnatus who has retained his full rights, although he be in the most distant degree, is generally preferred to a cognatus in a nearer degree; thus the grandson or great-grandson of a paternal uncle is preferred to a maternal uncle or aunt. Thus, when we say that the nearest in degree of cognation is called to the succession, or, if there be many in the same degree, that they are all called equally, it is subject to there being no sui heredes, nor any of those who are called with them, nor any one who ought to be preferred by right of agnatio, according to the principles we have laid down. And we must notice the exception made in the case of an emancipated brother and

Agnatus

(Tit. 12. 1), had been made the slaves of the masters of the fathers, and thus the fourth case would be that of children who were the issue of a slave by a mother originally free, but reduced to the position of a slave, and whose parents had been subsequently manumitted. This suggestion has the advantage of making out a fourth case, and is perhaps therefore to be adopted; but some violence has to be put on the Latin to carry it out, and it must be remembered that the senatusconsultum Claudianum was abrogated by Justinian.

11. Repetitis itaque omnibus, quæ jam tradidimus, apparet, non semper eos, qui parem gradum cognationis optinent, pariter vocari, eoque amplius nec eum quidem, qui proximior sit cognatus, semper potiorē esse. Cum enim prima causa sit suorum heredum quosque inter suos heredes jam enumeravimus, apparet, pronepotem vel abnepotem defuncti potiorē esse quam fratrem aut patrem matremque defuncti, cum alioquin pater quidem et mater, ut supra quoque tradidimus, primum gradum cognationis optineant, frater vero secundum, pronepos autem tertio gradu sit cognatus et abnepos quarto: nec interest, in potestate morientis fuerit an non fuerit, quod vel emancipatus vel ex emancipato aut ex feminino sexu propagatus est.

11. To recapitulate what we have said on this subject, it appears that those who are in the same degree of cognation are not always called equally to the succession; and further, that even the nearer in degree of cognation is not always preferred. For, as the first place is given to sui heredes, and to those who are numbered with them, it is evident that the great-grandson or great-grandson is preferred to the brother or even the father or mother of the deceased, although a father and mother (as we have before observed) are in the first degree of cognation, a brother in the second, a great-grandson in the third, and a great-grand-grandson in the fourth; neither does it make any difference whether the descendants were under the power of the deceased at the time of his death, or out of his power, either by being themselves emancipated, or by being the children of those who were so, nor whether they were descended by the female line.

D. xxxviii. 10. 1. 2.

12. Amotis quoque suis heredibus quosque inter suos heredes vocari diximus, agnatus, qui integrum jus agnationis habet, etiamsi longissimo gradu sit, plerumque potior habetur quam proximior cognatus: nam patrui nepos vel pronepos avunculo vel materteræ præferitur. Totiens igitur dicimus aut potiorē haberi eum, qui proximiorē gradum cognationis optinet, aut pariter vocari eos, qui cognati sint, quotiens neque suorum heredum jure quique inter suos heredes sunt, neque agnationis jure aliquis præferri debeat secundum ea, quæ tradidimus, exceptis fratre et sorore emancipatis, qui ad successionem fratrum vel sororum vocantur, qui et si capite deminuti sunt, tamen præferuntur ceteris ulterioris gradus agnatis.

12. But, when there are no sui heredes, nor any of those who are called with them, then an agnatus who has retained his full rights, although he be in the most distant degree, is generally preferred to a cognatus in a nearer degree; thus the grandson or great-grandson of a paternal uncle is preferred to a maternal uncle or aunt. Thus, when we say that the nearest in degree of cognation is called to the succession, or, if there be many in the same degree, that they are all called equally, it is subject to there being no sui heredes, nor any of those who are called with them, nor any one who ought to be preferred by right of agnatio, according to the principles we have laid down. And we must notice the exception made in the case of an emancipated brother and sister who are called to the succession of their brothers and sisters; for, although they have suffered a capitis deminutio, they are nevertheless preferred to all agnati of a more remote degree.

Agnatus

GAI. iii. 27, 29; C. v. 30. 4.

TIT. VII. DE SUCCESSIONE LIBERTORUM.

Nunc de libertorum bonis videamus. Olim itaque licebat liberto patronum suum impune testamento præterire: nam ita demum lex duodecim tabularum ad hereditatem liberti vocabat patronum, si intestatus mortuus esset libertus, nullo suo herede relicto. Itaque intestato quoque mortuo liberto, si is suum heredem reliquisset, nihil in bonis ejus patrono juris erat. Et si quidem ex naturalibus liberis aliquem suum heredem reliquisset, nulla videbatur querela: si vero adoptivus filius esset, aperte iniquum erat, nihil juris patrono superesse.

We will now speak of succession to freedmen. A freedman might formerly, with impunity, omit in his testament any mention of his patron, for the law of the Twelve Tables called the patron to the inheritance only when the freedman died intestate without leaving any suus heres. Therefore, though he had died intestate, yet if he had left a suus heres, the patron had no claim upon his estate. And, certainly, when the suus heres was a natural child of the deceased, the patron had no cause of complaint; but when the suus heres was only an adopted son, it was manifestly unjust that the patron should have no claim.

GAI. iii. 39, 40.

The law of the Twelve Tables regulated the succession to enfranchised slaves as follows: an enfranchised slave had no agnati, for he belonged to no civil family; but he might marry and found a family of his own, and then his children would be his sui heredes, or he might gain sui heredes by adoption. If he died intestate, his sui heredes succeeded to him; and in default of sui heredes, the patron, or, if the patron was dead, the children of the patron, took the place of agnati, and received the inheritance in capita, as agnati did. The enfranchised slave had, however, full power to make a testament, and might pass over both his own sui heredes and his patron. A female slave, however, if emancipated, could not exclude the patron from her inheritance; for she could have no sui heredes, being a woman; and as she was always, on account of her sex, considered under the tutela of her patron, she was incapable of making a testament, unless with the consent of her patron. (ULP. Reg. 29. 2; GAI. iii. 43.)

1. Qua de causa postea prætoris edicto hæc juris iniquitas emendata est. Sive enim faciebat testamentum libertus, jubebatur ita testari, ut patrono partem dimidiam bonorum suorum relinqueret: et si aut nihil aut minus partis dimidiæ reliquerat, dabatur patrono contra tabulas testamenti partis dimidiæ

1. This unfairness in the law was therefore afterwards amended by the edict of the prætor. Every freedman who made a testament was commanded to make such a disposition of his property as to leave one half to his patron; and, if the testator left him nothing, or less than a half, then the possession of half was given to the patron contra sister who are called to the succession of their brothers and sisters; for, although they have suffered a capitis diminutio, they are nevertheless preferred to all agnati of a more remote degree.

GAI. iii. 27, 29; C. v. 30. 4.

TIT. VII. DE SUCCESSIONE LIBERTORUM.

Nunc de libertorum bonis videamus. Olim itaque licebat liberto patronum suum impune testamento præterire: nam ita demum lex duodecim tabularum ad hereditatem liberti vocabat patronum, si intestatus mortuus esset libertus, nullo suo herede relicto. Itaque intestato quoque mortuo liberto, si is suum heredem reliquisset, nihil in bonis ejus patrono juris erat. Et si quidem ex naturalibus liberis aliquem suum heredem reliquisset, nulla videbatur querela: si vero adoptivus filius esset, aperte iniquum erat, nihil juris patrono superesse.

We will now speak of succession to freedmen. A freedman might formerly, with impunity, omit in his testament any mention of his patron, for the law of the Twelve Tables called the patron to the inheritance only when the freedman died intestate without leaving any suus heres. Therefore, though he had died intestate, yet if he had left a suus heres, the patron had no claim upon his estate. And, certainly, when the suus heres was a natural child of the deceased, the patron had no cause of complaint; but when the suus heres was only an adopted son, it was manifestly unjust that the patron should have no claim.

GAI. iii. 39, 40.

The law of the Twelve Tables regulated the succession to enfranchised slaves as follows: an enfranchised slave had no agnati, for he belonged to no civil family; but he might marry and found a family of his own, and then his children would be his sui heredes, or he might gain sui heredes by adoption. If he died intestate, his sui heredes succeeded to him; and in default of sui heredes, the patron, or, if the patron was dead, the children of the patron, took the place of agnati, and received the inheritance in capita, as agnati did. The enfranchised slave had, however, full power to make a testament, and might pass over both his own sui heredes and his patron. A female slave, however, if emancipated, could not exclude the patron from her inheritance; for she could have no sui heredes, being a woman; and as she was always, on account of her sex, considered under the tutela of her patron, she was incapable of making a testament, unless with the consent of her patron. (ULP. Reg. 29. 2; GAI. iii. 43.)

1. Qua de causa postea prætoris edicto hæc juris iniquitas emendata est. Sive enim faciebat testamentum libertus, jubebatur ita testari, ut patrono partem dimidiam bonorum suorum relinqueret: et si aut nihil aut minus partis dimidiæ reliquerat, dabatur patrono contra tabulas testamenti partis dimidiæ

1. This unfairness in the law was therefore afterwards amended by the edict of the prætor. Every freedman who made a testament was commanded to make such a disposition of his property as to leave one half to his patron; and, if the testator left him nothing, or less than a half, then the possession of half was given to the patron contra bonorum possessio. Si vero intestatus moriebatur, suo herede relicto filio adoptivo, dabatur æque patrono contra hunc suum heredem partis dimidiæ bonorum possessio. Prodesse autem liberto solebant ad excludendum patronum naturales liberi, non solum quos in potestate mortis tempore habebat, sed etiam emancipati et in adoptionem dati, si modo ex aliqua parte heredes scripti erant aut præteriti contra tabulas bonorum possessionem ex edicto petierant: nam exheredati nullo modo repellebant patronum.

tabulas. And if a freedman died intestate, leaving an adopted son as his suus heres, still the possession of a half was given to the patron. But the patron was excluded by the natural children of a freedman, not only by those in his power at the time of his death, but by those children also who had been emancipated or given in adoption, provided that they were instituted heirs for some part, or, in case they were omitted, had demanded the possession contra tabulas, under the praetorian edict. For in no way did disinherited children exclude the patron.

GAI. iii. 41.

The prætor considered it hard that a testament, or sui heredes gained by adoption or by the marriage of a wife in manu, should exclude the patron. This was to exclude him by purely voluntary acts of the freedman. If the freedman had children really born to him, that constituted a good reason why the patron should be excluded, and in this case the prætor did not interfere. It is to be observed that the prætor left the law as it was if it was a patrona, or a female child of the patronus, who was excluded; but by the lex Papia Poppæa women with a certain number of children were placed on a level with men in this respect (GAI. iii. 49; ULP. Reg. 29. 6).

2. Postea lege Papia adaucta sunt jura patronorum, qui locupletiores libertos habebant. Cautum est enim, ut ex bonis ejus, qui sestertiorum centum milium patrimonium reliquerit et pauciores quam tres liberos habebat, sive is testamento facto, sive intestato mortuus erat, virilis pars patrono deberetur. Itaque cum unum filium filiamve heredem reliquerit libertus, perinde pars dimidia patrono debebatur, ac si is sine ullo filio filiave decessisset: cum duos duasve heredes reliquerat, tertia pars debebatur patrono: si tres reliquerat, repellebatur patronus.

2. But afterwards the rights of patrons, who had wealthy freedmen, were enlarged by the lex Papia, which provided that the patron should have one equal share in the distribution of the effects of his freedman, whether dying testate or intestate, if the freedman had left a patrimony of a hundred thousand sesterces, and fewer than three children. Thus, if a freedman possessed of such a fortune left only one son or daughter as heir, a half was due to the patron, exactly as if the deceased had died testate, without having any son or daughter. But, when there were two heirs, male or female, a third part only was due to the patron; and, when there were three, the patron was wholly excluded.

GAI. iii. 42.

By the same law, freedwomen having four children were so far freed from the jus patronatus that the patron received only an equal share. (ULP. Reg. xxix. 3; GAI. iii. 44.)

3. Sed nostra constitutio, quam pro omnium notione Græca lingua,

3. But our constitution, published in a compendious form, and in the bonorum possessio. Si vero intestatus moriebatur, suo herede relicto filio adoptivo, dabatur æque patrono contra hunc suum heredem partis dimidiæ bonorum possessio. Prodesse autem liberto solebant ad excludendum patronum naturales liberi, non solum quos in potestate mortis tempore habebat, sed etiam emancipati et in adoptionem dati, si modo ex aliqua parte heredes scripti erant aut præteriti contra tabulas bonorum possessionem ex edicto petierant: nam exheredati nullo modo repellebant patronum.

tabulas. And if a freedman died intestate, leaving an adopted son as his suius heres, still the possession of a half was given to the patron. But the patron was excluded by the natural children of a freedman, not only by those in his power at the time of his death, but by those children also who had been emancipated or given in adoption, provided that they were instituted heirs for some part, or, in case they were omitted, had demanded the possession contra tabulas, under the prætorian edict. For in no way did disinherited children exclude the patron.

GAI. iii. 41.

The prætor considered it hard that a testament, or sui heredes gained by adoption or by the marriage of a wife in manu, should exclude the patron. This was to exclude him by purely voluntary acts of the freedman. If the freedman had children really born to him, that constituted a good reason why the patron should be excluded, and in this case the prætor did not interfere. It is to be observed that the prætor left the law as it was if it was a patrona, or a female child of the patronus, who was excluded; but by the lex Papia Poppæa women with a certain number of children were placed on a level with men in this respect (GAI. iii. 49; ULP. Reg. 29. 6).

2. Postea lege Papia adaucta sunt jura patronorum, qui locupletiores libertos habebant. Cautum est enim, ut ex bonis ejus, qui sestertiorum centum milium patrimonium reliquerit et pauciores quam tres liberos habebat, sive is testamento facto, sive intestato mortuus erat, virilis pars patrono deberetur. Itaque cum unum filium filiamve heredem reliquerit libertus, perinde pars dimidia patrono debebatur, ac si is sine ullo filio filiave decessisset: cum duos duasve heredes reliquerat, tertia pars debebatur patrono: si tres reliquerat, repellebatur patronus.

2. But afterwards the rights of patrons, who had wealthy freedmen, were enlarged by the lex Papia, which provided that the patron should have one equal share in the distribution of the effects of his freedman, whether dying testate or intestate, if the freedman had left a patrimony of a hundred thousand sesterces, and fewer than three children. Thus, if a freedman possessed of such a fortune left only one son or daughter as heir, a half was due to the patron, exactly as if the deceased had died testate, without having any son or daughter. But, when there were two heirs, male or female, a third part only was due to the patron; and, when there were three, the patron was wholly excluded.

GAI. iii. 42.

By the same law, freedwomen having four children were so far freed from the jus patronatus that the patron received only an equal share. (ULP. Reg. xxix. 3; GAI. iii. 44.)

3. Sed nostra constitutio, quam pro omnium notione Græca lingua,

3. But our constitution, published in a compendious form, and in the compendioso tractatu habito, composuimus, ita hujusmodi causas definiuit, ut si quidem libertus vel liberta minores centenariis sint, id est minus centum aureis habeant substantiam (sic enim legis Papiae summam interpretati sumus, ut pro mille sestertiis unus aureus computetur), nullum locum habeat patronus in eorum successionem, si tamen testamentum fecerint. Sin autem intestati decesserint, nullo liberorum relicto, tunc patronatus jus, quod erat ex lege duodecim tabularum, integrum reservavit. Cum vero majores centenariis sint, si heredes vel bonorum possessores liberos habeant sive unum sive plures cujuscunque sexus vel gradus, ad eos successionem parentum deduximus, omnibus patronis una cum sua progenie semotis. Sin autem sine liberis decesserint, si quidem intestati, ad omnem hereditatem patronos patronasque vocauimus: si vero testamentum quidem fecerint, patronos autem vel patronas præterierint, cum nullos liberos haberent vel habentes eos exheredauerint, vel mater sive avus maternus eos præterierit, ita ut non possint argui inofficiosi eorum testamenta: tunc ex nostra constitutione per bonorum possessionem contra tabulas non dimidiam, ut ante, sed tertiam partem bonorum liberti consequantur, vel quod deest eis, ex constitutione nostra repleatur, si quando minus tertia parte bonorum suorum libertus vel liberta eis reliquerint, ita sine onere, ut nec liberis liberti libertæve ex ea parte legata vel fideicommissa præstentur, sed ad coheredes hoc onus redundaret; multis aliis casibus a nobis in præfata constitutione congregatis, quos necessarios esse ad hujusmodi juris dispositionem perspeximus: ut tam patroni patronæque quam liberi eorum nec non qui ex transverso latere veniunt usque ad quintum gradum ad successionem libertorum vocentur, sicut ex ea constitutione intellegendum est: ut si ejusdem patroni vel patronæ vel duorum duarum pluriumve sint liberi, qui proximior est, ad liberti seu libertæ vocetur successionem et in capita, non in stirpes dividatur successio, eodem modo et in his, qui ex transverso latere veniunt, servando. Pæne enim consonantia jura inge-

Greek language, for the information of all men, established the following rules. If a freedman or freedwoman are less than centenarii, i.e. when their fortune does not reach a hundred aurei (the amount at which we estimated the sum mentioned in the lex Papia, counting one aureus for a thousand sesterces), the patron shall not be entitled to any share in the succession, provided the deceased has made a testament. But where a freed man or woman dies intestate, and without children, the right of patronage is maintained undiminished, and is as it formerly was, according to the law of the Twelve Tables. But if a freed person leaves more than a hundred aurei, and has one descendant or several, whatever be their sex or degree, as his heirs or the possessors of his goods, such descendant or descendants shall succeed their ascendant to the exclusion of the patron and his issue; but if he dies without children and intestate, we have called the patron or patroness to his whole inheritance. If, however, he has made a testament, omitting his patron or patroness, and has left no children, or has disinherited them, or if a mother or maternal grandfather has omitted them, so however that such testaments cannot be attacked as inofficious, then, according to our constitution, the patron or patroness shall succeed by a possession contra tabulas, not to a half as formerly, but to the third part of the estate of the deceased freedman, or shall have any deficiency made up in case the freed man or woman has left the patron or patroness a less share than a third of his or her estate. But this third part shall not be subject to any charge, so much so that it shall not furnish anything towards any legacies or fideicommissa, even though given for the benefit of the children of the deceased; but the whole burden shall fall exclusively on the co-heirs of the patron. In the same constitution we have collected many other decisions which we thought necessary to settle the law on the subject. Thus, patrons and patronesses, their children and collateral relations, so far as the fifth degree, are called to the succession of their freedmen and freedwomen, as may be seen in the constitution itself. And if there be several children, whether of one, two, or more patrons or patronesses, the compendioso tractatu habito, composuimus, ita hujusmodi causas definiuit, ut si quidem libertus vel liberta minores centenarii sint, id est minus centum aureis habeant substantiam (sic enim legis Papiae summam interpretati sumus, ut pro mille sestertiis unus aureus computetur), nullum locum habeat patronus in eorum successionem, si tamen testamentum fecerint. Sin autem intestati decesserint, nullo liberorum relicto, tunc patronatus jus, quod erat ex lege duodecim tabularum, integrum reservavit. Cum vero majores centenarii sint, si heredes vel bonorum possessores liberos habeant sive unum sive plures cujuscunque sexus vel gradus, ad eos successionem parentum deduximus, omnibus patronis una cum sua progenie semotis. Sin autem sine liberis decesserint, si quidem intestati, ad omnem hereditatem patronos patronasque vocauimus: si vero testamentum quidem fecerint, patronos autem vel patronas præterierint, cum nullos liberos haberent vel habentes eos exheredauerint, vel mater sive avus maternus eos præterierit, ita ut non possint argui inofficiosa eorum testamenta: tunc ex nostra constitutione per bonorum possessionem contra tabulas non dimidium, ut ante, sed tertiam partem bonorum liberti consequantur, vel quod deest eis, ex constitutione nostra repleatur, si quando minus tertia parte bonorum suorum libertus vel liberta eis reliquerint, ita sine onere, ut nec liberis liberti libertæve ex ea parte legata vel fideicommissa præstentur, sed ad coheredes hoc onus redundaret; multis aliis casibus a nobis in præfata constitutione congregatis, quos necessarios esse ad hujusmodi juris dispositionem perspeximus: ut tam patroni patronæque quam liberi eorum nec non qui ex transverso latere veniunt usque ad quintum gradum ad successionem libertorum vocentur, sicut ex ea constitutione intellegendum est: ut si ejusdem patroni vel patronæ vel duorum duarum pluriumve sint liberi, qui proximior est, ad liberti seu libertæ vocetur successionem et in capita, non in stirpes dividatur successio, eodem modo et in his, qui ex transverso latere veniunt, servando. Pæne enim consonantia jura inge-

Greek language, for the information of all men, established the following rules. If a freedman or freedwoman are less than centenarii, i.e. when their fortune does not reach a hundred aurei (the amount at which we estimated the sum mentioned in the lex Papia, counting one aureus for a thousand sesterces), the patron shall not be entitled to any share in the succession, provided the deceased has made a testament. But where a freed man or woman dies intestate, and without children, the right of patronage is maintained undiminished, and is as it formerly was, according to the law of the Twelve Tables. But if a freed person leaves more than a hundred auroi, and has one descendant or several, whatever be their sex or degree, as his heirs or the possessors of his goods, such descendant or descendants shall succeed their ascendant to the exclusion of the patron and his issue; but if he dies without children and intestate, we have called the patron or patroness to his whole inheritance. If, however, he has made a testament, omitting his patron or patroness, and has left no children, or has disinherited them, or if a mother or maternal grandfather has omitted them, so however that such testaments cannot be attacked as inofficious, then, according to our constitution, the patron or patroness shall succeed by a possession contra tabulas, not to a half as formerly, but to the third part of the estate of the deceased freedman, or shall have any deficiency made up in case the freed man or woman has left the patron or patroness a less share than a third of his or her estate. But this third part shall not be subject to any charge, so much so that it shall not furnish anything towards any legacies or fideicommissa, even though given for the benefit of the children of the deceased; but the whole burden shall fall exclusively on the co-heirs of the patron. In the same constitution we have collected many other decisions which we thought necessary to settle the law on the subject. Thus, patrons and patronesses, their children and collateral relations, so far as the fifth degree, are called to the succession of their freedmen and freedwomen, as may be seen in the constitution itself. And if there be several children, whether of one, two, or more patrons or patronesses, the nearest in degree is called to the succession of the freedman or freedwoman; and the estate is divided in capita and not in stirpes. It is the same with collaterals; for we have made the laws of succession as regards persons free-born and as regards enfranchised slaves almost the same.

nuitatis et libertinitatis in successionibus fecimus.

C. vi. 4. 4.

Doing away with all distinction of sex, and making the claim of the patrona the same as that of the patronus, and the position of the liberta the same as that of the libertus, Justinian thus regulates the succession ab intestato: first come the children of the freedman, whether in his power or not, or even if born before he was enfranchised; then, if he has no children, come the patron and his descendants; in default of these, the collaterals of the patron to the fifth degree. If the freedman has children, he can make any testament he pleases; if he has not, he can only make what testament he pleases provided his fortune is less than one hundred aurei; if it is more, he must leave the patron one unencumbered third, or the law will give this third contra tabulas.

4. Sed hæc de his libertinis hodie dicenda sunt, qui in civitatem Romanam pervenerunt, cum nec sunt alii liberti, simul et dediticii et Latinis sublati, cum Latinorum legitimæ successiones nullæ penitus erant, qui licet ut liberi vitam suam peragebant, attamen ipso ultimo spiritu simul animam atque libertatem amittebant, et quasi servorum ita bona eorum jure quodammodo peculii ex lege Junia manumissores detinebant. Postea vero senatusconsulto Largiano cautum fuerat, ut liberi manumissoris, non nominatim exhereditati facti, extraneis heredibus eorum in bonis Latinorum præponerentur. Quibus supervenit etiam divi Trajani edictum, quod eundem hominem, si invito vel ignorante patrono ad civitatem venire ex beneficio principis festinavit, faciebat vivum quidem civem Romanum, Latinum autem morientem. Sed nostra constitutione propter hujusmodi conditionum vices et alias difficultates cum ipsis Latinis etiam legem Juniam et senatusconsultum Largianum et edictum divi Trajani in perpetuum deleri censuimus, ut omnes liberti civitate Romana fruantur, et mirabili modo quibusdam adjectionibus ipsas vias, quæ in Latinitatem ducebant, ad civitatem

4. What we have said relates in these days to freedmen who are citizens of Rome; for there are now no others, there being no more dediticii or Latini. And the Latini never enjoyed any legal right of succession; for although they lived as free, yet, with their last breath, they lost at once their life and liberty: and their goods, like those of slaves, were claimed by their manumitter, as a kind of peculium, by virtue of the lex Junia Norbana. It was afterwards provided by the senatusconsultum Largianum, that the children of a manumitter, not disinherited by name, should, in the succession to the goods of a Latin, be preferred to any strangers whom a manumitter might institute his heirs. The edict of the Emperor Trajan followed, by which, if a slave, either against the will or without the knowledge of his patron, had managed to obtain Roman citizenship by favour of the emperor, he was regarded as a Roman citizen during his life, but at his death was looked on as a Latin. But we, being dissatisfied with the difficulties attending these changes of condition, have thought proper, by our constitution, for ever to abolish the Latini, and with them the lex Junia, the senatusconsultum Largianum, and the edict of Trajan; so that all freedmen whatever become citizens of Rome.

nuitatis et libertinitatis in successionibus fecimus.

nearest in degree is called to the succession of the freedman or freedwoman; and the estate is divided in capita and not in stirpes. It is the same with collaterals; for we have made the laws of succession as regards persons free-born and as regards enfranchised slaves almost the same.

C. vi. 4. 4.

Doing away with all distinction of sex, and making the claim of the patrona the same as that of the patronus, and the position of the liberta the same as that of the libertus, Justinian thus regulates the succession ab intestato: first come the children of the freedman, whether in his power or not, or even if born before he was enfranchised; then, if he has no children, come the patron and his descendants; in default of these, the collaterals of the patron to the fifth degree. If the freedman has children, he can make any testament he pleases; if he has not, he can only make what testament he pleases provided his fortune is less than one hundred aurei; if it is more, he must leave the patron one unencumbered third, or the law will give this third contra tabulas.

4. Sed hæc de his libertinis hodie dicenda sunt, qui in civitatem Romanam pervenerunt, cum nec sunt alii liberti, simul et dediticii et Latinis sublati, cum Latinorum legitimæ successiones nullæ penitus erant, qui licet ut liberi vitam suam peragebant, attamen ipso ultimo spiritu simul animam atque libertatem amittebant, et quasi servorum ita bona eorum jure quodammodo peculii ex lege Junia manumissores detinebant. Postea vero senatusconsulto Largiano cautum fuerat, ut liberi manumissoris, non nominatim exheredati facti, extraneis heredibus eorum in bonis Latinorum præponerentur. Quibus supervenit etiam divi Trajani edictum, quod eundem hominem, si invito vel ignorante patrono ad civitatem venire ex beneficio principis festinavit, faciebat vivum quidem civem Romanum, Latinum autem morientem. Sed nostra constitutione propter hujusmodi conditionum vices et alias difficultates cum ipsis Latinis etiam legem Juniam et senatusconsultum Largianum et edictum divi Trajani in perpetuum deleri censuimus, ut omnes liberti civitate Romana fruantur, et mirabili modo quibusdam adjectionibus ipsas vias, quæ in Latinitatem ducebant, ad civitatem

4. What we have said relates in these days to freedmen who are citizens of Rome; for there are now no others, there being no more dediticii or Latini. And the Latini never enjoyed any legal right of succession; for although they lived as free, yet, with their last breath, they lost at once their life and liberty: and their goods, like those of slaves, were claimed by their manumittor, as a kind of peculium, by virtue of the lex Junia Norbana. It was afterwards provided by the senatusconsultum Largianum, that the children of a manumittor, not disinherited by name, should, in the succession to the goods of a Latin, be preferred to any strangers whom a manumittor might institute his heirs. The edict of the Emperor Trajan followed, by which, if a slave, either against the will or without the knowledge of his patron, had managed to obtain Roman citizenship by favour of the emperor, he was regarded as a Roman citizen during his life, but at his death was looked on as a Latin. But we, being dissatisfied with the difficulties attending these changes of condition, have thought proper, by our constitution, for ever to abolish the Latini, and with them the lex Junia, the senatusconsultum Largianum, and the edict of Trajan; so that all freedmen whatever become citizens of Rome.

Romanam capiendam transposuimus.

And we have happily contrived, by some additional dispositions, that the very modes used to confer the freedom of Latins have now become modes of conferring Roman citizenship.

GAI. iii. 56-58, 63-65, 71-73; C. vii. 6.

Dediticii and Latini Juniani. See Bk. i. Tit. 5. 3 and note.

Senatusconsulto Largiano. This senatusconsultum was passed in the time of Claudius (A.D. 42), and in the consulate of Lupus and Largus. (GAI. iii. 63-67.) As we might infer from the text, the rights of the children of the patron to the succession of a Latinus Junianus remained if they were disinherited in any other way than by name.

By the edict of Trajan the rights of the patron were, in the case mentioned in the text, restored at the death of a Latinus exactly as if the Latinus had never become a citizen by imperial rescript. (GAI. iii. 72.)

TIT. VIII. DE ADSIGNATIONE LIBERTORUM.

In summa, quod ad bona libertorum, admonendi sumus, senatum censuisse, ut quamvis ad omnes patroni liberos, qui ejusdem gradus sint, equaliter bona libertorum pertineant, tamen liceret parenti uni ex liberis adsignare libertum, ut post mortem ejus solus is patronus habeatur, qui adsignatus est, et ceteri liberi, qui ipsi quoque ad eadem bona, nulla adsignatione interveniente, pariter admitterentur, nihil juris in his bonis habeant. Sed ita demum pristinum jus recipiunt, si is, cui adsignatus est, decesserit, nullis liberis relictis.

Finally, with regard to the goods of freedmen, we must remember that the senate has enacted, that although the goods of freedmen belong equally to all the childred of the patron who are in the same degree, yet an ascendant may assign a freedman to any one of his children, so that, after the death of the ascendant, the child, to whom the freedman was assigned, is alone considered as his patron, and the other children, who would have been equally admitted had there been no assignment, are wholly excluded. But if the child to whom the assignment has been made dies without issue they regain their former right.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr.

The senate enacted this by the consultum mentioned in paragr. 3.

1. Nec tantum libertum, sed etiam libertam, et non tantum filio nepotive, sed etiam filiae neptive adsignare permittitur.

1. Not only a freedman, but a freedwoman may be assigned, and not only to a son or grandson, but to a daughter or granddaughter.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr., and 4. 3. 1, 2.

But it was necessary that the child or grandchild should be in the power of the patron.

2. Datur autem hæc adsignandi facultas ei, qui duos pluresve liberos in potestate habebit, ut eis, quos in

2. The power of assigning freed persons is given to him who has two or more children in his power, and it

Romanam capiendam transposuimus.

And we have happily contrived, by some additional dispositions, that the very modes used to confer the freedom of Latins have now become modes of conferring Roman citizenship.

GAI. iii. 56-58, 63-65, 71-73; C. vii. 6.

Dediticii and Latini Juniani. See Bk. i. Tit. 5. 3 and note.

Senatusconsulto Largiano. This senatusconsultum was passed in the time of Claudius (A.D. 42), and in the consulate of Lupus and Largus. (GAI. iii. 63-67.) As we might infer from the text, the rights of the children of the patron to the succession of a Latinus Junianus remained if they were disinherited in any other way than by name.

By the edict of Trajan the rights of the patron were, in the case mentioned in the text, restored at the death of a Latinus exactly as if the Latinus had never become a citizen by imperial rescript. (GAI. iii. 72.)

TIT. VIII. DE ADSIGNATIONE LIBERTORUM.

In summa, quod ad bona libertorum, admonendi sumus, senatum censuisse, ut quamvis ad omnes patroni liberos, qui ejusdem gradus sint, æqualiter bona libertorum pertineant, tamen liceret parenti uni ex liberis adsignare libertum, ut post mortem ejus solus is patronus habeatur, qui adsignatus est, et ceteri liberi, qui ipsi quoque ad eadem bona, nulla adsignatione interveniente, pariter admitterentur, nihil juris in his bonis habeant. Sed ita demum pristinum jus recipiunt, si is, cui adsignatus est, decesserit, nullis liberis relictis.

Finally, with regard to the goods of freedmen, we must remember that the senate has enacted, that although the goods of freedmen belong equally to all the children of the patron who are in the same degree, yet an ascendant may assign a freedman to any one of his children, so that, after the death of the ascendant, the child, to whom the freedman was assigned, is alone considered as his patron, and the other children, who would have been equally admitted had there been no assignment, are wholly excluded. But if the child to whom the assignment has been made dies without issue they regain their former right.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr.

The senate enacted this by the consultum mentioned in paragr. 3.

1. Nec tantum libertum, sed etiam libertam, et non tantum filio nepotivæ, sed etiam filiæ neptivæ adsignare permittitur.

1. Not only a freedman, but a freedwoman may be assigned, and not only to a son or grandson, but to a daughter or granddaughter.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr., and 4. 3. 1, 2.

But it was necessary that the child or grandchild should be in the power of the patron.

2. Datur autem hæc adsignandi facultas ei, qui duos pluresve liberos in potestate habebit, ut eis, quos in potestate habet, adsignare ei liberum libertamve liceat. Unde quærebatur, si eum, cui adsignaverit, postea emancipaverit, num evanescat adsignatio? Sed placuit, evanescere, quod et Julianus et alii plerisque visum est.

2. The power of assigning freed persons is given to him who has two or more children in his power, and it is to children in his power that a father may assign a freedman or freedwoman. Hence the question arose, supposing a father assigned a freedman to his son, and afterwards emancipated that son, whether the assignment would be destroyed. It has been determined that it is destroyed; such was the opinion of Julian and of most others.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr.

The senatusconsultum did not allow the patron to give the freedman new heirs, but only to give a preference to particular heirs. If the children passed out of the power of the patron, they would cease to be heirs of the freedman.

3. Nec interest, testamento quis adsignet an sine testamento: sed etiam quibuscumque verbis hoc patronis permittitur facere ex ipso senatusconsulto, quod Claudianis temporibus factum est Suillo Rufo et Ostorio Scapula consulibus.

3. It makes no difference, whether the assignment of a freedman be made by testament, or without a testament. And patrons may make it in any terms whatever, by virtue of a senatusconsultum passed in the time of Claudius, in the consulship of Suillus Rufus and Ostorius Scapula.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr. and 3.

The date of this senatusconsultum is given as A.D. 45.

Just as any expression of the wishes of a patron sufficed to make an assignment, so any expression of a contrary wish sufficed to revoke it. (D. xxxviii. 4. 1. 4.) The mere disinheriting of a child did not revoke a previous assignment. (D. xxxviii. 4. 1. 6.)

TIT. IX. DE BONORUM POSSESSIONIBUS.

Jus bonorum possessionis introductum est a prætore emendandi veteris juris gratia. Nec solum in intestatorum hereditatibus vetus jus eo modo prætor emendavit, sicut supra dictum est, sed in eorum quoque, qui, testamento facto, decesserint. Nam si alienus postumus heres fuerit institutus, quamvis hereditatem jure civili adire non poterat, cum institutio non valebat, honorario tamen jure bonorum possessor efficiebatur, videlicet cum a prætore adjuvabatur: sed hic e nostra constitutione hodie recte heres instituitur, quasi et jure civili non incognitus.

The system of bonorum possessiones was introduced by the prætors as an amendment of the ancient law, this amendment being made with regard to the inheritances not only of intestates, as we have said above, but of those also who die after making a testament. For if a posthumous stranger was instituted heir, although he could not enter upon the inheritance by the civil law, inasmuch as his institution would not be valid, yet by the prætorian law he might be made the possessor of the goods, because he received the assistance of the prætor. But such a person may now, by our constitution, be legally instituted heir as being not unrecognised even by the civil law.

GAL. ii. 242; D. i. 1. 71; D. xxxviii. 6. 1. pr.

The jus civile knew of no other mode of succession than that of potestate habet, assignare ei liberum libertamve liceat. Unde quærebatur, si eum, cui assignaverit, postea emancipaverit, num evanescat assignatio? Sed placuit, evanescere, quod et Juliano et aliis plerisque visum est.

is to children in his power that a father may assign a freedman or freedwoman. Hence the question arose, supposing a father assigned a freedman to his son, and afterwards emancipated that son, whether the assignment would be destroyed. It has been determined that it is destroyed; such was the opinion of Julian and of most others.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr.

The senatusconsultum did not allow the patron to give the freedman new heirs, but only to give a preference to particular heirs. If the children passed out of the power of the patron, they would cease to be heirs of the freedman.

3. Nec interest, testamento quis assignet an sine testamento: sed etiam quibuscumque verbis hoc patronis permittitur facere ex ipso senatusconsulto, quod Claudianis temporibus factum est Suillo Rufo et Ostorio Scapula consulibus.

3. It makes no difference, whether the assignment of a freedman be made by testament, or without a testament. And patrons may make it in any terms whatever, by virtue of a senatusconsultum passed in the time of Claudius, in the consulship of Suillus Rufus and Ostorius Scapula.

D. xxxviii. 4. 1. pr. and 3.

The date of this senatusconsultum is given as A.D. 45.

Just as any expression of the wishes of a patron sufficed to make an assignment, so any expression of a contrary wish sufficed to revoke it. (D. xxxviii. 4. 1. 4.) The mere disinheriting of a child did not revoke a previous assignment. (D. xxxviii. 4. 1. 6.)

TIT. IX. DE BONORUM POSSESSIONIBUS.

Jus bonorum possessionis introductum est a prætore emendandi veteris juris gratia. Nec solum in intestatorum hereditatibus vetus jus eo modo prætor emendavit, sicut supra dictum est, sed in eorum quoque, qui, testamento facto, decesserint. Nam si alienus postumus heres fuerit institutus, quamvis hereditatem jure civili adire non poterat, cum institutio non valebat, honorario tamen jure bonorum possessor efficiebatur, videlicet cum a prætore adjuvabatur: sed hic e nostra constitutione hodie recte heres instituitur, quasi et jure civili non incognitus.

The system of bonorum possessiones was introduced by the prætors as an amendment of the ancient law, this amendment being made with regard to the inheritances not only of intestates, as we have said above, but of those also who die after making a testament. For if a posthumous stranger was instituted heir, although he could not enter upon the inheritance by the civil law, inasmuch as his institution would not be valid, yet by the prætorian law he might be made the possessor of the goods, because he received the assistance of the prætor. But such a person may now, by our constitution, be legally instituted heir as being not unrecognised even by the civil law.

GAL. ii. 242; D. i. 1. 71; D. xxxviii. 6. 1. pr.

The jus civile knew of no other mode of succession than that of those who were strictly heredes. The prætor introduced a new mode, that by giving possession of the goods. This was, in its origin, merely the placing of the person best entitled in at least temporary possession of the hereditas in case this possession was disputed; and then the prætor, being thus called on to admit to the possession, in process of time regulated this admission by the feeling of natural justice which it was part of his province to entertain, and admitted, in many cases, those whose blood gave a claim, in preference to those whom the course of the civil law marked out. He did not, indeed, admit any one whom the law expressly rejected; for the prætor could not openly violate the law; but when the law was silent, the prætor took advantage of this silence to admit persons whom the law passed over. (D. xxxvii. 1. 12. 1.) He never gave the dominium Quiritarium in any of the goods of the inheritance, but only the dominium bonitarium (see Introd. sec. 62), i.e. he made all that constituted the inheritance a part of the goods ('in bonis') of the person to whom he gave the possession, and then usucapion gave this person the legal ownership.

The constitution referred to in the text is not in the Code we now have.

1. Aliquando tamen neque emendandi neque impugnandi veteris juris, sed magis confirmandi gratia pollicetur bonorum possessionem. Nam illis quoque, qui recte facto testamento heredes instituti sunt, dat secundum tabulas bonorum possessionem: item ab intestato suos heredes et adgnatos ad bonorum possessionem vocat: sed et remota quoque bonorum possessione, ad eos hereditas pertinet jure civili.

1. But the prætor sometimes bestows the possession of goods with a wish not to amend or impugn the old law, but to confirm it; for he also gives possession secundum tabulas to those who are appointed heirs by regular testament. He also calls sui heredes and agnati to the possession of the goods of intestates, and yet the inheritance would be theirs by the civil law, even if the prætor did not give the possession of the goods.

GAL. iii. 34; D. xxxvii. 1. 6. 1.

The person to whom the prætor gave the bonorum possessio could make use of the interdict (see Introd. sec. 107) beginning with the words 'Quorum bonorum;' and as this was the readiest way of procuring the prætor's aid in being placed in possession, the heir might be glad to adopt it, though the possessio bonorum did not give him, as it did others, a title to succeed, which he would not otherwise have had.

In cases provided for by the edict the prætor gave possession in the exercise of his executive authority (possessio edictalis). If there were special circumstances in the case, the prætor would, after hearing opponents, give a special possession (possessio decretalis) which was not always protected by the interdict Quorum bonorum, but might be protected only by an interdict forbidding forcible eviction. (D. xxxvii. 9. 1. 14; xxxvii. 1. 3. 8; xliiii. 4.)

2. Quos autem prætor solus vocat ad hereditatem, heredes quidem ipso jure non fiunt (nam prætor heredem

2. But those whom the prætor alone calls to an inheritance, do not in law become heirs, inasmuch as the prætor

those who were strictly heredes. The prætor introduced a new mode, that by giving possession of the goods. This was, in its origin, merely the placing of the person best entitled in at least temporary possession of the hereditas in case this possession was disputed; and then the prætor, being thus called on to admit to the possession, in process of time regulated this admission by the feeling of natural justice which it was part of his province to entertain, and admitted, in many cases, those whose blood gave a claim, in preference to those whom the course of the civil law marked out. He did not, indeed, admit any one whom the law expressly rejected; for the prætor could not openly violate the law; but when the law was silent, the prætor took advantage of this silence to admit persons whom the law passed over. (D. xxxvii. 1. 12. 1.) He never gave the dominium Quiritarium in any of the goods of the inheritance, but only the dominium bonitarium (see Introd. sec. 62), i.e. he made all that constituted the inheritance a part of the goods ('in bonis') of the person to whom he gave the possession, and then usucapion gave this person the legal ownership.

The constitution referred to in the text is not in the Code we now have.

1. Aliquando tamen neque emendandi neque impugnandi veteris juris, sed magis confirmandi gratia pollicetur bonorum possessionem. Nam illis quoque, qui recte facto testamento heredes instituti sunt, dat secundum tabulas bonorum possessionem: item ab intestato suos heredes et adgnatos ad bonorum possessionem vocat: sed et remota quoque bonorum possessione, ad eos hereditas pertinet jure civili.

1. But the prætor sometimes bestows the possession of goods with a wish not to amend or impugn the old law, but to confirm it; for he also gives possession secundum tabulas to those who are appointed heirs by regular testament. He also calls sui heredes and agnati to the possession of the goods of intestates, and yet the inheritance would be theirs by the civil law, even if the prætor did not give the possession of the goods.

GAL. iii. 34; D. xxxvii. 1. 6. 1.

The person to whom the prætor gave the bonorum possessio could make use of the interdict (see Introd. sec. 107) beginning with the words 'Quorum bonorum;' and as this was the readiest way of procuring the prætor's aid in being placed in possession, the heir might be glad to adopt it, though the possessio bonorum did not give him, as it did others, a title to succeed, which he would not otherwise have had.

In cases provided for by the edict the prætor gave possession in the exercise of his executive authority (possessio edictalis). If there were special circumstances in the case, the prætor would, after hearing opponents, give a special possession (possessio decretalis) which was not always protected by the interdict Quorum bonorum, but might be protected only by an interdict forbidding forcible eviction. (D. xxxvii. 9. 1. 14; xxxvii. 1. 3. 8; xliiii. 4.)

2. Quos autem prætor solus vocat ad hereditatem, heredes quidem ipso jure non fiunt (nam prætor heredem

2. But those whom the prætor alone calls to an inheritance, do not in law become heirs, inasmuch as the prætor

facere non potest: per legem enim tantum vel similem juris constitutionem heredes fiunt, veluti per senatusconsultum et constitutiones principales): sed cum eis prætor dat bonorum possessionem, loco heredum constituuntur et vocantur bonorum possessores. Adhuc autem et alios complures gradus prætor fecit in bonorum possessionibus dandis, dum id agebat, ne quis sine successore moriatur: nam angustissimis finibus constitutum per legem duodecim tabularum jus percipiendarum hereditatum prætor ex bono et æquo dilatavit.

cannot make an heir, for heirs are made only by a law, or by what has the effect of a law, as a senatusconsultum or an imperial constitution. But when the prætor gives any persons the possession of goods, they stand in the place of heirs, and are called the possessors of the goods. The prætor has also devised many other orders of persons to whom the possession of goods may be granted, from a wish to insure that no man should die without a successor. In short, the right of succeeding to inheritances, which was confined within very narrow limits by the law of the Twelve Tables, has been extended by the prætor in conformity to the principles of justice and equity.

GAI. iii. 18, 25, 32, 33.

3. Sunt autem bonorum possessiones ex testamento quidem hæ. Prima, quæ præteritis liberis datur vocaturque contra tabulas. Secunda, quam omnibus jure scriptis heredibus prætor pollicetur ideoque vocatur secundum tabulas. Et cum de testamentis prius locutus est, ad intestatos transitum fecit. Et primo loco suis heredibus et his, qui ex edicto prætoris suis connumerantur, dat bonorum possessionem, quæ vocatur unde liberi. Secundo legitimis heredibus: tertio decem personis, quas extraneo manumissori præferebat (sunt autem decem personæ hæ: pater, mater, avus, avia, tam paterni quam materni, item filius, filia, nepos, neptis, tam ex filio quam ex filia, frater, soror, sive consanguinei sive uterini): quarto cognatis proximis: quinto tum quem ex familia: sexto patrono et patronæ liberisque eorum et parentibus: septimo viro et uxori: octavo cognatis manumissoris.

3. The testamentary possessions of goods are these. First, that which is given to children passed over in the testament; this is called contra tabulas. Secondly, that which the prætor promises to all those legally instituted heirs, and is therefore called possessio secundum tabulas. After having spoken of testaments, he passes on to intestacies: and first he gives the possession of goods, called unde liberi, to the sui heredes, or to those who by the prætorian edict are numbered among the sui heredes; secondly, to the legal heirs thirdly, to the ten persons who were preferred to a patron, if a stranger; and these ten persons were, a father; a mother; a grandfather or grandmother, paternal or maternal; a son; a daughter; a grandson or granddaughter, as well by a daughter as by a son; a brother or sister, either by the father or uterine. Then, fourthly, he gives the possession of goods to the nearest cognati; fifthly, 'tum quem ex familia,' to the nearest member of the family of the patron; sixthly, to the patron or patroness, and to their children and ascendants; seventhly, to a husband and wife; eighthly, to the cognati of the manumittor.

GAI. iii. 26-30; D. xxxviii. 6. 1. pr. and 1.

The various kinds of possessions of goods may be divided according as they were testamentary (ex testamento) or ab intestato. Under the first head come the two kinds called contra tabulas and secundum tabulas.

1. The possessio contra tabulas was given, as it is said in the text, to children passed over in the testament. It was also

facere non potest: per legem enim tantum vel similem juris constitutionem heredes fiunt, veluti per senatusconsultum et constitutiones principales: sed cum eis prætor dat bonorum possessionem, loco heredum constituuntur et vocantur bonorum possessores. Adhuc autem et alios complures gradus prætor fecit in bonorum possessionibus dandis, dum id agebat, ne quis sine successore moriatur: nam angustissimis finibus constitutum per legem duodecim tabularum jus percipiendarum hereditatum prætor ex bono et æquo dilatavit.

cannot make an heir, for heirs are made only by a law, or by what has the effect of a law, as a senatusconsultum or an imperial constitution. But when the prætor gives any persons the possession of goods, they stand in the place of heirs, and are called the possessors of the goods. The prætor has also devised many other orders of persons to whom the possession of goods may be granted, from a wish to insure that no man should die without a successor. In short, the right of succeeding to inheritances, which was confined within very narrow limits by the law of the Twelve Tables, has been extended by the prætor in conformity to the principles of justice and equity.

GAL. iii. 18, 25, 32, 33.

3. Sunt autem bonorum possessiones ex testamento quidem hæ. Prima, quæ præteritis liberis datur vocaturque contra tabulas. Secunda, quam omnibus jure scriptis heredibus prætor pollicetur ideoque vocatur secundum tabulas. Et cum de testamentis prius locutus est, ad intestatos transitum fecit. Et primo loco suis heredibus et his, qui ex edicto prætoris suis connumerantur, dat bonorum possessionem, quæ vocatur unde liberi. Secundo legitimis heredibus: tertio decem personis, quas extraneo manumissori præferebat (sunt autem decem personæ hæ: pater, mater, avus, avia, tam paterni quam materni, item filius, filia, nepos, neptis, tam ex filio quam ex filia, frater, soror, sive consanguinei sive uterini): quarto cognatis proximis: quinto tum quem ex familia: sexto patrono et patronæ liberisque eorum et parentibus: septimo viro et uxori: octavo cognatis manumissoris.

3. The testamentary possessions of goods are these. First, that which is given to children passed over in the testament; this is called contra tabulas. Secondly, that which the prætor promises to all those legally instituted heirs, and is therefore called possessio secundum tabulas. After having spoken of testaments, he passes on to intestacies: and first he gives the possession of goods, called unde liberi, to the sui heredes, or to those who by the prætorian edict are numbered among the sui heredes; secondly, to the legal heirs thirdly, to the ten persons who were preferred to a patron, if a stranger; and these ten persons were, a father; a mother; a grandfather or grandmother, paternal or maternal; a son; a daughter; a grandson or granddaughter, as well by a daughter as by a son; a brother or sister, either by the father or uterine. Then, fourthly, he gives the possession of goods to the nearest cognati; fifthly, 'tum quem ex familia,' to the nearest member of the family of the patron; sixthly, to the patron or patroness, and to their children and ascendants; seventhly, to a husband and wife; eighthly, to the cognati of the manumittor.

GAL. iii. 26-30; D. xxxviii. 6. 1. pr. and 1.

The various kinds of possessions of goods may be divided according as they were testamentary (ex testamento) or ab intestato. Under the first head come the two kinds called contra tabulas and secundum tabulas.

1. The possessio contra tabulas was given, as it is said in the text, to children passed over in the testament. It was also given, as we have seen, to a patron passed over. (Tit. 7. 1.) It was not given against the testament of women, as they had no sui heredes. (D. xxxvii. 4. 4. 2.)

2. The possessio secundum tabulas was given not only when the testament was in due form and valid, but also when it would have had no effect according to the civil law. The prætor gave the possession though the testament was defective in form, as, for instance, if it contained no familie munitio or nuncupation. (ULP. Reg. 28. 6. See Bk. ii. Tit. 17. 6.) The prætor, again, only required that the testator should have been capable of making a testament at the time he made it and at his death, without regard to the intermediate time. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 10. 6 note; D. xxxvii. 11. 1. 8.) He permitted the institution of the posthumous child of a stranger (see Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 26), and would, in cases where a gift was conditional, place the heir or legatee in possession of the goods while the condition was pending, and remove him if the condition was not fulfilled. (D. xxxvii. 11. 5. 6.)

The possessio secundum tabulas was not given until after that contra tabulas, that is, not until it was ascertained that there were no children passed over, or that they had made no claim within the time fixed by law. (D. xxxvii. 11. 2. pr.)

If there was no testament, the prætor gave the possession under one of the following heads: Unde liberi—Unde legitimi—Unde decem persone—Unde cognati—Tum quem ex familia—Unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum—Unde vir et uxor—Unde cognati manumissoris. (ULP. Reg. xxviii. 7.)

These are given in the text in the order in which they occurred in the edict; and those beginning with unde are in that form, by a contraction for ea pars edicti unde liberi vocantur, unde legitimi vocantur, &c.

Four only have reference to the succession of persons of free birth: Unde liberi, unde legitimi, unde cognati, unde vir et uxor. The other four are only applicable to freedmen.

1. The possessio unde liberi was given to the sui heredes and those called with them, in case there was no testament, or one wholly inoperative. If there was a testament not allowed to operate, the possessio would be that contra tabulas.

2. That unde legitimi was given to all those who would be the heirs of the deceased by law, that is, to those summoned to the succession by the law of the Twelve Tables, and those placed in the same rank by subsequent legislation. This part of the edict ran thus:—Tum quem ei heredem esse oporteret, si intestatus mortuus esset. (D. xxxviii. 7. 1.) It included the sui heredes, if they did not apply for, or even if they had refused, the possessio unde liberi, the agnati, those placed by the constitutions in the rank of agnati, the mother under the senatusconsultum Tertulianum, the children under the senatusconsultum Orphitianum, and the patron and his children as the heredes legitimi of their libertus.

given, as we have seen, to a patron passed over. (Tit. 7. 1.) It was not given against the testament of women, as they had no sui heredes. (D. xxxvii. 4. 4. 2.)

2. The possessio secundum tabulas was given not only when the testament was in due form and valid, but also when it would have had no effect according to the civil law. The prætor gave the possession though the testament was defective in form, as, for instance, if it contained no familie muncipatio or nuncupation. (ULP. Reg. 28. 6. See Bk. ii. Tit. 17. 6.) The prætor, again, only required that the testator should have been capable of making a testament at the time he made it and at his death, without regard to the intermediate time. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 10. 6 note; D. xxxvii. 11. 1. 8.) He permitted the institution of the posthumous child of a stranger (see Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 26), and would, in cases where a gift was conditional, place the heir or legatee in possession of the goods while the condition was pending, and remove him if the condition was not fulfilled. (D. xxxvii. 11. 5. 6.)

The possessio secundum tabulas was not given until after that contra tabulas, that is, not until it was ascertained that there were no children passed over, or that they had made no claim within the time fixed by law. (D. xxxvii. 11. 2. pr.)

If there was no testament, the prætor gave the possession under one of the following heads: Unde liberi—Unde legitimi—Unde decem persone—Unde cognati—Tum quem ex familia—Unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum—Unde vir et uxor—Unde cognati manumissoris. (ULP. Reg. xxviii. 7.)

These are given in the text in the order in which they occurred in the edict; and those beginning with unde are in that form, by a contraction for ea pars edicti unde liberi vocantur, unde legitimi vocantur, &c.

Four only have reference to the succession of persons of free birth: Unde liberi, unde legitimi, unde cognati, unde vir et uxor. The other four are only applicable to freedmen.

1. The possessio unde liberi was given to the sui heredes and those called with them, in case there was no testament, or one wholly inoperative. If there was a testament not allowed to operate, the possessio would be that contra tabulas.

2. That unde legitimi was given to all those who would be the heirs of the deceased by law, that is, to those summoned to the succession by the law of the Twelve Tables, and those placed in the same rank by subsequent legislation. This part of the edict ran thus:—Tum quem ei heredem esse oporteret, si intestatus mortuus esset. (D. xxxviii. 7. 1.) It included the sui heredes, if they did not apply for, or even if they had refused, the possessio unde liberi, the agnati, those placed by the constitutions in the rank of agnati, the mother under the senatusconsultum Tertulianum, the children under the senatusconsultum Orphitianum, and the patron and his children as the heredes legitimi of their libertus. freedman

3. That unde decem personæ was given to the ten persons mentioned in the text in preference to a stranger who might have emancipated a free person, after having acquired him in mancipio for the purpose of the fictitious sale necessary to emancipation. This emancipation made the emancipator the patron, and gave him rights of succession, which the prætor postponed by the edict.

4. The possessio unde cognati created a new class of persons interested in the succession by ties of blood which gave no claim except under the edict. The sui heredes and legitimi, if they had omitted to come in under the previous parts of the edict, might come in as cognati.

5. The possessio tum quem ex familia was given to the nearest member of the family of the patron (ULP. Reg. 28. 7) in default of the sui heredes taking under the unde liberi, or of the patron or his children taking under the unde legitimi. The words seem to be an abridgment of part of the edict, 'tum quem ex familia patroni proximum oportebit, vocabo.' For the first two words is read sometimes tunquam, and this reading, which derives some support from the paraphrase of Theophilus, is adopted by Huschke; but tum quem seems most in keeping with the usual phraseology of the edict. (D. xxxviii. 7. 1.)

6. The possessio unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum was given to the descendants of the patron, whether they had been in the power of the patron or not, and to the ascendants, whether the patron had been in their power or not—thus going a step beyond the last-mentioned possession, which was only given to a person in the family of the patron. This is as probable an account as any of the use of this and the last possessio; but so little is known respecting them, that we cannot be certain how they were applied.

7. The possessio unde vir et uxor gave husband and wife reciprocal rights of succession. The only mode in which one married person succeeded by the jus civile to the goods of another was when the wife passed into the power of her husband by in manum conventio, for she then succeeded as his daughter. (GAI. iii. 3.) The husband and wife succeeded in default of cognati.

8. The possessio unde cognati manumissoris was given to all the blood relations of the patron. In the possession given exclusively with reference to the goods of freedmen, it was the same as with those given alike of the goods of free persons and of freedmen; any one who might have applied for an earlier possession might, if he failed to do so, apply for a later possession, in the terms of which he was included. Thus the quem proximum might apply as for the possessio unde liberi patroni, &c., and both he and one of the liberi patroni might have applied for that unde cognati manumissoris.

If there was no one to whom possession of goods could be given, the right to the goods devolved to the people, and, in the times of the later emperors, to the fiscus. (Si nemo sit, ad quem)

3. That unde decem personæ was given to the ten persons mentioned in the text in preference to a stranger who might have emancipated a free person, after having acquired him in mancipio for the purpose of the fictitious sale necessary to emancipation. This emancipation made the emancipator the patron, and gave him rights of succession, which the prætor postponed by the edict.

4. The possessio unde cognati created a new class of persons interested in the succession by ties of blood which gave no claim except under the edict. The sui heredes and legitimi, if they had omitted to come in under the previous parts of the edict, might come in as cognati.

5. The possessio tum quem ex familia was given to the nearest member of the family of the patron (ULP. Reg. 28. 7) in default of the sui heredes taking under the unde liberi, or of the patron or his children taking under the unde legitimi. The words seem to be an abridgment of part of the edict, 'tum quem ex familia patroni proximum oportebit, vocabo.' For the first two words is read sometimes tunquam, and this reading, which derives some support from the paraphrase of Theophilus, is adopted by Huschke; but tum quem seems most in keeping with the usual phraseology of the edict. (D. xxxviii. 7. 1.)

6. The possessio unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum was given to the descendants of the patron, whether they had been in the power of the patron or not, and to the ascendants, whether the patron had been in their power or not—thus going a step beyond the last-mentioned possession, which was only given to a person in the family of the patron. This is as probable an account as any of the use of this and the last possessio; but so little is known respecting them, that we cannot be certain how they were applied.

7. The possessio unde vir et uxor gave husband and wife reciprocal rights of succession. The only mode in which one married person succeeded by the jus civile to the goods of another was when the wife passed into the power of her husband by in manum conventio, for she then succeeded as his daughter. (GAI. iii. 3.) The husband and wife succeeded in default of cognati.

8. The possessio unde cognati manumissoris was given to all the blood relations of the patron. In the possession given exclusively with reference to the goods of freedmen, it was the same as with those given alike of the goods of free persons and of freedmen; any one who might have applied for an earlier possession might, if he failed to do so, apply for a later possession, in the terms of which he was included. Thus the quem proximum might apply as for the possessio unde liberi patroni, &c., and both he and one of the liberi patroni might have applied for that unde cognati manumissoris.

If there was no one to whom possession of goods could be given, the right to the goods devolved to the people, and, in the times of the later emperors, to the fiscus. (Si nemo sit, ad quem) bonorum possessio pertinere possit, aut sit quidem, sed jus suum omiserit, populo bona deferuntur ex lege Julia caducaria.) (ULP. Reg. 28. 7.)

4. Sed eas quidem prætorias induxit jurisdictio. Nobis tamen nihil incuriosum prætermissum est, sed nostris constitutionibus omnia corrigentes, contra tabulas quidem et secundum tabulas bonorum possessiones admisimus utpote necessarias constitutas, nec non ab intestato unde liberi et unde legitimi bonorum possessiones. Quæ autem in prætoris edicto quinto loco posita fuerat, id est unde decem personæ, eam pio proposito et compendioso sermone supervacuam ostendimus: cum enim præfata bonorum possessio decem personas præponebat extraneo manumissori, nostra constitutio, quam de emancipatione liberorum fecimus, omnibus parentibus eisdemque manumissoribus contracta fiducia manumissionem facere dedit, ut ipsa manumissio eorum hoc in se habeat privilegium et supervacua fiat prædicta bonorum possessio. Sublata igitur præfata quinta bonorum possessione, in gradum ejus sextam antea bonorum possessionem reduximus et quintam fecimus, quam prætor proximis cognatis pollicetur.

4. Such are the possessions of goods introduced by the prætor's authority. We ourselves, who have passed over nothing negligently, but have wished to amend everything, by our constitutions have admitted as indispensably necessary the possessions of goods contra tabulas and secundum tabulas, and also the possessions ab intestato, called unde liberi and unde legitimi; but with a kind intention, and in a few words, we have shown that the possession called unde decem personæ, which held the fifth place in the prætor's edict, is superfluous; for ten kinds of persons were therein preferred to a patron if a stranger; but by our constitution on the subject of the emancipation of children, parents themselves are the manumitters of their children, as if under a fiduciary contract, so that this privilege belongs necessarily to the manumission they go through, and the possession unde decem personæ is now useless. We have suppressed it therefore, and, putting the sixth in its place, have now made that the fifth, by which the prætor gives the succession to the nearest cognati.

C. viii. 49. 6.

See Tit. 2. 8.

5. Cumque antea septimo loco fuerat bonorum possessio tum quem ex familia et octavo unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum, utramque per constitutionem nostram, quam de jure patronatus fecimus, penitus vacuavimus: cum enim ad similitudinem successionis ingenuorum libertinorum successiones posuimus, quas usque ad quintum tantummodo gradum coartavimus, ut sit aliqua inter ingenuos et libertos differentia, sufficiunt eis tam contra tabulas bonorum possessio quam unde legitimi et unde cognati, ex quibus possint sua jura vindicare, omni scrupulositate et inextricabili errore duarum istarum bonorum possessionum resoluta.

5. As to the possession tum quem ex familia, formerly in the seventh place, and the possession unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum, in the eighth, we have now annulled them both by our constitution concerning the right of patronage. For having made the successions of libertini like those of ingenui, except that we have limited the former to the fifth degree, so that there may still remain some difference between them, we think that the possessions contra tabulas, unde legitimi, and unde cognati may suffice for claimants to vindicate their rights; all the subtle and intricate niceties of those two kinds of possessions, tum quem ex familia and unde patroni, being done away with.

The possession tum quem ex familia is here said to be in the seventh place, because it was in the fifth place of the possiones regarding intestacies, and the two possiones regarding testamentary successions came before.

bonorum possessio pertinere possit, aut sit quidem, sed jus suum omiserit, populo bona deferuntur ex lege Julia caducaria.) (ULP. Reg. 28. 7.)

4. Sed eas quidem prætorias induxit jurisdictio. Nobis tamen nihil incuriosum prætermissum est, sed nostris constitutionibus omnia corrigentes, contra tabulas quidem et secundum tabulas bonorum possessiones admisimus utpote necessarias constitutas, nec non ab intestato unde liberi et unde legitimi bonorum possessiones. Quæ autem in prætoris edicto quinto loco posita fuerat, id est unde decem personæ, eam pio proposito et compendioso sermone supervacuam ostendimus: cum enim præfata bonorum possessio decem personas præponebat extraneo manumissori, nostra constitutio, quam de emancipatione liberorum fecimus, omnibus parentibus eisdemque manumissoribus contracta fiducia manumissionem facere dedit, ut ipsa manumissio eorum hoc in se habeat privilegium et supervacua fiat prædicta bonorum possessio. Sublata igitur præfata quinta bonorum possessione, in gradum ejus sextam antea bonorum possessionem reduximus et quintam fecimus, quam prætor proximis cognatis pollicetur.

4. Such are the possessions of goods introduced by the prætor's authority. We ourselves, who have passed over nothing negligently, but have wished to amend everything, by our constitutions have admitted as indispensably necessary the possessions of goods contra tabulas and secundum tabulas, and also the possessions ab intestato, called unde liberi and unde legitimi; but with a kind intention, and in a few words, we have shown that the possession called unde decem personæ, which held the fifth place in the prætor's edict, is superfluous; for ten kinds of persons were therein preferred to a patron if a stranger; but by our constitution on the subject of the emancipation of children, parents themselves are the manumitters of their children, as if under a fiduciary contract, so that this privilege belongs necessarily to the manumission they go through, and the possession unde decem personæ is now useless. We have suppressed it therefore, and, putting the sixth in its place, have now made that the fifth, by which the prætor gives the succession to the nearest cognati.

C. viii. 49. 6.

See Tit. 2. 8.

5. Cumque antea septimo loco fuerat bonorum possessio tum quem ex familia et octavo unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum, utramque per constitutionem nostram, quam de jure patronatus fecimus, penitus vacuavimus: cum enim ad similitudinem successionis ingenuorum libertinorum successiones posuimus, quas usque ad quintum tantummodo gradum coartavimus, ut sit aliqua inter ingenuos et libertos differentia, sufficiunt eis tam contra tabulas bonorum possessio quam unde legitimi et unde cognati, ex quibus possint sua jura vindicare, omni scrupulositate et inextricabili errore duarum istarum bonorum possessionum resoluta.

5. As to the possession tum quem ex familia, formerly in the seventh place, and the possession unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum, in the eighth, we have now annulled them both by our constitution concerning the right of patronage. For having made the successions of libertini like those of ingenui, except that we have limited the former to the fifth degree, so that there may still remain some difference between them, we think that the possessions contra tabulas, unde legitimi, and unde cognati may suffice for claimants to vindicate their rights; all the subtle and intricate niceties of those two kinds of possessions, tum quem ex familia and unde patroni, being done away with.

The possession tum quem ex familia is here said to be in the seventh place, because it was in the fifth place of the possessiones regarding intestacies, and the two possessiones regarding testamentary successions came before.

6. Aliam vero bonorum possessionem, quæ unde vir et uxor appellatur et nono loco inter veteres bonorum possessiones posita fuerat, et in suo vigore servavimus et altiore loco, id est sexto, eam posuimus, decima veteri bonorum possessione, quæ erat unde cognati manumissoris, propter causas enarratas merito sublata: ut sex tantummodo bonorum possessiones ordinariæ permaneant suo vigore pollentes.

7. Septima eas secuta, quam optima ratione prætores introduxerunt. Novissime enim promittitur edicto his etiam bonorum possessio, quibus ut detur, lege vel senatusconsulto vel constitutione comprehensum est, quam neque bonorum possessionibus, quæ ab intestato veniunt, neque eis, quæ ex testamento sunt, prætor stabili jure connumeravit, sed quasi ultimum et extraordinarium auxilium, prout res exigit, accommodavit scilicet his, qui ex legibus, senatusconsultis, constitutionibus principum ex novo jure vel ex testamento vel ab intestato veniunt.

6. The other possession of goods, called unde vir et uxor, which held the ninth place among the ancient possessions, we have preserved in full force, and have given it a higher place, namely, the sixth. The tenth of the ancient possessions, called unde cognati manumissoris, has been deservedly abolished for reasons already given; and there now, therefore, remain in force only six ordinary possessions of goods.

7. To these a seventh possession has been added, which the prætors have most properly introduced. For by the last disposition of the edict, possession of goods is promised to all those to whom it is given by any law, senatusconsultum, or constitution. The prætor has not positively numbered this possession of goods either with the possessions of the goods of intestates, or of persons who have made a testament; but has given it, according to the exigence of the case, as the last and extraordinary resource of those who are called to the successions of intestates, or under a testament whether by a law, a senatusconsultum, or, in later times, by an imperial constitution.

D. xxxviii. 14.

The difference between the possessio quibus ut detur, lege vel senatusconsulto vel constitutione comprehensum est, or, as it was sometimes called, the possessio tum quibus ex legibus (THEOPH. Paraphr.), and the possessio unde legitimi, was, that the first was given when the law, &c., expressly declared that the possession of goods was to be given; the latter when the law, &c., gave the hereditas, and the prætor gave the possessio. It was, for instance, by means of the possession uti ex legibus, that the patron took concurrently with the children of the libertus, by virtue of the lex Papia Poppæa.

8. Cum igitur plures species successionum prætor introduxisset easque per ordinem disposuisset et in unaquaque specie successionis sæpe plures extent dispari gradu personæ: ne actiones creditorum differrentur, sed haberent, quos convenirent, et ne facile in possessionem bonorum defuncti mitterentur et eo modo sibi consulerent, ideo petendæ bonorum possessioni certum tempus præfinivit. Liberis itaque et parentibus tam naturalibus quam adoptivis in petenda bonorum possessione anni spatium,

8. As the prætor thus introduced and arranged in order many kinds of successions, and as in each rank of succession persons in different degrees of relationship might often be found, therefore in order on the one hand that the actions of creditors might not be delayed, but there might be a proper person against whom to bring them, and on the other hand that the creditors might not possess themselves of the effects of the deceased too easily, and consult solely their own advantage, the prætor fixed a certain time within

6. Aliam vero bonorum possessionem, quæ unde vir et uxor appellatur et nono loco inter veteres bonorum possessiones posita fuerat, et in suo vigore servavimus et altiore loco, id est sexto, eam posuimus, decima veteri bonorum possessione, quæ erat unde cognati manumissoris, propter causas enarratas merito sublata: ut sex tantummodo bonorum possessiones ordinariæ permaneant suo vigore pollentes.

7. Septima eas secuta, quam optima ratione prætores introduxerunt. Novissime enim promittitur edicto his etiam bonorum possessio, quibus ut detur, lege vel senatusconsulto vel constitutione comprehensum est, quam neque bonorum possessionibus, quæ ab intestato veniunt, neque eis, quæ ex testamento sunt, prætor stabili jure connumeravit, sed quasi ultimum et extraordinarium auxilium, prout res exigit, accommodavit scilicet his, qui ex legibus, senatusconsultis, constitutionibus principum ex novo jure vel ex testamento vel ab intestato veniunt.

6. The other possession of goods, called unde vir et uxor, which held the ninth place among the ancient possessions, we have preserved in full force, and have given it a higher place, namely, the sixth. The tenth of the ancient possessions, called unde cognati manumissoris, has been deservedly abolished for reasons already given; and there now, therefore, remain in force only six ordinary possessions of goods.

7. To these a seventh possession has been added, which the prætors have most properly introduced. For by the last disposition of the edict, possession of goods is promised to all those to whom it is given by any law, senatusconsultum, or constitution. The prætor has not positively numbered this possession of goods either with the possessions of the goods of intestates, or of persons who have made a testament; but has given it, according to the exigence of the case, as the last and extraordinary resource of those who are called to the successions of intestates, or under a testament whether by a law, a senatusconsultum, or, in later times, by an imperial constitution.

D. xxxviii. 14.

The difference between the possessio quibus ut detur, lege vel senatusconsulto vel constitutione comprehensum est, or, as it was sometimes called, the possessio tum quibus ex legibus (THEOPH. Paraphr.), and the possessio unde legitimi, was, that the first was given when the law, &c., expressly declared that the possession of goods was to be given; the latter when the law, &c., gave the hereditas, and the prætor gave the possessio. It was, for instance, by means of the possession uti ex legibus, that the patron took concurrently with the children of the libertus, by virtue of the lex Papia Poppæa.

8. Cum igitur plures species successionum prætor introduxisset easque per ordinem disposuisset et in unaquaque specie successionis sæpe plures extent dispari gradu personæ: ne actiones creditorum differrentur, sed haberent, quos convenirent, et ne facile in possessionem bonorum defuncti mitterentur et eo modo sibi consulerent, ideo petendæ bonorum possessioni certum tempus præfinivit. Liberis itaque et parentibus tam naturalibus quam adoptivis in petenda bonorum possessione anni spatium,

8. As the prætor thus introduced and arranged in order many kinds of successions, and as in each rank of succession persons in different degrees of relationship might often be found, therefore in order on the one hand that the actions of creditors might not be delayed, but there might be a proper person against whom to bring them, and on the other hand that the creditors might not possess themselves of the effects of the deceased too easily, and consult solely their own advantage, the prætor fixed a certain time within which the possession of the goods was to be demanded. To ascendants and children, whether natural or adoptive, he allowed one year, within which they must ask for possession. To all other persons he allowed a hundred days.

ceteris centum dierum dedit.

D. xxxviii. 9. 1. pr. and 12.

The species successionum correspond to the different possessiones.

9. Et si intra hoc tempus aliquis bonorum possessionem non petierit, ejusdem gradus personis adcrevit: vel si nemo ex eo sit, deinceps ceteris proinde bonorum possessionem ex successorio edicto pollicetur, ac si is, qui præcedebat, ex eo numero non esset. Sed si quis ita delatam sibi bonorum possessionem repudiaverit, non quousque tempus bonorum possessioni præfinitum excesserit, expectatur, sed statim ceteri ex eodem edicto admittuntur. In petenda autem bonorum possessione dies utiles singuli considerantur.

9. And if any person does not claim possession within the time limited, the possession accrues to those in the same degree with himself; and if there are none of that degree, the prætor, by the successor edict, gives the possession to the succeeding degrees, exactly as if he who preceded had not been in the degree in which he was. But if a man refuses the possession of goods when it is thus offered to him, there is no necessity to wait until the time limited is expired, but the others in succession are instantly admitted under the same edict. In reckoning the time allowed for applications for the possession of goods, only those days which are utiles are counted.

D. xxxvii. 1. 3. 9; D. xxxvii. 1. 4. 5; D. xxxviii. 9. 1. 6, 8, 10;
D. xxxviii. 15. 2.

10. Sed bene anteriores principes et huic causæ providerunt, ne quis pro petendo bonorum possessiones curet, sed, quocumque modo si admittentis eam indicium, intra statuta tamen tempora, ostenderit, plenum habeat earum beneficium.

10. Former emperors have wisely provided that no person need trouble himself as to the possession of goods in the way of making an express demand; for if he has in any manner signified within the appointed time his wish to accept the possession, he shall enjoy the full benefit of the possession he can claim.

C. vi. 9. 8, 9.

Only those dies were considered utiles which were subsequent to the person entitled to the possession being aware of, and capable of claiming, his right, and which were not days on which magistrates did not transact business (dies nefasti). Demand of possession was to be made before a magistrate, that is, before the prætor in the city, and the præses in the province; for the possession did not devolve by course of law, but had to be expressly asked for within a prescribed time. A particular formality in the terms of the demand was held necessary, the applicant having to say 'da mihi hanc bonorum possessionem' (THEOPH. Paraphr.), until a constitution of the Emperor Constantius (C. vi. 9. 9) permitted the application to be made in any terms, and before any magis-

ceteris centum dierum dedit.

which the possession of the goods was to be demanded. To ascendants and children, whether natural or adoptive, he allowed one year, within which they must ask for possession. To all other persons he allowed a hundred days.

D. xxxviii. 9. 1. pr. and 12.

The species successionum correspond to the different possessiones.

9. Et si intra hoc tempus aliquis bonorum possessionem non petierit, ejusdem gradus personis aderescit: vel si nemo ex eo sit, deinceps ceteris proinde bonorum possessionem ex successorio edicto pollicetur, ac si is, qui præcedebat, ex eo numero non esset. Sed si quis ita delatam sibi bonorum possessionem repudiaverit, non quousque tempus bonorum possessioni præfinitum excesserit, expectatur, sed statim ceteri ex eodem edicto admittuntur. In petenda autem bonorum possessione dies utiles singuli considerantur.

9. And if any person does not claim possession within the time limited, the possession accrues to those in the same degree with himself; and if there are none of that degree, the prætor, by the successor edict, gives the possession to the succeeding degrees, exactly as if he who preceded had not been in the degree in which he was. But if a man refuses the possession of goods when it is thus offered to him, there is no necessity to wait until the time limited is expired, but the others in succession are instantly admitted under the same edict. In reckoning the time allowed for applications for the possession of goods, only those days which are utiles are counted.

D. xxxvii. 1. 3. 9; D. xxxvii. 1. 4. 5; D. xxxviii. 9. 1. 6, 8, 10;
D. xxxviii. 15. 2.

10. Sed bene anteriores principes et huic causæ providerunt, ne quis pro petendo bonorum possessiones curet, sed, quocumque modo si admittentis eam indicium, intra statuta tamen tempora, ostenderit, plenum habeat earum beneficium.

10. Former emperors have wisely provided that no person need trouble himself as to the possession of goods in the way of making an express demand; for if he has in any manner signified within the appointed time his wish to accept the possession, he shall enjoy the full benefit of the possession he can claim.

C. vi. 9. 8, 9.

Only those dies were considered utiles which were subsequent to the person entitled to the possession being aware of, and capable of claiming, his right, and which were not days on which magistrates did not transact business (dies nefasti). Demand of possession was to be made before a magistrate, that is, before the prætor in the city, and the præses in the province; for the possession did not devolve by course of law, but had to be expressly asked for within a prescribed time. A particular formality in the terms of the demand was held necessary, the applicant having to say 'da mihi hanc bonorum possessionem' (THEOPH. Paraphr.), until a constitution of the Emperor Constantius (C. vi. 9. 9) permitted the application to be made in any terms, and before any magistrate, and another constitution of the same emperor excused those whom ignorance of what was the proper cause, or whom absence prevented from making an application. (C. vi. 9. 8.) In the time of Justinian there was no application before a magistrate; any act that manifested the wish to have the possession was enough.

Sometimes the possession of goods was said to be given sine re, as opposed to cum re. (GAI. iii. 35-38; ULP. Reg. 28. 13.) The possession might be claimed, in many cases, by persons who were entitled to enter on the inheritance as heirs under the civil law. If these persons entered on the inheritance without demanding possession of the goods, the right to this possession devolved, at the expiration of the time in which they might have claimed it, to the next class entitled to it. But if the person standing next in the order of prætorian succession demanded the possession in such a case, he received it, but only sine re, i.e. he was placed in the legal position of possessor of the goods, but did not really have any share in those goods which formed the inheritance of the heir under the civil law.

As we have now finished the subject of successions ab intestato, as treated of in the Institutes, and seen the system prevailing when the Institutes were published, this is the most natural place to notice briefly the complete change introduced by the 118th and 127th Novels, which were issued respectively in the years 543 and 547. By this sweeping change, the difference between the possessio bonorum and the hereditas, and that between agnati and cognati (except in the case of arrogation), were entirely suppressed, and three orders of succession were created: the first, that of descendants; the second, that of ascendants; the third, that of collaterals. (1.) The descendants succeeded, whether emancipated or not, and whether adoptive or natural, to the exclusion of all other relations, and without distinction of sex or degree. When they were in the first degree, they shared the inheritance per capita; when in the second, they shared it per stirpes. (2.) If there were no descendants, the succession belonged to the ascendants, except that, when there were brothers or sisters of the whole blood, the ascendants shared the inheritance with them, each person who had a claim to succeed taking an equal share. When there were several ascendants, the nearest excluded the more remote; if two or more ascendants of the same degree were not in the same line, that is, were partly in the paternal, partly in the maternal line, then the ascendants of one line took one half, and the ascendants of the other took the other half, although there might be more of the same degree in one line than in the other. (3.) If there were no ascendants, then came, first, brothers and sisters of the whole blood, then brothers and sisters of the half-blood, no distinction being made between consanguinei, -æ, and uterini, -æ. The children of a deceased brother or sister were allowed to represent their deceased parent, and to receive the

X
I Descendants and natural children in the first degree
II Ascendants brothers and sisters of the whole blood
III Collateral relations brothers and sisters of the half blood
(B) nephews and nieces children of deceased parents
Capitula

trate, and another constitution of the same emperor excused those whom ignorance of what was the proper cause, or whom absence prevented from making an application. (C. vi. 9. 8.) In the time of Justinian there was no application before a magistrate; any act that manifested the wish to have the possession was enough.

Sometimes the possession of goods was said to be given sine re, as opposed to cum re. (GAI. iii. 35-38; ULP. Reg. 28. 13.) The possession might be claimed, in many cases, by persons who were entitled to enter on the inheritance as heirs under the civil law. If these persons entered on the inheritance without demanding possession of the goods, the right to this possession devolved, at the expiration of the time in which they might have claimed it, to the next class entitled to it. But if the person standing next in the order of prætorian succession demanded the possession in such a case, he received it, but only sine re, i.e. he was placed in the legal position of possessor of the goods, but did not really have any share in those goods which formed the inheritance of the heir under the civil law.

As we have now finished the subject of successions ab intestato, as treated of in the Institutes, and seen the system prevailing when the Institutes were published, this is the most natural place to notice briefly the complete change introduced by the 118th and 127th Novels, which were issued respectively in the years 543 and 547. By this sweeping change, the difference between the possessio bonorum and the hereditas, and that between agnati and cognati (except in the case of arrogation), were entirely suppressed, and three orders of succession were created: the first, that of descendants; the second, that of ascendants; the third, that of collaterals. (1.) The descendants succeeded, whether emancipated or not, and whether adoptive or natural, to the exclusion of all other relations, and without distinction of sex or degree. When they were in the first degree, they shared the inheritance per capita; when in the second, they shared it per stirpes. (2.) If there were no descendants, the succession belonged to the ascendants, except that, when there were brothers or sisters of the whole blood, the ascendants shared the inheritance with them, each person who had a claim to succeed taking an equal share. When there were several ascendants, the nearest excluded the more remote; if two or more ascendants of the same degree were not in the same line, that is, were partly in the paternal, partly in the maternal line, then the ascendants of one line took one half, and the ascendants of the other took the other half, although there might be more of the same degree in one line than in the other. (3.) If there were no ascendants, then came, first, brothers and sisters of the whole blood, then brothers and sisters of the half-blood, no distinction being made between consanguinei, -æ, and uterini, -æ. The children of a deceased brother or sister were allowed to represent their deceased parent, and to receive the

X
I Descendants per capita per stirpes
II Ascendants brothers and sisters
III Collaterals brothers and sisters
children
children
children Capita

share that parent would have received; but the grandchildren of a brother or sister were not allowed to represent their grandfather or grandmother. If there were no brothers and sisters, or children of brothers and sisters, the nearest relation, in whatever degree, succeeded; if there were several in the same degree, they shared the inheritance per capita. Finally, it is specially provided that these reforms are to apply only to those persons qui catholicæ fidei sunt.

TIT. X. DE ADQUISITIONE PER ADROGATIONEM.

Est et alterius generis per universitatem successio, quæ neque lege duodecim tabularum neque prætoris edicto, sed eo jure, quod consensu receptum est, introducta est.

There is also another kind of universal succession, introduced neither by the law of the Twelve Tables, nor by the edict of the prætor, but by the law which rests on general consent.

GAI. iii. 82.

1. Ecce enim cum paterfamilias sese in adrogationem dat, omnes res ejus corporales et incorporeales quæque ei debitæ sunt, adrogatori ante quidem pleno jure acquirebantur, exceptis his, quæ per capitis deminutionem pereunt, quales sunt operarum obligationes et jus agnationis. Usus etenim et usufructus licet his antea communerantur, attamen capitis deminutione minima eos tolli, nostra prohibuit constitutio.

1. For if the father of a family gives himself in arrogation, his property corporeal and incorporeal, and the debts due to him, were formerly acquired in full ownership by the arrogator, with the exception only of those things which were lost by the capitis deminutio, as the obligation of services and the rights of agnation. Formerly, use and usufruct were numbered among these, but one of our constitutions prevents their extinction by the minima deminutio.

GAI. iii. 83; C. iii. 33. 16.

Gaius remarks that the property of the wife who passed in manum viri was acquired by her husband exactly as fully as that of the paterfamilias was by the person who arrogated him. Everything belonging to them passed to the husband or arrogator, except only those things which were ipso facto destroyed by the change of status; for example, services which, as the price of his freedom, the freedman bound himself by oath to render to the patron, operarum obligationes, were due to him personally, and were no longer due if the patron passed into the power of another. The ties of agnation were also lost by the change of status, as the person arrogated passed out of his civil family.

2. Nunc autem nos eandem adquisitionem, quæ per adrogationem fiebat, coartavimus ad similitudinem naturalium parentum: nihil etenim aliud nisi tantummodo usufructus tam naturalibus patribus quam adoptivis per filiosfamilias acquiritur in his rebus, quæ extrinsecus filiis obveniunt, dominio eis integro servato:

2. At the present day acquisitions by arrogation are restrained within the same limits as acquisitions by natural parents. Neither natural nor adoptive parents now acquire anything but the usufruct of those things which come to their children from any extraneous source, the children still retaining the dominium. But, if an arrogated son share that parent would have received; but the grandchildren of a brother or sister were not allowed to represent their grandfather or grandmother. If there were no brothers and sisters, or children of brothers and sisters, the nearest relation, in whatever degree, succeeded; if there were several in the same degree, they shared the inheritance per capita. Finally, it is specially provided that these reforms are to apply only to those persons qui catholicæ fidei sunt.

TIT. X. DE ADQUISITIONE PER ADROGATIONEM.

Est et alterius generis per universitatem successio, quæ neque lege duodecim tabularum neque prætoris edicto, sed eo jure, quod consensu receptum est, introducta est.

There is also another kind of universal succession, introduced neither by the law of the Twelve Tables, nor by the edict of the prætor, but by the law which rests on general consent.

GAI. iii. 82.

1. Ecce enim cum paterfamilias sese in adrogationem dat, omnes res ejus corporales et incorporeales quæque ei debitæ sunt, adrogatori ante quidem pleno jure acquirebantur, exceptis his, quæ per capitis deminutionem pereunt, quales sunt operarum obligationes et jus agnationis. Usus etenim et usufructus licet his antea communerantur, attamen capitis deminutione minima eos tolli, nostra prohibuit constitutio.

1. For if the father of a family gives himself in arrogation, his property corporeal and incorporeal, and the debts due to him, were formerly acquired in full ownership by the arrogator, with the exception only of those things which were lost by the capitis deminutio, as the obligation of services and the rights of agnation. Formerly, use and usufruct were numbered among these, but one of our constitutions prevents their extinction by the minima deminutio.

GAI. iii. 83; C. iii. 33. 16.

Gaius remarks that the property of the wife who passed in manum viri was acquired by her husband exactly as fully as that of the paterfamilias was by the person who arrogated him. Everything belonging to them passed to the husband or arrogator, except only those things which were ipso facto destroyed by the change of status; for example, services which, as the price of his freedom, the freedman bound himself by oath to render to the patron, operarum obligationes, were due to him personally, and were no longer due if the patron passed into the power of another. The ties of agnation were also lost by the change of status, as the person arrogated passed out of his civil family.

2. Nunc autem nos eandem adquisitionem, quæ per adrogationem fiebat, coartavimus ad similitudinem naturalium parentum: nihil etenim aliud nisi tantummodo usufructus tam naturalibus patribus quam adoptivis per filiosfamilias acquiritur in his rebus, quæ extrinsecus filiis obveniunt, dominio eis integro servato:

2. At the present day acquisitions by arrogation are restrained within the same limits as acquisitions by natural parents. Neither natural nor adoptive parents now acquire anything but the usufruct of those things which come to their children from any extraneous source, the children still retaining the dominium. But, if an arrogated son

mortuo autem filio adrogato in adoptiva familia etiam dominium ejus ad adrogatorem transit, nisi supersint aliae personae, quae ex nostra constitutione patrem in his, quae adquiri non possunt, antecedunt.

dies in his adoptive family, then the property also will pass to the arrogator, provided there exist none of those persons who, by our constitution, are preferred to the father in the succession of those things which cannot be acquired by him.

The order of succession fixed by later emperors and Justinian to the goods of the filii familias coming to him from his mother, or as legacies, gifts, &c., from sources other than the father (peculium adventitium, which could not be acquired by the father, but only the usufruct of which passed to him), was—1. His children; 2. His brothers or sisters; 3. His ancestors, the father taking before the grandfather. (C. vi. 61. 3, 4, 6; C. vi. 59. 11.)

3. Sed ex diverso pro eo, quod is debuit, qui se in adoptionem dedit, ipso quidem jure adrogator non tenetur, sed nomine filii convenietur et, si noluerit eum defendere, permittitur creditoribus per competentes nostros magistratus bona, quae ejus cum usufructu futura fuissent, si se alieno juri non subjecisset, possidere et legitimo modo ea disponere.

3. On the other hand, an arrogator is not directly bound to satisfy the debts of his adopted son, but he may be sued in his son's name; and if he refuses to answer for his son, then the creditors may, by order of the proper magistrates, seize upon and sell in the manner prescribed by law those goods, of which the usufruct, as well as the property, would have been in the debtor, if he had not made himself subject to the power of another.

GAI. iii. 84.

The arrogator succeeded to all the rights of action for debt which the person arrogated had, but not to the debts. For the arrogator was in the position of a father, who was not bound by the obligations of a son. Under the jus civile, the debts themselves were extinguished by the change of status; but the prætor made the property of the arrogated son answerable for them, and, creating a sort of restitutio in integrum in favour of the creditor, gave an action against the arrogated as if the capitis minutio had not taken place; and then, if the arrogator did not guarantee the creditors, the prætor put the creditors in possession of the goods brought by the arrogated to the arrogator, with leave to sell them. (D. iv. 5. 2. 1; GAI. iii. 84.)

TIT. XI. DE EO, CUI LIBERTATIS CAUSA BONA ADDICUNTUR.

Accessit novus casus successionis ex constitutione divi Marci. Nam si hi, qui libertatem acceperunt a domino in testamento, ex quo non aditur hereditas, velint bona sibi addici libertatum conservandarum causa, audiuntur. Et ita rescripto divi

A new species of succession has been added by the constitution of the Emperor Marcus. For, if those slaves, to whom freedom has been given by the testament of their master, under which testament no one will accept the inheritance, wish that the property

mortuo autem filio adrogato in adoptiva familia etiam dominium ejus ad adrogatorem transit, nisi supersint alia persona, quæ ex nostra constitutione patrem in his, quæ adquiri non possunt, antecedunt.

dies in his adoptive family, then the property also will pass to the arrogator, provided there exist none of those persons who, by our constitution, are preferred to the father in the succession of those things which cannot be acquired by him.

The order of succession fixed by later emperors and Justinian to the goods of the filiusfamilias coming to him from his mother, or as legacies, gifts, &c., from sources other than the father (peculium adventitium, which could not be acquired by the father, but only the usufruct of which passed to him), was—1. His children; 2. His brothers or sisters; 3. His ancestors, the father taking before the grandfather. (C. vi. 61. 3, 4, 6; C. vi. 59. 11.)

3. Sed ex diverso pro eo, quod is debuit, qui se in adoptionem dedit, ipso quidem jure adrogator non tenetur, sed nomine filii convenietur et, si noluerit eum defendere, permittitur creditoribus per competentes nostros magistratus bona, quæ ejus cum usufructu futura fuissent, si se alieno juri non subjecisset, possidere et legitimo modo ea disponere.

3. On the other hand, an arrogator is not directly bound to satisfy the debts of his adopted son, but he may be sued in his son's name; and if he refuses to answer for his son, then the creditors may, by order of the proper magistrates, seize upon and sell in the manner prescribed by law those goods, of which the usufruct, as well as the property, would have been in the debtor, if he had not made himself subject to the power of another.

GAI. iii. 84.

The arrogator succeeded to all the rights of action for debt which the person arrogated had, but not to the debts. For the arrogator was in the position of a father, who was not bound by the obligations of a son. Under the jus civile, the debts themselves were extinguished by the change of status; but the prætor made the property of the arrogated son answerable for them, and, creating a sort of restitutio in integrum in favour of the creditor, gave an action against the arrogated as if the capitis minutio had not taken place; and then, if the arrogator did not guarantee the creditors, the prætor put the creditors in possession of the goods brought by the arrogated to the arrogator, with leave to sell them. (D. iv. 5. 2. 1; GAI. iii. 84.)

TIT. XI. DE EO, CUI LIBERTATIS CAUSA BONA ADDICUNTUR.

Accessit novus casus successionis ex constitutione divi Marci. Nam si hi, qui libertatem acceperunt a domino in testamento, ex quo non aditur hereditas, velint bona sibi addici libertatum conservandarum causa, audiuntur. Et ita rescripto divi

A new species of succession has been added by the constitution of the Emperor Marcus. For, if those slaves, to whom freedom has been given by the testament of their master, under which testament no one will accept the inheritance, wish that the property should be adjudged to them, in order that effect may be given to the disposition for their enfranchisement, their request is granted. Such is the effect of a rescript addressed by the Emperor Marcus to Popilius Rufus.

Marci ad Popilium Rufum continetur.

D. xl. 4. 50. pr. and l.

If no heres ex testamento accepted the inheritance, it devolved to the heredes ab intestato, and if no heres ab intestato accepted it, it devolved to the fiscus; if the fiscus would not accept it, the creditors could have the goods of the deceased sold for their benefit. But if the deceased had by testament or codicil given freedom to any slaves, then, after the inheritance had been successively rejected by the heredes ex testamento, the heredes ab intestato, and the fiscus, application might be made to have the goods given up to the applicant instead of being sold by the creditors, the applicant undertaking to enfranchise the other slaves and to satisfy the creditors, and then the applicant became the bonorum possessor, though not the owner of all the property of the deceased. If the inheritance was accepted by any heir, or if there were no slaves to whom the deceased had left their liberty, then this addictio could not take place.

Gaius makes no mention of this mode of acquisition per universitatem; a circumstance used to fix his date, as showing that he wrote before the time when Marcus Aurelius issued the rescript contained in the next paragraph.

1. Verba rescripti ita se habent: 'Si Virginio Valenti, qui testamento suo libertatem quibusdam adscriptis, nemino successore ab intestato existente, in ea causa bona esse ceperrunt, ut veniri debeant: is, cujus de ea re notio est, aditus, rationem desiderii tui habebit, ut libertatem tam earum, que directo, quam earum, que per speciem fideicommissi relicte sunt, tuendarum gratia addicantur tibi, si idoneis creditoribus caveris de solido, quod cuique debetur, solvendo. Et hi quidem, quibus directa libertas data est, perinde liberi erunt, ac si hereditas adita esset: hi autem, quos heres rogatus est manumittere, a te libertatem consequantur: nisi si non alia conditione velis bona tibi addici, quam ut etiam qui directo libertatem acceperunt, tui liberti fiant; nam huic etiam voluntati tue, si ii, de quorum statu agitur, consentiant, auctoritatem nostram accommodamus. Et ne hujus rescriptionis nostre emolumentum alia ratione irritum fiat, si fiscus bona agnoscere

1. The following are the terms of the rescript: 'If the estate of Virginio Valens, who by testament has given their freedom to certain slaves, must necessarily be sold, there being no successor ab intestato, then the magistrate who has the cognisance of the affair shall upon application attend to your request, that, for the sake of preserving the liberty of those to whom it was given, either directly or by a fideicommissum, the estate of the deceased may be adjudged to you, on condition that you give good security to the creditors that their claims shall be satisfied in full. And all those, to whom freedom was given directly, shall then become free, exactly as if the inheritance had been entered upon; but those whom the heir was ordered to manumit shall obtain their freedom from you only; unless you wish that the goods of the deceased should be adjudged to you on no other condition than that those slaves also who received their liberty directly by testament shall become your freedmen; for if those who are should be adjudged to them, in order that effect may be given to the disposition for their enfranchisement, their request is granted. Such is the effect of a rescript addressed by the Emperor Marcus to Popilius Rufus.

Marci ad Popilius Rufum continetur.

D. xl. 4. 50. pr. and l.

If no heres ex testamento accepted the inheritance, it devolved to the heredes ab intestato, and if no heres ab intestato accepted it, it devolved to the fiscus; if the fiscus would not accept it, the creditors could have the goods of the deceased sold for their benefit. But if the deceased had by testament or codicil given freedom to any slaves, then, after the inheritance had been successively rejected by the heredes ex testamento, the heredes ab intestato, and the fiscus, application might be made to have the goods given up to the applicant instead of being sold by the creditors, the applicant undertaking to enfranchise the other slaves and to satisfy the creditors, and then the applicant became the bonorum possessor, though not the owner of all the property of the deceased. If the inheritance was accepted by any heir, or if there were no slaves to whom the deceased had left their liberty, then this adlectio could not take place.

Gaius makes no mention of this mode of acquisition per universitatem; a circumstance used to fix his date, as showing that he wrote before the time when Marcus Aurelius issued the rescript contained in the next paragraph.

I. Verba rescripti ita se habent:

‘Si Virginio Valenti, qui testamento suo libertatem quibusdam adscripsit, nemine successore ab intestato existente, in ea causa bona esse ceperunt, ut veniri debeant: is, cuius de ea re notio est, aditus, rationem considerii tui habebit, ut libertatam tam earum, que directo, quam earum, que per speciem fideicommissi relicte sunt, tuendum gratia addiceamur tibi, si idonce creditoribus caveris de solido, quod cuique debetur, solvendo. Et hi quidem, quibus directa libertas data est, perinde liberi erunt, ac si hereditas adita esset: hi autem, quos heres rogatus est manumittere, a te libertatem consequantur: nisi si non alia condicione velis bona tibi addici, quam ut etiam qui directo libertatem acceperunt, tui liberti fiant; nam huic etiam voluntati tue, si ii, de quorum statu agitur, consentiant, auctoritatem nostram accommodamus. Et ne hujus rescriptionis nostre emolumentum alia ratione irritum fiat, si fiscus bona agnoscere

I. The following are the terms of the rescript: ‘If the estate of Virginus Valens, who by testament has given their freedom to certain slaves, must necessarily be sold, there being no successor ab intestato, then the magistrate who has the cognisance of the affair shall upon application attend to your request, that, for the sake of preserving the liberty of those to whom it was given, either directly or by a fideicommissum, the estate of the deceased may be adjudged to you, on condition that you give good security to the creditors that their claims shall be satisfied in full. And all those, to whom freedom was given directly, shall then become free, exactly as if the inheritance had been entered upon; but those whom the heir was ordered to manumit shall obtain their freedom from you only; unless you wish that the goods of the deceased should be adjudged to you on no other condition than that those slaves also who received their liberty directly by testament shall become your freedmen; for if those who are to receive their freedom agree to this, we are willing that your wishes in this respect shall be complied with. And, lest the benefit of this our rescript should be lost in another way, namely by the property being seized on behalf of the imperial treasury, be it known to the officers of our revenue, that the gift of liberty is to be attended to more than our pecuniary advantage; and seizure shall be made of the property in such a way as to preserve the freedom of those who would have been in a situation to obtain it, had the inheritance been entered on under the testament.'

vulnerit, et hi, qui rebus nostris attendunt, scient, commodum pecuniario preferendam libertatis causam et ita bona cogenda, ut libertas his salva sit, qui eam adipisci poterunt, si hereditas ex testamento adita esset.'

D. xl. 5. 2, and 5. 4, 8, 11. 12, 17.

By a constitution of Gordian, it was declared that the rescript of Marcus Aurelius extended to cases in which a stranger, and not one of the slaves of the deceased, applied for the addition. (C. vii. 2. 6.)

When the inheritance was not rejected, but accepted by the heredes ab intestato or by the fiscus, the fiscus, so far as regards the enfranchisement of the slaves, was placed by the latter part of this rescript in a different position from that which was occupied by the heredes ab intestato; whichever accepted it, the ad-dictio could not take place, but the fiscus was ordered to fulfil the wishes of the deceased, while the heredes ab intestato were at liberty to disregard them.

2. Hoc rescripto subventum est et libertatibus et defunctis, ne bona eorum a creditoribus possideantur et veniant. Certe si fuerint ex hac causa bona addicta, cessat bonorum venditio; extitit enim defuncti defensor, et quidem idoneus, qui de solido creditoribus cavet.

2. This rescript is meant to favour both the gift of liberty and also the deceased testator, whose effects it prevents being seized and sold by creditors: for, of course, when goods are thus adjudged, in order that liberty may be preserved, there cannot be a sale by creditors, for there is some one to answer for the deceased, and very efficiently, as he gives security to the creditors for the full satisfaction of their claims.

3. Inprimis hoc rescriptum totiens locum habet, quotiens testamento libertates datae sunt. Quid ergo, si quis intestatus decedens codicillis libertates dederit neque adita sit ab intestato hereditas? Favour constitutionis debet locum habere. Certe si testatus decedat et codicillis dederit libertatem, competere eam, nemini dubium est.

3. This rescript is applicable whenever freedom is conferred by testament. But what if a master dies intestate, having bequeathed freedom to his slaves by codicils, and the inheritance ab intestato is not entered upon? The benefit of the constitution shall extend to this case; of course, if the deceased dies testate, freedom given by codicils is effectual.

D. xl. 5. 2.

4. Tunc constitutioni locum esse, verba ostendunt, cum nemo successor ab intestato existat. Ergo quam-

4. The words of the constitution show, that it applies only when there is no successor ab intestato. Therevulnerit, et hi, qui rebus nostris attendunt, scient, commodo pecuniario preferendam libertatis causam et ita bona cogenda, ut libertas his salva sit, qui eam adipisci poterunt, si hereditas ex testamento adita esset.'

to receive their freedom agree to this, we are willing that your wishes in this respect shall be complied with. And, lest the benefit of this our rescript should be lost in another way, namely by the property being seized on behalf of the imperial treasury, be it known to the officers of our revenue, that the gift of liberty is to be attended to more than our pecuniary advantage; and seizure shall be made of the property in such a way as to preserve the freedom of those who would have been in a situation to obtain it, had the inheritance been entered on under the testament.'

D. xl. 5. 2, and 5. 4, 8, 11. 12, 17.

By a constitution of Gordian, it was declared that the rescript of Marcus Aurelius extended to cases in which a stranger, and not one of the slaves of the deceased, applied for the addition. (C. vii. 2. 6.)

When the inheritance was not rejected, but accepted by the heredes ab intestato or by the fiscus, the fiscus, so far as regards the enfranchisement of the slaves, was placed by the latter part of this rescript in a different position from that which was occupied by the heredes ab intestato; whichever accepted it, the ad-dictio could not take place, but the fiscus was ordered to fulfil the wishes of the deceased, while the heredes ab intestato were at liberty to disregard them.

2. Hoc rescripto subventum est et libertatibus et defunctis, ne bona eorum a creditoribus possideantur et veniant. Certe si fuerint ex hac causa bona addicta, cessat bonorum venditio; extitit enim defuncti defensor, et quidem idoneus, qui de solido creditoribus cavet.

2. This rescript is meant to favour both the gift of liberty and also the deceased testator, whose effects it prevents being seized and sold by creditors: for, of course, when goods are thus adjudged, in order that liberty may be preserved, there cannot be a sale by creditors, for there is some one to answer for the deceased, and very efficiently, as he gives security to the creditors for the full satisfaction of their claims.

3. Inprimis hoc rescriptum totiens locum habet, quotiens testamento libertates datæ sunt. Quid ergo, si quis intestatus decedens codicillis libertates dederit neque adita sit ab intestato hereditas? Favor constitutionis debet locum habere. Certe si testatus decedat et codicillis dederit libertatem, competere eum, nemini dubium est.

3. This rescript is applicable whenever freedom is conferred by testament. But what if a master dies intestate, having bequeathed freedom to his slaves by codicils, and the inheritance ab intestato is not entered upon? The benefit of the constitution shall extend to this case; of course, if the deceased dies testate, freedom given by codicils is effectual.

D. xl. 5. 2.

4. Tunc constitutioni locum esse, verba ostendunt, cum nemo successor ab intestato existat. Ergo quam-

4. The words of the constitution show, that it applies only when there is no successor ab intestato. Therefore, as long as it remains doubtful whether there is or is not a successor, the constitution is not applicable; but when it is certain that no one will enter upon the succession, it then takes effect.

diu incertum sit, utrum existat an non, cessabit constitutio: si certum esse ceperit, neminem extare, tunc erit constitutioni locus.

D. xl. 5. 4. pr.

5. Si is, qui in integrum restitui potest, abstinuit se ab hereditate, an, quavis potest in integrum restitui, potest admitti constitutio? Ea debet addictio bonorum fieri. Quid ergo, si post additionem libertatum conservandarum causa factum in integrum sit restitutus? Utique non erit dicendum revocari libertates, quæ semel competierunt.

5. If a person who has a right to be placed again in exactly the position he once held, should abstain from taking the inheritance, is the constitution here applicable, although he may possibly be restored to his former position? Here, too, an adjudication of the goods may be made. What, then, if, after an adjudication has been made for the sake of preserving liberty, the heir is restored to his former position? The answer will be that gifts of liberty are not to be held to be revoked which have once been established.

D. xl. 5. 4. 1, 2.

The case contemplated is that of a minor under 25 years, who was heres ab intestato. If he had accepted the inheritance at once, he would have taken it without any of the burdens, such as gifts of liberty, with which it was charged by the testament, which had become of no effect. But if he refused to accept it, and the slaves were enfranchised by addiction being granted, then when the minor attained the age of 25, and was entitled to the restitutio in integrum, was the freedom gained by the slaves to be revoked? Justinian says undoubtedly not. The inheritance would be restored to the minor, but liberty once given could not be taken away again.

6. Hæc constitutio libertatum tuendarum causa introducta est: ergo si libertates nullæ sint datæ, cessat constitutio. Quid ergo, si vivus dedit libertates vel mortis causa et, ne de hoc queratur, utrum in fraudem creditorum an non factum sit, idcirco volunt addici sibi bonæ, an audiendi sunt? Et magis est, ut audiri debeant, etsi deficiant verba constitutionis.

6. This constitution was intended to make gifts of liberty effectual; and, therefore, when no such gifts are made, the constitution is not applicable. Suppose then a master has given freedom to his slaves by a donation either inter vivos or mortis causa, and, to prevent any question arising whether the creditors have been defrauded, the slaves intended to be enfranchised should petition that the goods of the deceased may be adjudged to them; is this to be allowed? And we think that we ought, on the whole, to say that it is, although the constitution is silent on the point.

See Bk. i. Tit. 6.

7. Sed cum multas divisiones ejusmodi constitutioni decesse perspeximus, lata est a nobis plenissima constitutio, in quam multe species collatæ sunt, quibus jus hujusmodi

7. Perceiving that the constitution was deficient in many respects, we have published a very complete constitution, containing many provisions, which complete the legislation on this

diu incertum sit, utrum existat an non, cessabit constitutio: si certum esse ceperit, neminem extare, tunc erit constitutioni locus.

fore, as long as it remains doubtful whether there is or is not a successor, the constitution is not applicable; but when it is certain that no one will enter upon the succession, it then takes effect.

D. xl. 5. 4. pr.

5. Si is, qui in integrum restitui potest, abstinuit se ab hereditate, an, quamvis potest in integrum restitui, potest admitti constitutio? Ea debet addictio bonorum fieri. Quid ergo, si post additionem libertatum conservandarum causa factum in integrum sit restitutus? Utique non erit dicendum revocari libertates, quæ semel competierunt.

5. If a person who has a right to be placed again in exactly the position he once held, should abstain from taking the inheritance, is the constitution here applicable, although he may possibly be restored to his former position? Here, too, an adjudication of the goods may be made. What, then, if, after an adjudication has been made for the sake of preserving liberty, the heir is restored to his former position? The answer will be that gifts of liberty are not to be held to be revoked which have once been established.

D. xl. 5. 4. 1, 2.

The case contemplated is that of a minor under 25 years, who was heres ab intestato. If he had accepted the inheritance at once, he would have taken it without any of the burdens, such as gifts of liberty, with which it was charged by the testament, which had become of no effect. But if he refused to accept it, and the slaves were enfranchised by addiction being granted, then when the minor attained the age of 25, and was entitled to the restitutio in integrum, was the freedom gained by the slaves to be revoked? Justinian says undoubtedly not. The inheritance would be restored to the minor, but liberty once given could not be taken away again.

6. Hæc constitutio libertatum tuendarum causa introducta est: ergo si libertates nullæ sint datæ, cessat constitutio. Quid ergo, si vivus dedit libertates vel mortis causa et, ne de hoc queratur, utrum in fraudem creditorum an non factum sit, idcirco volunt addici sibi bona, an audiendi sunt? Et magis est, ut audiri debeant, etsi deficiant verba constitutionis.

6. This constitution was intended to make gifts of liberty effectual; and, therefore, when no such gifts are made, the constitution is not applicable. Suppose then a master has given freedom to his slaves by a donation either inter vivos or mortis causa, and, to prevent any question arising whether the creditors have been defrauded, the slaves intended to be enfranchised should petition that the goods of the deceased may be adjudged to them; is this to be allowed? And we think that we ought, on the whole, to say that it is, although the constitution is silent on the point.

See Bk. i. Tit. 6.

7. Sed cum multas divisiones ejusmodi constitutioni deesse perspeximus, lata est a nobis plenissima constitutio, in quam multe species collatæ sunt, quibus jus hujusmodi

7. Perceiving that the constitution was deficient in many respects, we have published a very complete constitution, containing many provisions, which complete the legislation on this kind of succession. and which may be easily learned by reading the constitution itself.

successionis plenissimum est effectum, quas ex ipsa lectione constitutionis potest quis cognoscere.

C. vii. 2. 15.

The chief changes made by this constitution were—1. That even if the goods had been sold by the creditors, the addictio might still be made within a year from the sale, which was rescinded on the applicant guaranteeing the creditors; 2. That the addictio might be made if the applicant offered a composition satisfactory to the creditors, instead of payment in full; 3. That some only of the slaves need be enfranchised if the property did not admit of all being enfranchised; and 4. That while, if several persons, having an equal right to apply, asked for an addictio, they became joint possessors of the goods; if they applied one after the other, the first applicant was preferred.

TIT. XII. DE SUCCESSIONIBUS SUBLATIS, QUÆ FIEBANT PER BONORUM VENDITIONEM ET EX SENATUSCONSULTO CLAUDIANO.

Erant ante prædictam successionem olim et aliæ per universitatem successiones. Qualis fuerat bonorum emptio, quæ de bonis debitoris vendendis per multas ambages fuerat introducta et tunc locum habebat, quando judicia ordinaria in usu fuerunt: sed cum extraordinariis iudiciis posteritas usa est, ideo cum ipsis ordinariis iudiciis etiam bonorum venditiones expiraverunt et tantummodo creditoribus datur officio iudicis bona possidere et, prout eis utile visum fuerit, ea disponere, quod ex latioribus digestorum libris perfectius apparebit.

There were formerly other kinds of universal succession prior to that of which we have just spoken; such was the emptio bonorum which with numberless formalities was established for the sale of the goods of debtors. It continued while the iudicia ordinaria were in use; but afterwards, when the iudicia extraordinaria were adopted, the sale of goods passed away with the iudicia ordinaria. Creditors can now do no more than possess themselves of the goods of their debtors by order of a judge, and dispose of them as they think proper. The subject will be found treated of more at length in the larger work of the Digest.

GAL. iii. 77-81; D. xlii. 5; C. vii. 72. 9.

This bonorum emptio per universitatem, one of the prætorian modes of execution (see Introd. sec. 108), was a transfer of the entire property of the debtor to the person who, in consideration of receiving it, would undertake to pay the largest proportion of the claims of the creditors. The creditors might apply for permission to have the goods sold in this way, not only when the debtor was dead, but (1) when he fraudulently hid himself, so that he could not be summoned before the magistrate; or (2) when he was absent, and no one appeared to defend his cause; or (3) if, after having been condemned, he did not satisfy the claims of the creditors within the time allowed by law; or (4) if he had made a cessio bonorum, i.e. had himself abandoned all his property to his creditors, as he

1 A
2 A
3 C
4 P aba

successionis plenissimum est effectum, quas ex ipsa lectione constitutionis potest quis cognoscere.

kind of succession, and which may be easily learned by reading the constitution itself.

C. vii. 2. 15.

The chief changes made by this constitution were—1. That even if the goods had been sold by the creditors, the addictio might still be made within a year from the sale, which was rescinded on the applicant guaranteeing the creditors; 2. That the addictio might be made if the applicant offered a composition satisfactory to the creditors, instead of payment in full; 3. That some only of the slaves need be enfranchised if the property did not admit of all being enfranchised; and 4. That while, if several persons, having an equal right to apply, asked for an addictio, they became joint possessors of the goods; if they applied one after the other, the first applicant was preferred.

TTT. XII. DE SUCCESSIONIBUS SUBLATIS, QUÆ FIEBANT PER BONORUM VENDITIONEM ET EX SENATUSCONSULTO CLAUDIANO.

Erant ante prædictam successionem olim et aliæ per universitatem successiones. Qualis fuerat bonorum emptio, quæ de bonis debitoris vendendis per multas ambages fuerat introducta et tunc locum habebat, quando judicia ordinaria in usu fuerunt: sed cum extraordinariis judiciis posteritas usa est, ideo cum ipsis ordinariis judiciis etiam bonorum venditiones expiraverunt et tantummodo creditoribus datur officio iudicis bona possidere et, prout eis utile visum fuerit, ea disponere, quod ex latioribus digestorum libris perfectius apparebit.

There were formerly other kinds of universal succession prior to that of which we have just spoken; such was the emptio bonorum which with numberless formalities was established for the sale of the goods of debtors. It continued while the judicia ordinaria were in use; but afterwards, when the judicia extraordinaria were adopted, the sale of goods passed away with the judicia ordinaria. Creditors can now do no more than possess themselves of the goods of their debtors by order of a judge, and dispose of them as they think proper. The subject will be found treated of more at length in the larger work of the Digest.

GAL. iii. 77-81; D. xlii. 5; C. vii. 72. 9.

This bonorum emptio per universitatem, one of the prætorian modes of execution (see Intro. sec. 108), was a transfer of the entire property of the debtor to the person who, in consideration of receiving it, would undertake to pay the largest proportion of the claims of the creditors. The creditors might apply for permission to have the goods sold in this way, not only when the debtor was dead, but (1) when he fraudulently hid himself, so that he could not be summoned before the magistrate; or (2) when he was absent, and no one appeared to defend his cause; or (3) if, after having been condemned, he did not satisfy the claims of the creditors within the time allowed by law; or (4) if he had made a cessio bonorum, i.e. had himself abandoned all his property to his creditors, as he

1 a
2 a
3 con
4 Prop
aba

was allowed to do by the lex Julia. (GAL. iii. 78.) The venditio bonorum was held to carry with it the infamy of the debtor. The creditors were first placed by the prætor in possession of the property, rei servandæ causâ, and the intended sale was announced by advertisement (proscriptio). This possession was continued during thirty days if the debtor was alive, and during fifteen if he was dead. The prætor then summoned a meeting of the creditors, at which they chose one of their own body to conduct the business for them, called the magister. Ten or five days thereafter, according as the debtor was alive or dead, the conditions of sale were fixed under the supervision of the prætor (publicatio). After a further delay of twenty or ten days, the goods were put up to public auction, and the offer of the highest bidder having been accepted, the prætor made the adictio, by which the goods of the debtor, though not the Quiritarian ownership in them, were transferred to the bonorum emptor, who stepped into the place of the debtor, and might sue and be sued exactly as the debtor might have sued or been sued. (THEOPH. PAR.; GAL. iii. 79, 80.)

Judicia ordinaria, extraordinaria. (See Introd. sec. 109.)

The process under the judicia extraordinaria, which is referred to in the text, was termed distinctio bonorum. The creditors or some of them, time being allowed for others to come in (C. vii. 72. 10. pr.)—were placed in possession of the goods generally of the debtor, and then the goods were sold, not in block to one purchaser, but separately to separate purchasers, as occasion offered. (See D. xxvii. 10. 5.)

1. Erat et ex senatusconsulto Claudiano miserabilis per universitatem adquisitio, cum libera mulier servili amore bacchata ipsam libertatem per senatusconsultum amittebat et cum libertate substantiam: quod indignum nostris temporibus esse existimantes, et a nostra civitate deleri et non inseri nostris digestis concessimus.

1. There was also, by virtue of the senatusconsultum Claudianum, another most wretched method of acquisition per universitatem; when a free woman indulged her passion for a slave, and lost her freedom under this senatusconsultum, and with her freedom her estate. This was, in our opinion, unworthy of our age, and we have therefore abolished it in our empire, and forbidden it to be inserted in our Digest.

GAL. I. 84, 91, 100; C. viii. 24.

There could be no marriage between a slave and a free person. If, therefore, a woman born free lived with a slave in contubernio, this was thought so disgraceful to her, that if the master of the slave complained by three denunciations of her conduct, a magisterial decree subjected her to the punishment mentioned in the text, and she and her property passed to the owner of the slave. The strong expression, servili amore bacchata, must not be taken as indicating anything more than cohabitation with a slave. If the woman was a freedwoman who thus lived with a slave, she became again the slave of her patron, if he had not known of, and assented to, her conduct, and the slave of the master of the slave was allowed to do by the lex Julia. (GAL. iii. 78.) The venditio bonorum was held to carry with it the infamy of the debtor. The creditors were first placed by the prætor in possession of the property, rei servandæ causâ, and the intended sale was announced by advertisement (proscriptio). This possession was continued during thirty days if the debtor was alive, and during fifteen if he was dead. The prætor then summoned a meeting of the creditors, at which they chose one of their own body to conduct the business for them, called the magister. Ten or five days thereafter, according as the debtor was alive or dead, the conditions of sale were fixed under the supervision of the prætor (publicatio). After a further delay of twenty or ten days, the goods were put up to public auction, and the offer of the highest bidder having been accepted, the prætor made the adlectio, by which the goods of the debtor, though not the Quiritarian ownership in them, were transferred to the bonorum emptor, who stepped into the place of the debtor, and might sue and be sued exactly as the debtor might have sued or been sued. (THEOPH. PAR.; GAL. iii. 79, 80.)

Judicia ordinaria, extraordinaria. (See Introd. sec. 109.)

Trachs Bonorum The process under the judicia extraordinaria, which is referred to in the text, was termed disruptio bonorum. The creditors or some of them, time being allowed for others to come in (G. vii. 72. 10. pr.)—were placed in possession of the goods generally of the debtor, and then the goods were sold, not in block to one purchaser, but separately to separate purchasers, as occasion offered. (See D. xxvii. 10. 5.)

1. Erat et ex senatusconsulto Claudio miserabilis per universitatem adquisitio, cum libera mulier servili amore bacchata ipsam libertatem per senatusconsultum amittebat et eum libertate substantiam: quod indignum nostris temporibus esse existimantes, et a nostra civitate deleri et non inseri nostris digestis concessimus.

1. There was also, by virtue of the senatusconsultum Claudianum, another most wretched method of acquisition per universitatem; when a free-woman indulged her passion for a slave, and lost her freedom under this senatusconsultum, and with her freedom her estate. This was, in our opinion, unworthy of our age, and we have therefore abolished it in our empire, and forbidden it to be inserted in our Digest.

GAL. i. 84, 91, 160; C. viii. 24.

There could be no marriage between a slave and a free person. If, therefore, a woman born free lived with a slave in contubernio, this was thought so disgraceful to her, that if the master of the slave complained by three denunciations of her conduct, a magisterial decree subjected her to the punishment mentioned in the text, and she and her property passed to the owner of the slave. The strong expression, 'servili amore bacchata,' must not be taken as indicating anything more than cohabitation with a slave. If the woman was a freedwoman who thus lived with a slave, she became again the slave of her patron, if he had not known of, and assented to, her conduct, and the slave of the master of the slave with whom she lived, if the patron had been aware of how she was living. (PAUL. Sent. 2. 21; GAI. i. 84-86, 91, 160; see also TACIT. Annal. xii. 53.) The date of the senatusconsultum Claudianum is A.D. 52. 375

TIT. XIII. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS.

Nunc transeamus ad obligationes. Obligatio est juris vinculum, quo necessitate adstringimur alicujus solvendæ rei, secundum nostræ civitatis jura.

Let us now pass to obligations. An obligation is a tie of law, by which we are so constrained that of necessity we must render something according to the laws of our state.

D. xlv. 7. 3. pr.

1. Omnium autem obligationum summa divisio in duo genera deducitur: nuncque aut civiles sunt aut prætorie. Civiles sunt, quæ aut legibus constitutæ aut certe jure civili comprobatæ sunt. Prætorie sunt, quas prætor ex sua jurisdictione constituit, quæ etiam honorariæ vocantur.

1. The principal division of all obligations is into two kinds, for they are civil or prætorian. Civil obligations are those constituted by the laws, or, at least, recognised by the civil law. Prætorian obligations are those which the prætor has established by his own authority; they are also called honorary.

D. xlv. 7. 52. pr. 5, 6.

2. Sequens divisio in quattuor species deducitur: aut enim ex contractu sunt aut quasi ex contractu aut ex maleficio aut quasi ex maleficio. Prius est, ut de his, quæ ex contractu sunt, dispiciamus. Harum æque quattuor species sunt: aut enim re contrahuntur aut verbis aut litteris aut consensu. De quibus singulis dispiciamus.

2. A further division separates them into four kinds, for they arise ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, ex maleficio or quasi ex maleficio. Let us first treat of those which arise from a contract: which again are divided into four kinds according as they are formed re, verbis, litteris, or consensu.² Let us examine each kind separately.

GAI. iii. 88, 89; D. xlv. 7. 1. pr. and 1.

We now pass to obligations. Having finished the subject of rights over things, and of the modes in which they are acquired, we now pass to rights against particular persons, jura in personam, expressed very inaccurately in later Latin by the term jura ad rem. These rights are those which we have against some one or more particular persons, as opposed to the general rights, such as that of having the secure enjoyment of our property, which we have against all mankind. (See Introductio sec. 61.)

Obligations are placed in the Institutes between the subject of things and the subject of actions; and as in Bk. i. (Tit. 2. 12) it is said that the whole of private law relates to persons, things, and actions, it has been questioned whether obligations are meant to be included under things or actions. Theophilus understood them to be included under actions, as we see by his paraphrase on this Title, and on the sixth Title of the Fourth Book; but it is evident that Gaius, from whom Justinian borrows the arrangement, meant obligations to come under the discussion of res:

with whom she lived, if the patron had been aware of how she was living. (PAUL. Sent. 2. 21; GAI. i. 84-86, 91, 160; see also TACIT. Annal. xii. 53.) The date of the senatusconsultum Claudianum is A.D. 52. 875

TIT. XIII. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS.

Nunc transeamus ad obligationes. Obligatio est juris vinculum, quo necessitate adstringimur alicujus solvendæ rei, secundum nostræ civitatis jura.

Let us now pass to obligations. An obligation is a tie of law, by which we are so constrained that of necessity we must render something according to the laws of our state.

D. xlv. 7. 3. pr.

1. Omnium autem obligationum summa divisio in duo genera deducitur: namque aut civiles sunt aut prætorie. Civiles sunt, quæ aut legibus constitutæ aut certe jure civili comprobate sunt. Prætorie sunt, quas prætor ex sua jurisdictione constituit, quæ etiam honorariæ vocantur.

1. The principal division of all obligations is into two kinds, for they are civil or prætorian. Civil obligations are those constituted by the laws, or, at least, recognised by the civil law. Prætorian obligations are those which the prætor has established by his own authority; they are also called honorary.

D. xlv. 7. 52. pr. 5, 6.

2. Sequens divisio in quatuor species deducitur: aut enim ex contractu sunt aut quasi ex contractu aut ex maleficio aut quasi ex maleficio. Præterea est, ut de his, quæ ex contractu sunt, dispiciamus. Harum æque quatuor species sunt: aut enim re contrahuntur aut verbis aut litteris aut consensu. De quibus singulis dispiciamus.

2. A further division separates them into four kinds, for they arise ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, ex maleficio or quasi ex maleficio. Let us first treat of those which arise from a contract: which again are divided into four kinds according as they are formed re, verbis, litteris, or consensu.⁴ Let us examine each kind separately.

GAI. iii. 88, 89; D. xlv. 7. 1. pr. and 1.

We now pass to obligations. Having finished the subject of rights over things, and of the modes in which they are acquired, we now pass to rights against particular persons, jura in personam, expressed very inaccurately in later Latin by the term jura ad rem. These rights are those which we have against some one or more particular persons, as opposed to the general rights, such as that of having the secure enjoyment of our property, which we have against all mankind. (See Introd. sec. 61.)

Obligations are placed in the Institutes between the subject of things and the subject of actions; and as in Bk. i. (Tit. 2. 12) it is said that the whole of private law relates to persons, things, and actions, it has been questioned whether obligations are meant to be included under things or actions. Theophilus understood them to be included under actions, as we see by his paraphrase on this Title, and on the sixth Title of the Fourth Book; but it is evident that Gaius, from whom Justinian borrows the arrangement, meant obligations to come under the discussion of res:

otherwise, as Savigny remarks (System des heut. röm. Rechts, Bk. ii. ch. 1), we must consider the part specially relating to actions as a subsidiary part of the portion commencing with obligations, which is contradicted by the mode in which Gaius treats of the subject of actions. The subject of obligations does not properly fall under either res or actiones, and it was from feeling this that Gaius placed it between the two, although his division of law obliged him to rank it under one or the other. He could not, consistently with this division, place obligations in his system according to their nature, and he preferred to consider them with reference to their ultimate result (res) rather than with reference to the mode by which the law secured this result (actio). The incorrectness of such a mode of treating obligations, and the inaccuracy of the expression jus ad rem, are evident when we consider that the actio did not really give the res which was the subject of the obligation, but only a pecuniary equivalent.

The remainder of this Book and the first five Titles of the Fourth Book must be taken together as treating of obligations, the remainder of this book being mainly devoted to one head of obligations, those arising from contract. As a preliminary to the general study of the part of the Institutes treating of obligations, and specially to the study of contracts, it will be convenient here to take a preliminary survey of some points to which constant reference is made in the discussion of subsequent details.

These points are: 1. The meaning of the term obligatio. 2. The sources of obligations. 3. The obligations which arise from contract, and their recognised heads. 4. Innominate contracts, pacts, natural obligations. 5. Culpa. 6. Interest. 7. The actions by which obligations, and especially contracts, were enforced.

1. The Meaning of the Term Obligation. Obligatio, as the text in the initial paragraph tells us, is a 'tie of law by which we are so constrained that of necessity we must render something according to the laws of our state,' i.e. the rules of either the strict civil law or the praetorian law. It was because it could be enforced by an action that the tie was binding on the person bound, debitor (debitor intellegatur is a quo invito exigere pecunia potest, D. l. 16. 108), in favour of the creditor, these words debitor and creditor being used in a general sense, in Roman law, for the person bound and the person profiting by the tie. That which the debtor is thus bound to render is in the text expressed by the general word solvere; and this general term includes three kinds of such rendering— dare, facere, prestare. Dare meant to give either the property in a thing, as in the contract of stipulatio, or only the possession of it, as in the case of the seller in the contract of sale; facere, to do something, as, for example, the mandatary or agent had to do what he had undertaken to do; and prestare, to make good, as the person guilty of negligence had prestare culpam, to make good his fault. These three terms, however, were not kept distinct, facere and prestare being constantly used in the sense otherwise, as Savigny remarks (System des heut. röm. Rechts, Bk. ii. ch. 1), we must consider the part specially relating to actions as a subsidiary part of the portion commencing with obligations, which is contradicted by the mode in which Gaius treats of the subject of actions. The subject of obligations does not properly fall under either res or actiones, and it was from feeling this that Gaius placed it between the two, although his division of law obliged him to rank it under one or the other. He could not, consistently with this division, place obligations in his system according to their nature, and he preferred to consider them with reference to their ultimate result (res) rather than with reference to the mode by which the law secured this result (actio). The incorrectness of such a mode of treating obligations, and the inaccuracy of the expression jus ad rem, are evident when we consider that the actio did not really give the res which was the subject of the obligation, but only a pecuniary equivalent.

re =
facere
the

The remainder of this Book and the first five Titles of the Fourth Book must be taken together as treating of obligations, the remainder of this book being mainly devoted to one head of obligations, those arising from contract. As a preliminary to the general study of the part of the Institutes treating of obligations, and specially to the study of contracts, it will be convenient here to take a preliminary survey of some points to which constant reference is made in the discussion of subsequent details.

These points are: 1. The meaning of the term obligatio. 2. The sources of obligations. 3. The obligations which arise from contract, and their recognised heads. 4. Innominate contracts, pacts, natural obligations. 5. Culpa. 6. Interest. 7. The actions by which obligations, and especially contracts, were enforced.

1. The Meaning of the Term Obligation.—Obligatio, as the text in the initial paragraph tells us, is a 'tie of law by which we are so constrained that of necessity we must render something according to the laws of our state,' i.e. the rules of either the strict civil law or the praetorian law. It was because it could be enforced by an action that the tie was binding on the person bound, debitor (debitor intellegatur is a quo invito exigere pecunia potest, D. l. 16. 108), in favour of the creditor, these words debitor and creditor being used in a general sense, in Roman law, for the person bound and the person profiting by the tie. That which the debtor is thus bound to render is in the text expressed by the general word solvere; and this general term includes three kinds of such rendering— dare, facere, prestare. Dare meant to give either the property in a thing, as in the contract of stipulatio, or only the possession of it, as in the case of the seller in the contract of sale; facere, to do something, as, for example, the mandatary or agent had to do what he had undertaken to do; and prestare, to make good, as the person guilty of negligence had prestare culpam, to make good his fault. These three terms, however, were not kept distinct, facere and prestare being constantly used in the sense of the thing

se =
facere

of dare. In every case, however, it was a sum of money that was the real thing that the debtor was forced to give, as the remedy for every breach of contract was put into the shape of a pecuniary equivalent, unless the debtor could and did execute his contract under compulsion.

Obligatio is thus properly the tie between creditor and debtor; but it is also used to express the right thus gained (D. xii. 2. 9. 3), the duty thus owed (D. l. 16. 21), and also one mode by which such a tie is created, being used as equivalent to contractus. (D. v. 1. 20.)

2. The Sources of Obligations.—The two main sources of obligations are contracts and delicts: the debtor is bound by having undertaken to be bound, or he has done an injury and has to make good his wrong. Contracts are the principal subject of the remainder of this Book, and delicts of the first Titles of the Fourth Book. But there were obligations which arose in a manner very similar to that from which contracts sprang, a state of facts having arisen by which the debtor was placed in very much the position in which he would have been had he contracted—obligationes quasi ex contractu, treated of in the 27th Title of this Book; and there were obligations which arose from wrongs being done, which did not fall within the special list of delicts known to Roman law—obligationes quasi ex delicto, treated of in Title 5 of the Fourth Book. The sources of obligations in the Institutes are thus four; while Gaius says (iii. 88), omnis obligatio vel ex contractu nascitur, vel ex delicto, and adds in a passage given in the Digest (xliv. 7. 1. pr.), aut proprio quodam jure ex variis causarum figuris, i.e. by obligations quasi ex contractu and quasi ex delicto.

3. Contracts.—A contract is a species of agreement, the accord of two wills, conventio, pactum; and in an agreement there is first of all the pollicitatio, the offer made by one party, and then the acceptance by the other. When this accord of wills is such that the law adds a third element, the vinculum juris, or obligation, we have a contract. (D. l. 12. 3. pr.) But in order that this third element should be added, it was, according to the strict theory of Roman law, necessary that the accord of wills should have been expressed in a particular manner. In the old times of Roman law, the negotium, the form of conveyance by the scales and the copper, was the chief and, perhaps, the only form of contract recognised, and the use of this form continued to be necessary to pass res mancipi. (See Introd. sec. 59.) Possibly stipulations also dated from the earliest time of Roman law (HUNTER, 364-8), but at any rate there were gradually recognised in Roman law the following forms by which contracts could be made: 1. Verbis, by the stipulation. 2. Litteris, by entry in a ledger. 3. Then, without any special form being gone through, contracts were recognised when made re, by the simple delivery of a thing in one of four ways, mutuum, commodatum, depositum, pignus. And, lastly, 4. In four cases contracts were recognised as arising immediately

1888
mancipium
1888

A B

1 Verb
2 delict
3 Re
4 man
5 Com
6 Dep
7 Pign
8

commodum 4/5

of dare. In every case, however, it was a sum of money that was the real thing that the debtor was forced to give, as the remedy for every breach of contract was put into the shape of a pecuniary equivalent, unless the debtor could and did execute his contract under compulsion.

Obligatio is thus properly the tie between creditor and debtor: but it is also used to express the right thus gained (D. xii. 2. 9. 3), the duty thus owed (D. l. 16. 21), and also one mode by which such a tie is created, being used as equivalent to contractus. (D. v. 1. 20.)

2. The Sources of Obligations.—The two main sources of obligations are contracts and delicts: the debtor is bound by having undertaken to be bound, or he has done an injury and has to make good his wrong. Contracts are the principal subject of the remainder of this Book, and delicts of the first Titles of the Fourth Book. But there were obligations which arose in a manner very similar to that from which contracts sprang, a state of facts having arisen by which the debtor was placed in very much the position in which he would have been had he contracted—obligationes quasi ex contractu, treated of in the 27th Title of this Book; and there were obligations which arose from wrongs being done, which did not fall within the special list of delicts known to Roman law—obligationes quasi ex delicto, treated of in Title 5 of the Fourth Book. The sources of obligations in the Institutes are thus four; while Gaius says (iii. 88), omnis obligatio vel ex contractu nascitur, vel ex delicto, and adds in a passage given in the Digest (xliv. 7. 1. pr.), aut proprio quodam jure ex variis causarum figuris, i.e. by obligations quasi ex contractu and quasi ex delicto.

3. Contracts.—A contract is a species of agreement, the accord of two wills, conventio, pactum; and in an agreement there is first of all the propositio, the offer made by one party, and then the acceptance by the other. When this accord of wills is such that the law adds a third element, the vinculum juris, or obligation, we have a contract. (D. l. 12. 3. pr.) But in order that this third element should be added, it was, according to the strict theory of Roman law, necessary that the accord of wills should have been expressed in a particular manner. In the old times of Roman law, the nummum, the form of conveyance by the scales and the copper, was the chief and, perhaps, the only form of contract recognised, and the use of this form continued to be necessary to pass res mancipi. (See Intro. sec. 59.) Possibly stipulations also dated from the earliest time of Roman law (HUNTER, 364-8), but at any rate there were gradually recognised in Roman law the following forms by which contracts could be made: 1. Verbis, by the stipulation. 2. Litteris, by entry in a ledger. 3. Then, without any special form being gone through, contracts were recognised when made re, by the simple delivery of a thing in one of four ways, mutuum, commodatum, depositum, pignus. And, lastly, 4. In four cases contracts were recognised as arising immediately

10786
mancipium
10786

A B

1 verb
2 litteris
3 Re
mut
Com
pign
4 Y common
4/5

out of the consent of the parties: sale, letting on hire, partnership, mandatum. There were thus ten recognised heads of contract. The Institutes, following Gaius, treat first of contracts re, although this is out of the historical order, then the formal contracts verbis and litteris, and lastly the formless contracts consensu. It may be observed that contracts re may in one way be classed with contracts verbis and litteris, and opposed to the consensual contracts; for in contracts re there is something, i.e. the delivery of the thing, as in contracts verbis and litteris there is something, i.e. the use of a form, beyond the mere consent.

By an obligation the debtor is bound to the creditor; but an obligation might either be such as to bind one party, the debtor, and not the other, the creditor (unilateral contracts), or it might be such that each party was in turn debtor and creditor (bilateral contracts). Contracts made verbis and litteris were unilateral. Among contracts made re, the contract of mutuum was unilateral. The contracts of commodatum, depositum, and pignus were so far bilateral that the person to whom the thing was delivered might recover extraordinary outlay incurred in preserving or maintaining the thing, or caused by the fault of the other person to the contract. It was much in the same sense that the consensual contract of mandatum was bilateral. The other three consensual contracts were always bilateral. An essential feature of the three contracts, commodatum, depositum, and mandatum, was that they were always gratuitous. Contracts again may be regarded as they are executed or executory—that is according as something must have been done in accomplishment of the contract at the time of making it, or as the liabilities of both parties might be altogether prospective. Contracts re belong to the former head; contracts verbis and consensu to the latter. Contracts litteris were, properly, executed, but were so used as to be executory.

4. Innominate Contracts.—When an agreement did not take the shape of any of the ten forms of contract recognised in the civil law (it will be remembered that the heads re and consensu have each four subdivisions), it was, strictly speaking, not a contract at all, but if one party to it had executed it, the praetor would force the other party to execute it also. These contracts, as having no special name, have been termed contractus innominati, and as the contract sprang into existence by a thing having been done or given, by the fact, that is, of the contract being already executed by one party to it, these contractus innominati may be looked on as belonging more immediately to the head of contracts made re. Paulus (D. xix. 5. 5. pr.) thus sums up the heads of the cases in which such contracts might arise: ‘Aut do tibi ut des, aut do ut facias, aut facio ut des, aut facio ut facias.’ I give something to you in such a way that by the fact of my gift (re) you are bound to give something to me, or I give so that you are bound to do something for me, or I do something for you so that you are bound to give me something, or I do something for you so that you are out of the consent of the parties: sale, letting on hire, partnership, mandatum. There were thus ten recognised heads of contract. The Institutes, following Gaius, treat first of contracts re, although this is out of the historical order, then the formal contracts verbis and litteris, and lastly the formless contracts consensu. It may be observed that contracts re may in one way be classed with contracts verbis and litteris, and opposed to the consensual contracts; for in contracts re there is something, i.e. the delivery of the thing, as in contracts verbis and litteris there is something, i.e. the use of a form, beyond the mere consent.

By an obligation the debtor is bound to the creditor; but an obligation might either be such as to bind one party, the debtor, and not the other, the creditor (unilateral contracts), or it might be such that each party was in turn debtor and creditor (bilateral contracts). Contracts made verbis and litteris were unilateral. Among contracts made re, the contract of mutuum was unilateral. The contracts of commodatum, depositum, and pignus were so far bilateral that the person to whom the thing was delivered might recover extraordinary outlay incurred in preserving or maintaining the thing, or caused by the fault of the other person to the contract. It was much in the same sense that the consensual contract of mandatum was bilateral. The other three consensual contracts were always bilateral. An essential feature of the three contracts, commodatum, depositum, and mandatum, was that they were always gratuitous. Contracts again may be regarded as they are executed or executory—that is according as something must have been done in accomplishment of the contract at the time of making it, or as the liabilities of both parties might be altogether prospective. Contracts re belong to the former head; contracts verbis and consensu to the latter. Contracts litteris were, properly, executed, but were so used as to be executory.

4. Innominate Contracts.—When an agreement did not take the shape of any of the ten forms of contract recognised in the civil law (it will be remembered that the heads re and consensu have each four subdivisions), it was, strictly speaking, not a contract at all, but if one party to it had executed it, the praetor would force the other party to execute it also. These contracts, as having no special name, have been termed contractus innominati, and as the contract sprang into existence by a thing having been done or given, by the fact, that is, of the contract being already executed by one party to it, these contractus innominati may be looked on as belonging more immediately to the head of contracts made re. Paulus (D. xix. 5. 5. pr.) thus sums up the heads of the cases in which such contracts might arise: ‘Aut do tibi ut des, aut do ut facias, aut facio ut des, aut facio ut facias.’ I give something to you in such a way that by the fact of my gift (re) you are bound to give something to me, or I give so that you are bound to do something for me, or I do something for you so that you are bound to give me something, or I do something for you so that you are bound to do something for me. Contracts of this sort would be enforced by an actio in factum præscriptis verbis, by one, that is, in which the formula would be arranged to meet the circumstances of this particular case (in factum), a short statement of these circumstances being placed in the demonstratio (præscriptis verbis).

Pacts.—An agreement, pactum, not coming under the ten heads of contract, nor binding as an innominate contract by having been executed on one side, was, as a general rule, a nudum pactum; that is, it could not be enforced by an action. But such an agreement might be used as the basis of an exception. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 13.) Nuda pactio obligationem non parit, sed parit exceptionem. (D. ii. 14. 7. 4.) There were, however, some pacts to which an action was attached, either by express enactment, pacta legitima, such as, after the time of Justinian, the agreement to give (Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 2), or by the prætors (pacta prætoria), such as the pactum constitutum pecunie, an agreement by which a person agreed to pay what he already owed. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 9.) Pacta might also be added (adjecta) as subsidiary to a main obligation.

Natural Obligations.—There were certain ties to which no action was attached, but which still were not without a recognised legal force, because of the moral claim to recognition they involved. (They were called natural obligations. As for example, if an agreement was made between a paterfamilias and any one in his power, this was not an obligation that could be legally enforced, but the parties were bound by a tie which the jurists ascribed to the sphere of the lex nature or jus gentium. Is natura debet quem jure gentium dare oportet, cujus fidem secuti sumus. (D. l. 17. 84. 1.) The principal effects of natural obligations were, that if money was paid in pursuance of them it could not be sued for back (D. xii. 6. 19. pr.), and they could be made the subject of a set-off in an action brought to enforce a legal obligation: etiam quod natura debetur venit in compensationem. (D. xvi. 2. 6.) Pacts probably were considered to produce always a natural obligation; but a natural obligation might arise in cases where there was no pact, no agreement, for example, of persons able to contract, as, if a thing was due from a slave, the slave could not bind himself, but after he became free, the thing was due by a natural obligation (D. xlv. 7. 14), and a suretyship could be created to give effect to it. (Tit. 20. 1.)

5. Culpa, dolus, diligentia.—One of the varying features in obligations which it is of considerable importance to notice is the amount of responsibility thrown on one or both of the parties to it.

If one person who was bound to another by a contract, designedly subjected him to harm or loss (damnum) with respect to anything included in the contract, the wrongdoer, in inflicting this wilful injury, was said to be guilty of dolus; if he was the means of an injury not designed being inflicted, then, unless the damnum was

1 no action
2 having a legal binding force

Dolus (wilful injury) Culpa
(designing)

bound to do something for me. Contracts of this sort would be enforced by an actio in factum præscriptis verbis, by one, that is, in which the formula would be arranged to meet the circumstances of this particular case (in factum), a short statement of these circumstances being placed in the demonstratio (præscriptis verbis).

Pacts.—An agreement, pactum, not coming under the ten heads of contract, nor binding as an innominate contract by having been executed on one side, was, as a general rule, a nudum pactum; that is, it could not be enforced by an action. But such an agreement might be used as the basis of an exception. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 13.) Nuda pactio obligationem non parit, sed parit exceptionem. (D. ii. 14. 7. 1.) There were, however, some pacts to which an action was attached, either by express enactment, pacta legitima, such as, after the time of Justinian, the agreement to give (Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 2), or by the prætors (pacta prætoria), such as the pactum constitutum pecunie, an agreement by which a person agreed to pay what he already owed. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 9.) Pacta might also be added (adjecta) as subsidiary to a main obligation.

Natural Obligations.—There were certain ties to which no action was attached, but which still were not without a recognised legal force, because of the moral claim to recognition they involved. They were called natural obligations. As for example, if an agreement was made between a paterfamilias and any one in his power, this was not an obligation that could be legally enforced, but the parties were bound by a tie which the jurists ascribed to the sphere of the lex naturæ or jus gentium. Is natura debet quem jure gentium dare oportet, cujus fidem secuti sumus. (D. l. 17. 84. 1.) The principal effects of natural obligations were, that if money was paid in pursuance of them it could not be sued for back (D. xii. 6. 19. pr.), and they could be made the subject of a set-off in an action brought to enforce a legal obligation: etiam quod natura debetur venit in compensationem. (D. xvi. 2. 6.) Pacts probably were considered to produce always a natural obligation; but a natural obligation might arise in cases where there was no pact, no agreement, for example, of persons able to contract, as, if a thing was due from a slave, the slave could not bind himself, but after he became free, the thing was due by a natural obligation (D. xlv. 7. 14), and a suretyship could be created to give effect to it. (Tit. 20. 1.)

5. Culpa, dolus, diligentia.—One of the varying features in obligations which it is of considerable importance to notice is the amount of responsibility thrown on one or both of the parties to it.

If one person who was bound to another by a contract, designedly subjected him to harm or loss (damnum) with respect to anything included in the contract, the wrongdoer, in inflicting this wilful injury, was said to be guilty of dolus; if he was the means of an injury not designed being inflicted, then, unless the damnum was the result of unavoidable accident, he was said to be guilty of culpa. The technical term for being responsible for malicious injury or a fault was dolum, culpam præstare. Every contract bound all parties dolum præstare, and a special agreement that the parties should not be so bound was void. (D. ii. 14. 27. 3.) Culpa would naturally admit of degrees. The fault might be one which any man in his senses would have scrupled to commit, and it was then termed lata culpa (lata culpa est nimia negligentia, id est, non intellegere quod omnes intellegunt; D. 1. 16. 213. 2); and lata culpa was treated as approaching nearly to dolum, as such extreme negligence must generally be due to design. Or it might consist in falling short of the highest standard of carefulness to avoid injury that could be found; such, for instance, as the carefulness employed in the management of affairs by a person who would deserve to be called bonus paterfamilias, and the culpa was then termed levis or levissima. Or, again, it might consist in falling short of the care which the person guilty of the culpa was accustomed to bestow on his own affairs. In this last case we no longer measure by an absolute standard, but a relative one; what is culpa in one man is not in another, and modern writers have therefore spoken of it as being culpa levis in concreto, i.e. as seen in and measured by the particular individual, opposed to the culpa levis in abstracto, i.e. estimated by the absolute standard of the diligence which a person of the utmost care would exhibit.

If we measure the degrees of responsibility which under various circumstances those bound by an obligation will incur, we may speak either of the fault for which they will be held responsible, or of the degree of negligence which this fault implies, or of the degree of diligence that is exacted from them. These are only different modes of talking of the same thing. If the circumstances are such that the person bound by the obligation undergoes a slight degree of responsibility, we may say that he will be responsible for a grave fault (lata culpa), not for a slight one (culpa levis), that the negligence for which he will be responsible must be gross, crassa, or that the diligence he has to show is of the second, not of the first, of the two orders to be mentioned immediately. It is in the language of diligence that the Roman jurists generally calculate the amount of responsibility. They make two orders of diligence, the higher, that of the bonus paterfamilias, exacta diligentia, and the lower, that shown by the person spoken of in the conduct of his own affairs, quanta in suis rebus diligentia; and these two orders of diligence are brought into harmony with the three divisions of culpa (lata, levis, and levis in concreto) in this way. (1) A person responsible for culpa levis in abstracto has to show the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (2) A person who is only responsible for lata culpa is not to be held liable until it is shown that he has not used as much care as he does habitually about his own things. A person who is responsible for culpa levis in concreto has to show that he has used as much care as he does about the result of unavoidable accident, he was said to be guilty of culpa. The technical term for being responsible for malicious injury or a fault was dolum, culpam præstare. Every contract bound all parties dolum præstare, and a special agreement that the parties should not be so bound was void. (D. ii. 11. 27. 3.) Culpa would naturally admit of degrees. The fault might be one which any man in his senses would have scrupled to commit, and it was then termed lata culpa (lata culpa est nimia negligentia, id est, non intellegere quod omnes intellegunt; D. l. 16. 213. 2); and lata culpa was treated as approaching nearly to dolum, as such extreme negligence must generally be due to design. Or it might consist in falling short of the highest standard of carefulness to avoid injury that could be found; such, for instance, as the carefulness employed in the management of affairs by a person who would deserve to be called bonus paterfamilias, and the culpa was then termed levis or levissima. Or, again, it might consist in falling short of the care which the person guilty of the culpa was accustomed to bestow on his own affairs. In this last case we no longer measure by an absolute standard, but a relative one; what is culpa in one man is not in another, and modern writers have therefore spoken of it as being culpa levis in concreto, i.e. as seen in and measured by the particular individual, opposed to the culpa levis in abstracto, i.e. estimated by the absolute standard of the diligence which a person of the utmost care would exhibit.

If we measure the degrees of responsibility which under various circumstances those bound by an obligation will incur, we may speak either of the fault for which they will be held responsible, or of the degree of negligence which this fault implies, or of the degree of diligence that is exacted from them. These are only different modes of talking of the same thing. If the circumstances are such that the person bound by the obligation undergoes a slight degree of responsibility, we may say that he will be responsible for a grave fault (lata culpa), not for a slight one (culpa levis), that the negligence for which he will be responsible must be gross, crassa, or that the diligence he has to show is of the second, not of the first, of the two orders to be mentioned immediately. It is in the language of diligence that the Roman jurists generally calculate the amount of responsibility. They make two orders of diligence, the higher, that of the bonus paterfamilias, exacta diligentia, and the lower, that shown by the person spoken of in the conduct of his own affairs, quanta in suis rebus diligentia; and these two orders of diligence are brought into harmony with the three divisions of culpa (lata, levis, and levis in concreto) in this way. (1) A person responsible for culpa levis in abstracto has to show the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (2) A person who is only responsible for lata culpa is not to be held liable until it is shown that he has not used as much care as he does habitually about his own things. A person who is responsible for culpa levis in concreto has to show that he has used as much care as he does about his own things, i.e. in this case the burden of proof is on him. In each case the standard is the care which the person sought to be made liable takes about his own things. All responsibility for culpa is thus set under two heads of diligence, and in the same way there are two corresponding heads of negligence; and negligence has a distinguishing mark added to it in the term crassa, as opposed to slight (minima), when it is meant that the person spoken of has not used in the case in question the care he habitually employs in matters that affect him.

The higher degree of diligence, that of a bonus paterfamilias, was required, or, in other words, the negligence from which liability would arise need not be crassa, or, in other words, the culpa causing liability might be levis and levis in abstracto, in the following set of cases: 1. Where the person responsible got the benefit of a contract, as, for example, when he borrowed a thing for his own use (commodatum). 2. When both parties were interested in the obligation being carried out, but there was no joint interest in the thing, as, for example, mortgagor and mortgagee (Tit. 14. 4), vendor and vendee (D. xviii. 6. 3), letter and hirer (D. xix. 2. 25. 7). 3. In case of agents (negotiorum gestores) (Tit. 27. 1).

Only the lower degree of diligence, that quanta in suis rebus, was required, or, in other words, the negligence from which liability would arise must be crassa, or, in other words, the culpa causing liability might be lata or levis in concreto, in the following cases: 1. When the other person to the contract got the benefit from it, as in a contract of deposit, the depositary is only liable for crassa negligentia, and it must be proved that he has not used the quanta in suis rebus diligentia. (D. xvi. 3. 32.) 2. When both parties to the contract have a common interest in the thing as to which the question of diligence or negligence arises, as partners, the husband in the management of the dotal estate, where he is a sort of partner (D. xxiii. 3. 17. pr.), co-heirs and co-legatees (D. x. 2. 25. 16). 3. Involuntary parties to a quasi contract, like tutors and curators (D. xxvii. 3. 1. pr.).

6. Interest, mora.—When a person bound by a contract delayed to execute it, and this delay (mora) was of such a kind that culpa could be imputed to him, he was subjected to something more than the necessity of fulfilling the contract, and especially he was in most cases liable to pay interest (usura). (D. xxii. 1. 7.) But interest was not ordinarily payable on debts except by express agreement. By the Twelve Tables there was fixed a legal maximum of 12 per cent. per annum, or 1 per cent. per month, centesimæ usuræ. It was afterwards reduced to 6 per cent., and by the lex Genucia (B.C. 341) interest was declared illegal. During the Republic, however, it was again recognised, and the maximum once more rose to 12 per cent. Justinian fixed a maximum varying according to circumstances from 12 to 4 per cent. (C. iv. 32. 26.)

7. Actions.—The subject of actions is treated of fully in the sixth and following Titles of the Fourth Book, and it is only neces-

his own things, i.e. in this case the burden of proof is on him. In each case the standard is the care which the person sought to be made liable takes about his own things. All responsibility for culpa is thus set under two heads of diligence, and in the same way there are two corresponding heads of negligence; and negligence has a distinguishing mark added to it in the term crassa, as opposed to slight (minima), when it is meant that the person spoken of has not used in the case in question the care he habitually employs in matters that affect him.

The higher degree of diligence, that of a bonus paterfamilias, was required, or, in other words, the negligence from which liability would arise need not be crassa, or, in other words, the culpa causing liability might be levis and levis in abstracto, in the following set of cases: 1. Where the person responsible got the benefit of a contract, as, for example, when he borrowed a thing for his own use (commodatum). 2. When both parties were interested in the obligation being carried out, but there was no joint interest in the thing, as, for example, mortgagor and mortgagee (Tit. 14. 4), vendor and vendee (D. xviii. 6. 3), letter and hirer (D. xix. 2. 25. 7). 3. In case of agents (negotiorum gestores) (Tit. 27. 1).

Only the lower degree of diligence, that quantum in suis rebus, was required, or, in other words, the negligence from which liability would arise must be crassa, or, in other words, the culpa causing liability might be lata or levis in concreto, in the following cases: 1. When the other person to the contract got the benefit from it, as in a contract of deposit, the depositary is only liable for crassa negligentia, and it must be proved that he has not used the quantum in suis rebus diligentia. (D. xvi. 3. 32.) 2. When both parties to the contract have a common interest in the thing as to which the question of diligence or negligence arises, as partners, the husband in the management of the dotal estate, where he is a sort of partner (D. xxiii. 3. 17. pr.), co-heirs and co-legatees (D. x. 2. 25. 16). 3. Involuntary parties to a quasi contract, like tutors and curators (D. xxvii. 3. 1. pr.).

6. Interest, mora.—When a person bound by a contract delayed to execute it, and this delay (mora) was of such a kind that culpa ^{negligentia} could be imputed to him, he was subjected to something more than the necessity of fulfilling the contract, and especially he was in most cases liable to pay interest (usurae). (D. xxii. 1. 7.) But interest was not ordinarily payable on debts except by express agreement. By the Twelve Tables there was fixed a legal maximum of 12 per cent. per annum, or 1 per cent. per month, centesimae usurae. It was afterwards reduced to 6 per cent., and by the lex Genucia (B.C. 341) interest was declared illegal. During the Republic, however, it was again recognised, and the maximum once more rose to 12 per cent. Justinian fixed a maximum varying according to circumstances from 12 to 4 per cent. (C. iv. 32. 26.)

7. Actions.—The subject of actions is treated of fully in the sixth and following Titles of the Fourth Book, and it is only necessary here to notice generally that part of the subject which has to do with the enforcement of obligations, and especially of contracts. As an obligation was constituted a legal tie by having an action attached to it, it is necessary to know by what kind of action different obligations were enforced, and in almost every case the Institutes couple the mention of the kind of action attached with the mention of each kind of obligation. The main distinction to be now referred to is that between condictiones and bonae fidei actions, corresponding with the distinction noticed in Tit. 13. 1 between civil and praetorian obligations.

The older actions of law (see Introd. sec. 94) afforded a very cumbrous machinery for the enforcement of rights against particular persons; and the lex Silia (510 A.U.C.) introduced a new kind of action, termed condictio, for the enforcement of obligations binding a person to give the absolute ownership (dare) of a certain sum of money (pecunia certa); and the lex Calpurnia (520 A.U.C.) extended its application to a similar demand of any certain thing, as a definite quantity of oil or wheat. (GAI. iv. 19.) In process of time the condictio was made to embrace uncertain as well as certain things, and was applied to obligations binding a person facere, and hence Gaius says, appellantur in personam actiones, quibus dari fieri oportere intendimus, conductiones (iv. 5). The condictio certi, i.e. the condictio in its older and stricter form, came thus to be opposed to the condictio incerti. We may therefore say that contracts dare or facere were enforced by a condictio, and that this condictio was certi or incerti according as a definite or indefinite thing was demanded. Whenever the contract was to do a thing, it was always uncertain, because the law could not compel the person bound by the contract to do the thing, but only to give a pecuniary equivalent; and what sum of money was a reasonable compensation for the loss sustained by the thing not being done was left to be settled by the judge. The formula of the condictio certi ran si paret eum [decem aureos] dare oportere. (See paragr. 1. of next Title.) That of the condictio incerti ran quicquid paret eum dare facere oportere. The condictio incerti, besides its general name, received also a special name derived from the kind of contract it was brought to enforce, or from the subject-matter of the contract itself. For instance the action brought to enforce a stipulation for an uncertain sum was termed an actio ex stipulatu. When the condictio was certi, it was generally spoken of simply as condictio. Sometimes, however, though more rarely, it too received a special name, as the condictio certi brought to enforce a mutuum sometimes termed the actio mutui.

There was another class of actions in which a wide discretion was given to the judge, who was to take all the circumstances of the case into his consideration, and pronounce the sentence which equity demanded, thus acting as an arbiter rather than as a iudex. Such actions were termed bonae fidei actiones, and the obligations, to sary here to notice generally that part of the subject which has to do with the enforcement of obligations, and especially of contracts. As an obligation was constituted a legal tie by having an action attached to it, it is necessary to know by what kind of action different obligations were enforced, and in almost every case the Institutes couple the mention of the kind of action attached with the mention of each kind of obligation. The main distinction to be now referred to is that between condictiones and bonae fidei actions, corresponding with the distinction noticed in Tit. 13. 1 between civil and praetorian obligations.

The older actions of law (see Introd. sec. 94) afforded a very cumbrous machinery for the enforcement of rights against particular persons; and the lex Silia (510 A.U.C.) introduced a new kind of action, termed condictio, for the enforcement of obligations binding a person to give the absolute ownership (dare) of a certain sum of money (pecunia certa); and the lex Calpurnia (520 A.U.C.) extended its application to a similar demand of any certain thing, as a definite quantity of oil or wheat. (GAI. IV. 19.) In process of time the condictio was made to embrace uncertain as well as certain things, and was applied to obligations binding a person facere, and hence Gaius says, appellantur in personam actiones, quibus dari fieri oportere intendimus, conductiones (IV. 5). The condictio certi, i.e. the condictio in its older and stricter form, came thus to be opposed to the condictio incerti. We may therefore say that contracts dare or facere were enforced by a condictio, and that this condictio was certi or incerti according as a definite or indefinite thing was demanded. Whenever the contract was to do a thing, it was always uncertain, because the law could not compel the person bound by the contract to do the thing, but only to give a pecuniary equivalent; and what sum of money was a reasonable compensation for the loss sustained by the thing not being done was left to be settled by the judge. The formula of the condictio certi ran si paret eum [decem aureos] dare oportere. (See paragr. 1. of next Title.) That of the condictio incerti ran quicquid paret eum dare facere oportere. The condictio incerti, besides its general name, received also a special name derived from the kind of contract it was brought to enforce, or from the subject matter of the contract itself. For instance the action brought to enforce a stipulation for an uncertain sum was termed an actio ex stipulatu. When the condictio was certi, it was generally spoken of simply as condictio. Sometimes, however, though more rarely, it too received a special name, as the condictio certi brought to enforce a mutuum sometimes termed the actio mutui.

There was another class of actions in which a wide discretion was given to the judge, who was to take all the circumstances of the case into his consideration, and pronounce the sentence which equity demanded, thus acting as an arbiter rather than as a judeex. Such actions were termed, bonae fidei actiones, and the obligations, to

Pig
P P

Ke

Multiseu
 1/2 inch, only with 1 2/3 inch of the long to be 1/2 inch 1/2 inch in the
 - 1/2 inch

The contract of mutuum was a contract of loan, where not the thing lent, but an equivalent, was to be returned. The obligation to return this equivalent arose on and by the delivery of the thing

enforce which they were given, were termed bonæ fidei obligationes. The right to have this equitable consideration of the whole case was inherent in the nature of the obligation, i.e. the action brought to enforce any of the bonæ fidei obligationes was always bonæ fidei. All actions instituted by the prætorian law were of this description. There was thus an opposition made between condictiones which were stricti juris, derived from the civil law, and in which the judge was confined within the limits of the formula, and these bonæ fidei actiones. Among the bonæ fidei actiones we shall find several mentioned in the following Titles of this Book, as, for instance, the action ex emptio, ex vendito, ex locato, ex conducto, mandati, depositi, pro socio, &c. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 28.) The bonæ fidei action given by the prætor to enforce innominate contracts was almost always one specially adapted to meet the facts of the particular case, and it received the name of the actio in factum præscriptis verbis. The formula was drawn up to meet the facts of the particular case (in factum), and this was done by placing in the demonstratio a short statement of these facts (præscriptis verbis). (See Introd. sec. 106.)

TIT. XIV. QUIBUS MODIS RE CONTRAHITUR OBLIGATIO.

Re contrahitur obligatio veluti mutui datione. Mutui autem obligatio in his rebus consistit, quæ pondere, numero mensurave constant, veluti vino, oleo, frumento, pecunia numerata, ære, argento, auro, quas res aut numerando aut metiendo aut adpendendo in hoc damus, ut accipientium fiant et quandoque nobis non eadem res, sed aliæ ejusdem nature et qualitatis reddantur. Unde etiam mutuum appellatum sit, quia ita a me tibi datur, ut ex meo tuum fiat. Ex eo contracta nascitur actio, quæ vocatur condictio.

An obligation is contracted re, as, for example, by giving a mutuum. This always consists of things which may be weighed, numbered, or measured, as wine, oil, corn, coin, brass, silver, or gold. In giving these things by number, measure, or weight, we so give them that they may become the property of those who receive them. And identical things lent are not returned, but only others of the same nature and quality; and hence the term mutuum, because what I give, from being mine, becomes yours. From this contract arises the action termed condictio.

GAI. iii. 90; D. xii. 1. pr. 1, 2.

Obligations were said to be contracted re when the actual receipt of a thing under certain conditions imposed the necessity of fulfilling those conditions. Four kinds of contracts came under this head, all of which are noticed in this Title, viz. those named mutuum, commodatum, depositum, and pignus. By the contract of mutuum the property in the thing delivered passed to the receiver; by that of pignus the recipient acquired possession; in contracts of commodatum and depositum the recipient was only in possession. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr. note.)

The contract of mutuum was a contract of loan, where not the thing lent, but an equivalent, was to be returned. The obligation to return this equivalent arose on and by the delivery of the thing

Pign
Fid
pign

Re

Mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

mutuum

lent. It is scarcely necessary to say that the derivation from ex meo tuum is quite erroneous. Things which were of such a nature that they could be replaced by equal quantities and qualities are termed, in barbarous Latin, fungibiles, because mutua vice funguntur (D. xii. 1. 6), they replace and represent each other: thus a bushel of wheat is said to be a res fungibilis, a particular picture is not. The distinction is much better expressed by saying that the classes of things which can represent each other are considered in genere, those which cannot are considered in specie. (See Introd. sec. 55.) If the person who lends the bushel of wheat receives in return a bushel of equally good wheat, consisting of grains totally different from those he lent, it is the same to him as if the identical grains were restored; the wheat may be considered in genere; not so with the picture, which can only be considered in specie. But it is to be observed that it is the intention of the parties, not the nature of the thing, that makes the thing considered in genere rather than in specie. A person might lend a picture, and only require that a picture of some sort, whether the same picture or another, should be given in return to him, in which case the picture would be considered in genere; or a person might require the identical grains of wheat to be returned, and then the wheat would be considered in specie. A thing lent in a mutuum was always considered in genere, so that whenever it was the intention of the parties that the loan should be a mutuum, it was also their intention that the thing lent should be considered in genere.

It was by the contract of mutuum that money was generally lent, and so we are told in Bk. iv. Tit. 7. 7, that persons who lent money (mutuas pecunias) to filiifamiliarum were deprived by the senatusconsultum Macedonianum of all power to recover the debt.

The action for recovering the equivalent would be a condictio certi, as the equivalent was necessarily something fixed and determined on. In this case the condictio received the name of condictio ex mutuo, or sometimes actio mutui, but as it was always certi, it very seldom was termed anything but condictio, and perhaps the term actio mutui (C. vii. 35. 5) would not have been used in the time of strict legal language.

Is quoque, qui non debitum accepit ab eo, qui per errorem solvit, pro obligatur: daturque agenti contra eum propter repetitionem condicticia actio; nam proinde ei condici potest 'si paret eum dare oportere,' ac si mutuum accepisset. Unde pupillus, si ei sine tutoris auctoritate non debitum per errorem datum est, non tenetur indebiti condictione, non magis quam mutui datione. Sed hæc species obligationis non videtur ex contractu consistere, cum is, qui solvendi animo dat, magis distrahere

1. A person, also, who receives a payment which is not due to him, and which is made by mistake, is bound re; and the plaintiff may have against him an actio condicticia to recover what he has paid. For the condictio 'Si paret eum dare oportere,' may be brought against him, exactly as if he had received a mutuum. Thus a pupil, to whom a payment has been made by mistake without the authorisation of his tutor, is not subject to a condictio indebiti, any more than he would be by the gift of a mutuum. This species

his condictio
non venit in p. mutui solutio Re

pupil

lent. It is scarcely necessary to say that the derivation from ex meo tuum is quite erroneous. Things which were of such a nature that they could be replaced by equal quantities and qualities are termed, in barbarous Latin, fungibiles, because mutua vice funguntur (D. xii. 1. 6), they replace and represent each other: thus a bushel of wheat is said to be a res fungibilis, a particular picture is not. The distinction is much better expressed by saying that the classes of things which can represent each other are considered in genere, those which cannot are considered in specie. (See Introd. sec. 55.) If the person who lends the bushel of wheat receives in return a bushel of equally good wheat, consisting of grains totally different from those he lent, it is the same to him as if the identical grains were restored; the wheat may be considered in genere; not so with the picture, which can only be considered in specie. But it is to be observed that it is the intention of the parties, not the nature of the thing, that makes the thing considered in genere rather than in specie. A person might lend a picture, and only require that a picture of some sort, whether the same picture or another, should be given in return to him, in which case the picture would be considered in genere; or a person might require the identical grains of wheat to be returned, and then the wheat would be considered in specie. A thing lent in a mutuum was always considered in genere, so that whenever it was the intention of the parties that the loan should be a mutuum, it was also their intention that the thing lent should be considered in genere.

It was by the contract of mutuum that money was generally lent, and so we are told in Bk. iv. Tit. 7. 7, that persons who lent money (mutuas pecunias) to filiifamiliarum were deprived by the senatusconsultum Macedonianum of all power to recover the debt.

The action for recovering the equivalent would be a condictio certi, as the equivalent was necessarily something fixed and determined on. In this case the condictio received the name of condictio ex mutuo, or sometimes actio mutui, but as it was always certi, it very seldom was termed anything but condictio, and perhaps the term actio mutui (C. vii. 35. 5) would not have been used in the time of strict legal language.

de condictio Is quoque, qui non debitum accepit ab eo, qui per errorem solvit, re obligatur: daturque agenti contra eum propter repetitionem condicticia actio; nam proinde ei condici potest 'si paret cum dare oportere,' ac si mutuum accepisset. Unde pupillus, si ei sine tutoris auctoritate non debitum per errorem datum est, non tenetur indebiti conductione, non magis quam mutui datione. Sed hæc species obligationis non videtur ex contractu consistere, cum is, qui solvendi animo dat, magis distrahere

1. A person, also, who receives a payment which is not due to him, and which is made by mistake, is bound re; and the plaintiff may have against him an actio condicticia to recover what he has paid. For the condictio 'Si paret cum dare oportere,' may be brought against him, exactly as if he had received a mutuum. Thus a pupil, to whom a payment has been made by mistake without the authorisation of his tutor, is not subject to a condictio indebiti, any more than he would be by the gift of a mutuum. This species

de condictio
Is quoque, qui non debitum accepit ab eo, qui per errorem solvit, re obligatur: daturque agenti contra eum propter repetitionem condicticia actio; nam proinde ei condici potest 'si paret cum dare oportere,' ac si mutuum accepisset.

pupil

voluit negotium quam contrahere.

of obligation, however, does not seem to arise from a contract, since he, who gives in order to acquit himself of something due from him, intends rather to dissolve than to make a contract.

GAI. iii. 91.

In this case it is the law that imposes certain conditions, and not the intention of the parties, and therefore the obligation arises quasi ex contractu, under which head it is, indeed, subsequently placed. (Tit. 27. 6.) A pupil could not be bound without the consent of his tutor. If, therefore, without the consent of his tutor, a loan was made him, he was not bound to repay it, or if money not due to him was paid him, he was not bound to refund it. (See Bk. i. Tit. 21. pr.)

2. Item is, cui res aliqua utenda datur, id est commodatur, re obligatur et tenetur commodati actione. Sed is ab eo, qui mutuum accepit, longo distat: namque non ita res datur, ut ejus fiat, et ob id de ea re ipsa restituenda tenetur. Et is quidem, qui mutuum accepit, si quolibet fortuito casu, quod accepit, amiserit, veluti incendio, ruina, naufragio aut latronum hostiumve incursu, nihilo minus obligatus permanet. At is, qui utendum accepit, sane quidem exactam diligentiam custodiendæ rei præstare jubetur nec sufficit ei, tantum diligentiam adhibuisse, quantum suis rebus adhibere solitus est, si modo alius diligentior poterit eam rem custodire: sed propter majorem vim majoresve casus non tenetur, si modo non hujus culpa is casus intervenierit: alioquin si id, quod tibi commodatum est, peregre ferre tecum malueris et vel incursu hostium prædonumve vel naufragio amiseris, dubium non est, quin de restituenda ea re tenearis. Commodata autem res tunc propria intelligitur, si nulla mercede accepta vel constituta res tibi utenda data est. Alioquin mercede interveniente locatus tibi usus rei videtur: gratuitum enim debet esse commodatum.

2. A person, too, to whom a thing is given as a commodatum, i.e. is given that he may make use of it, is bound re, and is subject to the actio commodati. But there is a wide difference between him and a person who has received a mutuum; for the thing is not given him so that it may become his property, and he therefore is bound to restore the identical thing he received. And, again, he who has received a mutuum, if by any accident, as fire, the fall of a building, shipwreck, the attack of thieves or enemies, he loses what he received, still remains bound. But he who has received a thing lent for his use, is indeed bound to employ the utmost diligence in keeping and preserving it; nor will it suffice that he should take the same care of it, which he was accustomed to take of his own property, if it appears that a more careful person might have preserved it in safety; but he has not to answer for loss occasioned by superior force, or extraordinary accident, provided the accident is not due to any fault of his. If, however, you take with you on a journey the thing lent you to make use of, and you lose it by the attack of enemies or robbers, or by shipwreck, you are undoubtedly bound to restore it. A thing is properly said to be commodatum, when you are permitted to enjoy the use of it without any recompense being given or agreed on; for, if there is any recompense, the contract is that of locatio, as a thing, to be a commodatum, must be lent gratuitously.

voluit negotium quam contrahere.

of obligation, however, does not seem to arise from a contract, since he, who gives in order to acquit himself of something due from him, intends rather to dissolve than to make a contract.

GAI. iii. 91.

In this case it is the law that imposes certain conditions, and not the intention of the parties, and therefore the obligation arises quasi ex contractu, under which head it is, indeed, subsequently placed. (Tit. 27. 6.) A pupil could not be bound without the consent of his tutor. If, therefore, without the consent of his tutor, a loan was made him, he was not bound to repay it, or if money not due to him was paid him, he was not bound to refund it. (See Bk. i. Tit. 21. pr.)

2. Item is, cui res aliqua utenda datur, id est commodatur, re obligatur et tenetur commodati actione. Sed is ab eo, qui mutuum accepit, longe distat: namque non ita res datur, ut ejus fiat, et ob id de ea re ipsa restituenda tenetur. Et is quidem, qui mutuum accepit, si quolibet fortuito casu, quod accepit, amiserit, veluti incendio, ruina, naufragio aut latronum hostiumve incursu, nihilo minus obligatus permanet. At is, qui utendum accepit, sane quidem exactam diligentiam custodiendæ rei præstare jubetur nec sufficit ei, tantum diligentiam adhibuisse, quantum suis rebus adhibere solitus est, si modo alius diligentior poterit eam rem custodire: sed propter majorem vim majoresve casus non tenetur, si modo non hujus culpa is casus intervenierit: alioquin si id, quod tibi commodatum est, peregre ferre tecum malueris et vel incursu hostium prædonumve vel naufragio amiseris, dubium non est, quin de restituenda ea re tenearis. Commodata autem res tunc proprie intelligitur, si nulla mercede accepta vel constituta res tibi utenda data est. Alioquin mercede interveniente locutus tibi usus rei videtur: gratuitum enim debet esse commodatum.

2. A person, too, to whom a thing is given as a commodatum, i.e. is given that he may make use of it, is bound re, and is subject to the actio commodati. But there is a wide difference between him and a person who has received a mutuum; for the thing is not given him so that it may become his property, and he therefore is bound to restore the identical thing he received. And, again, he who has received a mutuum, if by any accident, as fire, the fall of a building, shipwreck, the attack of thieves or enemies, he loses what he received, still remains bound. But he who has received a thing lent for his use, is indeed bound to employ the utmost diligence in keeping and preserving it; nor will it suffice that he should take the same care of it, which he was accustomed to take of his own property, if it appears that a more careful person might have preserved it in safety; but he has not to answer for loss occasioned by superior force, or extraordinary accident, provided the accident is not due to any fault of his. If, however, you take with you on a journey the thing lent you to make use of, and you lose it by the attack of enemies or robbers, or by shipwreck, you are undoubtedly bound to restore it. A thing is properly said to be commodatum, when you are permitted to enjoy the use of it without any recompense being given or agreed on; for, if there is any recompense, the contract is that of locatio, as a thing, to be a commodatum, must be lent gratuitously.

As the advantage is, in almost every case, entirely on the side of the receiver of the commodatum, he was bound to take every care of it, or, as Gaius says, as great care as the most diligent paterfamilias takes of his own property. (D. xiii. 6. 18. pr.)

To use the technical phrase, it was 'essential' to the commodatum that it should be gratuitous. Things incident to a contract may be essential to it, i.e. necessarily belonging; natural, i.e. belonging in the absence of express agreement to the contrary; or accidental, i.e. belonging only by express agreement.

The commodatum gave rise to the actio commodati, which was either directa or contraria; by the actio commodati directa, the commodatus made the receiver of the commodatum restore the thing lent, after the receiver had had it in his possession for the time agreed on (for he could not reclaim it before), or made him pay for any loss accruing through his fault. By the actio commodati contraria, the receiver of the commodatum obtained from the commodans compensation for any extraordinary expenses which the preservation of the thing had entailed, or for any losses occasioned by the fault of the commodatus. The actio was, in the former case, termed directa, because it proceeded from what was a necessary part of the execution of the contract, viz. the thing lent being put in the possession of the receiver, while the actio contraria only arose from a thing which might happen or not, viz. there being some extraordinary expense, or some fault on the part of the commodatus. (See D. xiii. 6. 17. 1.) All the actions arising out of contracts re, except the condictio ex mutuo, were bonae fidei. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 28.)

3. Præterea et is, apud quem res aliqua deponitur, re obligatur et actione depositi, quæ et ipso de ea re, quam accepit, restituenda tenetur. Sed is ex eo solo tenetur, si quid dolo commiserit, culpe autem nomine, id est desidie atque negligentie, non tenetur: itaque securus est, qui parum diligenter custoditam rem furto amisit, quin, qui negligenti amico rem custodiendam tradidit, suæ facilitati id imputare debet.

3. A person, again, with whom a thing is deposited, is bound re, and is subject to the actio depositi, by which he is bound to give back the identical thing which he received. But he is only answerable if he is guilty of fraud, and not for a mere fault, such as carelessness or negligence; and he cannot, therefore, be called to account if the thing deposited, being carelessly kept, is stolen. For he who commits his property to the care of a negligent friend, should impute the loss to his own want of caution.

D. xlv. 7. 1. 5.

Here the benefit is entirely on the side of the person who commits the thing to the care of one who receives it gratuitously. The latter, therefore, unless he specially agrees to be answerable for the thing entrusted to him, or himself offers to take care of it (D. xiii. 6. 5. 2), is not liable for its loss or deterioration, if he is not guilty of dishonesty, or of such gross neglect as amounts to dishonesty. He has, however, no right to make use of the thing, and would be guilty of theft if he did (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. 6); and as it is

As the advantage is, in almost every case, entirely on the side of the receiver of the commodatum, he was bound to take every care of it, or, as Gaius says, as great care as the most diligent paterfamilias takes of his own property. (D. xiii. 6. 18. pr.)

To use the technical phrase, it was 'essential' to the commodatum that it should be gratuitous. Things incident to a contract may be essential to it, i.e. necessarily belonging; natural, i.e. belonging in the absence of express agreement to the contrary; or accidental, i.e. belonging only by express agreement.

The commodatum gave rise to the actio commodati, which was either directa or contraria; by the actio commodati directa, the commodatus made the receiver of the commodatum restore the thing lent, after the receiver had had it in his possession for the time agreed on (for he could not reclaim it before), or made him pay for any loss accruing through his fault. By the actio commodati contraria, the receiver of the commodatum obtained from the commodans compensation for any extraordinary expenses which the preservation of the thing had entailed, or for any losses occasioned by the fault of the commodatus. The actio was, in the former case, termed directa, because it proceeded from what was a necessary part of the execution of the contract, viz. the thing lent being put in the possession of the receiver, while the actio contraria only arose from a thing which might happen or not, viz. there being some extraordinary expense, or some fault on the part of the commodatus. (See D. xiii. 6. 17. 1.) All the actions arising out of contracts re, except the condictio ex mutuo, were bonae fidei. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 28.)

3. Præterea et is, apud quem res aliqua deponitur, re obligatur et actione depositi, quæ et ipso de ea re, quam accepit, restituenda tenetur. Sed is ex eo solo tenetur, si quid dolo commiserit, culpe autem nomine, id est desidie atque negligentie, non tenetur: itaque securus est, qui parum diligenter custoditam rem furto amisit, quin, qui negligenti amico rem custodiendam tradidit, suæ facilitati id imputare debet.

3. A person, again, with whom a thing is deposited, is bound re, and is subject to the actio depositi, by which he is bound to give back the identical thing which he received. But he is only answerable if he is guilty of fraud, and not for a mere fault, such as carelessness or negligence; and he cannot, therefore, be called to account if the thing deposited, being carelessly kept, is stolen. For he who commits his property to the care of a negligent friend, should impute the loss to his own want of caution.

D. xlv. 7. 1. 5.

Here the benefit is entirely on the side of the person who commits the thing to the care of one who receives it gratuitously. The latter, therefore, unless he specially agrees to be answerable for the thing entrusted to him, or himself offers to take care of it (D. xiii. 6. 5. 2), is not liable for its loss or deterioration, if he is not guilty of dishonesty, or of such gross neglect as amounts to dishonesty. He has, however, no right to make use of the thing, and would be guilty of theft if he did (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. 6); and as it is deposited for the benefit of the person depositing it, that person can reclaim it when he pleases, and need not, like the commodans, wait for the expiration of the time agreed on.

The depositum gave rise to the actio depositi, which was directa or contraria, upon the same principle as the actio commodati. The depositary was entitled to be recompensed for every expense incurred, and to compensation for every loss occasioned by the fault of the deponens, however light that fault might be. If the depositary had voluntarily offered to receive the deposit, he too would be answerable for loss occasioned by a culpa levis, i.e. a slight fault, as opposed to culpa lata, gross negligence. If a deposit was rendered necessary by circumstances of unforeseen and sudden misfortune, as a shipwreck or fire, and if the depositary who had received the thing denied he had received it, double the value of the thing could be recovered. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 23.)

4. Creditor quoque, qui pignus accepit, re obligatur, qui et ipse de ea ipsa re, quam accepit, restituenda tenetur actione pignoratitia. Sed quia pignus utriusque gratia datur, et debitoris, quo magis ei pecunia crederetur, et creditoris, quo magis ei in tuto sit creditum, placuit sufficere, quod ad eam rem custodiendam, exactam diligentiam adhibere: quam si praestiterit et aliquo fortuito casu rem amiserit, securum esse nec impediri creditum potere.

4. A creditor also, who has received a pledge, is bound re, for he is obliged to restore the thing he has received, by the actio pignoratitia. But, inasmuch as a pledge is given for the benefit of both parties, of the debtor that he may borrow more easily, and of the creditor that repayment may be better secured, it has been decided that it will suffice if the creditor employs his utmost diligence in keeping the thing pledged; but if, notwithstanding this care, he has lost it by some accident, the creditor is not accountable for it, and he is not prohibited from suing for his debt.

D. xlv. 7. 1. 6; D. xiii. 7. 18. 1.

The oldest form of the contract of pledge was that of manuipatio, or absolute sale of the thing subject to a contract of fiducia or agreement for redemption. There were so many things to which manuipatio was considered inapplicable, that the more simple contract of pignus quite superseded this manuipatio contracta fiducia. A further simplification of the contract of pledge was the hypotheca, in which the thing pledged remained with the pledger. The manuipatio, it may be observed, transferred both the property and possession of the thing pledged; the pignus gave the possession to the creditor, but left the property in the thing with the debtor; the hypotheca left both the property and the possession with the debtor. (See note at end of Bk. ii. Tit. 5.) The right of the creditor over the thing pledged or hypothecated was protected by the actio quasi-Serviana (see Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 7), by which the creditor recovered the thing pledged if lost out of his possession, and got possession of the thing hypothecated.

The text seems to draw a distinction between the position of the creditor and that of the recipient of a commodatum, in regard to the degree of responsibility for negligence. But practically they

Actio Pign

actio pignoratitia
actio pignoratitia
actio pignoratitia

I Manuipatio

II Pignus

III Hypotheca

actio quasi-Serviana
actio quasi-Serviana
actio quasi-Serviana

deposited for the benefit of the person depositing it, that person can reclaim it when he pleases, and need not, like the commodans, wait for the expiration of the time agreed on.

The depositum gave rise to the actio depositi, which was directa or contraria, upon the same principle as the actio commodati. The depositary was entitled to be recompensed for every expense incurred, and to compensation for every loss occasioned by the fault of the deponens, however light that fault might be. If the depositary had voluntarily offered to receive the deposit, he too would be answerable for loss occasioned by a culpa levis, i.e. a slight fault, as opposed to culpa lata, gross negligence. If a deposit was rendered necessary by circumstances of unforeseen and sudden misfortune, as a shipwreck or fire, and if the depositary who had received the thing denied he had received it, double the value of the thing could be recovered. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 23.)

4. Creditor quoque, qui pignus accepit, re obligatur, qui et ipse de ea ipsa re, quam accepit, restituenda tenetur actione pignoratitia. Sed quia pignus utriusque gratia datur, et debitoris, quo magis ei pecunia crederetur, et creditoris, quo magis ei in tuto sit creditum, placuit sufficere, quod ad eam rem custodiendam, exactam diligentiam adhibere: quam si praestiterit et aliquo fortuito casu rem amiserit, securum esse nec impediri creditum potere.

4. A creditor also, who has received a pledge, is bound re, for he is obliged to restore the thing he has received, by the actio pignoratitia. But, inasmuch as a pledge is given for the benefit of both parties, of the debtor that he may borrow more easily, and of the creditor that repayment may be better secured, it has been decided that it will suffice if the creditor employs his utmost diligence in keeping the thing pledged; but if, notwithstanding this care, he has lost it by some accident, the creditor is not accountable for it, and he is not prohibited from suing for his debt.

D. xlv. 7. 1. 6; D. xiii. 7. 18. 1.

The oldest form of the contract of pledge was that of manuipatio, or absolute sale of the thing subject to a contract of fiducia or agreement for redemption. There were so many things to which manuipatio was considered inapplicable, that the more simple contract of pignus quite superseded this manuipatio contracta fiducia. A further simplification of the contract of pledge was the hypotheca, in which the thing pledged remained with the pledger. The manuipatio, it may be observed, transferred both the property and possession of the thing pledged; the pignus gave the possession to the creditor, but left the property in the thing with the debtor; the hypotheca left both the property and the possession with the debtor. (See note at end of Bk. ii. Tit. 5.) The right of the creditor over the thing pledged or hypothecated was protected by the actio quasi-Serviana (see Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 7), by which the creditor recovered the thing pledged if lost out of his possession, and got possession of the thing hypothecated.

The text seems to draw a distinction between the position of the creditor and that of the recipient of a commodatum, in regard to the degree of responsibility for negligence. But practically they

Actio Pign

actio pignoratitia
actio pignoratitia
actio pignoratitia

I Manuipatio

II Pignus

III Hypotheca

actio quasi-Serviana
actio quasi-Serviana
actio quasi-Serviana

were on the same footing. The creditor, like the receiver of a commodatum, could not make use of the thing placed in his possession; and although he could without agreement take them as against the principal of his claim (C. iv. 24. 1), it was only by an agreement, expressed or understood, that the creditor could take the fruits of the thing pledged by way of interest (D. xx. 1. 11. 1; D. xx. 2. 8).

Creditor and debtor are terms used more widely in Roman law than in our own. Every one who possessed a personal right against another was termed a creditor; and every one who owed the satisfaction of a claim, or was the subject of a personal right, was a debitor.

From the contract of pignus sprang the actio pignoratitia, which was directa when used by the debtor to constrain the creditor to give back the thing pledged if the debt had been paid, or to pay over the surplus if the thing pledged had been sold, and produced more than was due for the debt, or to obtain compensation from him for any injury to the thing pledged, arising through his fault. The actio pignoratitia was contraria when used by the creditor to make the debtor reimburse him for all expenses incurred in keeping the thing safe, or compensate him for all injuries sustained by the thing pledged through the fault of the debtor (D. xiii. 7. 31); or, again, to compensate him if the thing pledged proved to be in reality not the property of the debtor, and was claimed by the real owner. Until it was claimed, the fact that it belonged to another did not prevent a thing being made the subject of a contract of pignus, and the creditor was as much bound to restore it to the debtor, if the sum due was paid, as if it had really been the debtor's property.

II Verbis

TIT. XV. DE VERBORUM OBLIGATIONE.

Verbis obligatio contrahitur ex interrogatione et responsione, cum quid dari fieri nobis stipulamur. Ex qua due proficiuntur actiones, tam condictio, si certa sit stipulatio, quam ex stipulatu, si incerta. Que hoc nomine inde utitur, quia stipulum apud veteres firmum appellabatur, forte a stipite descendens.

An obligation verbis is contracted by means of a question and an answer, when we stipulate that anything shall be given to or done for us. It gives rise to two actions the condictio, when the stipulation is certain, and the actio ex stipulatu, when it is uncertain. The term stipulation is derived from stipulum, a word employed by the ancients to mean 'firm,' and coming perhaps from stipes, the trunk of a tree.

D. xlv. 7. 1. 7; D. xii. 1. 24.

The stipulatio was, properly speaking, not a contract, but a means of making a contract, a solemn form giving legal validity to an agreement. This form consisted of a question and answer, and it was the question only which was, properly speaking, the stipu-

were on the same footing. The creditor, like the receiver of a commodatum, could not make use of the thing placed in his possession; and although he could without agreement take them as against the principal of his claim (C. iv. 24. 1), it was only by an agreement, expressed or understood, that the creditor could take the fruits of the thing pledged by way of interest (D. xx. 1. 11. 1; D. xx. 2. 8).

Creditor and debtor are terms used more widely in Roman law than in our own. Every one who possessed a personal right against another was termed a creditor; and every one who owed the satisfaction of a claim, or was the subject of a personal right, was a debitor.

From the contract of pignus sprang the actio pignoratitia, which was directa when used by the debtor to constrain the creditor to give back the thing pledged if the debt had been paid, or to pay over the surplus if the thing pledged had been sold, and produced more than was due for the debt, or to obtain compensation from him for any injury to the thing pledged, arising through his fault. The actio pignoratitia was contraria when used by the creditor to make the debtor reimburse him for all expenses incurred in keeping the thing safe, or compensate him for all injuries sustained by the thing pledged through the fault of the debtor (D. xiii. 7. 31); or, again, to compensate him if the thing pledged proved to be in reality not the property of the debtor, and was claimed by the real owner. Until it was claimed, the fact that it belonged to another did not prevent a thing being made the subject of a contract of pignus, and the creditor was as much bound to restore it to the debtor, if the sum due was paid, as if it had really been the debtor's property.

II Verbis

TIT. XV. DE VERBORUM OBLIGATIONE.

Verbis obligatio contrahitur ex interrogatione et responsione, cum quid dari fieri nobis stipulamur. Ex qua due proficiuntur actiones, tam condictio, si certa sit stipulatio, quam ex stipulatu, si incerta. Que hoc nomine inde utitur, quia stipulum apud veteres firmum appellabatur, forte a stipite descendens.

An obligation verbis is contracted by means of a question and an answer, when we stipulate that anything shall be given to or done for us. It gives rise to two actions the condictio, when the stipulation is certain, and the actio ex stipulatu, when it is uncertain. The term stipulation is derived from stipulum, a word employed by the ancients to mean 'firm,' and coming perhaps from stipes, the trunk of a tree.

D. xlv. 7. 1. 7; D. xii. 1. 24.

The stipulatio was, properly speaking, not a contract, but a means of making a contract, a solemn form giving legal validity to an agreement. This form consisted of a question and answer, and it was the question only which was, properly speaking, the stipu-

latio, it being only by an extension of the term that the word was applied to the whole mode of contracting, and that the answerer as well as the questioner was said, as in paragr. 1, to be one of the stipulantes. Like all the old forms of obligation, this formula only bound one party, viz., the maker of the promise. The promissor had himself to become the stipulator, and to receive in his turn a promise, if he wished to secure reciprocal rights. Obligations may be divided according as they are unilateral and bind one party only, or bilateral and bind both parties. A stipulation gave rise to a unilateral obligation.

Festus derives stipulatio from stips, coined money; and Isidorus from stipula, a straw. 'Veteres enim, quando sibi aliquid promittebant, stipulam tenentes frangebant, quem iterum iungentes, sponsiones suas apnoscebant.' (Orig. v. 24. Quoted by Ortolan.) Stipes and stipulum are a more probable source of the derivation of the word.

When the stipulation was for something certain, as for a fixed sum of money, or for wine of a specified kind, it was enforced by the condictio certi; when for something uncertain, as for wine of a good quality, for something to be done or left undone, by the condictio incerti. The term actio ex stipulata is sometimes used to denote the condictio, whether certi or incerti, but it is more usually employed to denote the condictio incerti, as when the condictio was certi, that is, was employed in its proper form, it generally received no other name than condictio. The action arising on a stipulation of any kind was always stricti juris.

The stipulation was not the only contract made by going through a solemn form of words. By the dictio dotis the wife and her ascendants bound themselves to give the dos to the husband; and by a promise accompanied by an oath (jurata promissio liberti) the freedman bound himself to render his services to his patron. In neither of these cases, however, was a previous question a necessary part of the form.

1. In hac re olim talia verba tradita fuerunt: 'Spondes? spondeo, Promittis? promitto, Fidepromittis? fidepromitto, Fidejubes? fidejubeo, Dabis? dabo, Facies? faciam.' Utrum autem Latina an Græca vel quæcunque lingua stipulatio concipiatur, nihil interest, scilicet si uterque stipulantium intellectum hujus lingue habeat: nec necesse est eadem lingua utrumque uti, sed sufficit congruenter ad interrogatum respondere: quin etiam duo Græci Latina lingua obligationem contrahere possunt. Sed hæc sollemnia verba olim quidem in usu fuerunt: postea autem Leoniana constitutio lata est, quæ, sollemnitate verborum sublata, sensum et consonantem intellectum

1. Formerly the words used in making this kind of contract were as follows:—Spondes? do you engage yourself? Spondeo, I do engage myself. Promittis? do you promise? Promitto, I do promise. Fidepromittis? do you promise on your good faith? Fidepromitto, I do promise on my good faith. Fidejubes? do you make yourself fidejussor? Fidejubeo, I do make myself fidejussor. Dabis? will you give? Dabo, I will give. Facies? will you do? Faciam, I will do.' And it is immaterial whether the stipulation is in Latin or in Greek, or in any other language, so that the parties understand it; nor is it necessary that the same language should be used by each person, but it is sufficient if the

latio, it being only by an extension of the term that the word was applied to the whole mode of contracting, and that the answerer as well as the questioner was said, as in paragr. 1, to be one of the stipulantes. Like all the old forms of obligation, this formula only bound one party, viz., the maker of the promise. The promissor had himself to become the stipulator, and to receive in his turn a promise, if he wished to secure reciprocal rights. Obligations may be divided according as they are unilateral and bind one party only, or bilateral and bind both parties. A stipulation gave rise to a unilateral obligation.

Pestus derives stipulatio from stips, coined money; and Isidorus from stipula, a straw. 'Veteres enim, quando sibi aliquid promittebant, stipulam tenentes frangebant, quem iterum iungentes, sponsiones suas approposcebant.' (Orig. v. 24. Quoted by Ortolan.) Stipes and stipulum are a more probable source of the derivation of the word.

When the stipulation was for something certain, as for a fixed sum of money, or for wine of a specified kind, it was enforced by the condictio certi; when for something uncertain, as for wine of a good quality, for something to be done or left undone, by the condictio incerti. The term actio ex stipulatu is sometimes used to denote the condictio, whether certi or incerti, but it is more usually employed to denote the condictio incerti, as when the condictio was certi, that is, was employed in its proper form, it generally received no other name than condictio. The action arising on a stipulation of any kind was always stricti juris.

The stipulation was not the only contract made by going through a solemn form of words. By the dictio dotis the wife and her ascendants bound themselves to give the dos to the husband; and by a promise accompanied by an oath (jurata promissio liberti) the freedman bound himself to render his services to his patron. In neither of these cases, however, was a previous question a necessary part of the form.

1. In hac re olim talia verba tradita fuerunt: 'Spondes? spondeo, Promittis? fidepromittis? fidepromitto, Fidejubes? fidejubeo, Dabis? dabo, Facies? faciam.' Utrum autem Latina an Græca vel quæcunque lingua stipulatio concipiatur, nihil interest, scilicet si uterque stipulantium intellectum hujus lingue habent: nec necesse est eadem lingua utrumque uti, sed sufficit congruenter ad interrogatum respondere: quin etiam duo Græci Latina lingua obligationem contrahere possunt. Sed hæc sollemnia verba olim quidem in usu fuerunt: postea autem Leoniana constitutio lata est, quæ, sollemnitate verborum sublata, sensum et consonantem intellectum

1. Formerly the words used in making this kind of contract were as follows:—Spondes? do you engage yourself? Spondeo, I do engage myself. Promittis? do you promise? Promitto, I do promise. Fidepromittis? do you promise on your good faith? Fidepromitto, I do promise on my good faith. Fidejubes? do you make yourself fidejussor? Fidejubeo, I do make myself fidejussor. Dabis? will you give? Dabo, I will give. Facies? will you do? Faciam, I will do.' And it is immaterial whether the stipulation is in Latin or in Greek, or in any other language, so that the parties understand it; nor is it necessary that the same language should be used by each person, but it is sufficient if the answer agrees with the question. So two Greeks may contract in Latin. Anciently indeed it was necessary to use the formal words just mentioned, but the constitution of the Emperor Leo was afterwards enacted, which, removing formalities of expression, requires only that the parties understand one another and mean the same thing, no matter what words they use.

ab utraque parte solum desiderat, licet quibuscumque verbis expressus est.

GAL. iii. 92, 93; D. xlv. 1. 1. 6; C. viii. 37. 10.

Spondes? spondeo was the form exclusively proper when both parties were Roman citizens; adeo propria civium Romanorum est, ut ne quidem in Græcū sermonem per interpretationem proprie transferri possit, quamvis dicatur a Græca voce figurata esse. (GAL. iii. 93.)

This constitution of Leo was published A.D. 472. (C. viii. 37. 10.)

2. Omnis stipulatio aut pure aut in diem aut sub condicione fit. Pure veluti 'quinque aureos dare spondes?' Idque confestim peti potest. In diem, cum adjecto die, quo pecunia solvatur, stipulatio fit: veluti 'decem aureos primis kalendis Martiis dare spondes?' Id autem, quod in diem stipulamur, statim quidem debetur, sed peti priusquam dies veniat, non potest: ac ne eo quidem ipso die, in quem stipulatio facta est, peti potest, quia totus ille dies arbitrio solventis tribui debet. Neque enim certum est, eo die, in quem promissum est, datum non esse, priusquam is prætereat.

2. Every stipulation is made simply, or with the introduction of a particular time, or conditionally. Simply, as, 'Do you engage to give five aurei?' in this case the money may be instantly demanded. With the introduction of a particular time, as when a day is mentioned on which the money is to be paid, as, 'Do you engage to give me ten aurei on the first of the calends of March?' That which we stipulate to give at a particular time becomes immediately due, but cannot be demanded before the day arrives, nor can it even be demanded on that day, for the whole of the day is allowed to the debtor for payment, as it is never certain that the payment has not been made on the day appointed until that day is at an end.

D. xlv. 1. 46. pr.; D. 1. 16. 213.

In the technical language of the jurists, Ubi pure quis stipulatus fuerit, et cessit et venit dies; ubi in diem, cessit dies, sed nondum venit. (See note on Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 20.) If the stipulation was made pure, the interest in the thing stipulated for passed at once to the stipulator (cessit dies), and he could at once demand to have it (venit dies), giving, of course, sufficient time for the debtor to fulfil his obligation. If the stipulation was made in diem, the interest in the thing stipulated for passed at once to the stipulator, but he could not demand it until the dies was past.

There is a distinction in the respective effects of a stipulation in diem and of a conditional stipulation that deserves notice. When a stipulation was made in diem, the promise was binding ab utraque parte solum desiderat, licet quibuscumque verbis expressus est.

answer agrees with the question. So two Greeks may contract in Latin. Anciently indeed it was necessary to use the formal words just mentioned, but the constitution of the Emperor Leo was afterwards enacted, which, removing formalities of expression, requires only that the parties understand one another and mean the same thing, no matter what words they use.

GAI. iii. 92, 93; D. xlv. 1. 1. 6; C. viii. 37. 10.

Spondes? spondeo was the form exclusively proper when both parties were Roman citizens; adeo propria civium Romanorum est, ut ne quidem in Græcum sermonem per interpretationem proprie transferri possit, quamvis dicatur a Græca voce figurata esse. (GAI. iii. 93.)

This constitution of Leo was published A.D. 472. (C. viii. 37. 10.)

2. Omnis stipulatio aut pure aut in diem aut sub condicione fit. Pure veluti 'quinque aureos dare spondes?' Idque confestim peti potest. In diem, cum adjecto die, quo pecunia solvatur, stipulatio fit: veluti 'decem aureos primis kalendis Martiis dare spondes?' Id autem, quod in diem stipulamur, statim quidem debetur, sed peti priusquam dies veniat, non potest: ac ne eo quidem ipso die, in quem stipulatio facta est, peti potest, quia totus ille dies arbitrio solventis tribui debet. Neque enim certum est, eo die, in quem promissum est, datum non esse, priusquam is prætereat.

2. Every stipulation is made simply, or with the introduction of a particular time, or conditionally. Simply, as, 'Do you engage to give five aurei?' in this case the money may be instantly demanded. With the introduction of a particular time, as when a day is mentioned on which the money is to be paid, as, 'Do you engage to give me ten aurei on the first of the calends of March?' That which we stipulate to give at a particular time becomes immediately due, but cannot be demanded before the day arrives, nor can it even be demanded on that day, for the whole of the day is allowed to the debtor for payment, as it is never certain that the payment has not been made on the day appointed until that day is at an end.

D. xlv. 1. 46. pr.; D. l. 16. 213.

In the technical language of the jurists, Ubi pure quis stipulatus fuerit, et cessit et venit dies; ubi in diem, cessit dies, sed nondum venit. (See note on Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 20.) If the stipulation was made pure, the interest in the thing stipulated for passed at once to the stipulator (cessit dies), and he could at once demand to have it (venit dies), giving, of course, sufficient time for the debtor to fulfil his obligation. If the stipulation was made in diem, the interest in the thing stipulated for passed at once to the stipulator, but he could not demand it until the dies was past.

There is a distinction in the respective effects of a stipulation in diem and of a conditional stipulation that deserves notice. When a stipulation was made in diem, the promise was binding at once, and the debt was already due, and therefore if any part of the debt was paid before the day named, it could not be recovered; whereas, when a stipulation was made with a condition, if anything was paid before the condition was accomplished, it could be recovered back, because, until the condition was fulfilled, the stipulator had no interest in the thing stipulated for (nondum cessit dies). (See paragr. 4.)

3. At si ita stipuleris 'decem aureos annuos, quoad vivam, dare spondes?' et pure facta obligatio intellegitur et perpetuatur, quia ad tempus deberi non potest. Sed heres petendo pacti exceptione submovebitur.

3. But, if you stipulate thus, 'Do you engage to give me ten aurei annually, as long as I live?' the obligation is understood to be made simply, and is perpetual; for a debt cannot be due for a time only; but the heir, if he demands payment, will be repelled by the exceptio pacti.

D. xlv. 1. 56. 4.

Lapse of time was not, in the Roman law, a mode by which a debt could be extinguished. Consequently, if it was owed, it was owed for ever: but this technicality was prevented from working any injustice by the plea referred to in the text, namely that there was an agreement to the contrary, or by that of fraud. (Plane post tempus stipulator vel pacti conventi, vel doli mali exceptione submoveri poterit. (D. xlv. 7. 44. 1.) If, however, a similar gift had been given as a legacy, the right to receive would be extinguished ipso jure by the death of the legatee.

4. Sub condicione stipulatio fit, cum in aliquem casum differtur obligatio, ut, si aliquid factum fuerit aut non fuerit, stipulatio committatur, veluti 'si Titius consul factus fuerit, quinque aureos dare spondes?' Si quis ita stipuletur 'si in Capitolium non ascendero, dare spondes?' perinde erit, ac si stipulatus esset, cum morietur dari sibi. Ex condicionali stipulatione tantum spes est debitum iri, eamque ipsam spem transmittimus, si, priusquam condicio existat, mors nobis contigerit.

4. A stipulation is made conditionally, when the obligation is postponed to the happening of some uncertain event, so that it takes effect if such a thing happens or does not happen, as, for instance, 'Do you engage to give five aurei, if Titius is made consul?' Such a stipulation as 'Do you engage to give five aurei if I do not go up to the Capitol?' is in effect the same as if the stipulation had been, that five aurei should be given to the stipulator at the time of his death. From a conditional stipulation there arises only a hope that the thing will become due; and this hope we transmit to our heirs, if we die before the condition is accomplished.

D. xlv. 1. 115. 1; D. l. 16. 54.

The heir or legatee, it may be remembered (see Bk. ii. Tit. 14. 9), who died before the condition was accomplished, did not transmit any interest in the inheritance or legacy to his heirs, whereas the stipulator did, as we learn from the text, transmit to his heirs the hope that the thing stipulated for would be one day due to him (spes debitum iri). The reason of this difference is, at once, and the debt was already due, and therefore if any part of the debt was paid before the day named, it could not be recovered; whereas, when a stipulation was made with a condition, if anything was paid before the condition was accomplished, it could be recovered back, because, until the condition was fulfilled, the stipulator had no interest in the thing stipulated for (nondum cessit dies). (See paragr. 4.)

3. At si ita stipuleris 'decem aureos annuos, quoad vivam, dare spondes?' et pure facta obligatio intellegitur et perpetuatur, quia ad tempus deberi non potest. Sed heres petendo pacti exceptione submovebitur.

3. But, if you stipulate thus, 'Do you engage to give me ten aurei annually, as long as I live?' the obligation is understood to be made simply, and is perpetual; for a debt cannot be due for a time only; but the heir, if he demands payment, will be repelled by the exceptio pacti.

D. xlv. 1. 56. 4.

Lapse of time was not, in the Roman law, a mode by which a debt could be extinguished. Consequently, if it was owed, it was owed for ever: but this technicality was prevented from working any injustice by the plea referred to in the text, namely that there was an agreement to the contrary, or by that of fraud. Plane post tempus stipulator vel pacti conventi, vel doli mali exceptione submoveri poterit. (D. xlv. 7. 44. 1.) If, however, a similar gift had been given as a legacy, the right to receive would be extinguished ipso jure by the death of the legatee.

4. Sub condicione stipulatio fit, cum in aliquem casum differtur obligatio, ut, si aliquid factum fuerit aut non fuerit, stipulatio committatur, veluti 'si Titius consul factus fuerit, quinque aureos dare spondes?' Si quis ita stipuletur 'si in Capitolium non ascendero, dare spondes?' perinde erit, ac si stipulatus esset, cum morietur dari sibi. Ex condicionali stipulatione tantum spes est debitum iri, eamque ipsam spem transmittimus, si, priusquam condicio existat, mors nobis contigerit.

4. A stipulation is made conditionally, when the obligation is postponed to the happening of some uncertain event, so that it takes effect if such a thing happens or does not happen, as, for instance, 'Do you engage to give five aurei, if Titius is made consul?' Such a stipulation as 'Do you engage to give five aurei if I do not go up to the Capitol?' is in effect the same as if the stipulation had been, that five aurei should be given to the stipulator at the time of his death. From a conditional stipulation there arises only a hope that the thing will become due; and this hope we transmit to our heirs, if we die before the condition is accomplished.

D. xlv. 1. 115. 1; D. l. 16. 54.

The heir or legatee, it may be remembered (see Bk. ii. Tit. 14. 9), who died before the condition was accomplished, did not transmit any interest in the inheritance or legacy to his heirs, whereas the stipulator did, as we learn from the text, transmit to his heirs the hope that the thing stipulated for would be one day due to him (spes debitum iri). The reason of this difference is, that the testamentary dispositions were considered to be made to the heir or legatee personally.

If the promissor attempted to defeat the condition by preventing its being fulfilled, he was treated as if he had promised pure, and the thing could be demanded from him at once.

It is here said that a promise to pay, if a person did not do a thing, was a promise to pay when he died. There was, however, this difference: the promissor was certain to die, and therefore the stipulation, with the words cum moriar, was really made in diem; whereas it was not certain whether the promissor would or would not go up to the Capitol, and, therefore, the stipulation with the words si in Capitolium non ascendero was made sub conditione.

5. Loca etiam inseri stipulationi solent, veluti 'Carthagine dare spondes?' Quæ stipulatio licet pure fieri videatur, tamen re ipsa habet tempus injectum, quo promissor utatur ad pecuniam Carthagine dandam. Et ideo si quis ita Romæ stipuletur 'Hodie Carthagine dare spondes?' inutilis erit stipulatio, cum impossibilis sit repromissio.

5. It is customary to insert a particular place in a stipulation, as, for instance, 'Do you engage to give me at Carthage?' and this stipulation, although it appears to be made simply, yet necessarily implies a delay sufficient to enable the person who promises to pay the money at Carthage. And therefore, if any one at Rome stipulates thus, 'Do you engage to give to me this day at Carthage?' the stipulation is useless, because the fulfilment of the promise is impossible.

D. xlv. 1. 73. pr.; D. xiii. 4. 2. 6.

6. Condiciones, quæ ad præteritum vel ad præsens tempus referuntur, aut statim infirmant obligationem aut omnino non differunt: veluti 'si Titius consul fuit, vel si Mævius vivit, dare spondes?' Nam si ea ita non sunt, nihil valet stipulatio: sin autem ita se habent, statim valet. Quæ enim per rerum naturam certa sunt, non morantur obligationem, licet apud nos incerta sint.

6. Conditions, which relate to time present or past, either instantly make the obligation void, or do not suspend it in any way; as, for instance, 'If Titius has been consul, or if Mævius is alive, do you engage to give me?' For if the thing mentioned is not really the case, the stipulation is void; if it is the case, the stipulation is immediately valid: since things certain, if regarded in themselves, although uncertain as far as our knowledge is concerned, do not delay the formation of the obligation.

D. xlv. 1. 100; D. xii. 1. 37-39.

7. Non solum res in stipulatum deduci possunt, sed etiam facta: ut si stipulemur fieri aliquid vel non fieri. Et in hujusmodi stipulationibus optimum erit pœnam subicere, ne quantitas stipulationis in incerto sit ac necesse sit actori probare, quid ejus intersit. Itaque si quis, ut fiat aliquid, stipuletur, ita adjici pœna debet: 'si ita factum non erit, tum pœnæ nomine decem aureos dare spondes?' Sed si quædam fieri, quædam non fieri una eademque conceptione stipuletur, clausula erit hujus-

7. Not only things, but acts, may be the subject of a stipulation: as when we stipulate, that something shall, or shall not, be done. And, in these stipulations, it will be best to subjoin a penalty, lest the amount included in the stipulation should be uncertain, and the plaintiff should therefore be obliged to prove how great his interest is. Therefore, if any one stipulates that something shall be done, a penalty ought to be added as thus: 'If the thing is not done, do you engage to give ten aurei by way of penalty?'

that the testamentary dispositions were considered to be made to the heir or legatee personally.

If the promissor attempted to defeat the condition by preventing its being fulfilled, he was treated as if he had promised pure, and the thing could be demanded from him at once.

It is here said that a promise to pay, if a person did not do a thing, was a promise to pay when he died. There was, however, this difference: the promissor was certain to die, and therefore the stipulation, with the words cum moriar, was really made in diem; whereas it was not certain whether the promissor would or would not go up to the Capitol, and, therefore, the stipulation with the words si in Capitolium non ascendero was made sub conditione.

5. Loca etiam inseri stipulationi solent, veluti 'Carthagine dare spondes?' Quæ stipulatio licet pure fieri videatur, tamen re ipsa habet tempus injectum, quo promissor utatur ad pecuniam Carthagine dandam. Et ideo si quis ita Romæ stipuletur 'Hodie Carthagine dare spondes?' inutilis erit stipulatio, cum impossibilis sit represso.

5. It is customary to insert a particular place in a stipulation, as, for instance, 'Do you engage to give me at Carthage?' and this stipulation, although it appears to be made simply, yet necessarily implies a delay sufficient to enable the person who promises to pay the money at Carthage. And therefore, if any one at Rome stipulates thus, 'Do you engage to give to me this day at Carthage?' the stipulation is useless, because the fulfilment of the promise is impossible.

D. xlv. 1. 73. pr.; D. xiii. 4. 2. 6.

6. Condiciones, quæ ad præteritum vel ad præsens tempus referuntur, aut statim infirmant obligationem aut omnino non differunt: veluti 'si Titius consul fuit, vel si Mævius vivit, dare spondes?' Nam si ea ita non sunt, nihil valet stipulatio: sin autem ita se habent, statim valet. Quæ enim per rerum naturam certa sunt, non morantur obligationem, licet apud nos incerta sint.

6. Conditions, which relate to time present or past, either instantly make the obligation void, or do not suspend it in any way; as, for instance, 'If Titius has been consul, or if Mævius is alive, do you engage to give me?' For if the thing mentioned is not really the case, the stipulation is void; if it is the case, the stipulation is immediately valid: since things certain, if regarded in themselves, although uncertain as far as our knowledge is concerned, do not delay the formation of the obligation.

D. xlv. 1. 100; D. xii. 1. 37-39.

7. Non solum res in stipulatum deduci possunt, sed etiam facta: ut si stipulemur fieri aliquid vel non fieri. Et in hujusmodi stipulationibus optimum erit penam subjicere, ne quantitas stipulationis in incerto sit ac necesse sit actori probare, quid ejus intersit. Itaque si quis, ut fiat aliquid, stipuletur, ita adjici pœna debet: 'si ita factum non erit, tum pœnæ nomine decem aureos dare spondes?' Sed si quædam fieri, quædam non fieri una eademque conceptione stipuletur, clausula erit hujus-

7. Not only things, but acts, may be the subject of a stipulation: as when we stipulate, that something shall, or shall not, be done. And, in these stipulations, it will be best to subjoin a penalty, lest the amount included in the stipulation should be uncertain, and the plaintiff should therefore be obliged to prove how great his interest is. Therefore, if any one stipulates that something shall be done, a penalty ought to be added as thus: 'If the thing is not done, do you engage to give ten aurei by way of penalty?'

modi adjicienda: 'si adversus ea factum erit, sive quid ita factum non erit, tunc pœnæ nomine decem aureos dare spondes?'

But, if by one single question a stipulation is made, that some things shall be done, and that other things shall not be done, there ought to be added some such clause as this: 'If anything is done contrary to what is agreed on, or anything agreed on is not done, then do you engage to give ten aurei by way of penalty?'

D. xlv. 1. 137. 7; D. xlv. 5. 11.

TIT. XVI. DE DUOBUS REIS STIPULANDI ET PROMITTENDI.

Et stipulandi et promittendi duo pluresve rei fieri possunt. Stipulandi ita, si post omnium interrogationem promissor respondeat 'spondeo.' Ut puta cum duobus separatim stipulantibus ita promissor respondeat 'utrique vestrum dare spondeo:' nam si prius Titio sponderit, deinde alio interrogante spondeat, alia atque alia erit obligatio nec creduntur duo rei stipulandi esse. Duo pluresve rei promittendi ita fiunt, (veluti si post Titii interrogationem) 'Mævi, quinque aureos dare spondes? Sei, eosdem quinque aureos dare spondes?' respondeat singuli separatim 'spondeo.'

Two or more persons may be parties together in the stipulation or in the promise. In the stipulation, if, after all have asked the question, the promissor answers 'Spondeo,' 'I engage;' for instance, when, two stipulators having each separately asked the question, the promissor answers, 'I engage to give to each of you.' For if he first answers Titius, and then, on another person putting the same question, he again answers him, there will be two distinct obligations, and not two co-stipulators. Two or more become co-promissors, thus, as if after Titius has put the question: 'Mævius, do you engage to give five aurei? 'Seius, do you engage to give five aurei?' they each separately answer, 'I do engage.'

D. xlv. 2. 4.

The word reus, strictly speaking, signifies the person who is liable, or subject, to a demand, but is used more generally to signify a party to an obligation, whether active or passive: so here we have rei stipulandi, as well as rei promittendi.

It was immaterial whether the interrogation was put and answered in the plural, spondetis? spondemus; or in the singular, spondes? spondeo. (D. xlv. 2. 4.)

It was not only in contracts made verbis that there could be joint creditors and joint debtors. In a commodatum or depositum, for instance, the parties might agree that several persons should be subject to a common obligation, and each be bound for the whole. (D. xlv. 2. 9.)

1. Ex hujusmodi obligationibus et stipulantibus solidum singulis debetur et promittentes singuli in solidum tenentur. In utraque tamen obligatione una res vertitur: et vel alter debitum accipiendo vel alter solvendo omnium perimit obliga-

1. By virtue of such obligations, the whole thing stipulated for is due to each stipulator, and from each promissor. But in each obligation, there is only one thing due, and if either of the joint parties receives the thing due, or gives the thing due, the obligation

modi adjicienda: 'si adversus ea factum erit, sive quid ita factum non erit, tunc pœnæ nomine decem aureos dare spondes?'

But, if by one single question a stipulation is made, that some things shall be done, and that other things shall not be done, there ought to be added some such clause as this: 'If anything is done contrary to what is agreed on, or anything agreed on is not done, then do you engage to give ten aurei by way of penalty?'

D. xlv. 1. 137. 7; D. xlv. 5. 11.

TIT. XVI. DE DUOBUS REIS STIPULANDI ET PROMITTENDI.

Et stipulandi et promittendi duo pluresve rei fieri possunt. Stipulandi ita, si post omnium interrogationem promissor respondeat 'spondeo.' Ut puta cum duobus separatim stipulantibus ita promissor respondeat 'utrique vestrum dare spondeo:' nam si prius Titio sponderit, deinde alio interrogante spondeat, alia atque alia erit obligatio nec creduntur duo rei stipulandi esse. Duo pluresve rei promittendi ita fiunt, (veluti si post Titii interrogationem) 'Mævi, quinque aureos dare spondes? Sei, eosdem quinque aureos dare spondes?' respondeat singuli separatim 'spondeo.'

Two or more persons may be parties together in the stipulation or in the promise. In the stipulation, if, after all have asked the question, the promissor answers 'Spondeo,' 'I engage;' for instance, when, two stipulators having each separately asked the question, the promissor answers, 'I engage to give to each of you.' For if he first answers Titius, and then, on another person putting the same question, he again answers him, there will be two distinct obligations, and not two co-stipulators. Two or more become co-promissors, thus, as if after Titius has put the question: 'Mævius, do you engage to give five aurei? 'Seius, do you engage to give five aurei? 'they each separately answer, 'I do engage.'

D. xlv. 2. 4.

The word reus, strictly speaking, signifies the person who is liable, or subject, to a demand, but is used more generally to signify a party to an obligation, whether active or passive: so here we have rei stipulandi, as well as rei promittendi.

It was not immaterial whether the interrogation was put and answered in the plural, spondetis? spondemus; or in the singular, spondes? spondeo. (D. xlv. 2. 4.)

It was not only in contracts made verbis that there could be joint creditors and joint debtors. In a commodatum or depositum, for instance, the parties might agree that several persons should be subject to a common obligation, and each be bound for the whole. (D. xlv. 2. 9.)

1. Ex hujusmodi obligationibus et stipulantibus solidum singulis debetur et promittentes singuli in solidum tenentur. In utraque tamen obligatione una res vertitur: et vel alter debitum accipiendo vel alter solvendo omnium perimit obliga-

1. By virtue of such obligations, the whole thing stipulated for is due to each stipulator, and from each promissor. But in each obligation, there is only one thing due, and if either of the joint parties receives the thing due, or gives the thing due, the obligation

tionem et omnes liberat.

is at end for all, and all are freed from it.

D. xlv. 2. 2, and 3. 1.

If we look to the thing which was the subject of the contract, we may say, however many were the joint parties, there was but one obligation; while if we look to the persons by or to whom the promise was given, there were as many obligations as there were persons making or receiving the promise. If, therefore, the thing was given, that is, payment or performance made, the obligation was at an end, but the obligation binding on any one might be made to cease, as by the deminutio capitis of one of the co-promissors, without those binding on the others ceasing also. If, indeed, the aid of the law had been called in to enforce the obligation, the position of the parties was different. If one co-stipulator sued the promissor, all the other parties to the stipulation were thereby prevented from suing him; and if one co-promissor was sued, none of the others could be sued, the litis contestatio operating as an extinction of the debt; but under Justinian, when it appeared that there was a deficiency in what had been obtained from the promissor that had been sued, the others might be sued to make up this deficiency. (C. viii. 41. 28.) The co-promissor who had paid all could recover, as a partner, their shares from the others, if there was a partnership between them, and if not, he could recover by paying to the creditor the whole sum, but separating the payment, paying his share absolutely, and paying the rest as the price of having the creditor's actions transferred to him to use against the other co-promissors (beneficium cedendarum actionum); and probably, even if he had not actually made this separation, the prætor would allow him to bring an action against the other co-promissors in which he was feigned to have done it. (D. xxvii. 3. 1. 13.)

2. Ex duobus reis promittendi alius pure, alius in diem vel sub condicione obligari potest: nec impedimento erit dies aut condicio, quo minus ab eo, qui pure obligatus est, petatur.

2. Of two co-promissors, one may engage simply, the other with the introduction of a particular time, or conditionally; and neither the time nor the condition will prevent payment being exacted from the one who binds himself simply.

D. xlv. 2. 7.

TIT. XVII. DE STIPULATIONE SERVORUM.

Servus ex persona domini jus stipulandi habet. Sed hereditas in plerisque personarum defuncti vicem sustinet: ideoque quod servus hereditarius ante aditam hereditatem stipulatur, acquirit hereditati ac per hoc etiam heredi postea facto acquiritur.

A slave derives from the persona of his master the power of making a stipulation. But as the inheritance in most respects represents the persona of the deceased, if a stipulation is made by a slave belonging to the inheritance before the inheritance is entered on,

tionem et omnes liberat.

is at end for all, and all are freed from it.

D. xlv. 2. 2, and 3. 1.

If we look to the thing which was the subject of the contract, we may say, however many were the joint parties, there was but one obligation; while if we look to the persons by or to whom the promise was given, there were as many obligations as there were persons making or receiving the promise. If, therefore, the thing was given, that is, payment or performance made, the obligation was at an end, but the obligation binding on any one might be made to cease, as by the deminutio capitis of one of the co-promissors, without those binding on the others ceasing also. If, indeed, the aid of the law had been called in to enforce the obligation, the position of the parties was different. If one co-stipulator sued the promissor, all the other parties to the stipulation were thereby prevented from suing him; and if one co-promissor was sued, none of the others could be sued, the litis contestatio operating as an extinction of the debt; but under Justinian, when it appeared that there was a deficiency in what had been obtained from the promissor that had been sued, the others might be sued to make up this deficiency. (C. viii. 41. 28.) The co-promissor who had paid all could recover, as a partner, their shares from the others, if there was a partnership between them, and if not, he could recover by paying to the creditor the whole sum, but separating the payment, paying his share absolutely, and paying the rest as the price of having the creditor's actions transferred to him to use against the other co-promissors (beneficium cedendarum actionum); and probably, even if he had not actually made this separation, the prætor would allow him to bring an action against the other co-promissors in which he was feigned to have done it. (D. xxvii. 3. 1. 13.)

2. Ex duobus reis promittendi alius pure, alius in diem vel sub condicione obligari potest: nec impedimento erit dies aut condicio, quo minus ab eo, qui pure obligatus est, petatur.

2. Of two co-promissors, one may engage simply, the other with the introduction of a particular time, or conditionally; and neither the time nor the condition will prevent payment being exacted from the one who binds himself simply.

D. xlv. 2. 7.

TIT. XVII. DE STIPULATIONE SERVORUM.

Servus ex persona domini jus stipulandi habet. Sed hereditas in plerisque personarum defuncti vicem sustinet: ideoque quod servus hereditarius ante aditam hereditatem stipulatur, acquirit hereditati ac per hoc etiam heredi postea facto acquiritur.

A slave derives from the persona of his master the power of making a stipulation. But as the inheritance in most respects represents the persona of the deceased, if a stipulation is made by a slave belonging to the inheritance before the inheritance is entered on, he acquires for the inheritance, and therefore for him who subsequently becomes heir.

D. xli. 1. 84, 61.

A slave had no persona, that is, no capacity of acquiring civil or political rights. But his master, who had such a capacity, could make his own persona speak and act through the slave, who was thus only a channel by which the wishes of the master were expressed. (See Bk. i. Tit. 3. pr. note.) But although a slave could thus engage others for the benefit of his master, by a stipulation, he could not bind his master, and could not, therefore, be the promisor in a stipulation; hence, the text only speaks of the stipulations, and not of the promises, of slaves.

In plerisque personae defuncti vicem sustinet; the inheritance represented the person of the deceased in most things, but there were some things which the slave could not acquire for the inheritance, which he could acquire for a living master: a usufruct, for instance, being always attached to a person, could not be stipulated for by a slave before the inheritance was entered on. (D. xli. 1. 61.)

1. Sive autem domino sive sibi sive conservo suo sive impersonaliter servus stipuletur, domino acquirit. Idem juris est et in liberis, qui in potestate patris sunt, ex quibus causis adquirere possunt.

1. Whether a slave stipulates for his master, or for himself, or for his fellow-slave, or without naming any person for whom he stipulates, he always acquires for his master. It is the same with children in the power of their father, in all cases in which they acquire for him.

D. xlv. 3. 15; D. xlv. 1. 45. pr. and 4.

What is said here of the children in potestate must be taken with all the limitations made necessary by the power they had to acquire a peculium for themselves. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 9.)

2. Sed cum factum in stipulatione continebitur, omnimodo persona stipulantis continetur, veluti si servus stipuletur, ut sibi ire agere liceat: ipse enim tantum prohiberi non debet, non etiam dominus ejus.

2. If it is a licence to do something that is stipulated for, the benefit of the stipulation is personal to the stipulator; for instance, if a slave stipulates that he shall have a right of passage for himself or beasts and vehicles, it is he himself, not his master, who is not to be hindered from passing.

D. xlv. 1. 130.

Even in this case the slave really acquires for the master. It is the master, and not the slave, who could enforce the stipulation by action. Of course this personal licence to cross land is something quite different from a servitude. For a servitude eundi or agendi, stipulated for by the slave, could only be attached to the praedium of the master. (D. xlv. 3. 17.)

he acquires for the inheritance, and therefore for him who subsequently becomes heir.

D. xli. 1. 84, 61.

A slave had no persona, that is, no capacity of acquiring civil or political rights. But his master, who had such a capacity, could make his own persona speak and act through the slave, who was thus only a channel by which the wishes of the master were expressed. (See Bk. i. Tit. 3. pr. note.) But although a slave could thus engage others for the benefit of his master, by a stipulation, he could not bind his master, and could not, therefore, be the promisor in a stipulation; hence, the text only speaks of the stipulations, and not of the promises, of slaves.

In plerisque personae defuncti vicem sustinet; the inheritance represented the person of the deceased in most things, but there were some things which the slave could not acquire for the inheritance, which he could acquire for a living master: a usufruct, for instance, being always attached to a person, could not be stipulated for by a slave before the inheritance was entered on. (D. xli. 1. 61.)

1. Sive autem domino sive sibi sive conservo suo sive impersonaliter servus stipuletur, domino acquirit. Idem juris est et in liberis, qui in potestate patris sunt, ex quibus causis acquirere possunt.

1. Whether a slave stipulates for his master, or for himself, or for his fellow-slave, or without naming any person for whom he stipulates, he always acquires for his master. It is the same with children in the power of their father, in all cases in which they acquire for him.

D. xlv. 3. 15; D. xlv. 1. 45. pr. and 4.

What is said here of the children in potestate must be taken with all the limitations made necessary by the power they had to acquire a peculium for themselves. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 9.)

2. Sod cum factum in stipulatione continebitur, omnimodo persona stipulantis continetur, veluti si servus stipuletur, ut sibi ire agere liceat: ipse enim tantum prohiberi non debet, non etiam dominus ejus.

2. If it is a licence to do something that is stipulated for, the benefit of the stipulation is personal to the stipulator; for instance, if a slave stipulates that he shall have a right of passage for himself or beasts and vehicles, it is he himself, not his master, who is not to be hindered from passing.

D. xlv. 1. 180.

Even in this case the slave really acquires for the master. It is the master, and not the slave, who could enforce the stipulation by action. Of course this personal licence to cross land is something quite different from a servitude. For a servitude eundi or agendi, stipulated for by the slave, could only be attached to the praedium of the master. (D. xlv. 3. 17.)

3. Servus communis stipulando unicuique dominorum pro portione domini acquirit, nisi si unius eorum jussu aut nominatim cui eorum stipulatus est: tunc enim soli ei acquiritur. Quod servus communis stipulatur, si alteri ex dominis adquiri non potest, solidum alteri acquiritur, veluti si res, quam dari stipulatus est, unius domini sit.

3. If a slave held in common by several masters stipulates, he acquires a share for each master according to the proportion which each has in him, unless he stipulates at the command or in the name of any one master, for then the thing stipulated for is acquired solely for that master. And whatever a slave held in common stipulates for, is all acquired for one of his masters, if it is not capable of being acquired for the other; as, for instance, if the thing he has stipulated to be given belongs to one of his masters.

GAL. iii. 167; D. xlv. 3. 7. 1.

TIT. XVIII. DE DIVISIONE STIPULATIONUM.

Stipulationum aliae judiciales sunt, aliae prætoriae, aliae conventionales, aliae communes tam prætoriae quam judiciales.

Stipulations are either judicial, or prætorian, or conventional, or common, that is, both prætorian and judicial.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

The division of stipulations here given is based on the difference of the circumstances in which they are entered into. Sometimes they are the result simply of the will of the parties, sometimes of the direction of a person in authority.

1. Judiciales sunt dumtaxat, quæ a mero iudicis officio proficiuntur: veluti de dolo cautio vel de persequendo servo, qui in fuga est, restituendove pretio.

1. Judicial stipulations are those which proceed exclusively from the office of the judge, such as the giving security against fraud, or the engagement to pursue a fugitive slave, or to pay his price.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.; D. xxx. 69. 5.

Before the magistrate the parties were in jure, before the judeex they were in judicio. (See Introd. sec. 92.) The judeex sometimes ordered that the parties before him should enter into stipulations.

Two instances are here given of stipulations directed by the judeex. The first is the de dolo cautio. This was a stipulation directed for the benefit of a plaintiff, that the sentence given in his favour might be executed, without any attempt at fraud (dolus malus) on the part of the defendant. For instance, if the defendant was ordered to make over the property in a slave, the judeex would direct that he should stipulate that he had done nothing to lessen the value of the slave. Otherwise the slave might be made over to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff's claim be thus nominally satisfied, while it might really be evaded by the defendant wilfully doing the slave some material harm. (D. vi. 1. 20 and 45.)

The other instance given is that of the stipulation de perse-

3. Servus communis stipulando unicuique dominorum pro portione domini acquirit, nisi si unius eorum jussu aut nominatim cui eorum stipulatus est: tunc enim soli ei acquiritur. Quod servus communis stipulatur, si alteri ex dominis adquiri non potest, solidum alteri acquiritur, veluti si res, quam dari stipulatus est, unius domini sit.

3. If a slave held in common by several masters stipulates, he acquires a share for each master according to the proportion which each has in him, unless he stipulates at the command or in the name of any one master, for then the thing stipulated for is acquired solely for that master. And whatever a slave held in common stipulates for, is all acquired for one of his masters, if it is not capable of being acquired for the other; as, for instance, if the thing he has stipulated to be given belongs to one of his masters.

GAL. iii. 167; D. xlv. 3. 7. 1.

TIT. XVIII. DE DIVISIONE STIPULATIONUM.

Stipulationum aliae judiciales sunt, aliae prae toriae, aliae conventionales, aliae communes tam prae toriae quam judiciales.

Stipulations are either judicial, or praetorian, or conventional, or common, that is, both praetorian and judicial.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

The division of stipulations here given is based on the difference of the circumstances in which they are entered into. Sometimes they are the result simply of the will of the parties, sometimes of the direction of a person in authority.

1. Judiciales sunt dumtaxat, quae a mero iudicis officio proficiunt: veluti de dolo cautio vel de persequendo servo, qui in fuga est, restituendove pretio.

1. Judicial stipulations are those which proceed exclusively from the office of the judge, such as the giving security against fraud, or the engagement to pursue a fugitive slave, or to pay his price.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.; D. xxx. 69. 5.

Before the magistrate the parties were in jure, before the judex they were in judicio. (See Introd. sec. 92.) The judex sometimes ordered that the parties before him should enter into stipulations.

Two instances are here given of stipulations directed by the judex. The first is the de dolo cautio. This was a stipulation directed for the benefit of a plaintiff, that the sentence given in his favour might be executed, without any attempt at fraud (dolus malus) on the part of the defendant. For instance, if the defendant was ordered to make over the property in a slave, the judex would direct that he should stipulate that he had done nothing to lessen the value of the slave. Otherwise the slave might be made over to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff's claim be thus nominally satisfied, while it might really be evaded by the defendant wilfully doing the slave some material harm. (D. vi. 1. 20 and 45.)

The other instance given is that of the stipulation de perse-

quando servo qui in fuga est, restituendove pretio. A slave must be supposed to be demanded, and to run away before the decision is given. As the defendant, being the actual possessor, could alone reclaim the slave against third parties, the judez would compel him to engage by stipulation to follow and reclaim him, or to pay his price. If the slave escaped without any fault whatsoever of the defendant, the judge merely directed that the defendant should engage to give up the slave if he came into his power, and to permit the plaintiff to bring an action in the defendant's name for the recovery of the slave from any one who might detain him. (D. iv. 2. 14. 11.)

2. Prætoriae, quæ a mero prætoris officio proficiscuntur, veluti damni infecti vel legatorum. Prætorias autem stipulationes sic exaudiri oportet, ut in his contineantur etiam ædiliæ: nam et hæ ab jurisdictione veniunt.

2. Prætorian stipulations are those which proceed exclusively from the office of the prætor; as the giving security against damnum infectum, or for the payment of legacies. Under prætorian stipulations must be comprehended ædilitian, for these, too, proceed from a magistrate pronouncing the law.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

Damnum infectum est damnum nondum factum quod futurum veremur. (D. xxxix. 2. 2.) Supposing the damnum futurum which a man apprehended were an injury to his premises from the fall of the ill-repaired house of his neighbour, by the strict civil law, if he was to wait till the mischief was done, his neighbour might abandon his property in the fallen house, and the injured man could then obtain no reparation from him. To remedy this, the prætor would, if he saw fit, order the neighbour to give security (cautio damni infecti) to indemnify the person applying, his heirs and successors in title, against any damage that might be done. If this order was not obeyed, the prætor authorised the complainant to enter upon and occupy the premises (in possessionem mittebat); and, finally, if security was still refused, the prætor gave the complainant full possession of the premises, but he was liable to be dispossessed, if within a certain time the original proprietor made compensation and complied with everything enjoined him. (See D. xxxix. 2. 4. 1.)

Legatorum: this was a stipulation binding the heir to pay legacies, when due, which were not yet payable; otherwise the heir might previously have spent and consumed all the inheritance. As in the previous case, the legatee received possession, if sureties were not given. (D. xxxvi. 3. 1. 2.)

A jurisdictione veniunt, that is, come from a magistrate qui jus dicit. Jurisdictio, in its general sense, includes the whole officium of the jus dicens, which is said to be latissimum, for honorum possessionem dare potest, et in possessionem mittere, pupillis non habentibus tutores constituere, judices litigantibus dare. (D. ii. 1. 1.)

quando servo qui in fuga est, restituendove pretio. A slave must be supposed to be demanded, and to run away before the decision is given. As the defendant, being the actual possessor, could alone reclaim the slave against third parties, the judez would compel him to engage by stipulation to follow and reclaim him, or to pay his price. If the slave escaped without any fault whatsoever of the defendant, the judge merely directed that the defendant should engage to give up the slave if he came into his power, and to permit the plaintiff to bring an action in the defendant's name for the recovery of the slave from any one who might detain him. (D. iv. 2. 14. 11.)

2. Prætoriae, quæ a mero prætoris officio proficiscuntur, veluti damni infecti vel legatorum. Prætorias autem stipulationes sic exaudiri oportet, ut in his contineantur etiam ædiliæ: nam et hæ ab jurisdictione veniunt.

2. Prætorian stipulations are those which proceed exclusively from the office of the prætor; as the giving security against damnum infectum, or for the payment of legacies. Under prætorian stipulations must be comprehended ædilitian, for these, too, proceed from a magistrate pronouncing the law.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

Damnum infectum est damnum nondum factum quod futurum veremur. (D. xxxix. 2. 2.) Supposing the damnum futurum which a man apprehended were an injury to his premises from the fall of the ill-repaired house of his neighbour, by the strict civil law, if he was to wait till the mischief was done, his neighbour might abandon his property in the fallen house, and the injured man could then obtain no reparation from him. To remedy this, the prætor would, if he saw fit, order the neighbour to give security (cautio damni infecti) to indemnify the person applying, his heirs and successors in title, against any damage that might be done. If this order was not obeyed, the prætor authorised the complainant to enter upon and occupy the premises (in possessionem mittebat); and, finally, if security was still refused, the prætor gave the complainant full possession of the premises, but he was liable to be dispossessed, if within a certain time the original proprietor made compensation and complied with everything enjoined him. (See D. xxxix. 2. 4. 1.)

Legatorum: this was a stipulation binding the heir to pay legacies, when due, which were not yet payable; otherwise the heir might previously have spent and consumed all the inheritance. As in the previous case, the legatee received possession, if sureties were not given. (D. xxxvi. 3. 1. 2.)

A jurisdictione veniunt, that is, come from a magistrate qui jus dicit. Jurdictio, in its general sense, includes the whole officium of the jus dicens, which is said to be latissimum, for honorum possessionem dare potest, et in possessionem mittere, pupillis non habentibus tutores constituere, judices litigantibus dare. (D. ii. 1. 1.)

3. Conventionales sunt, quæ ex conventione utriusque partis concipiuntur, hoc est neque jussu judicis neque jussu prætoris, sed ex conventione contrahentium. Quarum totidem genera sunt, quot (pæne dixerim) rerum contrahendarum.

3. Conventional stipulations are those which are made by the agreement of parties; that is, neither by the order of a judge nor by that of the prætor, but by the consent of the persons contracting. And of these stipulations there are as many kinds, so to speak, as there are of things to be contracted for.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

4. Communes sunt stipulationes veluti rem salvam fore pupilli: nam et prætor jubet, rem salvam fore pupillo caveri et interdum judex, si aliter expediri hæc res non potest: vel de rato stipulatio.

4. Common stipulations are those, for example, providing for the security of the property of a pupil, for sometimes the prætor, and sometimes, too, when the matter cannot be managed in any other way, the judge, orders security to be given to the pupil for the safeguard of his property, or, again, the stipulation that a thing shall be ratified.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

Communes stipulationes were those sometimes directed by the prætor, sometimes by the judex. They ought properly to have preceded the conventionales.

Mention has already been made of the security a tutor or curator was obliged to give. (Bk. i. Tit. 24. pr.) It was properly given before the tutor entered on his office, and it belonged to the prætor to see that it was given. But if, before it was given, the tutor sued a debtor of the pupil, and the debtor objected that security had not been given, ~~the judge~~, in order that the proceedings might not be put an end to, would direct security to be then given before him.

The stipulation de rato, or rem ratam haberi, was one entered into by a procurator bringing an action in the name of his principal that what he did would be ratified by his principal. It properly belonged to the prætor to direct that this stipulation should be entered into before the litis contestatio (see Intro. sec. 105); but if he omitted to direct this, and there was ground for distrusting the authority of the procurator, the judge would direct that the procurator should bind himself by this stipulation. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 11. 1.)

TIT. XIX. DE INUTILIBUS STIPULATIONIBUS.

Omnis res, quæ dominio nostro subijcitur, in stipulationem deduci potest, si illa mobilis sive soli sit.

Everything, of which we have the property, whether it be moveable or immoveable, may be the subject of a stipulation.

A stipulation is inutilis, i.e. invalid, when it produces no tie binding on the parties to it. It would seem to have been proper

3. Conventionales sunt, quæ ex conventione utriusque partis concipiuntur, hoc est neque jussu iudicis neque jussu prætoris, sed ex conventione contrahentium. Quarum totidem genera sunt, quot (pæne dixerim) rerum contrahendarum.

3. Conventional stipulations are those which are made by the agreement of parties; that is, neither by the order of a judge nor by that of the prætor, but by the consent of the persons contracting. And of these stipulations there are as many kinds, so to speak, as there are of things to be contracted for.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

4. Communes sunt stipulationes veluti rem salvam fore pupilli: nam et prætor jubet, rem salvam fore pupillo caveri et interdum iudex, si aliter expediri hæc res non potest: vel de rato stipulatio.

4. Common stipulations are those, for example, providing for the security of the property of a pupil, for sometimes the prætor, and sometimes, too, when the matter cannot be managed in any other way, the judge, orders security to be given to the pupil for the safeguard of his property, or, again, the stipulation that a thing shall be ratified.

D. xlv. 1. 5. pr.

Communes stipulationes were those sometimes directed by the prætor, sometimes by the iudex. They ought properly to have preceded the conventionales.

Mention has already been made of the security a tutor or curator was obliged to give. (Bk. i. Tit. 24. pr.) It was properly given before the tutor entered on his office, and it belonged to the prætor to see that it was given. But if, before it was given, the tutor sued a debtor of the pupil, and the debtor objected that security had not been given, the judge, in order that the proceedings might not be put an end to, would direct security to be then given before him.

The stipulation de rato, or rem ratam haberi, was one entered into by a procurator bringing an action in the name of his principal that what he did would be ratified by his principal. It properly belonged to the prætor to direct that this stipulation should be entered into before the litis contestatio (see Introd. sec. 105); but if he omitted to direct this, and there was ground for distrusting the authority of the procurator, the judge would direct that the procurator should bind himself by this stipulation. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 11. 1.)

TIT. XIX. DE INUTILIBUS STIPULATIONIBUS.

Omnis res, quæ dominio nostro subjicitur, in stipulationem deduci potest, sive illa mobilis sive soli sit.

Everything, of which we have the property, whether it be moveable or immovable, may be the subject of a stipulation.

A stipulation is inutilis, i.e. invalid, when it produces no tie binding on the parties to it. It would seem to have been proper to have examined here the causes which make contracts of any kind invalid, and not to limit the inquiry to stipulations. But the stipulation was so much the most important kind of contract that it is taken to represent all other kinds. Some few of the causes of invalidity noticed in this Title are peculiar to stipulations, but most are common to all contracts.

Lagrange thus classifies the reasons given in this Title for the invalidity of stipulations: they might be invalid (1) on account of their object (pr., paragr. 1, 2, 22, 24); (2) on account of the persons by whom (paragr. 7, 8, 9, 10, 12), for whom (paragr. 3, 4, 19, 20, 21), or between whom (paragr. 6) they were made; (3) on account of the manner in which they were made (paragr. 5, 17, 18, 23); (4) on account of the time (paragr. 13, 14, 15, 16, 26), or the condition (paragr. 11, 25) subject to which they were made.

1. At si quis rem, quæ in rerum natura non est aut esse non potest, dari stipulatus fuerit, veluti Stichum, qui mortuus sit, quem vivere credebatur, aut hippocentaurum, qui esse non possit, inutilis erit stipulatio.

1. But, if any one stipulates for a thing which does not or cannot exist, as for Stichus, who is dead, but whom he thought to be living, or for a Hippocentaur, which cannot exist, the stipulation is void.

GAI. III. 97.

In such a case no claim could be made for the supposed value of the thing, nor even for a sum promised under a penal clause in case of non-performance. (D. xlv. 1. 69 and 103.)

2. Idem juris est, si rem sacram aut religiosam, quam humani juris esse credebatur, vel publicam, quæ usibus populi perpetuo exposita sit, ut forum vel theatrum, vel liberum hominem, quem servum esse credebatur, vel rem, cujus commercium non habuit, vel rem suam dari quis stipuletur. Nec in pendenti erit stipulatio ob id, quod publica res in privatum deduci et ex libero servus fieri potest et commercium adipisci stipulator potest et res stipulatoris esse desinere potest: sed protinus inutilis est. Item contra, licet initio utiliter res in stipulationem deducta sit, si postea in eorum qua causa, de quibus supra dictum est, sine facto promissoris devenierit, extinguatur stipulatio. Ac ne statim ab initio talis stipulatio valebit 'Lucium Titium, cum servus erit, dare spondes?' et similia, quia natura sui dominio nostro exempta in obligationem deduci nullo modo possunt.

2. It is the same if any one stipulates for a thing sacred or religious, which he thought to be subject to human law, or for a public thing appropriated to the perpetual use of the people, as a forum or theatre, or for a free man whom he thought to be a slave, or for a thing of which he has not the commercium, or for a thing belonging to himself. Nor will the stipulation remain in suspense, because the public thing may become private, the freeman may become a slave, the stipulator may acquire the commercium of the thing, or the thing which now belongs to him may cease to be his; but the stipulation is at once void. So, conversely, although a thing may have been validly stipulated for originally, yet, if it afterwards falls under the class of any of the things before mentioned, without the promisor having caused the change, the stipulation is extinguished. Such a stipulation, too, as the following, is void ab initio. 'Do you promise to give me Lucius Titius, when he shall become a slave?' for that which by its

to have examined here the causes which make contracts of any kind invalid, and not to limit the inquiry to stipulations. But the stipulation was so much the most important kind of contract that it is taken to represent all other kinds. Some few of the causes of invalidity noticed in this Title are peculiar to stipulations, but most are common to all contracts.

Lagrange thus classifies the reasons given in this Title for the invalidity of stipulations: they might be invalid (1) on account of their object (pr., paragr. 1, 2, 22, 24); (2) on account of the persons by whom (paragr. 7, 8, 9, 10, 12), for whom (paragr. 3, 4, 19, 20, 21), or between whom (paragr. 6) they were made; (3) on account of the manner in which they were made (paragr. 5, 17, 18, 23); (4) on account of the time (paragr. 13, 14, 15, 16, 26), or the condition (paragr. 11, 25) subject to which they were made.

1. At si quis rem, quæ in rerum natura non est aut esse non potest, dari stipulatus fuerit, veluti Stichum, qui mortuus sit, quem vivere credebatur, aut hippocentaurum, qui esse non possit, inutilis erit stipulatio.

1. But, if any one stipulates for a thing which does not or cannot exist, as for Stichus, who is dead, but whom he thought to be living, or for a Hippocentaur, which cannot exist, the stipulation is void.

GAI. III. 97.

In such a case no claim could be made for the supposed value of the thing, nor even for a sum promised under a penal clause in case of non-performance. (D. xlv. 1. 69 and 103.)

2. Idem juris est, si rem sacram aut religiosam, quam humani juris esse credebatur, vel publicam, quæ usibus populi perpetuo exposita sit, ut forum vel theatrum, vel liberum hominem, quem servum esse credebatur, vel rem, cujus commercium non habuit, vel rem suam dari quis stipuletur. Nec in pendenti erit stipulatio ob id, quod publica res in privatum deduci et ex libero servus fieri potest et commercium adipisci stipulator potest et res stipulatoris esse desinere potest: sed protinus inutilis est. Item contra, licet initio utiliter res in stipulationem deducta sit, si postea in earum qua causa, de quibus supra dictum est, sine facto promissoris devenerit, extinguatur stipulatio. Ac ne statim ab initio talis stipulatio valebit 'Lucium Titium, cum servus erit, dare spondes?' et similia, quia natura sui dominio nostro exempta in obligationem deduci nullo modo possunt.

2. It is the same if any one stipulates for a thing sacred or religious, which he thought to be subject to human law, or for a public thing appropriated to the perpetual use of the people, as a forum or theatre, or for a free man whom he thought to be a slave, or for a thing of which he has not the commercium, or for a thing belonging to himself. Nor will the stipulation remain in suspense, because the public thing may become private, the freeman may become a slave, the stipulator may acquire the commercium of the thing, or the thing which now belongs to him may cease to be his; but the stipulation is at once void. So, conversely, although a thing may have been validly stipulated for originally, yet, if it afterwards falls under the class of any of the things before mentioned, without the promisor having caused the change, the stipulation is extinguished. Such a stipulation, too, as the following, is void ab initio. 'Do you promise to give me Lucius Titius, when he shall become a slave?' for that which by its nature is not susceptible of ownership cannot in any way be made the subject of an obligation.

GAL. iii. 97; D. xlv. 1. 82. 83. 5.

Cujus commercium non habuit. For instance, if, in the days of Gaius, a peregrinus had stipulated for a fundus Italicus, or if, in the times of the Lower Empire, a heathen had stipulated for a Christian slave. (C. i. 10.) Of course, if the promissor had not the commercium of the particular thing, while the stipulator had it, the promissor was answerable to the stipulator for a breach of contract if he did not fulfil his promise. (D. xlv. 1. 34.)

Vel rem suam. It cannot belong to him more than it does; but he might stipulate for its value, or conditionally for the thing itself if it ceased to belong to him. (D. xlv. 1. 31.)

Extinguitur stipulatio. And if it was once extinguished, no alteration of circumstances would renew it. In perpetuum sublata obligatio restitui non potest. (D. xlv. 3. 98. 8.)

Quam humani juris esse credebatur. In a stipulation it made no difference that the stipulator was really ignorant that there was some character attaching to the object of the stipulation which made the stipulation invalid, as that it was sacred or public. The fact that it was sacred or public invalidated the stipulation, and the stipulator had no further remedy against the promissor. We shall find (Tit. 23. 5) that if a person purchased in ignorance a thing of this nature, he would have a remedy against the seller to indemnify him for the loss he sustained by the purchase.

3. Si quis alium daturum facturumve quid sponderit, non obligabitur, veluti si spondeat, Titium quinque aureos daturum. Quodsi effecturum se, ut Titius daret, sponderit, obligatur.

3. If a man engages that another shall give or do something, he is not bound, as if he engages that Titius shall give five aurei. But if he engages that he will manage that Titius shall give five aurei, he is bound.

D. xlv. 1. 83. pr.

4. Si quis alii, quam cujus juri subjectus sit, stipuletur, nihil agit. Plane solutio etiam in extranei personam conferri potest (veluti si quis ita stipuletur 'mihi aut Seio dare spondes?'), ut obligatio quidem stipulatori adquiratur, solvi tamen Seio etiam invito eo recte possit, ut liberatio ipso jure contingat, sed ille adversus Seium habeat mandati actionem. Quodsi quis sibi et alii, cujus juri subjectus non sit, decem dari aureos stipulatus est, valebit quidem stipulatio: sed utrum totum debetur, quod in stipulationem deductum est, an vero pars dimidia, dubitatum est: sed placet, non plus quam partem dimidiam ei adquiri. Ei, qui tuo juri subjectus est, si sti-

4. If any one stipulates for the benefit of a third person, other than a person in whose power he is, the stipulation is void. But it may be arranged that payment shall be made to a third person, as if a person stipulates thus, 'Do you engage to pay to me or to Seius?' The stipulator alone, in this case, acquires the obligation; but payment may be lawfully made to Seius even against his will; the payer will then by mere force of law be freed from his obligation, while the stipulator will have against Seius an actio mandati. If any one stipulates that ten aurei shall be paid to him and to a third person, other than a person in whose power he is, the stipulation is valid; but it has been doubted whether,

Invalid

a/c of the person

from whom they were

Invalid

a/c of the person

from whom they were

Invalid

a/c of the person

from whom they were

nature is not susceptible of ownership cannot in any way be made the subject of an obligation.

GAL. iii. 97; D. xlv. 1. 82. 83. 5.

Origus commercium non habuit. For instance, if, in the days of Gaius, a peregrinus had stipulated for a fundus Italicus, or if, in the times of the Lower Empire, a heathen had stipulated for a Christian slave. (C. i. 10.) Of course, if the promissor had not the commercium of the particular thing, while the stipulator had it, the promissor was answerable to the stipulator for a breach of contract if he did not fulfil his promise. (D. xlv. 1. 34.)

Vel rem suam. It cannot belong to him more than it does; but he might stipulate for its value, or conditionally for the thing itself if it ceased to belong to him. (D. xlv. 1. 31.)

Extinguitur stipulatio. And if it was once extinguished, no alteration of circumstances would renew it. In perpetuum sublata obligatio restitui non potest. (D. xlv. 3. 98. 8.)

Quam humani juris esse credebatur. In a stipulation it made no difference that the stipulator was really ignorant that there was some character attaching to the object of the stipulation which made the stipulation invalid, as that it was sacred or public. The fact that it was sacred or public invalidated the stipulation, and the stipulator had no further remedy against the promissor. We shall find (Tit. 23. 5) that if a person purchased in ignorance a thing of this nature, he would have a remedy against the seller to indemnify him for the loss he sustained by the purchase.

8. Si quis alium daturum facturumve quid sponderit, non obligabitur, veluti si spondeat, Titium quinque aureos daturum. Quodsi effecturum se, ut Titius daret, sponderit, obligatur.

3. If a man engages that another shall give or do something, he is not bound, as if he engages that Titius shall give five aurei. But if he engages that he will manage that Titius shall give five aurei, he is bound.

D. xlv. 1. 83. pr.

4. Si quis alii, quam cuius juri subjectus sit, stipuletur, nihil agit. Plane solutio etiam in extranei personam conferri potest (veluti si quis ita stipuletur 'mihi aut Seio dare spondes?'), ut obligatio quidem stipulatori adquiratur, solvi tamen Seio etiam invito eo recte possit, ut liberatio ipso jure contingat, sed ille adversus Seium habeat mandati actionem. Quodsi quis sibi et alii, cuius juri subjectus non sit, decem dari aureos stipulatus est, valebit quidem stipulatio: sed utrum totum debetur, quod in stipulationem deductum est, an vero pars dimidia, dubitatum est: sed placet, non plus quam partem dimidiam ei adquiri. Ei, qui tuo juri subjectus est, si sti-

4. If any one stipulates for the benefit of a third person, other than a person in whose power he is, the stipulation is void. But it may be arranged that payment shall be made to a third person, as if a person stipulates thus, 'Do you engage to pay to me or to Seius?' The stipulator alone, in this case, acquires the obligation; but payment may be lawfully made to Seius even against his will; the payer will then by mere force of law be freed from his obligation, while the stipulator will have against Seius an actio mandati. If any one stipulates that ten aurei shall be paid to him and to a third person, other than a person in whose power he is, the stipulation is valid; but it has been doubted whether, pulatus sis, tibi adquiris, quia vox tua tamquam filii sit, sicuti filii vox tamquam tua intellegitur in his rebus, quæ tibi adquiri possunt.

in this case, the whole sum is due to the stipulator, or only half; and it has been decided that only half is due. But, if you stipulate for another, who is in your power, you acquire for yourself; for your words are as the words of your son, and your son's words are as yours, with respect to all things which can be acquired for you.

GAI. iii. 103; D. xlv. 1. 141. 3; D. xlv. 1. 39, 130; D. xxxix. 2. 42.

No one who was not a party to a contract could gain or lose by it. Res inter alios acta aliis neque nocere neque prodesse potest (a maxim not to be found exactly in its present shape, but based on C. vii. 60. 1). And as this was true of all kinds of contracts, so was it specially of stipulations, in which a particular formula had to be spoken, and which could not properly be entered into by any one that was absent. The third person, not being a party to the contract, could have no action to enforce it, and the stipulator could not enforce it because he had no interest in it. If, indeed, he had any interest in it, that is, any legal interest, which of course might happen, a stipulation for another was binding. Si stipulator alii, cum mea interesset, ait Marcellus stipulationem valere. (D. xlv. 1. 38. 20, and see paragr. 20 of this Title.) And when one person wished to stipulate for another, the object might generally be effected by adding a penalty for the non-performance of the promise. A stipulation binding the promissor to give something to Titius, or, if it were not given, to pay a penalty to the stipulator, was binding. It was, indeed, nothing but a conditional contract. In the event of something not happening, which might have happened, a certain benefit was to accrue to the stipulator. (D. xlv. 1. 38. 17.) It is because the thing might have happened that such a penal clause differs in its effects from one made to enforce the performance of a thing physically impossible. (See note on paragr. 1.)

Mihi aut Seio. The third person to whom payment might be thus made at the option of the payee, was said to be solutionis gratia adjectus. (D. xlv. 1. 3. 95. 5.)

Sibi et alii. We learn from Gaius, that the Sabinians were of opinion that the whole sum specified was in this case due to the stipulator. Justinian adopts the contrary opinion. (GAI. iii. 103.)

Every one could stipulate and promise for his heir. Every paterfamilias could stipulate for those under his power and his slaves; every person under power and every slave could stipulate for the paterfamilias or master, and could promise so as to bind the paterfamilias or master, if authorised, directly or indirectly, to do so. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 7.)

In the later law many kinds of stipulations could be made through another person, though this was contrary to the primary notion of a stipulation. For instance, the stipulation 'rem putilli salvam fore' (see Tit. 18. 4) could be made, for a pupil who

pulatus sis, tibi adquiris, quia vox tua tamquam filii sit, sicuti filii vox tamquam tua intellegitur in his rebus, quæ tibi adquiri possunt.

in this case, the whole sum is due to the stipulator, or only half; and it has been decided that only half is due. But, if you stipulate for another, who is in your power, you acquire for yourself; for your words are as the words of your son, and your son's words are as yours, with respect to all things which can be acquired for you.

GAI. iii. 103; D. xlv. 1. 141. 3; D. xlv. 1. 39, 130; D. xxxix. 2. 42.

No one who was not a party to a contract could gain or lose by it. Res inter alios acta aliis neque nocere neque prodesse potest (a maxim not to be found exactly in its present shape, but based on C. vii. 60. 1). And as this was true of all kinds of contracts, so was it specially of stipulations, in which a particular formula had to be spoken, and which could not properly be entered into by any one that was absent. The third person, not being a party to the contract, could have no action to enforce it, and the stipulator could not enforce it because he had no interest in it. If, indeed, he had any interest in it, that is, any legal interest, which of course might happen, a stipulation for another was binding. Si stipuler alii, cum mea interesset, ait Marcellus stipulationem valere. (D. xlv. 1. 38. 20, and see paragr. 20 of this Title.) And when one person wished to stipulate for another, the object might generally be effected by adding a penalty for the non-performance of the promise. A stipulation binding the promissor to give something to Titius, or, if it were not given, to pay a penalty to the stipulator, was binding. It was, indeed, nothing but a conditional contract. In the event of something not happening, which might have happened, a certain benefit was to accrue to the stipulator. (D. xlv. 1. 38. 17.) It is because the thing might have happened that such a penal clause differs in its effects from one made to enforce the performance of a thing physically impossible. (See note on paragr. 1.)

Mihi aut Seio. The third person to whom payment might be thus made at the option of the payee, was said to be solutionis gratia adjectus. (D. xlv. 3. 95. 5.)

Sibi et alii. We learn from Gaius, that the Sabinians were of opinion that the whole sum specified was in this case due to the stipulator. Justinian adopts the contrary opinion. (GAI. iii. 103.)

Every one could stipulate and promise for his heir. Every paterfamilias could stipulate for those under his power and his slaves; every person under power and every slave could stipulate for the paterfamilias or master, and could promise so as to bind the paterfamilias or master, if authorised, directly or indirectly, to do so. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 7.)

In the later law many kinds of stipulations could be made through another person, though this was contrary to the primary notion of a stipulation. For instance, the stipulation 'rem pignori salvam fore' (see Tit. 18. 4) could be made, for a pupil who was infans, or absent, by a public slave, by a person appointed by the prætor, or by a magistrate if the parties came before him. (D. xxvii. 8. 1. 15.)

Invalid for to manner.

*the answer.
is not a free
to the condition.*

5. Præterea inutilis est stipulatio, si quis ad ea, quæ interrogatus erit, non respondeat, veluti si decem aureos a te dari stipuletur, tu quinque promittas, vel contra: aut si ille pure stipuletur, tu sub condicione promittas, vel contra, si modo scilicet id exprimas, id est si cui sub condicione vel in diem stipulanti tu respondeas: 'Præsenti die spondeo.' Nam si hoc solum respondeas 'Promitto,' brevier videris in eandem diem aut condicionem spopondisse: nec enim necesse est in respondendo eadem omnia repeti, quæ stipulator expresserit.

5. A stipulation, again, is void, if the answer does not agree with the demand; as when a person stipulates that ten aurei shall be given him, and you answer five, or conversely. A stipulation is also void, if a person stipulates simply, and you promise conditionally, or conversely; provided only that the disagreement is expressly stated, as if, when a man stipulates conditionally, or for a particular time, you answer, 'I promise for to-day.' But, if you answer only, 'I promise,' you seem in a brief way to agree to the time or condition he proposes. For it is not necessary, that in the answer every word should be repeated which the stipulator expressed.

D. xlv. 1. 1. 3, 4; D. xlv. 1. 134. 1.

Si decem aureos. Ulpian, in the Digest, decides the question the other way. (D. xlv. 1. 1. 4.)

Invalid between them when they were made made with one in your power

6. Item inutilis est stipulatio, si quis ab eo stipuleris, qui juri tuo subjectus est, vel si a te stipuletur. Sed servus quidem non solum domino suo obligari non potest, sed ne alii quidem ulli: filii vero familias aliis obligari possunt.

6. A stipulation is also void if made with one who is in your power, or if such a person stipulates with you. A slave is incapable not only of entering into an obligation with his master, but of binding himself to any other person. But a filiusfamilias can be bound to others by an obligation.

GAI. iii. 104; D. xlv. 7. 14.

The slave could not contract civilly with his master; but the later law recognised that there might be a naturalis obligatio created between them, so that if a master owed anything to a slave in the accounts kept between them, and paid it to the slave after he had been manumitted, the master could not recover it, as he was paying what, by a natural obligation, he was bound to pay. (D. xii. 6. 64.)

The filiusfamilias could bind himself civilly. Filiusfamilias ex omnibus causis tanquam paterfamilias obligatur. (D. xlv. 7. 39.) He could be sued and his person taken in execution, and his peculia could be made available for his creditors; and Justinian permitted him to make a cessio bonorum. (C. vi. 61. 8.) To protect filiifamiliarum, the senatusconsultum Macedonianum was passed, by which money lent to filiifamiliarum could not be recovered from them. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 7. 7.)

Invalid

of the person when they were made

7. Mutum neque stipulari neque promittere posse, palam est. Quod et in surdo receptum est: quia et is,

7. It is evident that a dumb man can neither stipulate nor promise. And this is considered to apply also

*Sum
one*

was infans, or absent, by a public slave, by a person appointed by the prætor, or by a magistrate if the parties came before him. (D. xxvii. 8. 1. 15.)

Invalid for to manner

the answer.

is not a free

to the D. condition

5. Præterea inutilis est stipulatio, si quis ad ea, quæ interrogatus erit, non respondeat, veluti si decem aureos a te dari stipuletur, tu quinque promittas, vel contra: aut si ille pure stipuletur, tu sub condicione promittas, vel contra, si modo scilicet id exprimas, id est si cui sub condicione vel in diem stipulanti tu respondeas: 'Præsenti die spondeo.' Nam si hoc solum respondeas 'Promitto,' brevier videris in eandem diem aut condicionem spocondidisse: nec enim necesse est in respondendo eadem omnia repeti, quæ stipulator expresserit.

5. A stipulation, again, is void, if the answer does not agree with the demand; as when a person stipulates that ten aurei shall be given him, and you answer five, or conversely. A stipulation is also void, if a person stipulates simply, and you promise conditionally, or conversely; provided only that the disagreement is expressly stated, as if, when a man stipulates conditionally, or for a particular time, you answer, 'I promise for to-day.' But, if you answer only, 'I promise,' you seem in a brief way to agree to the time or condition he proposes. For it is not necessary, that in the answer every word should be repeated which the stipulator expressed.

D. xlv. 1. 1. 3, 4; D. xlv. 1. 134. 1.

Si decem aureos. Ulpian, in the Digest, decides the question the other way. (D. xlv. 1. 1. 4.)

Invalid between them where they were made made with each other in the power

6. Item inutilis est stipulatio, si eo stipuleris, qui juri tuo subiectus est, vel si is a te stipuletur. Sed servus quidem non solum domino suo obligari non potest, sed ne alii quidem ulli: filii vero familias aliis obligari possunt.

6. A stipulation is also void if made with one who is in your power, or if such a person stipulates with you. A slave is incapable not only of entering into an obligation with his master, but of binding himself to any other person. But a filiusfamilias can be bound to others by an obligation.

GAI. iii. 104; D. xlv. 7. 14.

The slave could not contract civilly with his master; but the later law recognised that there might be a naturalis obligatio created between them, so that if a master owed anything to a slave in the accounts kept between them, and paid it to the slave after he had been manumitted, the master could not recover it, as he was paying what, by a natural obligation, he was bound to pay. (D. xii. 6. 64.)

The filiusfamilias could bind himself civilly. Filiusfamilias ex omnibus causis tanquam paterfamilias obligatur. (D. xlv. 7. 39.) He could be sued and his person taken in execution, and his peculia could be made available for his creditors; and Justinian permitted him to make a cessio bonorum. (C. vi. 61. 8.) To protect filiifamiliarum, the senatusconsultum Macedonianum was passed, by which money lent to filiifamiliarum could not be recovered from them. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 7. 7.)

Invalid

of the person

when they were made

7. Mutum neque stipulari neque promittere posse, palam est. Quod et in surdo receptum est: quia et is,

7. It is evident that a dumb man can neither stipulate nor promise. And this is considered to apply also

Sum
out

qui stipulatur, verba promittentis et is, qui promittit, verba stipulantis audire debet. Unde apparet, non de eo nos loqui, qui tardius exaudit, sed de eo, qui omnino non exaudit.

to deaf persons, for he who stipulates ought to hear the words of the promissor, and he who promises, the words of the stipulator. Hence it is clear that we are not speaking of a person who hears with difficulty, but of one who cannot hear at all.

GAI. iii. 105; D. xlv. 7. 1. 15.

8. Furiosus nullum negotium gerere potest, quia non intellegit, quid agit.

8. A madman can go through no legal act, because he does not understand what he is doing.

GAI. iii. 106; D. xlv. 7. 1. 12.

During lucid intervals a madman could make valid stipulations or promises, as he could make a will. (Bk. ii. Tit. 12. 1.)

9. Pupillus omne negotium recte gerit: ut tamen, sicubi tutoris auctoritas necessaria sit, adhibeatur tutor, veluti si ipse obligetur: nam alium sibi obligare etiam sine tutoris auctoritate potest.

9. A pupil may go through any legal act, provided that the tutor takes a part in the proceeding in cases where his authorisation is necessary, as, for instance, when the pupil binds himself; for a pupil can bind others to him without the authorisation of his tutor.

GAI. ii. 107.

10. Sed quod diximus de pupillis, utique de his verum est, qui jam aliquem intellectum habent; nam infans et qui infantia proximus est, non multum a furioso distant, quia hujus ætatis pupilli nullum intellectum habent: sed in proximis infantia propter utilitatem eorum benignior juris interpretatio facta est, ut idem juris habeant, quod pubertati proximi. Sed qui in parentis potestate est impubes, nec auctore quidem patre obligatur.

10. This must be understood only of pupils who already have some understanding; for an infant, or one still near to infancy, differs but little from a madman, because pupils of such an age have no understanding at all. But, in order to consult their interest, the law has been construed more favourably to those who are near to infancy, and they are allowed the same rights as those near the age of puberty. But a son in the power of his father, and under the age of puberty, cannot bind himself even if his father authorises him.

GAI. iii. 109; D. xlv. 1. 141. 2.

An infant was properly one qui fieri non potest, a child not yet old enough to speak with understanding of what he said, i.e. who was below the age of seven years. When a child could talk, and began to have some degree of understanding, he was termed infanti proximus. Theophilus, in his paraphrase of this paragraph, says, proximus infanti qualis fuerit qui septimum aut octavum annum agit. He could now pronounce, and in some measure understand, the words of a stipulation, and the law permitted him to do so with the sanction of his tutor in certain cases, such as the acquisition of an inheritance, where his personal intervention was necessary. But the law did not allow him to stipulate except to deaf persons, for he who stipulates ought to hear the words of the promissor, and he who promises, the words of the stipulator. Hence it is clear that we are not speaking of a person who hears with difficulty, but of one who cannot hear at all.

qui stipulatur, verba promittentis et is, qui promittit, verba stipulantis audire debet. Unde apparet, non de eo nos loqui, qui tardius exaudit, sed de eo, qui omnino non exaudit.

GAI. iii. 105; D. xlv. 7. 1. 15.

8. Furiosus nullum negotium gerere potest, quia non intellegit, quid agit.

8. A madman can go through no legal act, because he does not understand what he is doing.

GAI. iii. 106; D. xlv. 7. 1. 12.

During lucid intervals a madman could make valid stipulations or promises, as he could make a will. (Bk. ii. Tit. 12. 1.)

9. Pupillus omne negotium recte gerit: ut tamen, sicubi tutoris auctoritas necessaria sit, adhibeatur tutor, veluti si ipse obligetur: nam alium sibi obligare etiam sine tutoris auctoritate potest.

9. A pupil may go through any legal act, provided that the tutor takes a part in the proceeding in cases where his authorisation is necessary, as, for instance, when the pupil binds himself; for a pupil can bind others to him without the authorisation of his tutor.

GAI. ii. 107.

10. Sed quod diximus de pupillis, utique de his verum est, qui jam aliquem intellectum habent; nam infans et qui infantia proximus est, non multum a furioso distant, quia hujus ætatis pupilli nullum intellectum habent: sed in proximis infantia propter utilitatem eorum benignior juris interpretatio facta est, ut idem juris habeant, quod pubertati proximi. Sed qui in parentis potestate est inpubes, nec auctore quidem patre obligatur.

10. This must be understood only of pupils who already have some understanding; for an infant, or one still near to infancy, differs but little from a madman, because pupils of such an age have no understanding at all. But, in order to consult their interest, the law has been construed more favourably to those who are near to infancy, and they are allowed the same rights as those near the age of puberty. But a son in the power of his father, and under the age of puberty, cannot bind himself even if his father authorises him.

GAI. iii. 109; D. xlv. 1. 141. 2.

An infant was properly one qui fieri non potest, a child not yet old enough to speak with understanding of what he said, i.e. who was below the age of seven years. When a child could talk, and began to have some degree of understanding, he was termed infanti proximus. Theophilus, in his paraphrase of this paragraph, says, proximus infanti qualis fuerit qui septimum aut octavum annum agit. He could now pronounce, and in some measure understand, the words of a stipulation, and the law permitted him to do so with the sanction of his tutor in certain cases, such as the acquisition of an inheritance, where his personal intervention was necessary. But the law did not allow him to stipulate except when the stipulation was clearly for his benefit. (Bk. i. Tit. 21 ; D. xxix. 2. 9.)

Just as the child who was older than an infant was said to be infantiae proximus, so one a little younger than a pubes was said to be pubertati proximus. The original notion seems to have been that the child infantiae proximus could not do things which the pubertati proximus could do. There was a clear difference between a child between seven and eight and a child between thirteen and fourteen. But the capacity existing in the intervening years would vary with the individual. Gradually the law recognised more and more the acts of the child over seven years, as this was considered, as the text says, the benignior interpretatio, the more favourable interpretation to the child, as removing doubts as to his competence, and avoiding the necessity of having recourse to a slave to stipulate for the child. (D. xlv. 6. 6.) But, with regard to delicts, the benignior interpretatio would be to mark the distinction between different ages of children above seven ; and so we are told (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. 18) that the impubes is only bound ex furto in case proximus pubertati sit et ob id intellegat se delinquere.

The paterfamilias could not, like a tutor, supply his authority to make up what was deficient in the capacity of the impubes. The concluding words of this paragraph are taken from Gaius, who makes his statement more complete by adding pubes vero qui in potestate est, proinde ac si paterfamilias obligari solet. (D. xlv. l. 141. 2.)

11. Si impossibilis condicio obligationibus adiciatur, nihil valet stipulatio. Impossibilis autem condicio habetur, cui natura impedimento est, quo minus existat, veluti si quis ita dixerit: 'si digito cælum attigero, dare spondes?' At si ita stipuletur, 'si digito cælum non attigero, dare spondes?' pure facta obligatio intellegitur ideoque statim petere potest.

11. If an impossible condition is added to an obligation, the stipulation is void. A condition is considered impossible of which nature forbids the accomplishment ; as, if a person says, 'Do you promise if I touch the sky with my finger?' But if a stipulation is made thus, 'Do you promise if I do not touch the sky with my finger?' the obligation is considered as unconditional, and so performance may be instantly demanded.

GAI. III. 98 ; D. xlv. 1. 7.

An impossible condition in a testamentary gift was treated as if it had never been inserted. In a stipulation or any other contract it made the contract void, a difference due to the favour with which testamentary gifts were regarded. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 14. 10.)

In the stipulation, 'If I do not touch the sky,' &c., there is really no condition ; there is nothing left undecided in the mind of the speaker or hearer.

12. Item verborum obligatio inter absentes concepta inutilis est. Sed cum hoc materiam litium conten-

12. A verbal obligation, made between absent persons, is also void. But as this doctrine afforded matter of Verbal obligation between absent persons.

when the stipulation was clearly for his benefit. (Bk. i. Tit. 21 ; D. xxix. 2. 9.)

Just as the child who was older than an infant was said to be infantie proximus, so one a little younger than a pubes was said to be pubertati proximus. The original notion seems to have been that the child infantie proximus could not do things which the pubertati proximus could do. There was a clear difference between a child between seven and eight and a child between thirteen and fourteen. But the capacity existing in the intervening years would vary with the individual. Gradually the law recognised more and more the acts of the child over seven years, as this was considered, as the text says, the benignior interpretatio, the more favourable interpretation to the child, as removing doubts as to his competence, and avoiding the necessity of having recourse to a slave to stipulate for the child. (D. xlv. 6. 6.) But, with regard to delicts, the benignior interpretatio would be to mark the distinction between different ages of children above seven ; and so we are told (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. 18) that the impubes is only bound ex furto in case proximus pubertati sit et ob id intellegat se delinquere.

The paterfamilias could not, like a tutor, supply his authority to make up what was deficient in the capacity of the impubes. The concluding words of this paragraph are taken from Gaius, who makes his statement more complete by adding pubes vero qui in potestate est, proinde ac si paterfamilias obligari solet. (D. xlv. 1. 141. 2.)

11. Si impossibilis condicio obligationibus adjiciatur, nihil valet stipulatio. Impossibilis autem condicio habetur, cui natura impedimento est, quo minus existat, veluti si quis ita dixerit : 'si digito cælum attigero, dare spondes?' At si ita stipuletur, 'si digito cælum non attigero, dare spondes?' pure facta obligatio intellegitur ideoque statim petere potest.

11. If an impossible condition is added to an obligation, the stipulation is void. A condition is considered impossible of which nature forbids the accomplishment ; as, if a person says, 'Do you promise if I touch the sky with my finger?' But if a stipulation is made thus, 'Do you promise if I do not touch the sky with my finger?' the obligation is considered as unconditional, and so performance may be instantly demanded.

GAI. III. 98 ; D. xlv. 1. 7.

An impossible condition in a testamentary gift was treated as if it had never been inserted. In a stipulation or any other contract it made the contract void, a difference due to the favour with which testamentary gifts were regarded. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 14. 10.)

In the stipulation, 'If I do not touch the sky,' &c., there is really no condition ; there is nothing left undecided in the mind of the speaker or hearer.

12. Item verborum obligatio inter absentes concepta inutilis est. Sed cum hoc materiam litium conten-

12. A verbal obligation, made between absent persons, is also void. But as this doctrine afforded matter of tiosis hominibus præstabat, forte post tempus tales allegationes opponentibus et non presentes esse vel se vel adversarios suos contententibus: ideo nostra constitutio propter celeritatem dirimendarum litium introducta est, quam ad Cæsarienses advocatos scripsimus, per quam disposuimus, tales scripturas, quæ præsto esse partes indicant, omnimodo esse credendas, nisi ipse, qui talibus utitur improbis allegationibus, manifestissimis probationibus vel per scripturam vel per testes idoneos approbaverit, in ipso toto die, quo conficiebatur instrumentum, sese vel adversarium suum in aliis locis esse.

Verbal obligation between absent persons.

GAI. iii. 138; C. viii. 38. 14.

No writing was necessary to make a verbal contract valid; but one was generally drawn up as a record of the transactions, and called instrumentum or cautio, as being a security for the stipulator. An example of a contract reduced to writing is given in D. xlv. 1. 126. 2.

13. Post mortem suam dari sibi nemo stipulari poterat, non magis quam post ejus mortem, a quo stipulabatur. Ac ne is, qui in alicujus potestate est, post mortem ejus stipulari poterat, quia patris vel domini voce loqui videtur. Sed et si quis ita stipuletur, 'pridie quam moriar' vel 'pridie quam morieris dari?' inutilis erat stipulatio. Sed cum, ut jam dictum est, ex consensu contrahentium stipulationes valent, placuit nobis etiam in hunc juris articulum necessariam inducere emendationem, ut, sive post mortem sive pridie quam morietur stipulator sive promissor, stipulatio concepta est, valeat stipulatio.

GAI. iii. 100; C. viii. 38. 11; C. iv. 11.

A stipulation 'pridie quam moriar' was held to be invalid, because the date when the thing promised became due could not be fixed until the death happened, and then the action would only be acquired for or against the heirs, exactly as in the case of a stipulation 'dabis post mortem' (GAI. iii. 100); and a stipulation in favour of the heirs only would be one in which the stipulator strife to contentious men, who alleged, after some time had elapsed, that either they or their adversaries were not present, we issued a constitution, addressed to the advocates of Cæsarea, in order to provide for the speedy determination of such suits. By this we have enacted, that written acts which declare that the contracting parties were present, shall be considered as indisputable evidence of the fact, unless the party who has recourse to such shameless allegations makes it evident, by the most manifest proofs, either by writing or by credible witnesses, that either he or his adversary was in some other place during the whole day in which the instrument was made.

13. A man could not formerly stipulate that a thing should be given him after his own death, any more than after the death of the promissor. Neither could any person in the power of another stipulate that anything should be given him after the death of the person in whose power he was, because it was his father or master who appeared to be speaking in him. And if any one stipulated thus, 'Do you promise to give the day before I die? or the day before you die?' the stipulation was invalid. But since all stipulations, as we have already said, derive their force from the consent of the contracting parties, we have thought it proper to introduce a necessary alteration in this respect, so that now, whether it is stipulated that a thing shall be given after, or immediately before, the death either of the stipulator or the promissor, the stipulation is good.

tiosis hominibus præstabat, forte post tempus tales allegationes opponentibus et non præsentibus esse vel se vel adversarios suos contententibus: ideo nostra constitutio propter celeritatem dirimendarum litium introducta est, quam ad Cæsarienses advocatos scripsimus, per quam disposuimus, tales scripturas, quæ præsto esse partes indicant, omnimodo esse credendas, nisi ipse, qui talibus utitur improbis allegationibus, manifestissimis probationibus vel per scripturam vel per testes idoneos approbaverit, in ipso toto die, quo conficiebatur instrumentum, sese vel adversarium suum in aliis locis esse.

GAI. iii. 138; C. viii. 38. 14.

No writing was necessary to make a verbal contract valid; but one was generally drawn up as a record of the transactions, and called instrumentum or cautio, as being a security for the stipulator. An example of a contract reduced to writing is given in D. xlv. 1. 126. 2.

13. Post mortem suam dari sibi nemo stipulari poterat, non magis quam post ejus mortem, a quo stipulabatur. Ac ne is, qui in alienius potestate est, post mortem ejus stipulari poterat, quia patris vel domini voce loqui videtur. Sed et si quis ita stipuletur, 'pridie quam moriar' vel 'pridie quam morieris dari?' inutilis erat stipulatio. Sed cum, ut jam dictum est, ex consensu contrahentium stipulationes valent, placuit nobis etiam in hunc juris articulum necessariam inducere emendationem, ut, sive post mortem sive pridie quam morietur stipulator sive promissor, stipulatio concepta est, valeat stipulatio.

GAI. iii. 100; C. viii. 38. 11; C. iv. 11.

A stipulation 'pridie quam moriar' was held to be invalid, because the date when the thing promised became due could not be fixed until the death happened, and then the action would only be acquired for or against the heirs, exactly as in the case of a stipulation 'dabis post mortem' (GAI. iii. 100); and a stipulation in favour of the heirs only would be one in which the stipulator strife to contentious men, who alleged, after some time had elapsed, that either they or their adversaries were not present, we issued a constitution, addressed to the advocates of Cæsarea, in order to provide for the speedy determination of such suits. By this we have enacted, that written acts which declare that the contracting parties were present, shall be considered as indisputable evidence of the fact, unless the party who has recourse to such shameless allegations makes it evident, by the most manifest proofs, either by writing or by credible witnesses, that either he or his adversary was in some other place during the whole day in which the instrument was made.

13. A man could not formerly stipulate that a thing should be given him after his own death, any more than after the death of the promissor. Neither could any person in the power of another stipulate that anything should be given him after the death of the person in whose power he was, because it was his father or master who appeared to be speaking in him. And if any one stipulated thus, 'Do you promise to give the day before I die? or the day before you die?' the stipulation was invalid. But since all stipulations, as we have already said, derive their force from the consent of the contracting parties, we have thought it proper to introduce a necessary alteration in this respect, so that now, whether it is stipulated that a thing shall be given after, or immediately before, the death either of the stipulator or the promissor, the stipulation is good.

had no interest (note to paragr. 4). Gaius says inelegans esse visum est ex heredis persona incipere obligationem; it was out of the due order of things that a man should enter into an obligation on which no action could be brought until after his death. Justinian does away with all these subtleties.

14. Item si quis ita stipulatus erat: 'si navis ex Asia venerit, hodie dare spondes?' inutilis erat stipulatio, quia praeputere concepta est. Sed cum Leo inclytæ recordationis in dotibus eandem stipulationem, quæ praeputera nuncupatur, non esse rejiciendam existimavit, nobis placuit, et huic perfectum robur accommodare, ut non solum in dotibus, sed etiam in omnibus valeat hujusmodi conceptio stipulationis.

14. Also, if any one stipulated thus, 'If a certain ship arrives hereafter from Asia, do you engage to give to-day?' the stipulation would be void, as being preposterous. But, since the Emperor Leo, of glorious memory, decided that such a stipulation, which is termed praeputera, ought not to be rejected with respect to marriage-portions, we have thought it right to give it complete validity, so that now every stipulation made in this way is valid, not only with respect to marriage-portions, but whatever may be its object.

C. vi. 23. 25.

Such a stipulation was said to be praeputere concepta (i.e. the things which should come post are placed prae), because the payment is to be made at once, and thus is placed before (prae) instead of after (post) the fulfilment of the condition. Under Justinian's enactment the contract was binding at once, but payment could not be enforced until the condition was fulfilled. (C. vi. 23. 25.)

15. Ita autem concepta stipulatio, veluti si Titius dicat 'cum moriar, dare spondes?' vel 'cum morieris,' et apud veteres utilis erat et nunc valet.

15. A stipulation made thus, as if, for instance, Titius says, 'Do you promise to give when I die,' or 'when you die?' was considered valid by the ancients, and is so now.

D. xlv. 1. 45. 3.

The stipulation was said to be valid because the thing was to be given 'non post mortem, sed ultimo vitae tempore.' (Gai. ii. 232.) The moment when the performance of the engagement became due was fixed before the time when the rights of the heir were distinct from those of the deceased. A distinction was drawn between such a stipulation and one dari pridie quam moriar (par. 13), but, as we have seen in the case of legacies, it rested on no sound reason. (Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 35.)

16. Item post mortem alterius recte stipulamur.

16. We may also validly stipulate that a thing shall be given after the death of a third person.

D. xlv. 1. 45. 1.

The death of a third person was an uncertain term, which might be as legitimately affixed to a stipulation as any other uncertain time. The reason which prevented the stipulation post mortem meam or tuam did not apply.

had no interest (note to paragr. 4). Gaius says inclegans esse visum est ex heredis persona incipere obligationem; it was out of the due order of things that a man should enter into an obligation on which no action could be brought until after his death. Justinian does away with all these subtleties.

14. Item si quis ita stipulatus erat: 'si navis ex Asia venerit, hodie dare spondes?' inutilis erat stipulatio, quia præpostere concepta est. Sed cum Leo inelytæ recordationis in dotibus eandem stipulationem, quæ præpostera nuncupatur, non esse rejiciendam existimavit, nobis placuit, et huic perfectum robur accommodare, ut non solum in dotibus, sed etiam in omnibus valeat hujusmodi conceptio stipulationis.

14. Also, if any one stipulated thus, 'If a certain ship arrives hereafter from Asia, do you engage to give to-day?' the stipulation would be void, as being preposterous. But, since the Emperor Leo, of glorious memory, decided that such a stipulation, which is termed præpostera, ought not to be rejected with respect to marriage-portions, we have thought it right to give it complete validity, so that now every stipulation made in this way is valid, not only with respect to marriage-portions, but whatever may be its object.

C. vi. 23. 25.

Such a stipulation was said to be præpostere conceptu (i.e. the things which should come post are placed præ), because the payment is to be made at once, and thus is placed before (præ) instead of after (post) the fulfilment of the condition. Under Justinian's enactment the contract was binding at once, but payment could not be enforced until the condition was fulfilled. (C. vi. 23. 25.)

15. Ita autem concepta stipulatio, veluti si Titius dicat 'cum moriar, dare spondes?' vel 'cum morieris,' et apud veteres utilis erat et nunc valet.

15. A stipulation made thus, as if, for instance, Titius says, 'Do you promise to give when I die,' or 'when you die?' was considered valid by the ancients, and is so now.

D. xlv. 1. 45. 3.

The stipulation was said to be valid because the thing was to be given 'non post mortem, sed ultimo vitæ tempore.' (GAL. ii. 232.) The moment when the performance of the engagement became due was fixed before the time when the rights of the heir were distinct from those of the deceased. A distinction was drawn between such a stipulation and one dari pridie quam moriar (par. 13), but, as we have seen in the case of legacies, it rested on no sound reason. (Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 35.)

16. Item post mortem alterius recte stipulamur.

16. We may also validly stipulate that a thing shall be given after the death of a third person.

D. xlv. 1. 45. 1.

The death of a third person was an uncertain term, which might be as legitimately affixed to a stipulation as any other uncertain time. The reason which prevented the stipulation post mortem meam or tuam did not apply.

17. Si scriptum fuerit in instrumento, promississe aliquem, perinde habetur, atque si interrogatione præcedente responsum sit.

17. If it is written in an instrument that a person has promised, the promise is considered to have been given in answer to a precedent interrogation.

See PAUL. Sent. v. 7. 2. Ulpian says (D. ii. 14. 7. 12), that if, at the end of the instrument of an agreement, the words usually added were found, viz. rogavit Titius, spopondit Mævius, the agreement was taken to be a stipulation unless it was expressly shown that it was in reality only a pactum.

18. Quotiens plures res una stipulatione comprehenduntur, si quidem promissor simpliciter respondeat 'dare spondeo,' propter omnes tenetur: si vero unam ex his vel quasdam daturum se spoponderit, obligatio in his, pro quibus spoponderit, contrahitur. Ex pluribus enim stipulationibus una vel quedam videntur esse perfectæ: singulas enim res stipulari et ad singulas respondere debemus.

18. When many things are comprehended in one stipulation, a man binds himself to all, if he answers simply 'I promise to give.' But, if he promises to give one or some of the things stipulated for, he is bound only with respect to the things comprised in his answer. For, of the different stipulations contained in the question, only some are considered to have been answered, as for each object a question and an answer are required.

D. xlv. 1. 83. 4; D. xlv. 1. 1. 5.

This should be compared with the cases decided in paragr. 5.

19. Alteri stipulari, ut supra dictum est, nemo potest: invente sunt enim hujusmodi obligationes ad hoc, ut unusquisque sibi adquirat, quod sua interest; ceterum si alii detur, nihil interest stipulatoris. Plane si quis velit hoc facere, pœnam stipulari conveniet, ut, nisi ita factum sit, ut comprehensum esset, committatur pœnæ stipulatio etiam ei, cujus nihil interest: pœnam enim cum stipulatur quis, non illud inspicitur, quid intersit ejus, sed quæ sit quantitas sita in condicione stipulationis. Ergo si quis stipuletur Titio dari, nihil agit; sed si addiderit pœnam 'nisi dederis, tot aurcos dare spondes?' tunc committitur stipulatio.

19. No one, as we have already said, can stipulate for another, for this kind of obligations has been invented, that every person may acquire what it is for his own advantage to acquire; but if a thing is given to another it is no concern of the stipulator. But if any one wishes to stipulate for another, he should stipulate for a penalty payable to him, so that if the promisor does not perform his promise, the stipulation for the penalty may be valid even for a person who had no interest in the performance of the promise; for when a penalty is stipulated for, it is not the interest of the stipulator that is regarded, but the amount fixed in the condition of the stipulation. If, therefore, any one stipulates that a certain thing shall be given to Titius, this is void; but if he adds a penalty, 'Do you promise to give me so many aurci if you do not give the thing to Titius?' this stipulation binds the promissor.

D. xlv. 1. 38. 17.

20. Sed si quis stipuletur alii cum ejus interesset, placuit stipulationem valere. Nam si is, qui pupilli tutelam administrare ceperat, cessit administratione contutori

20. But, if any one stipulates for another, having himself an interest in the performance of the promise, the stipulation has been decided to be valid. Thus if he who has begun to

17. Si scriptum fuerit in instrumento, promississe aliquem, perinde habetur, atque si interrogatione præcedente responsum sit.

17. If it is written in an instrument that a person has promised, the promise is considered to have been given in answer to a precedent interrogation.

See PAUL. Sent. v. 7. 2. Ulpian says (D. ii. 14. 7. 12), that if, at the end of the instrument of an agreement, the words usually added were found, viz. rogavit Titius, spopondit Maevius, the agreement was taken to be a stipulation unless it was expressly shown that it was in reality only a pactum.

18. Quotiens plures res una stipulatione comprehenduntur, si quidem promissor simpliciter respondeat 'dare spondeo,' propter omnes tenetur: si vero unam ex his vel quasdam daturum se spoponderit, obligatio in his, pro quibus spoponderit, contrahitur. Ex pluribus enim stipulationibus una vel quedam videntur esse perfectæ: singulas enim res stipulari et ad singulas respondere debemus.

18. When many things are comprehended in one stipulation, a man binds himself to all, if he answers simply 'I promise to give.' But, if he promises to give one or some of the things stipulated for, he is bound only with respect to the things comprised in his answer. For, of the different stipulations contained in the question, only some are considered to have been answered, as for each object a question and an answer are required.

D. xlv. 1. 83. 4; D. xlv. 1. 1. 5.

This should be compared with the cases decided in paragr. 5.

19. Alteri stipulari, ut supra dictum est, nemo potest: inventæ sunt enim hujusmodi obligationes ad hoc, ut unusquisque sibi adquirat, quod sua interest; ceterum si alii detur, nihil interest stipulatoris. Plane si quis velit hoc facere, pœnam stipulari conveniet, ut, nisi ita factum sit, ut comprehensum esset, committatur pœne stipulatio etiam ei, cujus nihil interest: pœnam enim cum stipulatur quis, non illud inspicitur, quid intersit ejus, sed quæ sit quantitas sita in conditione stipulationis. Ergo si quis stipuletur Titio dari, nihil agit; sed si addiderit pœnam 'nisi dederis, tot aureos dare spondes?' tunc committitur stipulatio.

19. No one, as we have already said, can stipulate for another, for this kind of obligations has been invented, that every person may acquire what it is for his own advantage to acquire; but if a thing is given to another it is no concern of the stipulator. But if any one wishes to stipulate for another, he should stipulate for a penalty payable to him, so that if the promissor does not perform his promise, the stipulation for the penalty may be valid even for a person who had no interest in the performance of the promise; for when a penalty is stipulated for, it is not the interest of the stipulator that is regarded, but the amount fixed in the condition of the stipulation. If, therefore, any one stipulates that a certain thing shall be given to Titius, this is void; but if he adds a penalty, 'Do you promise to give me so many aurei if you do not give the thing to Titius?' this stipulation binds the promissor.

D. xlv. 1. 38. 17.

20. Sed si quis stipuletur alii cum ejus interesset, placuit stipulationem valere. Nam si is, qui pupilli tutelam administrare ceperat, cessit administratione contutori

20. But, if any one stipulates for another, having himself an interest in the performance of the promise, the stipulation has been decided to be valid. Thus if he who has begun to act as tutor afterwards gives up the administration to his co-tutor, and stipulates for the security of the estate of his pupil, since it is for the interest of the stipulator that the promise should be performed, as he is answerable to the pupil for maladministration, the obligation is binding. So if a person stipulates that a thing shall be given to his procurator, the stipulation is effectual. So, too, is a stipulation that a thing shall be given to a creditor of the stipulator, the stipulator having an interest in the performance of the promise; as, for instance, that he may avoid becoming liable to a penal clause, or that his immoveables, given in pledge, should not be sold.

suo et stipulatus est, rem pupilli salvam fore, quoniam interest stipulatoris fieri, quod stipulatus est, cum obligatus futurus esset pupillo, si male res gesserit, tenet obligatio. Ergo et si quis procuratori suo dari stipulatus sit, stipulatio vires habebit. Et si creditori suo, quod sua interest, ne forte vel poena committatur vel prædia distrahantur, quæ pignori data erant, valet stipulatio.

D. xlv. 1. 38. 20. 23.

See note on paragr. 4. The tutor was liable for all his co-tutor did. (See Bk. i. Tit. 24. 1.)

21. Versa vice qui alium facturum promisit, videtur in ea esse causa, ut non teneatur, nisi poenam ipse promiserit.

21. Conversely, he who undertakes for the performance of another, is not bound unless he promises under a penalty.

D. xlv. 1. 38. 2.

The law on this point is more accurately stated in paragr. 3.

22. Item nemo rem suam futuram in eum casum, quo sua fit, utiliter stipulatur.

22. No man can validly stipulate that a thing which may hereafter belong to him shall be given him when it becomes his.

D. xlv. 1. 87.

When the time was come, the stipulation would have nothing on which to take effect.

23. Si de alia re stipulator senserit, de alia promissor, perinde nulla contrahitur obligatio, ac si ad interrogatum responsum non esset, veluti si hominem Stichum a te stipulatus quis fuerit, tu de Pamphilio senseris, quem Stichum vocari credideris.

23. If the stipulator intends one thing, and a promissor another, an obligation is no more contracted than if no answer had been made to the interrogation; for instance, if any one has stipulated that you should give Stichus, and you understood him to refer to Pamphilus, thinking that Pamphilus was called Stichus.

D. xlv. 1. 137. 1.

Stipulatio ex utriusque consensu valet. (D. xlv. 1. 83. 1.) And if the seeming consent implied in pronouncing the words of the stipulation was vitiated by a mistake under which one party spoke of one thing and the other of another, the stipulation was void; but if the mistake was only with reference to something in, or relating to, the thing they were speaking of, i.e. if they were suo et stipulatus est, rem pupilli salvam fore, quoniam interest stipulatoris fieri, quod stipulatus est, cum obligatus futurus esset pupillo, si male res gesserit, tenet obligatio. Ergo et si quis procuratori suo dari stipulatus sit, stipulatio vires habebit. Et si creditori suo, quod sua interest, ne forte vel pena committatur vel prædia distrahantur, quæ pignori data erant, valet stipulatio.

act as tutor afterwards gives up the administration to his co-tutor, and stipulates for the security of the estate of his pupil, since it is for the interest of the stipulator that the promise should be performed, as he is answerable to the pupil for maladministration, the obligation is binding. So if a person stipulates that a thing shall be given to his procurator, the stipulation is effectual. So, too, is a stipulation that a thing shall be given to a creditor of the stipulator, the stipulator having an interest in the performance of the promise; as, for instance, that he may avoid becoming liable to a penal clause, or that his immoveables, given in pledge, should not be sold.

D. xlv. 1. 38. 20. 23.

See note on paragr. 4. The tutor was liable for all his co-tutor did. (See Bk. i. Tit. 24. 1.)

21. Versa vice qui alium facturum promisit, videtur in ea esse causa, ut non teneatur, nisi penam ipse promiserit.

21. Conversely, he who undertakes for the performance of another, is not bound unless he promises under a penalty.

D. xlv. 1. 38. 2.

The law on this point is more accurately stated in paragr. 3.

22. Item nemo rem suam futuram in eum casum, quo sua fit, utiliter stipulatur.

22. No man can validly stipulate that a thing which may hereafter belong to him shall be given him when it becomes his.

D. xlv. 1. 87.

When the time was come, the stipulation would have nothing on which to take effect.

23. Si de alia re stipulator senserit, de alia promissor, perinde nulla contrahitur obligatio, ac si ad interrogatum responsum non esset, veluti si hominem Stichum a te stipulatus quis fuerit, tu de Pamphilio senseris, quem Stichum vocari credideris.

23. If the stipulator intends one thing, and a promissor another, an obligation is no more contracted than if no answer had been made to the interrogation; for instance, if any one has stipulated that you should give Stichus, and you understood him to refer to Pamphilus, thinking that Pamphilus was called Stichus.

D. xlv. 1. 187. 1.

Stipulatio ex utriusque consensu valet. (D. xlv. 1. 83. 1.) And if the seeming consent implied in pronouncing the words of the stipulation was vitiated by a mistake under which one party spoke of one thing and the other of another, the stipulation was void; but if the mistake was only with reference to something in, or relating to, the thing they were speaking of, i.e. if they were really speaking of the same thing, but one party was under some misapprehension respecting it, the stipulation was valid. So it was valid if fraud or violence had been used to procure it; but though in such cases it was valid, the rights it gave were worthless under the jurisdiction of the prætor, who always allowed exceptiones doli, metus, &c., by which the action brought on the stipulation was repelled.

24. Quod turpi ex causa promissum est, veluti si quis homicidium vel sacrilegium se facturum promittat, non valet.

24. A promise founded on a base consideration, as if a man engages to commit homicide or sacrilege, is not binding.

D. xlv. 1. 26, 27.

A thing was said to be promissum ex turpi causa, when it was promised, being itself illegal or immoral, or was the reward, or depended on the happening, of anything illegal or immoral.

25. Cum quis sub aliqua conditione fuerit stipulatus, licet ante condicionem decesserit, postea existente conditione, heres ejus agere potest. Idem est et a promissoris parte.

25. If a stipulation is conditional, although the stipulator dies before the accomplishment of the condition, yet if, afterwards, the condition is accomplished, his heir can demand the execution of the promise; and so, too, the heir of the promissor may be sued.

D. xlv. 1. 57.

26. Qui hoc anno aut hoc mense dari stipulatus sit, nisi omnibus partibus præteritis anni vel mensis non recte petet.

26. A person who stipulates that a thing shall be given to him in such a year or month, cannot legally demand the thing promised until the whole year or month has elapsed.

D. xlv. 1. 42.

27. Si fundum dari stipuleris vel hominem, non poteris continuo agere, nisi tantum spatii præterierit, quo traditio fieri possit.

27. If you stipulate for a piece of ground or a slave, you cannot instantly demand the thing, but must wait until enough time has passed for delivery to have been made.

D. xlv. 1. 73. pr.

TIT. XX. DE FIDEJUSSORIBUS.

Pro eo, qui promittit, solent alii obligari, qui fidejussores appellantur, quos homines accipere solent, dum curant, ut diligentius sibi cautum sit.

It is customary that other persons, termed fidejussores, should bind themselves for the promissor, creditors generally requiring that they should do so in order that the security may be greater.

GAL. iii. 115, 117.

We have already noticed in Title 16 the cases of persons who joined in making the same stipulation or who joined in making the same promise. We now come to the cases of persons who come in as accessories to the creditor or debtor. Many of the rules of really speaking of the same thing, but one party was under some misapprehension respecting it, the stipulation was valid. So it was valid if fraud or violence had been used to procure it; but though in such cases it was valid, the rights it gave were worthless under the jurisdiction of the prætor, who always allowed exceptiones doli, metus, &c., by which the action brought on the stipulation was repelled.

24. Quod turpi ex causa promissum est, veluti si quis homicidium vel sacrilegium se facturum promittat, non valet.

24. A promise founded on a base consideration, as if a man engages to commit homicide or sacrilege, is not binding.

D. xlv. 1. 26, 27.

A thing was said to be promissum ex turpi causa, when it was promised, being itself illegal or immoral, or was the reward, or depended on the happening, of anything illegal or immoral.

25. Cum quis sub aliqua condicione fuerit stipulatus, licet ante condicionem decesserit, postea existente condicione, heres ejus agere potest. Idem est et a promissoris parte.

25. If a stipulation is conditional, although the stipulator dies before the accomplishment of the condition, yet if, afterwards, the condition is accomplished, his heir can demand the execution of the promise; and so, too, the heir of the promissor may be sued.

D. xlv. 1. 57.

26. Qui hoc anno aut hoc mense dari stipulatus sit, nisi omnibus partibus præteritis anni vel mensis non recte petet.

26. A person who stipulates that a thing shall be given to him in such a year or month, cannot legally demand the thing promised until the whole year or month has elapsed.

D. xlv. 1. 42.

27. Si fundum dari stipuleris vel hominem, non poteris continuo agere, nisi tantum spatii præterierit, quo traditio fieri possit.

27. If you stipulate for a piece of ground or a slave, you cannot instantly demand the thing, but must wait until enough time has passed for delivery to have been made.

D. xlv. 1. 73. pr.

TIT. XX. DE FIDEJUSSORIBUS.

Pro eo, qui promittit, solent alii obligari, qui fidejussores appellantur, quos homines accipere solent, dum curant, ut diligentius sibi cautum sit.

It is customary that other persons, termed fidejussores, should bind themselves for the promissor, creditors generally requiring that they should do so in order that the security may be greater.

GAJ. iii. 115, 117.

We have already noticed in Title 16 the cases of persons who joined in making the same stipulation or who joined in making the same promise. We now come to the cases of persons who come in as accessories to the creditor or debtor. Many of the rules of law applying to the correi stipulandi or promittendi applied to these accessories; thus if payment was made to the accessory of the creditor, the debtor was free as against the creditor; and if the principal debtor or any of his accessories was sued, no further action could, until Justinian permitted it, be brought by the creditor against those who were not sued, the litis contestatio operating as an extinction of the debt.

Besides the principal parties to a stipulation, the stipulator and the promisor, there might be accessory parties, called respectively adstipulatores and adpromissores. The adstipulator either received the same promise as his principal did, and could, therefore, have the same actions, and equally receive or exact payment; or he only stipulated for a part of that for which the principal stipulated, and then his rights were co-extensive with the amount of his own stipulation. (GAI. iii. 113.) In the early law, the chief use of an adstipulator was, probably, to supply the place of a procurator at a time when the law refused to allow stipulations to be made by procurator. A might make a stipulation, and know that at the time when payment would be due he would be abroad. He, therefore, joined B in the stipulation, who could receive payment or bring an action in his place, and would be bound by an actio mandati to pay over to A whatever he had received.

Before the time of Justinian no one could stipulate validly for a thing after his own death (see Tit. 19. 13); and, therefore, those who wished to make such a stipulation joined an adstipulator with them, and this adstipulator could bring an action, or receive payment, after the death of the stipulator. As, in the days of Gaius, all contracts could be made by procurator, it appears from his account of the adstipulator, which is the only one we have, that the only use of the adstipulator was to make this stipulation post mortem suam valid. (GAI. iii. 117.)

The adstipulator could not transmit his right of action even to his heirs. His rights were purely personal, because he was selected by the stipulator, to whom he stood in the relation of a mandatary, from motives of personal confidence. (GAI. iii. 114.)

The adpromissores were accessory to the promise, in order to give the stipulator greater security. They were guarantees for the fulfilment of the promise (GAI. iii. 116), and these guarantees were termed sponsors when Roman citizens, as they pledged themselves by the word spondeo, a word which citizens alone could utter, and fidepromissores when peregrini (GAI. iii. 120), because, in binding themselves, they used the expression fide mea promitto.

The spondores and fidepromissores held a position, in many respects, the exact converse of the adstipulator. They made the same promise as their principal, or one not so extensive, for they might only choose to become guarantees to a certain extent; they could not bind themselves for more than their principal was bound for. They were often employed to remove any objections that might be made to the capacity of their promisor, as, for instance, law applying to the correi stipulandi or promittendi applied to these accessories; thus if payment was made to the accessory of the creditor, the debtor was free as against the creditor; and if the principal debtor or any of his accessories was sued, no further action could, until Justinian permitted it, be brought by the creditor against those who were not sued, the litis contestatio operating as an extinction of the debt.

Besides the principal parties to a stipulation, the stipulator and the promisor, there might be accessory parties, called respectively adstipulatores and adpromissores. The adstipulator either received the same promise as his principal did, and could, therefore, have the same actions, and equally receive or exact payment; or he only stipulated for a part of that for which the principal stipulated, and then his rights were co-extensive with the amount of his own stipulation. (GAI. iii. 113.) In the early law, the chief use of an adstipulator was, probably, to supply the place of a procurator at a time when the law refused to allow stipulations to be made by procurator. A might make a stipulation, and know that at the time when payment would be due he would be abroad. He, therefore, joined B in the stipulation, who could receive payment or bring an action in his place, and would be bound by an actio mandati to pay over to A whatever he had received.

Before the time of Justinian no one could stipulate validly for a thing after his own death (see Tit. 19. 13); and, therefore, those who wished to make such a stipulation joined an adstipulator with them, and this adstipulator could bring an action, or receive payment, after the death of the stipulator. As, in the days of Gaius, all contracts could be made by procurator, it appears from his account of the adstipulator, which is the only one we have, that the only use of the adstipulator was to make this stipulation post mortem suam valid. (GAI. iii. 117.)

The adstipulator could not transmit his right of action even to his heirs. His rights were purely personal, because he was selected by the stipulator, to whom he stood in the relation of a mandatary, from motives of personal confidence. (GAI. iii. 114.)

The adpromissores were accessory to the promise, in order to give the stipulator greater security. They were guarantees for the fulfilment of the promise (GAI. iii. 116), and these guarantees were termed sponsores when Roman citizens, as they pledged themselves by the word spondeo, a word which citizens alone could utter, and fidepromissores when peregrini (GAI. iii. 120), because, in binding themselves, they used the expression fide mea promitto.

The sponsores and fidepromissores held a position, in many respects, the exact converse of the adstipulator. They made the same promise as their principal, or one not so extensive, for they might only choose to become guarantees to a certain extent; they could not bind themselves for more than their principal was bound for. They were often employed to remove any objections that might be made to the capacity of their promisor, as, for instance, that he was impubes and contracting without the consent of his tutor. Their heirs were not bound (GAI. iii. 120), and they might recover from their principal by an actio mandati what they had advanced for him. (GAI. iii. 127.)

By the lex Furia (95 B.C.), which applied only to Italy, their obligation was only binding for two years from the time when it could have been enforced against them, and the amount of the liability of all was divided equally among all living at the time when the guarantee could be enforced. (GAI. iii. 121.)

These restrictions, the limitation of the intervention of sponsores and fidepromissores to verbal contracts, and their obligation dying with them, made it necessary that there should be a more unfettered mode of becoming surety for a party to a contract. This was supplied by the introduction of the fidejussores, who could bind themselves by stipulation in every kind of obligation, and who transmitted their obligation to their heirs. In the time of Justinian, sponsores and fidepromissores had been long obsolete, and as, under his legislation, stipulations post mortem suam were allowed, there was no longer any occasion for the intervention of adstipulatores, and, consequently, none of the additional parties to a verbal contract, except fidejussores, are mentioned in the Institutes.

Gaius mentions other laws besides the lex Furia, bearing on the subject of the additional parties to a contract; and as the effect of some of their provisions is traceable in what we read with respect to fidejussores in this Title, it may be as well to notice them here. (1) The lex Apuleia (102 B.C.) established a kind of partnership (quandam societatem) between the different sponsores or fidepromissores; any one of them who had paid the whole debt could recover from the others what he had paid in excess of his own share by an action pro socio. (GAI. iii. 122.) (2) A law, the name of which is illegible in the manuscript of Gaius, required that the creditor should give notice beforehand of the amount of the debt secured, and how many sponsores or fidepromissores there were to be; if they proved that such notice was not given, they were freed from liability. (3) The provisions of the lex Furia (95 B.C.) have been noticed above. (4) A lex Cornelia (81 B.C.), referring not only to sponsores and fidepromissores, but to all sureties, and therefore to fidejussores (which, perhaps, shows the date of the first introduction of fidejussores), provided that, with certain exceptions, no one could bind himself for the same debtor, to the same creditor, in the same year (idem pro eodem, apud eundem, eodem anno), for more than 20,000 sesterces; the promise was void as to the excess. (GAI. iii. 124, 125.) (5) Lastly, a lex Publilia gave sponsores an advantage over any other sureties, for they were allowed, unless reimbursed in six months, to recover from their principal what they had paid by a special action (actio depensi), and proceed to personal execution, manus injectio, against him. (GAI. iii. 127, and iv. 22.)

that he was impubes and contracting without the consent of his tutor. Their heirs were not bound (GAI. iii. 120), and they might recover from their principal by an actio mandati what they had advanced for him. (GAI. iii. 127.)

By the lex Furia (95 B.C.), which applied only to Italy, their obligation was only binding for two years from the time when it could have been enforced against them, and the amount of the liability of all was divided equally among all living at the time when the guarantee could be enforced. (GAI. iii. 121.)

These restrictions, the limitation of the intervention of sponsores and fidepromissores to verbal contracts, and their obligation dying with them, made it necessary that there should be a more unfettered mode of becoming surety for a party to a contract. This was supplied by the introduction of the fidejussores, who could bind themselves by stipulation in every kind of obligation, and who transmitted their obligation to their heirs. In the time of Justinian, sponsores and fidepromissores had been long obsolete, and as, under his legislation, stipulations post mortem suam were allowed, there was no longer any occasion for the intervention of adstipulatores, and, consequently, none of the additional parties to a verbal contract, except fidejussores, are mentioned in the Institutes.

Gaius mentions other laws besides the lex Furia, bearing on the subject of the additional parties to a contract; and as the effect of some of their provisions is traceable in what we read with respect to fidejussores in this Title, it may be as well to notice them here. (1) The lex Apuleia (102 B.C.) established a kind of partnership (quandam societatem) between the different sponsores or fidepromissores; any one of them who had paid the whole debt could recover from the others what he had paid in excess of his own share by an action pro socio. (GAI. iii. 122.) (2) A law, the name of which is illegible in the manuscript of Gaius, required that the creditor should give notice beforehand of the amount of the debt secured, and how many sponsores or fidepromissores there were to be; if they proved that such notice was not given, they were freed from liability. (3) The provisions of the lex Furia (95 B.C.) have been noticed above. (4) A lex Cornelia (81 B.C.), referring not only to sponsores and fidepromissores, but to all sureties, and therefore to fidejussores (which, perhaps, shows the date of the first introduction of fidejussores), provided that, with certain exceptions, no one could bind himself for the same debtor, to the same creditor, in the same year (idem pro eodem, apud eundem, eodem anno), for more than 20,000 sesterces; the promise was void as to the excess. (GAI. iii. 124, 125.) (5) Lastly, a lex Publilia gave sponsores an advantage over any other sureties, for they were allowed, unless reimbursed in six months, to recover from their principal what they had paid by a special action (actio depensi), and proceed to personal execution, manus injectio, against him. (GAI. iii. 127, and iv. 22.)

Intercedere was the general term for paying, becoming bound for, the debt of another; satisfacere for the giving surety for the obligation of the principal; satisfacere for the receiving it.

Suretyship might be created not only in the modes above mentioned, but by the surety offering himself as mandator pecunie credendae, i.e. bidding the creditor to lend to the debtor, and becoming responsible for repayment, or by a pactum constitutum pecunie, an undertaking to pay an ascertained debt, and in this case the debt of another person. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 9.)

The senatusconsultum Velleianum (D. xvi. 1. 2. 1), perhaps of the date of 46 A.D., forbade women ever to bind themselves for another person.

1. In omnibus autem obligationibus adsumi possunt, id est sive re sive verbis sive litteris sive consensu contractae fuerint. Ac ne illud quidem interest, utrum civilis an naturalis sit obligatio, cui adjiciatur fidejussor, adeo quidem, ut pro servo quoque obligetur, sive extraneus sit, qui fidejussorem a servo accipiat, sive ipse dominus in id, quod sibi naturaliter debetur.

1. Fidejussores may be added in every kind of obligation, i.e. whether the obligation is contracted re, verbis, litteris, or consensu. Nor is it material whether the obligation to which the fidejussor is made an additional party is civil or natural; so much so, that a man may bind himself as a fidejussor for a slave, either to a stranger or to the master of the slave, in respect of a thing due by a natural obligation to the person accepting the fidejussor from the slave.

GAI. III. 119; D. xvi. 1. 8. 1, 2, and 70. 3.

In omnibus obligationibus, including obligations arising out of delicts. (D. xvi. 1. 8. 5.) This was the principal advantage gained by the introduction of fidejussores.

2. Fidejussor non tantum ipse obligatur, sed etiam heredem obligatum relinquit.

2. A fidejussor not only binds himself, but leaves also his heir bound.

D. xvi. 1. 4. 1.

This was the second chief point of difference between fidejussores and sponsores, or fidepromissores. There was no limit to the time during which fidejussores remained bound, such as the lex Furia had laid down for the benefit of sponsores and fidepromissores.

3. Fidejussor et praecedere obligationem et sequi potest.

3. A fidejussor may be added either before or after an obligation is entered into.

D. xvi. 1. 6. pr. and 2.

Probably the formality of verbal contracts exacted that the words of the principal should precede those of the accessory.

4. Si plures sint fidejussores, quotquot erunt numero, singuli in solidum tenentur. Itaque liberum est creditori, a quo velit, solidum petere. Sed ex epistula divi Hadri-

4. Where there are several fidejussores, whatever is their number, each is bound for the whole debt, and the creditor may demand the whole from any of them he pleases. But,

Intercedere was the general term for paying, becoming bound for, the debt of another; satisdare for the giving surety for the obligation of the principal; satisaccipere for the receiving it.

Suretyship might be created not only in the modes above mentioned, but by the surety offering himself as mandator pecunie credendæ, i.e. bidding the creditor to lend to the debtor, and becoming responsible for repayment, or by a pactum constitutæ pecunie, an undertaking to pay an ascertained debt, and in this case the debt of another person. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 9.)

The senatusconsultum Velleianum (D. xvi. 1. 2. 1), perhaps of the date of 46 A.D., forbade women ever to bind themselves for another person.

1. In omnibus autem obligationibus adsumi possunt, id est sive re sive verbis sive litteris sive consensu contractæ fuerint. Ac ne illud quidem interest, utrum civilis an naturalis sit obligatio, cui adjiciatur fidejussor, adeo quidem, ut pro servo quoque obligetur, sive extraneus sit, qui fidejussorem a servo accipiat, sive ipse dominus in id, quod sibi naturaliter debetur.

1. Fidejussores may be added in every kind of obligation, i.e. whether the obligation is contracted re, verbis, litteris, or consensu. Nor is it material whether the obligation to which the fidejussor is made an additional party is civil or natural; so much so, that a man may bind himself as a fidejussor for a slave, either to a stranger or to the master of the slave, in respect of a thing due by a natural obligation to the person accepting the fidejussor from the slave.

GAR. iii. 119; D. xlv. 1. 8. 1, 2, and 70. 3.

I In omnibus obligationibus, including obligations arising out of delicts. (D. xlv. 1. 8. 5.) This was the principal advantage gained by the introduction of fidejussores.

2. Fidejussor non tantum ipse obligatur, sed etiam heredem obligatum relinquit.

2. A fidejussor not only binds himself, but leaves also his heir bound.

D. xlv. 1. 4. 1.

II This was the second chief point of difference between fidejussores and sponsores, or fidepromissores. There was no limit to the time during which fidejussores remained bound, such as the lex Furia had laid down for the benefit of sponsores and fidepromissores.

3. Fidejussor et præcedere obligationem et sequi potest.

3. A fidejussor may be added either before or after an obligation is entered into.

D. xlv. 1. 6. pr. and 2.

Probably the formality of verbal contracts exacted that the words of the principal should precede those of the accessory.

4. Si plures sint fidejussores, quotquot erunt numero, singuli in solidum tenentur. Itaque liberum est creditori, a quo velit, solidum petere. Sed ex epistula divi Hadri-

4. Where there are several fidejussores, whatever is their number, each is bound for the whole debt, and the creditor may demand the whole from any of them he pleases. But, ani compellitur creditor a singulis, qui modo solvendo sint litis contestatæ tempore, partes petere. Ideoque si quis ex fidejussoribus eo tempore solvendo non sit, hoc ceteros onerat. Sed et si ab uno fidejussore creditor totum consecutus fuerit, hujus solius detrimentum erit, si is, pro quo fidejussit, solvendo non sit: et sibi imputare debet, cum potuerit adjuvari ex epistula divi Hadriani et desiderare, ut pro parte in se detur actio.

by a rescript of the Emperor Hadrian, the creditor is forced to divide his demand between all those fidejussores who are solvent at the time of the litis contestatio, so that, if any of the fidejussores is not solvent at that time, the rest have so much additional burden. But, if the creditor obtains his whole demand from one of the fidejussores, the whole loss falls upon him alone, if the principal debtor cannot pay; for he has no one but himself to blame, as he might have availed himself of the rescript of the Emperor Hadrian, and might have required that no action should be given against him for more than his share of the debt.

GAI. iii. 121; D. xlv. 1. 26.

The provision of the lex Furia not applying to fidejussores, they were bound for all they had promised; and as each promised for himself alone, the one first sued had no remedy against the other fidejussores, until the rescript of Hadrian provided one, and gave him what was called the beneficium divisionis; but under the lex Furia, the liability was divided among the different sureties ipso jure, whereas the surety first sued was obliged expressly to claim the benefit given by the rescript of Hadrian (beneficium divisionis).

There were two other privileges or beneficia of which the fidejussor might avail himself: one was that cedendum actionum, by which, if the creditor, without suing the debtor, proceeded against the fidejussor, the surety, if prepared to pay the whole debt, could, before paying the creditor, compel him to make over to him the actions which belonged to the stipulator, and thus the fidejussor could sue those bound with him, or the principal debtor (D. xlv. 1. 17), and this was often more advantageous to the fidejussor than having recourse to the rescript of Hadrian, because, if the creditor had taken pledges, they were transferred to the fidejussor, if the actions were ceded to him. If the creditor refused to cede the actions and still sued the surety, he could be repelled by an exceptio doli mali. (D. xlv. 1. 59.)

There was also a beneficium ordinis, or, as it was otherwise termed, excussionis or discussionis, introduced by Justinian (Nov. 4. 1); by this a creditor was bound to sue the principal debtor first, and could only sue the sureties for that which he could not recover from the principal.

5. Fidejussores ita obligari non possunt, ut plus debeant, quam debet is, pro quo obligantur: nam eorum obligatio accessio est principalis obligationis nec plus in accessione esse potest quam in prin-

5. Fidejussores cannot bind themselves for more than the debtor is bound for; because their obligation is accessory to the principal obligation; and the accessory cannot contain more than the principal. They ani compellitur creditor a singulis, qui modo solvendo sint litis contestatae tempore, partes petere. Ideoque si quis ex fidejussoribus eo tempore solvendo non sit, hoc ceteros onerat. Sed et si ab uno fidejussore creditor totum consecutus fuerit, hujus solius detrimentum erit, si is, pro quo fidejussit, solvendo non sit: et sibi imputare debet, cum potuerit adjuvari ex epistula divi Hadriani et desiderare, ut pro parte in se detur actio.

by a rescript of the Emperor Hadrian, the creditor is forced to divide his demand between all those fidejussores who are solvent at the time of the litis contestatio, so that, if any of the fidejussores is not solvent at that time, the rest have so much additional burden. But, if the creditor obtains his whole demand from one of the fidejussores, the whole loss falls upon him alone, if the principal debtor cannot pay; for he has no one but himself to blame, as he might have availed himself of the rescript of the Emperor Hadrian, and might have required that no action should be given against him for more than his share of the debt.

GAI. iii. 121; D. xlv. 1. 26.

The provision of the lex Furia not applying to fidejussores, they were bound for all they had promised; and as each promised for himself alone, the one first sued had no remedy against the other fidejussores, until the rescript of Hadrian provided one, and gave him what was called the beneficium divisionis; but under the lex Furia, the liability was divided among the different sureties ipso jure, whereas the surety first sued was obliged expressly to claim the benefit given by the rescript of Hadrian (beneficium divisionis).

There were two other privileges or beneficia of which the fidejussor might avail himself: one was that cedendum actionum, by which, if the creditor, without suing the debtor, proceeded against the fidejussor, the surety, if prepared to pay the whole debt, could, before paying the creditor, compel him to make over to him the actions which belonged to the stipulator, and thus the fidejussor could sue those bound with him, or the principal debtor (D. xlv. 1. 17), and this was often more advantageous to the fidejussor than having recourse to the rescript of Hadrian, because, if the creditor had taken pledges, they were transferred to the fidejussor, if the actions were ceded to him. If the creditor refused to cede the actions and still sued the surety, he could be repelled by an exceptio doli mali. (D. xlv. 1. 59.)

There was also a beneficium ordinis, or, as it was otherwise termed, excussionis or discussionis, introduced by Justinian (Nov. 4. 1); by this a creditor was bound to sue the principal debtor first, and could only sue the sureties for that which he could not recover from the principal.

5. Fidejussores ita obligari non possunt, ut plus debeant, quam debet is, pro quo obligantur: nam eorum obligatio accessio est principalis obligationis nec plus in accessione esse potest quam in prin-

5. Fidejussores cannot bind themselves for more than the debtor is bound for; because their obligation is accessory to the principal obligation; and the accessory cannot contain more than the principal. They may, however, bind themselves for less. Therefore, if the principal debtor promises ten aurei, the fidejussor may be bound for five, but the fidejussor cannot be bound for ten when the principal debtor is bound only for five. Again, when the principal promises unconditionally, the fidejussor may promise conditionally, but the converse case is not possible. For the terms more and less are used not only with respect to quantity, but also with respect to time; it is more to give a thing instantly, it is less to give it after a time.

cipali re. At ex diverso, ut minus debeant, obligari possunt. Itaque si reus decem aureos promiserit, fidejussor in quinque recte obligatur: contra vero non potest obligari. Item si ille pure promiserit, fidejussor sub condicione promittere potest: contra vero non potest. Non solum enim in quantitate, sed etiam in tempore minus et plus intelligitur. Plus est enim statim aliquid dare, minus est post tempus dare.

GAI. iii. 113, 126.

his mandati
6. Si quid autem fidejussor pro reo solverit, ejus recipiendi causa habet cum eo mandati iudicium.

6. If a fidejussor has made payment for the debtor, he may have an actio mandati against him to recover what he has paid.

GAI. iii. 127.

'If he had intervened without the knowledge of the principal, he would have an actio negotiorum gestorum, not mandati (Tit. 27. 1); and he would have neither of these actions if he had intervened in defiance of the wishes of the principal, though it was doubtful whether he had not an actio utilis. (D. xvii. 1. 40.) Justinian declared that he should have no action at all. (C. ii. 19. 24.)

7. Græce fidejussor plerumque ita accipitur: τῇ ἐμῇ πίστει κελεύω, λέγω, θέλω sive βούλομαι: sed et si φημί dixerit, pro eo erit, ac si dixerit λέγω.

7. A fidejussor may bind himself in Greek, by using the expression τῇ ἐμῇ πίστει κελεύω (I order upon my faith), λέγω (I say), θέλω or βούλομαι (I wish); if he uses the word φημί, it will be equivalent to λέγω.

D. xli. 1. 8. pr.

The appropriate Latin formula was, 'Idem fide meū esse jubeo,' but this formula was probably never insisted on, as the formulæ 'spondeo' and 'idem fide mea promitto' were.

8. In stipulationibus fidejussorum sciendum est generaliter hoc accipi, ut, quodcumque scriptum sit quasi actum, videatur etiam actum: ideoque constat, si quis se scripserit fidejus isse, videri omnia sollemniter acta.

8. It is a general rule in all stipulations of fidejussores, that whatever is stated in writing to have been done, is considered really to have been done. If, therefore, any one states in writing that he has bound himself as a fidejussor, it is presumed that all the necessary forms were observed.

D. xlv. 1. 30.

Cautio was the general term for the documentary evidence of a contract.

cipali re. At ex diverso, ut minus debeant, obligari possunt. Itaque si reus decem aureos promiserit, fidejussor in quinque recte obligatur: contra vero non potest obligari. Item si ille pure promiserit, fidejussor sub condicione promittere potest: contra vero non potest. Non solum enim in quantitate, sed etiam in tempore minus et plus intelligitur. Plus est enim statim aliquid dare, minus est post tempus dare.

may, however, bind themselves for less. Therefore, if the principal debtor promises ten aurei, the fidejussor may be bound for five, but the fidejussor cannot be bound for ten when the principal debtor is bound only for five. Again, when the principal promises unconditionally, the fidejussor may promise conditionally, but the converse case is not possible. For the terms more and less are used not only with respect to quantity, but also with respect to time; it is more to give a thing instantly, it is less to give it after a time.

GAI. iii. 113, 126.

6. Si quid autem fidejussor pro reo solverit, ejus recipiendi causa habet cum eo mandati iudicium.

6. If a fidejussor has made payment for the debtor, he may have an actio mandati against him to recover what he has paid.

GAI. iii. 127.

'If he had intervened without the knowledge of the principal, he would have an actio negotiorum gestorum, not mandati (Tit. 27. 1); and he would have neither of these actions if he had intervened in defiance of the wishes of the principal, though it was doubtful whether he had not an actio utilis. (D. xvii. l. 40.) Justinian declared that he should have no action at all. (C. ii. 19. 24.)

7. Græce fidejussor plerumque ita accipitur: τῇ ἐμῇ πίστει κελεύω, λέγω, θέλω sive βούλομαι: sed et si φημί dixerit, pro eo erit, ac si dixerit λέγω.

7. A fidejussor may bind himself in Greek, by using the expression τῇ ἐμῇ πίστει κελεύω (I order upon my faith), λέγω (I say), θέλω or βούλομαι (I wish); if he uses the word φημί, it will be equivalent to λέγω.

D. xlv. l. 8. pr.

The appropriate Latin formula was, 'Idem fide meo esse jubeo,' but this formula was probably never insisted on, as the formulæ 'spondeo' and 'idem fide mea promitto' were.

8. In stipulationibus fidejussorum sciendum est generaliter hoc accipi, ut, quodcumque scriptum sit quasi actum, videatur etiam actum: ideoque constat, si quis se scripserit fidejus isse, videri omnia sollemniter acta.

8. It is a general rule in all stipulations of fidejussores, that whatever is stated in writing to have been done, is considered really to have been done. If, therefore, any one states in writing that he has bound himself as a fidejussor, it is presumed that all the necessary forms were observed.

D. xlv. l. 30.

Cautio was the general term for the documentary evidence of a contract.

III. Litteris

TIT. XXI. DE LITTERARUM OBLIGATIONE.

Olim scriptura fiebat obligatio, quæ nominibus fieri dicebatur: quæ nomina hodie non sunt in usu. Plane si quis debere se scripserit, quod numeratum ei non est, de pecunia minime numerata post multum temporis exceptionem opponere non potest: hoc enim sæpissime constitutum est. Sic fit, ut et hodie, dum queri non potest, scriptura obligetur: et ex ea nascitur condictio, cessante scilicet verborum obligatione. Multum autem tempus in hac exceptione antea quidem ex principalibus constitutionibus usque ad quinquennium procedebat: sed ne creditores diutius possint suis pecuniis forsitan defraudari, per constitutionem nostram tempus coartatum est, ut ultra biennii metas hujusmodi exceptio minime extendatur.

Formerly there was made by writing a kind of obligation, which was said to be made nominibus (by booking debts). These nomina are now no longer in use. But if any one states in writing that he owes a sum which has never really been told out to him, he cannot, after a long time has elapsed, use the exception non numeratæ pecuniæ, i.e. that the money has not been told out. This has been often decided by imperial constitutions; and thus, even at the present day, as he cannot relieve himself from payment, he is bound by the writing, and the writing gives rise to a condictio, in the absence, that is, of any verbal obligation. The length of time fixed as barring this exception, was, under imperial constitutions antecedent to our time, not less than five years. But, that creditors might not be exposed too long to the risk of being defrauded of their money, we have shortened the time by our constitution, and this exception cannot now be used beyond the space of two years.

GAL. iii. 128-134; C. iv. 30. 14.

A contract was said to be formed litteris, when it originated in a certain entry or statement of it being made in the books of the creditor with the consent of the debtor. Regularity in keeping accounts, and in entering all matters of business in a private ledger, was considered one of the first duties of a Roman citizen. Cicero speaks of a failure in this duty as an almost insupposable act of negligence and dishonesty. (See pro Roscio, 3. 1 and 3.) Events, as they occurred, were jotted down in rough memorandums called adversaria, and these were transferred at least once a month to the ledger (codex or tabula). It was probably only this ledger which had any legal importance. If any one put down in his ledger that he had advanced such a sum of money to another (expensum ferre), this entry (expensilatio) was an admissible proof of the fact. If the debtor also had made a corresponding entry in his ledger (acceptum referre, acceptilatio), the tallying of the two together made what was called an obligatio litteris. These two entries had, in fact, exactly the same effect as if the two parties had entered into a stipulation. But this was not all: the creditor was not to be placed entirely at the mercy of his debtor, whose wilful or accidental negligence, preventing a proper entry, might make the

Litteris contractus

II. Litteris

TIT. XXI. DE LITTERARUM OBLIGATIONE.

Olim scriptura fiebat obligatio, quæ nominibus fieri dicebatur: quæ nomina hodie non sunt in usu. Plane si quis debere se scripserit, quod numeratum ei non est, de pecunia minime numerata post multum temporis exceptionem opponere non potest: hoc enim sæpissime constitutum est. Sic fit, ut et hodie, dum queri non potest, scriptura obligetur: et ex ea nascitur conditio, cessante scilicet verborum obligatione. Multum autem tempus in hac exceptione antea quidem ex principalibus constitutionibus usque ad quinquennium procedebat: sed ne creditores diutius possint suis pecuniis forsitan defraudari, per constitutionem nostram tempus coartatum est, ut ultra biennii metas hujusmodi exceptio minime extendatur.

Formerly there was made by writing a kind of obligation, which was said to be made nominibus (by booking debts). These nomina are now no longer in use. But if any one states in writing that he owes a sum which has never really been told out to him, he cannot, after a long time has elapsed, use the exception non numerata pecunia, i.e. that the money has not been told out. This has been often decided by imperial constitutions; and thus, even at the present day, as he cannot relieve himself from payment, he is bound by the writing, and the writing gives rise to a condemnation, in the absence, that is, of any verbal obligation. The length of time fixed as barring this exception, was, under imperial constitutions antecedent to our time, not less than five years. But, that creditors might not be exposed too long to the risk of being defrauded of their money, we have shortened the time by our constitution, and this exception cannot now be used beyond the space of two years.

GAI. III. 128-134; C. IV. 30. 14.

A contract was said to be formed litteris when it originated in a certain entry or statement of it being made in the books of the creditor with the consent of the debtor. Regularity in keeping accounts, and in entering all matters of business in a private ledger, was considered one of the first duties of a Roman citizen. Cicero speaks of a failure in this duty as an almost insupposable act of negligence and dishonesty. (See pro Roscio, 3. 1 and 3.) Events, as they occurred, were jotted down in rough memorandums called adversario, and these were transferred at least once a month to the ledger (codex or tabula). It was probably only this ledger which had any legal importance. If any one put down in his ledger that he had advanced such a sum of money to another (expensum ferre), this entry (expensilatio) was an admissible proof of the fact. If the debtor also had made a corresponding entry in his ledger (acceptum referre, acceptilatio), the tallying of the two together made what was called an obligatio litteris. These two entries had, in fact, exactly the same effect as if the two parties had entered into a stipulation. But this was not all: the creditor was not to be placed entirely at the mercy of his debtor, whose wilful or accidental negligence, preventing a proper entry, might make the obligation fail. The real source of the obligation was taken to be the consent of the debtor to the entry made by the creditor. If the debtor made a corresponding entry in his ledger, this was a conclusive proof that he had consented to the creditor's entry; but if he did not, then the creditor might still prove, in any way that he could, that he had really made his entry with the debtor's consent. Of course, if he had really paid the money over, this, if proved, would show beyond a doubt that the debtor had consented.

Litteris contract

The foundation of this contract litteris being either the payment of a sum certain by the creditor, or simply the statement in the codex that a sum certain was due by the debtor, the obligation was always for a sum certain, and was therefore enforced by condictio certi, more usually termed simply condictio.

As the creditor put down the name of his debtor, the word 'nomen' came to signify a debt; and Gaius speaks of 'nominum transcripticia.' He says transcriptio took place (1) a re in personam, as when something being already owed, as, for instance, under a contract of sale or of letting to hire, the debtor assented to the creditor making an entry of the debt (GAI. iii. 129): this operated as a novatio (see Introd. sec. 89) of the old debt, and the creditor could now employ a condictio to enforce his claim; (2) the transcriptio took place a persona in personam, viz. when one man took on himself the debt of another. (GAI. iii. 130.) In both cases the effect was that the debtor recognised that a fictitious loan had been made to him. He assented to its being recorded in the codex that he had received in account what he owed on the sale, or what the third person, whose debt he was taking over, had received.

These contracts were peculiar to Roman citizens. Peregrini had, as a substitute, syngraphae, signed by both parties, or chirographa, signed only by the debtor, and retained by the creditor. The syngraphae and chirographa were not mere proofs of a contract, but were instruments on which an action could be brought, and the making of which operated as a novation of an existing debt.

In every period of the law, if there was a formal verbal contract, the written contract was thought subsidiary, and was merged in the stipulation: as the text says, nascitur condictio, cessante scilicet verborum obligatione.

An entry by a creditor might either profess to create an obligation (the obligatio litteris properly so called), or to operate as a novatio. In the former case, it was open to the alleged debtor to show that he had never consented, i.e. that there was no contract. In the latter case, when the debtor had not really received the money, the praetor permitted him to repel the action of the creditor by an exception called the 'exceptio non numerata pecuniae,' by which the debtor insisted that the money which formed the consideration of the obligation had never been told or counted out to him; and here, contrary to the usual rule as to obligation fail. The real source of the obligation was taken to be the consent of the debtor to the entry made by the creditor. If the debtor made a corresponding entry in his ledger, this was a conclusive proof that he had consented to the creditor's entry; but if he did not, then the creditor might still prove, in any way that he could, that he had really made his entry with the debtor's consent. Of course, if he had really paid the money over, this, if proved, would show beyond a doubt that the debtor had consented.

The foundation of this contract litteris being either the payment of a sum certain by the creditor, or simply the statement in the codex that a sum certain was due by the debtor, the obligation was always for a sum certain, and was therefore enforced by condictio certi, more usually termed simply condictio.

As the creditor put down the name of his debtor, the word 'nomen' came to signify a debt; and Gaius speaks of 'nomina transcripticia.' He says transcriptio took place (1) a re in personam, as when something being already owed, as, for instance, under a contract of sale or of letting to hire, the debtor assented to the creditor making an entry of the debt (GAI. iii. 129): this operated as a novatio (see Introd. sec. 89) of the old debt, and the creditor could now employ a condictio to enforce his claim; (2) the transcriptio took place a persona in personam, viz. when one man took on himself the debt of another. (GAI. iii. 130.) In both cases the effect was that the debtor recognised that a fictitious loan had been made to him. He assented to its being recorded in the codex that he had received in account what he owed on the sale, or what the third person, whose debt he was taking over, had received.

These contracts were peculiar to Roman citizens. Peregrini had, as a substitute, syngraphæ, signed by both parties, or chirographæ, signed only by the debtor, and retained by the creditor. The syngraphæ and chirographæ were not mere proofs of a contract, but were instruments on which an action could be brought, and the making of which operated as a novation of an existing debt.

In every period of the law, if there was a formal verbal contract, the written contract was thought subsidiary, and was merged in the stipulation: as the text says, nascitur condictio, cessante scilicet verborum obligatione.

An entry by a creditor might either profess to create an obligation (the obligatio litteris properly so called), or to operate as a novatio. In the former case, it was open to the alleged debtor to show that he had never consented, i.e. that there was no contract. In the latter case, when the debtor had not really received the money, the prætor permitted him to repel the action of the creditor by an exception called the 'exceptio non numeratæ pecuniæ,' by which the debtor insisted that the money which formed the consideration of the obligation had never been told or counted out to him; and here, contrary to the usual rule as to exceptions (Bk. iv. Tit. 13. pr. note), the burden of proof was considered to fall on the plaintiff, i.e. the creditor. It was for him to prove that he had paid the money, not for the debtor to prove that he had not.

This power of calling on the creditor to prove that he had really made the loan was extended to cases where the debtor had not gone through the form of the contract litteris, but had merely given a general acknowledgment of debt (cautio), such as is spoken of in the text. Although cautiones were not properly contracts, but proofs of a contract, yet, as they were protected by the same exception (C. iv. 30. 3), they were equivalent to and superseded contracts litteris. It will be noticed that the text uses the words scriptura obligetur, as if the obligation was created by the writing. This may account for Justinian at once telling us that contracts litteris were obsolete, and yet giving them a place in the Institutes.

After a certain number of years—~~first one, then five, and fixed~~ by Justinian at two—the debtor was bound by the writing conclusively. (C. iv. 30. 14.) During this period, however, the debtor who had not really received the money need not wait to be sued; he might protest in a public act against any writing by which he admitted, or was alleged to have admitted, a debt, or bring an action against the creditor to compel him to give it up (C. iv. 30. 7); and a constitution in the Code (iv. 30. 14. 4) permitted him to make his exception perpetual by a formal announcement to the creditor of his intention to do so, and by his going through certain forms. If it was proved that the debtor had falsely denied having received what he had really received, Justinian ordered by a Novel (18. 8) that he should pay double the amount.

IV Consensus

TIT. XXII. DE CONSENSU OBLIGATIONE.

Consensu fiunt obligationes in emptionibus venditionibus, locationibus conductionibus, societatibus, mandatis. Ideo autem istis modis consensu dicitur obligatio contrahi, quia neque scriptura neque presentia omnimodo opus est, ac ne dari quidquam necesse est, ut substantiam capiat obligatio, sed sufficit eos, qui negotium gerunt, consentire. Unde inter absentes quoque talia negotia contrahuntur, veluti per epistulam aut per nuntium. Item in his contractibus alter alteri obligatur in id, quod alterum alteri ex bono et æquo præstare oportet, cum alioquin in verborum obligationibus aliis stipuletur, aliis promittat.

Obligations are formed by the mere consent of the parties in the contracts of sale, of letting to hire, of partnership, and of mandate. An obligation is, in these cases, said to be made by the mere consent of the parties, because there is no necessity for any writing, nor even for the presence of the parties; nor is it requisite that anything should be given to make the contract binding, but the mere consent of those between whom the transaction is carried on suffices. Thus these contracts may be entered into by those who are at a distance from each other by means of letters, for instance, or of messengers. In these contracts each party is bound to the other to render him all that equity demands, while in verbal obligations one party stipulates and the other promises.

*mentioned
by letters
or messengers*

exceptions (Bk. iv. Tit. 13. pr. note), the burden of proof was considered to fall on the plaintiff, i.e. the creditor. It was for him to prove that he had paid the money, not for the debtor to prove that he had not.

This power of calling on the creditor to prove that he had really made the loan was extended to cases where the debtor had not gone through the form of the contract litteris, but had merely given a general acknowledgment of debt (cautio), such as is spoken of in the text. Although cautiones were not properly contracts, but proofs of a contract, yet, as they were protected by the same exception (C. iv. 30. 3), they were equivalent to and superseded contracts litteris. It will be noticed that the text uses the words scriptura obligetur, as if the obligation was created by the writing. This may account for Justinian at once telling us that contracts litteris were obsolete, and yet giving them a place in the Institutes.

After a certain number of years—~~first one, then five, and fixed~~ by Justinian at two—the debtor was bound by the writing conclusively. (C. iv. 30. 14.) During this period, however, the debtor who had not really received the money need not wait to be sued; he might protest in a public act against any writing by which he admitted, or was alleged to have admitted, a debt, or bring an action against the creditor to compel him to give it up (C. iv. 30. 7); and a constitution in the Code (iv. 30. 14. 4) permitted him to make his exception perpetual by a formal announcement to the creditor of his intention to do so, and by his going through certain forms. If it was proved that the debtor had falsely denied having received what he had really received, Justinian ordered by a Novel (18. 8) that he should pay double the amount.

Consensus

TIT. XXII. DE CONSENSU OBLIGATIONE.

Consensu fiunt obligationes in emptionibus venditionibus, locationibus conductionibus, societatibus, mandatis. Ideo autem istis modis consensu dicitur obligatio contrahi, quia neque scriptura neque presentia omnimodo opus est, ac ne dari quidquam necesse est, ut substantiam capiat obligatio, sed sufficit eos, qui negotium gerunt, consentire. Unde inter absentes quoque talia negotia contrahuntur, veluti per epistulam aut per nuntium. Item in his contractibus alter alteri obligatur in id, quod alterum alteri ex bono et æquo præstare oportet, cum alioquin in verborum obligationibus alius stipuletur, alius promittat.

Obligations are formed by the mere consent of the parties in the contracts of sale, of letting to hire, of partnership, and of mandate. An obligation is, in these cases, said to be made by the mere consent of the parties, because there is no necessity for any writing, nor even for the presence of the parties; nor is it requisite that anything should be given to make the contract binding, but the mere consent of those between whom the transaction is carried on suffices. Thus these contracts may be entered into by those who are at a distance from each other by means of letters, for instance, or of messengers. In these contracts each party is bound to the other to render him all that equity demands, while in verbal obligations one party stipulates and the other promises.

*mere consent
by letters
messengers*

We now pass to contracts which belong to the jus gentium, which have nothing of the peculiar characteristics of the old civil law of Rome, and which are perfected by the simple consent of the parties. As is remarked in the concluding words of the text, these contracts by simple consent, unlike the contracts of which we have hitherto spoken, are bilateral; there is something which binds both parties; whereas the older and peculiarly Roman contracts were only unilateral. In a stipulation, for instance, it was only the promissor that was bound. Commodatum, depositum, and pignus were only bilateral in the sense that they gave rise to actiones contrariae under certain circumstances, so that then both parties were bound by them. These contracts 'consensu' were not enforced by actions stricti juris, such as were proper to the peculiarly Roman contracts of mutuum, stipulation, and contracts made litteris, but by actions 'bonae fidei,' i.e. praetorian actions, in which equitable principles were permitted to govern the decision. (See Intro. sec. 106.)

TIT. XXIII. DE EMPTIONE ET VENDITIONE.

price agreed upon earnest given may given
then of a bargain

Emptio et venditio contrahitur, simulatque de pretio conveniunt, quamvis nondum pretium numeratum sit ac ne arra quidem data fuerit. Nam quod arra nomine datur, argumentum est emptionis et venditionis contractus. Sed haec quidem de emptionibus et venditionibus, quae sine scriptura consistunt, optinere oportet: nam nihil a nobis in hujusmodi venditionibus innovatum est. In his autem, quae scriptura conficiuntur, non aliter perfectam esse emptionem et venditionem constituimus, nisi et instrumenta emptionis fuerint conscripta vel manu propria contrahentium, vel ab alio quidem scripta, a contrahente autem subscripta et, si per tabellionem fiunt, nisi et completiones acceperint et fuerint partibus absoluta. Donec enim aliquid ex his deest, et penitentiae locus est et potest emptor vel venditor sine poena recedere ab emptione. Ita tamen impune recedere eis concedimus, nisi jam arrarum nomine aliquid fuerit datum: hoc etenim subsequuto, sive in scriptis sive sine scriptis venditio celebrata est, is, qui recusat adimplere contractum, si quidem emptor est, perdit, quod dedit, si vero venditor, duplum restituere compellitur, licet nihil super arris expressum est.

The contract of sale is formed as soon as the price is agreed upon, although it has not yet been paid, nor even an earnest given; for what is given as an earnest only serves as proof that the contract has been made. This must be understood of sales made without writing; for with regard to these we have made no alteration in the law. But, where there is a written contract, we have enacted that a sale is not to be considered completed unless an instrument of sale has been drawn up, being either written by the contracting parties, or at least signed by them, if written by others; or if drawn up by a tabellio, it must be formally complete and finished throughout; for as long as any of these requirements is wanting, there is room to retract, and either the buyer or seller may retract without suffering loss: that is, if no earnest has been given. If earnest has been given, then, whether the contract was written or unwritten, the purchaser, if he refuses to fulfil it, loses what he has given as earnest, and the seller, if he refuses, has to restore double; although no agreement on the subject of the earnest was expressly made.

We now pass to contracts which belong to the jus gentium, which have nothing of the peculiar characteristics of the old civil law of Rome, and which are perfected by the simple consent of the parties. As is remarked in the concluding words of the text, these contracts by simple consent, unlike the contracts of which we have hitherto spoken, are bilateral; there is something which binds both parties; whereas the older and peculiarly Roman contracts were only unilateral. In a stipulation, for instance, it was only the promissor that was bound. Commodatum, depositum, and pignus were only bilateral in the sense that they gave rise to actiones contrariae under certain circumstances, so that then both parties were bound by them. These contracts 'consensu' were not enforced by actions stricti juris, such as were proper to the peculiarly Roman contracts of mutuum, stipulation, and contracts made litteris, but by actions 'bonae fidei,' i.e. praetorian actions, in which equitable principles were permitted to govern the decision. (See Introd. sec. 106.)

TIT. XXIII. DE EMPTIONE ET VENDITIONE.

Emptio et venditio contrahitur, simulatque de pretio convenierit, quamvis nondum pretium numeratum sit ac ne arra quidem data fuerit. Nam quod arra nomine datur, argumentum est emptionis et venditionis contractae. Sed huc quidem de emptionibus et venditionibus, quae sine scriptura consistunt, optinere oportet: nam nihil a nobis in hujusmodi venditionibus innovatum est. In his autem, quae scriptura conficiuntur, non aliter perfectam esse emptionem et venditionem constituimus, nisi et instrumenta emptionis fuerint conscripta vel manu propria contrahentium, vel ab alio quidem scripta, a contrahente autem subscripta et, si per tabellionem fiunt, nisi et completiones acceperint et fuerint partibus absoluta. Donec enim aliquid ex his deest, et poenitentiae locus est et potest emptor vel venditor sine poena recedere ab emptione. Ita tamen impune recedere eis concedimus, nisi jam arrarum nomine aliquid fuerit datum: hoc etenim subsequuto, sive in scriptis sive sine scriptis venditio celebrata est, is, qui recusat adimplere contractum, si quidem emptor est, perdit, quod dedit, si vero venditor, duplum restituere compellitur, licet nihil super arris expressum est.

The contract of sale is formed as soon as the price is agreed upon, although it has not yet been paid, nor even an earnest given; for what is given as an earnest only serves as proof that the contract has been made. This must be understood of sales made without writing; for with regard to these we have made no alteration in the law. But, where there is a written contract, we have enacted that a sale is not to be considered completed unless an instrument of sale has been drawn up, being either written by the contracting parties, or at least signed by them, if written by others; or if drawn up by a tabellio, it must be formally complete and finished throughout; for as long as any of these requirements is wanting, there is room to retract, and either the buyer or seller may retract without suffering loss: that is, if no earnest has been given. If earnest has been given, then, whether the contract was written or unwritten, the purchaser, if he refuses to fulfil it, loses what he has given as earnest, and the seller, if he refuses, has to restore double; although no agreement on the subject of the earnest was expressly made.

The contract of sale belonging to the jus gentium was attended with none of those material symbols which characterised the formation of contracts under the civil law. Directly one person agreed to sell a particular thing, and another to buy it, for a fixed sum of money, the contract was complete; no thing need be delivered, no money paid, in order that an obligation should arise. On the mutual consent being given, the seller was bound to deliver, the buyer to pay the price. The change which Justinian here introduced is that, when, in giving this mutual consent, they agree that the terms of the contract shall be reduced to writing, they shall be considered not to have consented to the contract until all the formalities have been gone through.

The arrae were either signs of a bargain having been struck, as, for instance, when the buyer deposited his ring with the seller (D. xix. 1. 11. 6), or consisted of an advance of a portion of the purchase-money. They were also intended as a proof that the purchase had been made. Justinian gave these deposits a new character by making them the measures of a forfeit in case either party wished to recede from his bargain, it being open to either party to retract if he chose to incur this forfeit. This power of retracting by forfeiture of the deposit, or double its value, was a great change in the law; and when Justinian says nihil in hujusmodi venditionibus innovatum est, he must be understood only to be referring to unwritten contracts of sale in which there was no deposit made as earnest. It will be seen from the text that this power of retractation was given whether the contract was made with writing or without.

Besides a buyer and a seller, there must, in a contract of sale, be a fixed price and a particular thing sold. The jurists are very minute in their distinctions of the nature of the thing sold. There is a distinction with regard to things future and uncertain forming the object of a sale, which is worth mentioning. Either a proportionate price may be agreed to be paid on a greater or lesser number of things that may be actually realised, as 'so much a head for all the fish I catch to-day,' which is termed rei speratae emptio; or a definite sum may be agreed on as the price of the possibility of any number of things, more or less, being realised, as 'so much for the chance of all the fish I catch to-day;' and this was termed spei emptio. (D. xviii. 1. 8. 1.)

1. Pretium autem constitui oportet: nam nulla emptio sine pretio esse potest. Sed et certum pretium esse debet. Alioquin si ita inter aliquos convenerit, quanti Titius rem aestimaverit, tanti sit empti: inter veteres satis abundeque hoc dubitabatur, sive constat venditio sive non. Sed nostra decisio ita hoc constituit, ut, quotiens sic composita sit venditio 'quanti ille aestimaverit,' sub hac condicione sta-

1. It is necessary that a price should be agreed upon, for there can be no sale without a price. And the price must be fixed and certain. If the parties agree that the thing shall be sold at the sum at which Titius shall value it, it was a question much debated among the ancients, whether in such a case there is a sale or not. We have decided, that when a sale is made for a price to be fixed by a third person, the contract shall be binding

Justinian

Arrae

Justinian

1 Buyer
2 Seller
3 fixed price
4 uncertain thing
5 thing sold

no sale without wh. must fixed

The contract of sale belonging to the jus gentium was attended with none of those material symbols which characterised the formation of contracts under the civil law. Directly one person agreed to sell a particular thing, and another to buy it, for a fixed sum of money, the contract was complete; no thing need be delivered, no money paid, in order that an obligation should arise. On the mutual consent being given, the seller was bound to deliver, the buyer to pay the price. The change which Justinian here introduced is that, when, in giving this mutual consent, they agree that the terms of the contract shall be reduced to writing, they shall be considered not to have consented to the contract until all the formalities have been gone through.

The arrae were either signs of a bargain having been struck, as, for instance, when the buyer deposited his ring with the seller (D. xix. 1. 11. 6), or consisted of an advance of a portion of the purchase-money. They were also intended as a proof that the purchase had been made. Justinian gave these deposits a new character by making them the measures of a forfeit in case either party wished to recede from his bargain, it being open to either party to retract if he chose to incur this forfeit. This power of retracting by forfeiture of the deposit, or double its value, was a great change in the law; and when Justinian says nihil in hujusmodi venditionibus innovatum est, he must be understood only to be referring to unwritten contracts of sale in which there was no deposit made as earnest. It will be seen from the text that this power of retraction was given whether the contract was made with writing or without.

Besides a buyer and a seller, there must, in a contract of sale, be a fixed price and a particular thing sold. The jurists are very minute in their distinctions of the nature of the thing sold. There is a distinction with regard to things future and uncertain forming the object of a sale, which is worth mentioning. Either a proportionate price may be agreed to be paid on a greater or lesser number of things that may be actually realised, as 'so much a head for all the fish I catch to-day,' which is termed rei speratae emptio; or a definite sum may be agreed on as the price of the possibility of any number of things, more or less, being realised, as 'so much for the chance of all the fish I catch to-day;' and this was termed spei emptio. (D. xviii. 1. 8. 1.)

1. Pretium autem constitui oportet: nam nulla emptio sine pretio esse potest. Sed et certum pretium esse debet. Alioquin si ita inter aliquos convenerit, ut, quanti Titius rem aestimaverit, tanti sit empti: inter veteres satis abundeque hoc dubitabatur, sive constaret venditio sive non. Sed nostra decisio ita hoc constituit, ut, quotiens sic composita sit venditio 'quanti ille aestimaverit,' sub hac condicione sta-

1. It is necessary that a price should be agreed upon, for there can be no sale without a price. And the price must be fixed and certain. If the parties agree that the thing shall be sold at the sum at which Titius shall value it, it was a question much debated among the ancients, whether in such a case there is a sale or not. We have decided, that when a sale is made for a price to be fixed by a third person, the contract shall be binding

Justinian

Arrae

Justinian

1 Buyer
2 Seller
3 Goods for sale
4 Particular thing sold

no sale without a price which must be fixed etc

ret contractus, ut, si quidem ipse, qui nominatus est, pretium definierit, omnimodo secundum ejus estimationem et pretium persolvatur et res tradatur, ut venditio ad effectum perducatur, emptore quidem ex empto actione, venditore autem ex vendito agente. Sin autem ille, qui nominatus est, vel noluerit vel non potuerit pretium definire, tunc pro nihilo esse venditionem, quasi nullo pretio statuto. Quod jus cum in venditionibus nobis placuit, non est absurdum et in locationibus et conductionibus trahere.

under this condition--that if this third person does fix a price, the price to be paid shall be that which he fixes, and the thing shall be delivered, so that the sale becomes complete, the purchaser having the actio ex empto, and the seller having that ex vendito. But if he will not or cannot fix a price, the sale is then void, as being made without any price being fixed on. This decision, which we have adopted with respect to sales, may reasonably be made to apply to contracts of letting on hire.

GAI. iii. 140; C. iv. 38. 15.

2. Item pretium in numerata pecunia consistere debet. Nam in ceteris rebus an pretium esse possit, veluti homo aut fundus aut toga alterius rei pretium esse possit, valde querebatur. Sabinus et Cassius etiam in alia re putant posse pretium consistere: unde illud est, quod vulgo dicebatur, per permutationem rerum emptionem et venditionem contrahi eamque speciem emptionis venditionisque vetustissimam esse: argumentoque utebantur Græco poeta Homero, qui aliqua parte exercitum Achivorum vinum sibi comparasse ait permutatis quibusdam rebus, his verbis:

Ἐνθεν ἄρ' οἰνίζοντο καρπηκόωντες
Ἀχαιοί,
Ἄλλοι μὲν χαλκῷ, ἄλλοι δ' αἶθωνι σιδῆρῳ,
Ἄλλοι δὲ μίνοϊς, ἄλλοι δ' αὐτῆσι βόεσσιν,
Ἄλλοι δ' ἀνδραπόδεσσιν.

Diverse scholæ auctores contra sentiebant aliudque esse existimabant permutationem rerum, aliud emptionem et venditionem. Alioquin non posse rem expediri, permutatis rebus, quæ videatur res venisse et quæ pretii nomine data esse: nam utrumque videri et venisse et pretii nomine datam esse, rationem non pati. Sed Proculi sententia dicentis, permutationem propriam esse speciem contractus a venditione separatan, merito prævaluit, cum et ipse aliis Homericis versibus adjuvatur et validioribus rationibus argumentatur. Quod et anteriores divi principes admiserunt et in nostris digestis latius significatur.

2. The price should consist in a sum of money. It has been much doubted whether it can consist in anything else, as in a slave, a piece of land, or a toga. Sabinus and Cassius thought that it could. And it is thus that it is commonly said that exchange is a sale, and that this form of sale is the most ancient. The testimony of Homer was quoted, who in one place says that the army of the Greeks procured wine by an exchange of certain things. The passage is this:--

'The long-haired Achæans procured wine, some by giving copper, others by giving shining steel, others by giving hides, others by giving oxen, others by giving slaves.'

The authors of the opposite school were of a contrary opinion: they thought that exchange was one thing and sale another. Otherwise, in an exchange, it would be impossible to say which was the thing sold, and which the thing given as the price; for it was contrary to reason to consider each thing as at once sold, and given as the price. The opinion of Proculus, who maintained that exchange is a particular kind of contract distinct from sale, has deservedly prevailed, as it is supported by other lines from Homer, and by still more weighty reasons. This view has been adopted by former emperors, and has been fully treated of in our Digest.

GAI. iii. 141; D. xviii. 1. 1.; C. iv. 64. 7.

ret contractus, ut, si quidem ipse, qui nominatus est, pretium definierit, omnimodo secundum ejus estimationem et pretium persolvatur et res tradatur, ut venditio ad effectum perducatur, emptore quidem ex empto actione, venditore autem ex vendito agente. Sin autem ille, qui nominatus est, vel noluerit vel non potuerit pretium definire, tunc pro nihilo esse venditionem, quasi nullo pretio statuto. Quod jus cum in venditionibus nobis placuit, non est absurdum et in locationibus et conductionibus trahere.

under this condition--that if this third person does fix a price, the price to be paid shall be that which he fixes, and the thing shall be delivered, so that the sale becomes complete, the purchaser having the actio ex empto, and the seller having that ex vendito. But if he will not or cannot fix a price, the sale is then void, as being made without any price being fixed on. This decision, which we have adopted with respect to sales, may reasonably be made to apply to contracts of letting on hire.

GAI. iii. 140; C. iv. 38. 15.

2. Item pretium in numerata pecunia consistere debet. Nam in ceteris rebus an pretium esse possit, veluti homo aut fundus aut toga alterius rei pretium esse possit, valde querebatur. Sabinus et Cassius etiam in alia re putant posse pretium consistere: unde illud est, quod vulgo dicebatur, per permutationem rerum emptionem et venditionem contrahi eamque speciem emptionis venditionisque vetustissimam esse: argumentoque utebantur Græco poeta Homero, qui aliqua parte exercitum Achivorum vinum sibi comparasse ait permutatis quibusdam rebus, his verbis:

Ἐνθεν ἄρ' οἰνίζοντο καρπηκόωντες
Ἀχαιοί,
Ἄλλοι μὲν χαλκῷ, ἄλλοι δ' αἶθωνι σιδῆρῳ,
Ἄλλοι δὲ μίνοισ, ἄλλοι δ' αὐτῆσι βόεσσιν,
Ἄλλοι δ' ἀνδραπόδεσσιν.

Diverse scholæ auctores contra sentiebant aliudque esse existimabant permutationem rerum, aliud emptionem et venditionem. Alioquin non posse rem expediri, permutatis rebus, quæ videatur res venisse et quæ pretii nomine data esse: nam utrumque videri et venisse et pretii nomine datam esse, rationem non pati. Sed Proculi sententia dicentis, permutationem propriam esse speciem contractus a venditione separatan, merito prævaluit, cum et ipse aliis Homericis versibus adjuvatur et validioribus rationibus argumentatur. Quod et anteriores divi principes admiserunt et in nostris digestis latius significatur.

2. The price should consist in a sum of money. It has been much doubted whether it can consist in anything else, as in a slave, a piece of land, or a toga. Sabinus and Cassius thought that it could. And it is thus that it is commonly said that exchange is a sale, and that this form of sale is the most ancient. The testimony of Homer was quoted, who in one place says that the army of the Greeks procured wine by an exchange of certain things. The passage is this:--

'The long-haired Achæans procured wine, some by giving copper, others by giving shining steel, others by giving hides, others by giving oxen, others by giving slaves.'

The authors of the opposite school were of a contrary opinion: they thought that exchange was one thing and sale another. Otherwise, in an exchange, it would be impossible to say which was the thing sold, and which the thing given as the price; for it was contrary to reason to consider each thing as at once sold, and given as the price. The opinion of Proculus, who maintained that exchange is a particular kind of contract distinct from sale, has deservedly prevailed, as it is supported by other lines from Homer, and by still more weighty reasons. This view has been adopted by former emperors, and has been fully treated of in our Digest.

GAI. iii. 141; D. xviii. 1. 1.; C. iv. 64. 7.

A sale and an exchange differ so little that it might seem natural to treat the promise to exchange as raising an obligation equally with the promise to deliver a thing sold; it was indeed the opinion of the Sabinians that it did so; but this opinion did not prevail, and the law recognised no obligation as existing under an agreement to exchange unless one party had delivered to the other the thing he had promised. Ex placito permutationis re nulla secuta, constat nemini actionem competere. (C. iv. 64. 3.) Thus the distinction between sale and exchange was that in the former the contract was made consensu, in the other re: when one party had delivered the thing, the other was obliged to give the other thing. Permutatio ex re tradita initium obligationi prebet. (D. xix. 4. 1. 2.)

In a contract of sale the seller was not bound to make the buyer absolute master (dominus) of the thing sold, as he would have been in a stipulation. (D. xviii. 1. 25. 1.) What he was bound to do was this: 1st. He was bound to deliver the thing itself (prestare, tradere) (D. xix. 1. 11. 2), to give free and undisturbed possession of it (possessionem vacuum tradere) (D. xix. 1. 2. 1), and to give lawful possession of it (prestare licere habere). (D. xix. 1. 30. 1.) 2ndly. He was bound, if the buyer was disturbed in his possession by the real owner (which was termed evictio), to recompense him for what he lost. (D. xix. 1. 11. 2.) And 3rdly. To secure the buyer against secret faults; if such faults were discovered, either compensation might be claimed by an actio aestimatoria, reducing the price to a greater or less amount, according as the seller had or had not knowledge of the defect (D. xix. 1. 13), or, at the option of the buyer, the contract might be rescinded by an actio redhibitoria, and the thing returned (which was termed redhibitio—redhibere est facere ut rursus habeat venditor quod habuerit, D. xxi. 1. 21. pr.). In order to fortify his position, the buyer could stipulate with the seller, and make the seller promise that he would give, not the free possession only, but the dominium of the thing, and that he would pay the buyer double the price if the buyer was evicted. The buyer would then have an action ex stipulatu to enforce the undertaking. Even if there was no such stipulation actually made, yet after it had become usual to make such stipulations, custom was held to have so far imported the promise into the contract of sale that the buyer, in bringing the action appropriate to his contract, actio ex empto, could obtain double the price in case of eviction, as this action was bonae fidei, i.e. the parties could be placed in a fair position towards each other, and it was considered that to have given the promise to pay double the price in case of eviction was a duty of the seller. (D. xxi. 2. 2.)

The buyer was bound to make the seller the real owner of the money paid as the price (emptor nummos venditoris facere cogitur, D. xix. 1. 11. 2), and was also bound to pay interest on the purchase money from the day when he had received the thing sold. (D. xix. 1. 13. 20.)

A sale and an exchange differ so little that it might seem natural to treat the promise to exchange as raising an obligation equally with the promise to deliver a thing sold; it was indeed the opinion of the Sabinians that it did so; but this opinion did not prevail, and the law recognised no obligation as existing under an agreement to exchange unless one party had delivered to the other the thing he had promised. Ex placito permutationis re nulla secuta, constat nemini actionem competere. (C. iv. 64. 3.) Thus the distinction between sale and exchange was that in the former the contract was made consensu, in the other re: when one party had delivered the thing, the other was obliged to give the other thing. Permutatio ex re tradita initium obligationi prebet. (D. xix. 4. 1. 2.)

In a contract of sale the seller was not bound to make the buyer absolute master (dominus) of the thing sold, as he would have been in a stipulation. (D. xviii. 1. 25. 1.) What he was bound to do was this: 1st. He was bound to deliver the thing itself (prestare, tradere) (D. xix. 1. 11. 2), to give free and undisturbed possession of it (possessionem vacuum tradere) (D. xix. 1. 2. 1), and to give lawful possession of it (prestare licere habere). (D. xix. 1. 30. 1.) 2ndly. He was bound, if the buyer was disturbed in his possession by the real owner (which was termed evictio), to recompense him for what he lost. (D. xix. 1. 11. 2.) And 3rdly. To secure the buyer against secret faults; if such faults were discovered, either compensation might be claimed by an actio aestimatoria, reducing the price to a greater or less amount, according as the seller had or had not knowledge of the defect (D. xix. 1. 13), or, at the option of the buyer, the contract might be rescinded by an actio redhibitoria, and the thing returned (which was termed redhibitio—redhibere est facere ut rursus habeat venditor quod habuerit, D. xxi. 1. 21. pr.). In order to fortify his position, the buyer could stipulate with the seller, and make the seller promise that he would give, not the free possession only, but the dominium of the thing, and that he would pay the buyer double the price if the buyer was evicted. The buyer would then have an action ex stipulatu to enforce the undertaking. Even if there was no such stipulation actually made, yet after it had become usual to make such stipulations, custom was held to have so far imported the promise into the contract of sale that the buyer, in bringing the action appropriate to his contract, actio ex empto, could obtain double the price in case of eviction, as this action was bonae fidei, i.e. the parties could be placed in a fair position towards each other, and it was considered that to have given the promise to pay double the price in case of eviction was a duty of the seller. (D. xxi. 2. 2.)

The buyer was bound to make the seller the real owner of the money paid as the price (emptor nummos venditoris facere cogitur, D. xix. 1. 11. 2), and was also bound to pay interest on the purchase money from the day when he had received the thing sold. (D. xix. 1. 13. 20.)

The lines cited in the text are from II. vii. 472; probably the alii versus alluded to are those describing the exchange between Glaucus and Diomedes (II. vi. 235).

3. Cum autem emptio et venditio contracta sit (quod effeci diximus, simulatque de pretio convenierit, cum sine scriptura res agitur), periculum rei venditæ statim ad emptorem pertinet, tametsi adhuc ea res emptori tradita non sit. Itaque si homo mortuus sit vel aliqua parte corporis læsus fuerit, aut ædes totæ aut aliqua ex parte incendio consumptæ fuerint, aut fundus vi fluminis totus vel aliqua ex parte ablatus sit, sive etiam inundatione aquæ aut arboribus turbine dejectis longe minor aut deterior esse cœperit: emptoris damnum est, cui necesse est, licet rem non fuerit nactus, pretium solvere. Quidquid enim sine dolo et culpa venditoris accidit, in eo venditor securus est. Sed et si post emptionem fundo aliquid per alluvionem accessit, ad emptoris commodum pertinet: nam et commodum ejus esse debet, cujus periculum est. Quodsi fingerit homo, qui veniit, aut subreptus fuerit, ita ut neque dolo neque culpa venditoris interveniat, animadvertendum erit, an custodiam ejus usque ad traditionem venditor suscepit. Sane enim, si suscepit, ad ipsius periculum is casus pertinet: si non suscepit, securus erit. Idem et in ceteris animalibus ceterisque rebus intellegimus. Utique tamen vindicationem rei et conditionem exhibere debet emptori, quia sane, qui rem nondum emptori tradidit, adhuc ipse dominus est. Idem est etiam de furti et de damni injuriæ actione.

3. As soon as the sale is contracted, that is, in the case of a sale made without writing, when the parties have agreed on the price, all risk attaching to the thing sold falls upon the purchaser, although the thing has not yet been delivered to him. Therefore, if the slave sold dies or receives an injury in any part of his body, or the whole or a portion of the house is burnt, or the whole or a portion of the land is carried away by the force of a flood, or is diminished or deteriorated by an inundation, or by a tempest making havoc with the trees, the loss falls on the purchaser, and although he does not receive the thing, he is obliged to pay the price, for the seller does not suffer for anything which happens without any fraud or fault of his. On the other hand, if after the sale the land is increased by alluvion, it is the purchaser who receives the advantage, for he who bears the risk of harm ought to receive the benefit of all that is advantageous. But if a slave who has been sold runs away or is stolen, without any fraud or fault on the part of the seller, we must inquire whether the seller undertook to keep him safely until he was delivered over; if he undertook this, what happens is at his risk; if he did not undertake it, he is not responsible. The same would hold in the case of any other animal or any other thing. But the seller is in any case bound to make over to the purchaser his right to a real or personal action, for the person who has not delivered the thing is still its owner; and it is the same with regard to the action of theft, and the action damni injuriæ.

D. xviii. 6. 8. pr.; D. xviii. 1. 35. 4.

The contract of sale was complete when the price had been fixed, but the thing sold did not pass to the buyer thereby. The seller retained the proprietorship (dominium) until he delivered it to the buyer, and the buyer received it, or until the property in it was passed by the buyer having paid the price, or given security for it, or in some way satisfied the seller (vere soluto vel fidejussore dato vel alias satisfacto, D. xiv. 4. 5. 18). Until this happened, the seller retained the thing in his custody, and if it had, meanwhile, any accretion, or suffered any diminution, he was still the

The lines cited in the text are from Il. vii. 472; probably the alii versus alluded to are those describing the exchange between Glaucus and Diomedes (Il. vi. 235).

3. Cum autem emptio et venditio contracta sit (quod effici diximus, simulatque de pretio convenerit, cum sine scriptura res agitur), periculum rei vendite statim ad emptorem pertinet, tametsi adhuc ea res emptori tradita non sit. Itaque si homo mortuus sit vel aliqua parte corporis læsus fuerit, aut ædes totæ aut aliqua ex parte incendio consumptæ fuerint, aut fundus vi fluminis totus vel aliqua ex parte ablatus sit, sive etiam inundatione aquæ aut arboribus turbine dejectis longe minor aut deterior esse cæperit: emptoris damnum est, cui necesse est, licet rem non fuerit nactus, pretium solvere. Quidquid enim sine dolo et culpa venditoris accidit, in eo venditor securus est. Sed et si post emptionem fundo aliquid per alluvionem accessit, ad emptoris commodum pertinet: nam et commodum ejus esse debet, cujus periculum est. Quodsi fingerit homo, qui veniit, aut subreptus fuerit, ita ut neque dolo neque culpa venditoris interveniat, animadvertendum erit, an custodiam ejus usque ad traditionem venditor suscepit. Sane enim, si suscepit, ad ipsius periculum is casus pertinet: si non suscepit, securus erit. Idem et in ceteris animalibus ceterisque rebus intellegimus. Utique tamen vindicationem rei et conditionem exhibere debet emptori, quia sano, qui rem nondum emptori tradidit, adhuc ipse dominus est. Idem est etiam de furti et de damni injuriæ actione.

3. As soon as the sale is contracted, that is, in the case of a sale made without writing, when the parties have agreed on the price, all risk attaching to the thing sold falls upon the purchaser, although the thing has not yet been delivered to him. Therefore, if the slave sold dies or receives an injury in any part of his body, or the whole or a portion of the house is burnt, or the whole or a portion of the land is carried away by the force of a flood, or is diminished or deteriorated by an inundation, or by a tempest making havoc with the trees, the loss falls on the purchaser, and although he does not receive the thing, he is obliged to pay the price, for the seller does not suffer for anything which happens without any fraud or fault of his. On the other hand, if after the sale the land is increased by alluvion, it is the purchaser who receives the advantage, for he who bears the risk of harm ought to receive the benefit of all that is advantageous. But if a slave who has been sold runs away or is stolen, without any fraud or fault on the part of the seller, we must inquire whether the seller undertook to keep him safely until he was delivered over; if he undertook this, what happens is at his risk; if he did not undertake it, he is not responsible. The same would hold in the case of any other animal or any other thing. But the seller is in any case bound to make over to the purchaser his right to a real or personal action, for the person who has not delivered the thing is still its owner; and it is the same with regard to the action of theft, and the action damni injuriæ.

D. xviii. 6. 8. pr.; D. xviii. 1. 35. 4.

The contract of sale was complete when the price had been fixed, but the thing sold did not pass to the buyer thereby. The seller retained the proprietorship (dominium) until he delivered it to the buyer, and the buyer received it, or until the property in it was passed by the buyer having paid the price, or given security for it, or in some way satisfied the seller (are soluto vel fidejussore dato vel alias satisfacto, D. xiv. 4. 5. 18). Until this happened, the seller retained the thing in his custody, and if it had, meanwhile, any accretion, or suffered any diminution, he was still the dominus of the thing which was increased or decreased. But his obligation bound him to deliver the thing exactly in the state in which it might happen to be at the time of delivery; and so it made no real difference to him whether there was an accretion or diminution. If the thing was lost by accident, the loss fell on the buyer and not on the seller, the dominus; so res domino perit could not be said of him. But, whatever happened to the thing sold, the price fixed on remained due. For, the obligation of the buyer being a distinct and independent obligation, the price could not alter, but remained fixed. The seller was, however, answerable for the care with which he preserved the thing while in his custody, periculum rei ad emptorem pertinet, dummodo custodiam venditor ante traditionem præstet (D. xlvii. 2. 1. 4. pr.); and he was not only bound to guard against gross and ordinary negligence (dolus et culpam præstare, D. xiii. 6. 5. 2), but to preserve it more carefully even than his own property, diligentiam præstet custodiendam quam in suis rebus adhiberet (D. xviii. 6. 3). He was bound to exercise the care of a bonus paterfamilias. In the text the case of a slave is taken, and a bonus paterfamilias might exercise the diligence proper to him, and yet a slave might run away. The loss would fall on the buyer, unless the seller had specially undertaken that he would keep him safely.

The actio furti and the actio damni injuriæ are noticed in Tit. 1 and 4 of the Fourth Book. If the thing was stolen or injured by a third person, without the fault of the seller, the buyer suffered the loss, but the seller was obliged to cede to the buyer the actions which as dominus he had against the thief or the doer of the injury.

4. Emptio tam sub condicione quam pure contrahi potest. Sub condicione veluti 'si Stichus intra certum diem tibi placuerit, erit tibi emptus aureis tot.'

4. A sale may be made conditionally or unconditionally: conditionally, as, for example, 'If Stichus suits you within a certain time, he shall be purchased by you at such a price.'

GAI. iii. 146.

The exact opposite might be contracted for: if within a certain time you find Stichus does not suit you, let it be considered you have not bought him. The jurists then said that the sale was a pura emptio, quæ sub conditione resolvitur. (D. xviii. 2. 2. pr.; D. xli. 4. 2. 5.) Stichus is sold, but within a certain time the contract may be rescinded.

The generic name for the accessory agreements which modified the principal contract was pacta. Some of these pacta relating to the contract of sale are treated of at considerable length in the Digest (D. xviii. 2 and 3), different names being appropriated to those most frequently in use; as, for instance, the in diem addictio, when the thing was sold, but if the seller had a better offer within a certain time, the contract might be rescinded (D. xviii. 2); and the lex commissoria, which was a general agreement for the rescis-

Paul.

*In diem
addictio
lex com.*

dominus of the thing which was increased or decreased. But his obligation bound him to deliver the thing exactly in the state in which it might happen to be at the time of delivery; and so it made no real difference to him whether there was an accretion or diminution. If the thing was lost by accident, the loss fell on the buyer and not on the seller, the dominus; so res domino perit could not be said of him. But, whatever happened to the thing sold, the price fixed on remained due. For, the obligation of the buyer being a distinct and independent obligation, the price could not alter, but remained fixed. The seller was, however, answerable for the care with which he preserved the thing while in his custody, periculum rei ad emptorem pertinet, dummodo custodiam venditor ante traditionem præstet (D. xlvii. 2. 14. pr.); and he was not only bound to guard against gross and ordinary negligence (dolus et culpam præstare, D. xiii. 6. 5. 2), but to preserve it more carefully even than his own property, diligentiam præstet exactiorem quam in suis rebus adhiberet (D. xviii. 6. 3). He was bound to exercise the care of a bonus paterfamilias. In the text the case of a slave is taken, and a bonus paterfamilias might exercise the diligence proper to him, and yet a slave might run away. The loss would fall on the buyer, unless the seller had specially undertaken that he would keep him safely.

The actio furti and the actio damni injuriæ are noticed in Tit. 1 and 4 of the Fourth Book. If the thing was stolen or injured by a third person, without the fault of the seller, the buyer suffered the loss, but the seller was obliged to cede to the buyer the actions which as dominus he had against the thief or the doer of the injury.

4. Emptio tam sub condicione quam pure contrahi potest. Sub condicione veluti 'si Stichus intra certum diem tibi placuerit, erit tibi emptus aureis tot.'

4. A sale may be made conditionally or unconditionally: conditionally, as, for example, 'If Stichus suits you within a certain time, he shall be purchased by you at such a price.'

GAI. iii. 146.

The exact opposite might be contracted for: if within a certain time you find Stichus does not suit you, let it be considered you have not bought him. The jurists then said that the sale was a pura emptio, quæ sub condicione resolvitur. (D. xviii. 2. 2. pr.; D. xli. 4. 2. 5.) Stichus is sold, but within a certain time the contract may be rescinded.

The generic name for the accessory agreements which modified the principal contract was pacta. Some of these pacta relating to the contract of sale are treated of at considerable length in the Digest (D. xviii. 2 and 3), different names being appropriated to those most frequently in use; as, for instance, the in diem addictio, when the thing was sold, but if the seller had a better offer within a certain time, the contract might be rescinded (D. xviii. 2); and the lex commissoria, which was a general agreement for the rescis-

Pacta
In diem addictio
Lex comm.

sion of the contract if either party violated its terms, and was especially used to enable the seller to demand back the thing sold, if the price was not paid by a certain day. (D. xviii. 3.)

We may observe that the Code (iv. 44. 2 and 8) permits a seller at all times to get a judicial order rescinding a contract if he has not received half the real value, but the contract will remain binding, if the buyer elects to pay the residue of the proper price.

5. Loca sacra vel religiosa, item publica, veluti forum, basilicam, frustra quis sciens emit, quas tamen si pro privatis vel profanis, deceptus a venditore, emerit, habebit actionem ex empto, quod non habere ei liceat, ut consequatur, quod sua interest, deceptum eum non esse. Idem juris est, si hominem liberum pro servo emerit.

5. A sale is void when a person knowingly purchases a sacred or religious place, or a public place, such as a forum or basilica. If, however, deceived by the vendor, he has supposed that what he was buying was profane or private, as he cannot have what he purchased, he may bring an action ex empto to recover whatever it would have been worth to him not to have been deceived. It is the same if he has purchased a free man, supposing him to be a slave.

D. xviii. 1, 4, 5, 6. pr.; D. xviii. 1. 62. 1.

This paragraph is probably inserted in order to contrast the effects of a contract of sale with those of a stipulation. In the strict civil law, ignorance that a thing was not a subject of commerce would not help the person who had stipulated for it. But in a contract of sale, if the seller had, and the buyer had not, known the real character of the thing he was buying, the buyer could recover against the seller anything he lost by entering into the bargain; for instance, he would not only receive back the purchase-money, but also would be entitled to interest upon it from the date of its payment.

The contract of sale gave rise to two actions bonae fidei, the actio ex vendito or venditi, belonging to the seller, and the actio ex empto or empti, mentioned in the text, belonging to the buyer. The buyer had also the actio aestimatoria, and the actio redhibitoria. (See note to par. 2.)

TIT. XXIV. DE LOCATIONE ET CONDUCTIONE.

Locatio et conductio proxima est emptioni et venditioni iisdemque juris regulis consistit. Nam ut emptio et venditio ita contrahitur, si de pretio convenierit, sic etiam locatio et conductio ita contrahi intellegitur, si merces constituta sit. Et competit locatori quidem locati actio, conductori vero conducti.

The contract of letting on hire approaches very nearly to that of sale, and is governed by the same rules of law. As the contract of sale is formed as soon as a price is fixed, so a contract of letting on hire is formed as soon as the amount to be paid for the hiring has been agreed on; and the latter has an action locati, and the hirer an action conducti.

D. xix. 2. 2. pr. and 15. pr.

sion of the contract if either party violated its terms, and was especially used to enable the seller to demand back the thing sold, if the price was not paid by a certain day. (D. xviii. 3.)

We may observe that the Code (iv. 44. 2 and 8) permits a seller at all times to get a judicial order rescinding a contract if he has not received half the real value, but the contract will remain binding, if the buyer elects to pay the residue of the proper price.

5. Loca sacra vel religiosa, item publica, veluti forum, basilicam, frustra quis sciens emit, quas tamen si pro privatis vel profanis, deceptus a venditore, emerit, habebit actionem ex empto, quod non habere ei liceat, ut consequatur, quod sua interest, deceptum eum non esse. Idem juris est, si hominem liberum pro servo emerit.

5. A sale is void when a person knowingly purchases a sacred or religious place, or a public place, such as a forum or basilica. If, however, deceived by the vendor, he has supposed that what he was buying was profane or private, as he cannot have what he purchased, he may bring an action ex empto to recover whatever it would have been worth to him not to have been deceived. It is the same if he has purchased a free man, supposing him to be a slave.

D. xviii. 1, 4, 5, 6. pr.; D. xviii. 1. 62. 1.

This paragraph is probably inserted in order to contrast the effects of a contract of sale with those of a stipulation. In the strict civil law, ignorance that a thing was not a subject of commerce would not help the person who had stipulated for it. But in a contract of sale, if the seller had, and the buyer had not, known the real character of the thing he was buying, the buyer could recover against the seller anything he lost by entering into the bargain; for instance, he would not only receive back the purchase-money, but also would be entitled to interest upon it from the date of its payment.

The contract of sale gave rise to two actions bonae fidei, the actio ex vendito or venditi, belonging to the seller, and the actio ex empto or empti, mentioned in the text, belonging to the buyer. The buyer had also the actio aestimatoria, and the actio redhibitoria. (See note to par. 2.)

TIT. XXIV. DE LOCATIONE ET CONDUCTIONE.

Locatio et conductio proxima est emptioni et venditioni iisdemque juris regulis consistit. Nam ut emptio et venditio ita contrahitur, si de pretio convenierit, sic etiam locatio et conductio ita contrahi intellegitur, si merces constituta sit. Et competit locatori quidem locati actio; conductori vero conducti.

The contract of letting on hire approaches very nearly to that of sale, and is governed by the same rules of law. As the contract of sale is formed as soon as a price is fixed, so a contract of letting on hire is formed as soon as the amount to be paid for the hiring has been agreed on; and the latter has an action locati, and the hirer an action conducti.

D. xix. 2. 2. pr. and 15. pr.

The contract of letting on hire (locatio conductio), like that of sale, was complete by the mere consent of the parties, and, like it, produced only personal obligations, and not any real rights. The hirer was, however, not even entitled to the possessio; the letter still remained the possessor in the eye of the law, his duty not being præstare rem licere habere, but præstare re frui, uti licere.

There were three principal heads of this contract: 1, locatio conductio rerum, when one person let a thing and another hired it; 2, locatio conductio operarum, when one person let his services and another hired them, without reference to any object in respect of which the services were to be performed; 3, locatio conductio operis faciendi, when one person contracted that a particular piece of work should be done, and another contracted to do it. If in the last-named contract we look at the labour, &c., expended on the work, we should naturally call the person who did the work the locator, as it was he who let out his services for its performance; but the Roman jurists generally looked at the work itself that was to be done, and spoke of the person who contracted for its performance, i.e. gave it out, as its locator, and the person who engaged to perform or execute it, i.e. took it in, as the conductor. The price of, or consideration for, the letting, was properly called merces, sometimes pretium (D. xix. 2. 28. 2), and, in the case of the letting of houses or land, pensio or reditus. In particular contracts, the conductor had special names, as the hirer of a house was called inquilinus, of a farm colonus.

The duty of the letter was to guarantee the hirer against eviction, and to reimburse him for any useful or necessary expenses he had incurred; The duty of the hirer was to take care as a bonus paterfamilias of the thing hired (see par. 5), to give up the thing hired at the end of the term for which it was let, and to pay the price agreed on.

The text gives us the names of the personal actions which belonged to the letter and the hirer respectively, the former having the actio locati, the latter the actio conducti. But actions of a very different kind were sometimes connected with this contract. In the case of land let to hire, certain instruments of farming and other property of the hirer were held as a security for the payment of the rent, and a real action, termed the actio Serviana, because first introduced by the prætor Servius, was given to the letter to enforce his right to these things in case of non-payment of the rent; this action was gradually extended in its effects, and the extended action, under the name of actio quasi-Serviana, was used to enforce the rights of a creditor over anything given in pledge. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 7.) The prætor, too, gave an interdict, termed the interdictum Salvianum (similarly extended under the name of interdictum quasi-Salvianum), by which the letter got possession of things pledged for the rent of land. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 15. 3.)

The contract of letting on hire (locatio conductio), like that of sale, was complete by the mere consent of the parties, and, like it, produced only personal obligations, and not any real rights. The hirer was, however, not even entitled to the possessio; the letter still remained the possessor in the eye of the law, his duty not being præstare rem licere habere, but præstare re frui, uti licere.

There were three principal heads of this contract: 1, locatio conductio rerum, when one person let a thing and another hired it; 2, locatio conductio operarum, when one person let his services and another hired them, without reference to any object in respect of which the services were to be performed; 3, locatio conductio operis faciendi, when one person contracted that a particular piece of work should be done, and another contracted to do it. If in the last-named contract we look at the labour, &c., expended on the work, we should naturally call the person who did the work the locator, as it was he who let out his services for its performance; but the Roman jurists generally looked at the work itself that was to be done, and spoke of the person who contracted for its performance, i.e. gave it out, as its locator, and the person who engaged to perform or execute it, i.e. took it in, as the conductor. The price of, or consideration for, the letting, was properly called merces, sometimes pretium (D. xix. 2. 28. 2), and, in the case of the letting of houses or land, pensio or reditus. In particular contracts, the conductor had special names, as the hirer of a house was called inquilinus, of a farm colonus.

The duty of the letter was to guarantee the hirer against eviction, and to reimburse him for any useful or necessary expenses he had incurred; the duty of the hirer was to take care as a bonus paterfamilias of the thing hired (see par. 5), to give up the thing hired at the end of the term for which it was let, and to pay the price agreed on.

The text gives us the names of the personal actions which belonged to the letter and the hirer respectively, the former having the actio locati, the latter the actio conducti. But actions of a very different kind were sometimes connected with this contract. In the case of land let to hire, certain instruments of farming and other property of the hirer were held as a security for the payment of the rent, and a real action, termed the actio Serviana, because first introduced by the prætor Servius, was given to the letter to enforce his right to these things in case of non-payment of the rent; this action was gradually extended in its effects, and the extended action, under the name of actio quasi-Serviana, was used to enforce the rights of a creditor over anything given in pledge. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 7.) The prætor, too, gave an interdict, termed the interdictum Salvianum (similarly extended under the name of interdictum quasi-Salvianum), by which the letter got possession of things pledged for the rent of land. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 15. 3.)

1. Et quæ supra diximus, si alieno arbitrio pretium permissum fuerit, eadem et de locatione et conductione dicta esse intellegamus, si alieno arbitrio merces permissa fuerit. Quæ de causa si fulloni polienda curandæ aut sarcinatori sarcienda vestimenta quis dederit nulla statim mercede constituta, sed postea tantum daturus, quantum inter eos convenerit, non proprie locatio et condictio contrahi intellegitur, sed eo nomine præscriptis verbis actio datur.

1. What we have said above of a sale in which the price is to be fixed by the decision of a third person, may be applied to the contract of letting on hire, if the amount to be paid for the hire is left to the decision of a third person. Accordingly, if any one gives clothes to a fuller to be scoured or cleaned, or to a tailor to be mended, without then fixing the sum to be paid for their work, but with the intention of afterwards paying what may be agreed on, a contract of letting on hire cannot properly be said to be made; but the circumstances furnish ground for an action præscriptis verbis.

GAI. iii. 143; D. xix. 2. 25. pr.

Qua de causa, i.e., 'the price ought to be determined, and therefore,' &c.; the passage is taken rather unconnectedly out of Gaius.

Actio præscriptis verbis. (See note 7 on Tit. 13. pr.) Or an actio mandati might be brought. (Tit. 26. 13.)

2. Præterea sicut vulgo quærebatur, an permutatis rebus emptio et venditio contrahitur: ita quæri solebat de locatione et conductione, si forte rem aliquam tibi utendam sive fruendam quis dederit et invicem a te aliam utendam sive fruendam acceperit. Et placuit, non esse locationem et conductionem, sed proprium genus esse contractus. Veluti si, cum unum quis bovem haberet et vicinus ejus unum, placuerit inter eos, ut per denos dies invicem boves commodarent, ut opus facerent, et apud alterum bos periret: neque locati vel conducti neque commodati competit actio, quia non fuit gratuitum commodatum, verum præscriptis verbis agendum est.

2. Moreover, just as the question was often asked whether a contract of sale was formed by exchange, a similar question arose with respect to the contract of letting on hire, in case any one gave you a thing to use or take the fruits of, and in return receive from you something else of which he was to have the use or fruits. It has been decided that this is not a contract of letting to hire, but a distinct kind of contract. For example, if two neighbours have each an ox, and agree each to lend the other his ox for ten days to make use of, and one of the oxen dies while in the care of the person to whom it does not belong, there will not be an actio locati or conducti, nor will there be an actio commodati, since the loan was not gratuitous, but the parties have to sue by an action præscriptis verbis.

GAI. iii. 144; D. xix. 5. 17. 3.

3. Adeo autem familiaritatem aliquam inter se habere videntur emptio et venditio, item locatio et condictio, ut in quibusdam causis quæri soleat, utrum emptio et venditio contrahatur, an locatio et condictio. Ut ecce de prædiis, quæ perpetuo quibusdam fruenda traduntur, id est ut, quamdiu pensio sive reditus pro his domino præstetur, neque ipsi conductori neque heredi ejus,

3. Contracts of sale and contracts of letting on hire are so nearly connected, that in some cases it is questioned whether the contract is one or the other. For instance, when lands are delivered over to be enjoyed for ever, that is, that as long as the rent is paid for the land to the owner, he cannot take away the land from the hirer or his heir, or from any one to whom the hirer or his heir has sold

exceptio
id est

ad given in lease for rent

1. Et quæ supra diximus, si alieno arbitrio pretium permissum fuerit, eadem et de locatione et conductione dicta esse intellegamus, si alieno arbitrio merces permissa fuerit. Quæ de causa si fulloni poliendi curandæ aut sarcinatori sarcienda vestimenta quis dederit nulla statim mercede constituta, sed postea tantum daturus, quantum inter eos convenerit, non proprie locatio et conductio contrahi intellegitur, sed eo nomine præscriptis verbis actio datur.

1. What we have said above of a sale in which the price is to be fixed by the decision of a third person, may be applied to the contract of letting on hire, if the amount to be paid for the hire is left to the decision of a third person. Accordingly, if any one gives clothes to a fuller to be scoured or cleaned, or to a tailor to be mended, without then fixing the sum to be paid for their work, but with the intention of afterwards paying what may be agreed on, a contract of letting on hire cannot properly be said to be made; but the circumstances furnish ground for an action præscriptis verbis.

GAL. iii. 143; D. xix. 2. 25. pr.

Qua de causa, i.e., 'the price ought to be determined, and therefore,' &c.; the passage is taken rather unconnectedly out of Gaius.

Actio præscriptis verbis. (See note 7 on Tit. 13. pr.) Or an actio mandati might be brought. (Tit. 26. 13.)

2. Præterea sicut vulgo quaeritur, an permutatis rebus emptio et venditio contrahitur: ita quaeri solebat de locatione et conductione, si forte rem aliquam tibi utendam sive fruendam quis dederit et invicem a te aliam utendam sive fruendam acceperit. Et placuit, non esse locationem et conductionem, sed proprium genus esse contractus. Veluti si, cum unum quis bovem haberet et vicinus ejus unum, placuerit inter eos, ut per denos dies invicem boves commodarent, ut opus facerent, et apud alterum bos periret: neque locati vel conducti neque commodati competit actio, quia non fuit gratuitum commodatum, verum præscriptis verbis agendum est.

2. Moreover, just as the question was often asked whether a contract of sale was formed by exchange, a similar question arose with respect to the contract of letting on hire, in case any one gave you a thing to use or take the fruits of, and in return receive from you something else of which he was to have the use or fruits. It has been decided that this is not a contract of letting to hire, but a distinct kind of contract. For example, if two neighbours have each an ox, and agree each to lend the other his ox for ten days to make use of, and one of the oxen dies while in the care of the person to whom it does not belong, there will not be an actio locati or conducti, nor will there be an actio commodati, since the loan was not gratuitous, but the parties have to sue by an action præscriptis verbis.

GAL. iii. 144; D. xix. 5. 17. 3.

3. Adeo autem familiaritatem aliquam inter se habere videntur emptio et venditio, item locatio et conductio, ut in quibusdam causis quaeri soleat, utrum emptio et venditio contrahatur, an locatio et conductio. Ut ecce de prædiis, quæ perpetuo quibusdam fruenda traduntur, id est ut, quamdiu pensio sive reditus pro his domino præstetur, neque ipsi conductori neque heredi ejus,

3. Contracts of sale and contracts of letting on hire are so nearly connected, that in some cases it is questioned whether the contract is one or the other. For instance, when lands are delivered over to be enjoyed for ever, that is, that as long as the rent is paid for the land to the owner, he cannot take away the land from the hirer or his heir, or from any one to whom the hirer or his heir has sold

exemptio
istis

ad quæ in longe for est

cuive conductor heresve ejus id prædium venderit aut donaverit aut dotis nomine dederit aliove quo modo alienaverit, auferre liceat. Sed talis contractus quia inter veteres dubitabatur et a quibusdam locatio, a quibusdam venditio existimabatur: lex Zenoniana lata est, quæ emphyteuseos contractui propriam statuit naturam neque ad locationem neque ad venditionem inclinantem, sed suis pactionibus fulciendam, et si quidem aliquid pactum fuerit, hoc ita optinere, ac si natura talis esset contractus, sin autem nihil de periculo rei fuerit pactum, tunc si quidem totius rei interitus accesserit, ad dominum super hoc redundare periculum, sin particularis, ad emphyteuticarium hujusmodi damnum venire. Quo jure utimur.

or given the land, or made it over as part of a dos, or has in any way alienated it. As the ancients were in doubt as to this contract, some regarding it as a letting on hire, and some as a sale, the constitution of Zeno was made, which declared that the contract of emphyteusis was of a special nature, and was not to be confounded either with letting on hire or with sale, but rested upon its own peculiar agreements; and that if any special agreement was made, it was to be observed as if to have such an agreement was part of the nature of the contract; but if no agreement was made as to the risks the thing might undergo, the risk of a total loss should fall upon the owner, and the detriment of a partial loss upon the occupier; and this we still wish to be considered the law.

GAI. iii. 145; C. iv. 66. 1.

We have already given an account of emphyteusis in the note to Bk. ii. Tit. 5. 6.

The law would naturally contemplate the contract under which the emphyteuta entered as a locatio conductio; but the dominus seemed to have parted with so much of his interest, that it appeared doubtful whether it ought not rather to be considered as a sale. Zeno (about A.D. 476) enacted that it should be regarded as a separate form of contract.

4. Item queritur, si cum aurifice Titio convenerit, ut is ex auro suo certi ponderis certæque formæ anulos ei faceret et acciperet verbi gratia aureos decem, utrum emptio et venditio contrahi videatur, an locatio et conductio? et Cassius ait, materiæ quidem emptionem venditionemque contrahi, operæ autem locationem et conductionem. Sed placuit, tantum emptionem et venditionem contrahi. Quodsi suum aurum Titius dederit, mercede pro opera constituta, dubium non est, quin locatio et conductio sit.

4. It is also questioned whether, when Titius has agreed with a goldsmith to make him rings of a certain weight and pattern, out of gold belonging to the goldsmith himself, the goldsmith to receive, for example, ten aurei, the contract is one of sale or letting on hire. Cassius says that there is a sale of the material, and a letting on hire of the goldsmith's work; but it has been decided that there is only a contract of sale. But if Titius gives the gold, and a sum is agreed on to be paid for the work, there is no doubt that the contract is then one of letting to hire.

GAI. iii. 147; D. xix. 2. 2. 1.

5. Conductor omnia secundum legem conductionis facere debet et, si quid in lege præterminissum fuerit, id ex bono et æquo debet prestare. Qui pro usu aut vestimentorum aut argenti aut jumenti mercedem aut dedit aut promisit, ab eo custodia talis desideratur, qualem diligentis-

5. The hirer ought to do everything according to the terms of his hiring, and if anything has been omitted in these terms, he ought to supply it according to the rules of equity. He who has given or promised a sum for the hire of clothes or silver or a beast of burden, is required to bestow as cuius conductor heresve ejus id prædium vendiderit aut donaverit aut dotis nomine dederit aliove quo modo alienaverit, auferre liceat. Sed talis contractus quia inter veteres dubitabatur et a quibusdam locatio, a quibusdam venditio existimabatur: lex Zenoniana lata est, quæ emphyteuseos contractui propriam statuit naturam neque ad locationem neque ad venditionem inclinantem, sed suis pactionibus fulciendam, et si quidem aliquid pactum fuerit, hoc ita optimere, ac si natura talis esset contractus, sin autem nihil de periculo rei fuerit pactum, tunc si quidem totius rei interitus accesserit, ad dominum super hoc redundare periculum, sin particularis, ad emphyteuticarium hujusmodi damnum venire. Quo jure utimur.

or given the land, or made it over as part of a dos, or has in any way alienated it. As the ancients were in doubt as to this contract, some regarding it as a letting on hire, and some as a sale, the constitution of Zeno was made, which declared that the contract of emphyteusis was of a special nature, and was not to be confounded either with letting on hire or with sale, but rested upon its own peculiar agreements; and that if any special agreement was made, it was to be observed as if to have such an agreement was part of the nature of the contract; but if no agreement was made as to the risks the thing might undergo, the risk of a total loss should fall upon the owner, and the detriment of a partial loss upon the occupier; and this we still wish to be considered the law.

GAI. iii. 145; C. iv. 66. 1.

We have already given an account of emphyteusis in the note to Bk. ii. Tit. 5. 6.

The law would naturally contemplate the contract under which the emphyteuta entered as a locatio conductio; but the dominus seemed to have parted with so much of his interest, that it appeared doubtful whether it ought not rather to be considered as a sale. Zeno (about A.D. 476) enacted that it should be regarded as a separate form of contract.

4. Item queritur, si cum aurifice Titio conveniret, ut is ex auro suo certi ponderis certæque formæ anulos ei faceret et acciperet verbi gratia aureos decem, utrum emptio et venditio contrahi videatur, an locatio et conductio? et Cassius ait, materiæ quidem emptionem venditionemque contrahi, operæ autem locationem et conductionem. Sed placuit, tantum emptionem et venditionem contrahi. Quodsi suum aurum Titius dederit, mercede pro opera constituta, dubium non est, quin locatio et conductio sit.

4. It is also questioned whether, when Titius has agreed with a goldsmith to make him rings of a certain weight and pattern, out of gold belonging to the goldsmith himself, the goldsmith to receive, for example, ten aurei, the contract is one of sale or letting on hire. Cassius says that there is a sale of the material, and a letting on hire of the goldsmith's work; but it has been decided that there is only a contract of sale. But if Titius gives the gold, and a sum is agreed on to be paid for the work, there is no doubt that the contract is then one of letting to hire.

GAI. iii. 147; D. xix. 2. 2. 1.

5. Conductor omnia secundum legem conductionis facere debet et, si quid in lege prætermisissum fuerit, id ex bono et æquo debet præstare. Qui pro usu aut vestimentorum aut argenti aut jumentum mercedem aut dedit aut promisit, ab eo custodia talis desideratur, qualem diligentis-

5. The hirer ought to do everything according to the terms of his hiring, and if anything has been omitted in these terms, he ought to supply it according to the rules of equity. He who has given or promised a sum for the hire of clothes or silver or a beast of burden, is required to bestow as great care on the safe custody of the thing he hires as the most careful paterfamilias bestows on the custody of his own property. If he bestows such care, but loses the thing through some accident, he is not bound to restore it.

simus paterfamilias suis rebus adhibet. Quam si praestiterit et aliquo casu rem amiserit, de restituenda ea non tenebitur.

D. xix. 2. 25. 3, 7.

The distinction between the cases of a sale and of a letting on hire is to be noticed. Here the risk of fortuitous loss is with the owner, i.e. the locator, in accordance with the general rule; but in sale the risk of fortuitous loss is not with the owner, the seller, but with the buyer.

6. Mortuo conductore intra tempora conductionis, heres ejus eodem jure in conductionem succedit.

6. If the hirer dies during the time of his hiring, his heir succeeds him in the hiring on the same terms.

C. iv. 65. 10.

And the same may be said of the locator; but in a locatio conductio of personal services or of a thing to be done by a special person, the death of the person who let out his services terminated the contract.

The contract, in the case of a locatio conductio rei, was also terminated by the sale of the thing hired. The buyer was not considered bound by the contract. Emptori fundi necesse non est stare colonum cui prior dominus locavit, nisi ea lege emit (C. iv. 65. 9); but the conductor could demand compensation from the locator. The contract ceasing if the thing was sold serves clearly to distinguish the interest of the conductor from a usufruct. The conductor had no real interest in the thing, but only a personal right against the locator, while the usufructuary had a servitude, i.e. a real right, in the thing. The whole of the thing over which the usufruct extended could not be sold, because part of it, namely the usufruct, had already been parted with.

The contract was also terminated if the rent was two years in arrear (D. xix. 2. 54. 1); if the conductor grossly misused the thing hired (C. iv. 65. 3); if the locator had indispensable need of it, si propriis usibus dominus esse necessarium cum probaverit (C. ib.); or if the conductor was prevented from getting benefit from it, as by armed force. (D. xix. 2. 13. 7.) X-8

TIT. XXV. DE SOCIETATE.

Societatem coire solemus aut totorum bonorum, quam Græci specialiter κοινωνία appellant, aut unius alicujus negotiationis, veluti mancipiorum emendorum vendendorumque, aut olei, vini, frumenti emendi vendendique.

A partnership is formed either of the whole goods of the contracting parties, to which the Greeks give the special name of κοινωνία, or for some particular business, as the sale or purchase of slaves, oil, wine, or wheat.

Gar. iii. 148.

simus paterfamilias suis rebus adhibet. Quam si praestiterit et aliquo casu rem amiserit, de restituenda ea non tenebitur.

great care on the safe custody of the thing he hires as the most careful paterfamilias bestows on the custody of his own property. If he bestows such care, but loses the thing through some accident, he is not bound to restore it.

D. xix. 2. 25. 3, 7.

The distinction between the cases of a sale and of a letting on hire is to be noticed. Here the risk of fortuitous loss is with the owner, i.e. the locator, in accordance with the general rule; but in sale the risk of fortuitous loss is not with the owner, the seller, but with the buyer.

6. Mortuo conductore intra tempora conductionis, heres ejus eodem jure in conductionem succedit.

6. If the hirer dies during the time of his hiring, his heir succeeds him in the hiring on the same terms.

C. iv. 65. 10.

And the same may be said of the locator; but in a locatio conductio of personal services or of a thing to be done by a special person, the death of the person who let out his services terminated the contract.

The contract, in the case of a locatio conductio rei, was also terminated by the sale of the thing hired. The buyer was not considered bound by the contract. Emptori fundi necesse non est stare colonum cui prior dominus locavit, nisi ea lege emit (C. iv. 65. 9); but the conductor could demand compensation from the locator. The contract ceasing if the thing was sold serves clearly to distinguish the interest of the conductor from a usufruct. The conductor had no real interest in the thing, but only a personal right against the locator, while the usufructuary had a servitude, i.e. a real right, in the thing. The whole of the thing over which the usufruct extended could not be sold, because part of it, namely the usufruct, had already been parted with.

The contract was also terminated if the rent was two years in arrear (D. xix. 2. 54. 1); if the conductor grossly misused the thing hired (C. iv. 65. 3); if the locator had indispensable need of it, si propriis usibus dominus esse necessarium cum probaverit (C. ib.); or if the conductor was prevented from getting benefit from it, as by armed force. (D. xix. 2. 13. 7.) X-8

TIT. XXV. DE SOCIETATE.

Societatem coire solemus aut totorum bonorum, quam Græci specialiter κοινωνία appellant, aut unius alicujus negotiationis, veluti mancipiorum emendorum vendendorumque, aut olei, vini, frumenti emendi vendendique.

A partnership is formed either of the whole goods of the contracting parties, to which the Greeks give the special name of κοινωνία, or for some particular business, as the sale or purchase of slaves, oil, wine, or wheat.

GAR. III. 148.

The text, borrowed from Gaius, gives the general division of partnerships into two classes according as they are universal or particular. In the Digest we have a further division by distinguishing five kinds of partnership. (D. xvii. 2. 5, 7.)

1. Societas universorum bonorum, in which everything belonging or accruing in any way to each partner is held in common. Here the property belonging to each partner at the time when the partnership was formed became the property of all, without delivery (D. xvii. 2. 1. 1, 2); after-acquired property had to be delivered to the partnership (D. xvii. 2. 74).

2. Societas universorum quæ ex questu veniunt, i.e. of all things which are gained or acquired by each partner through business transactions; but not of things belonging or accruing in other ways, such as inheritances or legacies. (D. xvii. 2. 7, 8, 9.)

3. Societas negotiationis alicujus, formed to carry on a particular business.

4. Societas vectigalis, formed to carry on the farming of one or more branches of the public revenues—a mere branch of the last, but subject to special rules. (D. xvii. 2. 59.)

5. Societas rei unius, when one or more particular things are held in common.

1. Et quidem si nihil de partibus lucri et damni nominatim convenerit, æquales scilicet partes et in lucro et in damno spectantur. Quodsi expressæ fuerint partes, hæc servari debent: nec enim unquam dubium fuit, quin valeat conventio, si duo inter se pacti sunt, ut ad unum quidem duæ partes et damni et lucri pertineant, ad alium tertia.

1. If the proportions of gain and loss have not been specially agreed on, the shares of gain and loss are looked on as equal. But if they have been agreed on, effect ought to be given to the agreement; for, indeed, the validity of the agreement has never been questioned, if two partners have agreed that two-thirds of the gain and loss should belong to the one, and one-third to the other.

GAI. iii. 150.

Æquales partes, i.e. one equal share of the whole, not proportional to what each contributes. (D. xvii. 2. 80.)

Hæc servari debent: subject, however, to this qualification, that one partner can get a greater share of the profits than the others only if he has given more to the partnership, whether in money or in labour. (D. xvii. 2. 29. pr.)

2. De illa sane conventionione questum est, si Titius et Seius inter se pacti sunt, ut ad Titium lucri duæ partes pertineant, damni tertia, ad Seium duæ partes damni, lucri tertia, an rata debet haberi conventio? Quintus Mucius contra naturam societatis talem pactionem esse existimavit et ob id non esse ratam habendam. Servius Sulpicius, cujus sententia prævaluit, contra sentit, quia sæpe quorundam ita pretiosa est opera in societate, ut

2. But doubts have been raised as to the following agreement. Supposing Titius and Seius have agreed that two-thirds of the profit and one-third of the loss shall belong to Titius, and two-thirds of the loss and one-third of the profit shall belong to Seius, ought such an agreement to be valid? Quintus Mucius considered it as contrary to the nature of partnership, and as therefore not to be held valid. Servius Sulpicius, on the contrary, whose opinion has prevailed, thought it valid,

The text, borrowed from Gaius, gives the general division of partnerships into two classes according as they are universal or particular. In the Digest we have a further division by distinguishing five kinds of partnership. (D. xvii. 2. 5, 7.)

1. Societas universorum bonorum, in which everything belonging or accruing in any way to each partner is held in common. Here the property belonging to each partner at the time when the partnership was formed became the property of all, without delivery (D. xvii. 2. 1. 1, 2); after-acquired property had to be delivered to the partnership (D. xvii. 2. 74).

2. Societas universorum quæ ex questu veniunt, i.e. of all things which are gained or acquired by each partner through business transactions; but not of things belonging or accruing in other ways, such as inheritances or legacies. (D. xvii. 2. 7, 8, 9.)

3. Societas negotiationis alicujus, formed to carry on a particular business.

4. Societas vectigalis, formed to carry on the farming of one or more branches of the public revenues—a mere branch of the last, but subject to special rules. (D. xvii. 2. 59.)

5. Societas rei unius, when one or more particular things are held in common.

1. Et quidem si nihil de partibus lucri et damni nominatim convenerit, æquales scilicet partes et in lucro et in damno spectantur. Quodsi expressæ fuerint partes, hæc servari debent: nec enim unquam dubium fuit, quin valeat conventio, si duo inter se pacti sunt, ut ad unum quidem duæ partes et damni et lucri pertineant, ad alium tertia.

1. If the proportions of gain and loss have not been specially agreed on, the shares of gain and loss are looked on as equal. But if they have been agreed on, effect ought to be given to the agreement; for, indeed, the validity of the agreement has never been questioned, if two partners have agreed that two-thirds of the gain and loss should belong to the one, and one-third to the other.

GAI. iii. 150.

Æquales partes, i.e. one equal share of the whole, not proportional to what each contributes. (D. xvii. 2. 80.)

Hæc servari debent: subject, however, to this qualification, that one partner can get a greater share of the profits than the others only if he has given more to the partnership, whether in money or in labour. (D. xvii. 2. 29. pr.)

2. De illa sane conventionione questum est, si Titius et Seius inter se pacti sunt, ut ad Titium lucri duæ partes pertineant, damni tertia, ad Seium duæ partes damni, lucri tertia, an rata debet haberi conventio? Quintus Mucius contra naturam societatis talem pactionem esse existimavit et ob id non esse ratam habendam. Servius Sulpicius, cujus sententia prævaluit, contra sentit, quia sæpe quorundam ita pretiosa est opera in societate, ut

2. But doubts have been raised as to the following agreement. Supposing Titius and Seius have agreed that two-thirds of the profit and one-third of the loss shall belong to Titius, and two-thirds of the loss and one-third of the profit shall belong to Seius, ought such an agreement to be valid? Quintus Mucius considered it as contrary to the nature of partnership, and as therefore not to be held valid. Servius Sulpicius, on the contrary, whose opinion has prevailed, thought it valid, eos justum sit meliore condicione in societatem admitti: nam et ita coiri posse societatem non dubitatur, ut alter pecuniam conferat, alter non conferat et tamen lucrum inter eos commune sit, quia sæpe opera alicujus pro pecunia valet. Et adeo contra Quinti Mucii sententiam obtinuit, ut illud quoque constiterit, posse convenire, ut quis lucri partem ferat, damno non teneatur, quod et ipsum Servius convenienter sibi existimavit: quod tamen ita intellegi oportet, ut, si in aliqua re lucrum, in aliqua damnum allatum sit, compensatione facta, solum quod superest, intellegatur lucri esse.

as frequently the services of particular partners are so valuable that it is just to give them advantages in the terms of the partnership. There can be no doubt that a partnership may be formed on the terms of one partner contributing money, and of the other not contributing, while yet the profit is common to both, as often a man's labour is equivalent to money. An opinion, therefore, so directly contrary to that of Quintus Mucius has prevailed, that it is admitted that by special agreement a partner may share the profit, and yet not be responsible for the loss, as Servius consistently held. This must be understood as meaning that, if there is profit on one transaction and loss on another, the accounts must be balanced, and only the net profit be reckoned as profit.

GAL. iii. 149; D. xvii. 2. 30.

A partnership in which one partner was totally excluded from gain was void. The jurists called it a leonina societas, as the other partner would have the lion's share. (D. xvii. 2. 29. 2.)

With respect to the power of one partner to bind another, a point not touched on by Justinian, we may observe that, as between the partners themselves, any one who acted in behalf of the rest was their mandatary, and, beyond acts of pure administration of their affairs, could only be empowered to act by their express desire (mandatum). If he was so empowered, he had an action against them for all expenses and losses he incurred, and was bound to account to them for the profits. With regard to third persons, as the Roman law, strictly speaking, took no notice of any one who was not a party to the particular contract, they could not sue, or be sued by, the remaining partners, who were not parties. The prætor, however, allowed the remaining partners to sue if they had no other means of protecting their interests (D. xiv. 3. 1, 2); and the stranger to sue, if the partners had benefited by the contract. (D. xvii. 2. 82.)

3. Illud expeditum est, si in una causa pars fuerit expressa, veluti in solo lucro vel in solo damno, in altera vero omitta: in eo quoque, quod prætermisum est, eandem partem servari.

3. Of course if the share on one side only is expressly agreed on, as on the side of profit only, or on that of loss only, the same share is to be considered as held on the side of which no mention is made.

GAL. iii. 150.

4. Manet autem societas eo usque, donec in eodem consensu perseveraverint: at cum aliquis renuntiaverit societati, solvitur societas. Sed plane si quis callide in hoc renuntiaverit societati, ut ob-

4. A partnership continues as long as the partners continue to agree that it shall do so; but if any one partner renounces the partnership, then the partnership is dissolved. If, however, he makes this renunciation with a

eos justum sit meliore condicione in societatem admitti: nam et ita coiri posse societatem non dubitatur, ut alter pecuniam conferat, alter non conferat et tamen lucrum inter eos commune sit, quia sæpe opera alicujus pro pecunia valet. Et adeo contra Quinti Mucii sententiam obtinuit, ut illud quoque constiterit, posse convenire, ut quis lucri partem ferat, damno non teneatur, quod et ipsum Servius convenienter sibi existimavit: quod tamen ita intellegi oportet, ut, si in aliqua re lucrum, in aliqua damnum allatum sit, compensatione facta, solum quod superest, intellegatur lucri esse.

as frequently the services of particular partners are so valuable that it is just to give them advantages in the terms of the partnership. There can be no doubt that a partnership may be formed on the terms of one partner contributing money, and of the other not contributing, while yet the profit is common to both, as often a man's labour is equivalent to money. An opinion, therefore, so directly contrary to that of Quintus Mucius has prevailed, that it is admitted that by special agreement a partner may share the profit, and yet not be responsible for the loss, as Servius consistently held. This must be understood as meaning that, if there is profit on one transaction and loss on another, the accounts must be balanced, and only the net profit be reckoned as profit.

GAI. iii. 149; D. xvii. 2. 30.

A partnership in which one partner was totally excluded from gain was void. The jurists called it a leonina societas, as the other partner would have the lion's share. (D. xvii. 2. 29. 2.)

With respect to the power of one partner to bind another, a point not touched on by Justinian, we may observe that, as between the partners themselves, any one who acted in behalf of the rest was their mandatary, and, beyond acts of pure administration of their affairs, could only be empowered to act by their express desire (mandatum). If he was so empowered, he had an action against them for all expenses and losses he incurred, and was bound to account to them for the profits. With regard to third persons, as the Roman law, strictly speaking, took no notice of any one who was not a party to the particular contract, they could not sue, or be sued by, the remaining partners, who were not parties. The prætor, however, allowed the remaining partners to sue if they had no other means of protecting their interests (D. xiv. 3. 1, 2); and the stranger to sue, if the partners had benefited by the contract. (D. xvii. 2. 82.)

3. Illud expeditum est, si in una causa pars fuerit expressa, veluti in solo lucro vel in solo damno, in altera vero omissa: in eo quoque, quod prætermisum est, eandem partem servari.

3. Of course if the share on one side only is expressly agreed on, as on the side of profit only, or on that of loss only, the same share is to be considered as held on the side of which no mention is made.

GAI. iii. 150.

4. Manet autem societas eo usque, donec in eodem consensu perseveraverint: at cum aliquis renuntiaverit societati, solvitur societas. Sed plane si quis callide in hoc renuntiaverit societati, ut ob-

4. A partnership continues as long as the partners continue to agree that it shall do so; but if any one partner renounces the partnership, then the partnership is dissolved. If, however, he makes this renunciation with a secret motive, such as that he may alone enjoy a gain which he knows awaits him; as, for instance, if an inheritance has been left to a member of a partnership embracing all the property of each of the partners, and he renounces the partnership to enjoy alone the advantage of an inheritance left him; he is compelled to share this source of gain with his partners. But if he gains anything without such previous design, he alone profits by it: while the partner who has received his renunciation alone takes all that is acquired after the renunciation of the partnership has been made.

veniens aliquod lucrum solus habeat, veluti si totorum bonorum socius, cum ab aliquo heres esset relictus, in hoc renuntiaverit societati, ut hereditatem solus lucrifaceret, cogitur hoc lucrum communicare: si quid vero aliud lucrifaceret, quod non captaverit, ad ipsum solum pertinet: ei vero, cui renuntiatum est, quidquid omnino post renuntiationem societatem acquiritur, soli conceditur.

GAL. iii. 151; D. xvii. 2. 65. 3.

The contract of partnership may have different modifications. It may be made during or from a certain time or conditionally. (D. xvii. 2. 1. pr.) But there can be no partnership to last for ever, as no one can be forced to remain a partner against his will. (D. xvii. 2. 70.) Any partner may renounce, i.e. withdraw, when he pleases, but if the time during which the partnership is to last has been fixed, he cannot escape liability during that period, and even if no time has been fixed, he must not so retire as to force on a disadvantageous sale of partnership property. (D. xvii. 2. 65. 5 and 6.)

The remaining paragraphs of this Title treat of the modes in which the partnership may be dissolved. Ulpian, enumerating the causes of the dissolution of partnership, says, 'Societas solvitur ex personis, ex rebus, ex voluntate, ex actione.' (D. xvii. 2. 63. 10.) Ex personis, when one of the parties is dead or incapacitated, as by confiscation (publicatio) of goods, when the treasury succeeds to his persona (paragr. 7); ex rebus, when the purpose of the partnership is effected, or its subject-matter has ceased to exist, as in the case of cession of goods (paragr. 8); ex voluntate, when one partner renounces; and ex actione, when one partner compels a dissolution of partnership by action. We may add ex tempore, if the partnership was only temporary.

5. Solvitur adhuc societas etiam morte socii, quia qui societatem contrahit, certam personam sibi elegit. Sed et si consensu plurium societas coita sit, morte unius socii solvitur, etsi plures supersint, nisi si in coeunda societate aliter convenierit.

5. A partnership is also dissolved by the death of a partner, as he who enters into a partnership chooses a particular person to whom he binds himself. And even if there are more than two partners, the death of any one dissolves the partnership although more than one survive, unless on the formation of the partnership it has been otherwise agreed.

GAL. iii. 152; D. xvii. 2. 65. 9.

Although, in forming the partnership, the parties might agree that, if any one ceased to be a partner, the rest should still continue partners, or, to speak more accurately, should immediately and veniens aliquod lucrum solus habeat, veluti si totorum bonorum socius, cum ab aliquo heres esset relictus, in hoc renuntiaverit societati, ut hereditatem solus lucrificeret, cogitur hoc lucrum communicare: si quid vero aliud lucrificeret, quod non captaverit, ad ipsum solum pertinet: ei vero, cui renuntiatum est, quidquid omnino post renuntiatam societatem acquiritur, soli conceditur.

secret motive, such as that he may alone enjoy a gain which he knows awaits him; as, for instance, if an inheritance has been left to a member of a partnership embracing all the property of each of the partners, and he renounces the partnership to enjoy alone the advantage of an inheritance left him; he is compelled to share this source of gain with his partners. But if he gains anything without such previous design, he alone profits by it: while the partner who has received his renunciation alone takes all that is acquired after the renunciation of the partnership has been made.

GAL. iii. 151; D. xvii. 2. 65. 3.

The contract of partnership may have different modifications. It may be made during or from a certain time or conditionally. (D. xvii. 2. 1. pr.) But there can be no partnership to last for ever, as no one can be forced to remain a partner against his will. (D. xvii. 2. 70.) Any partner may renounce, i.e. withdraw, when he pleases, but if the time during which the partnership is to last has been fixed, he cannot escape liability during that period, and even if no time has been fixed he must not so retire as to force on a disadvantageous sale of partnership property. (D. xvii. 2. 65. 5 and 6.)

The remaining paragraphs of this Title treat of the modes in which the partnership may be dissolved. Ulpian, enumerating the causes of the dissolution of partnership, says, 'Societas solvitur ex personis, ex rebus, ex voluntate, ex actione.' (D. xvii. 2. 63. 10.) Ex personis, when one of the parties is dead or incapacitated, as by confiscation (publicatio) of goods, when the treasury succeeds to his persona (paragr. 7); ex rebus, when the purpose of the partnership is effected, or its subject-matter has ceased to exist, as in the case of cession of goods (paragr. 8); ex voluntate, when one partner renounces; and ex actione, when one partner compels a dissolution of partnership by action. We may add ex tempore, if the partnership was only temporary.

5. Solvitur adhuc societas etiam morte socii, quia qui societatem contrahit, certam personam sibi elegit. Sed et si consensu plurium societas coita sit, morte unius socii solvitur, etsi plures supersint, nisi si in coeunda societate aliter convenerit.

5. A partnership is also dissolved by the death of a partner, as he who enters into a partnership chooses a particular person to whom he binds himself. And even if there are more than two partners, the death of any one dissolves the partnership although more than one survive, unless on the formation of the partnership it has been otherwise agreed.

GAL. iii. 152; D. xvii. 2. 65. 9.

Although, in forming the partnership, the parties might agree that, if any one ceased to be a partner, the rest should still continue partners, or, to speak more accurately, should immediately and without fresh agreement form a new partnership, yet no one could validly make it part of the contract that his heirs should, on his death, be admitted partners, the contract being personal. There was an exception made to this rule in the case of societates vectigales. (D. xvii. 2. 59. pr.)

6. Item si alicujus rei contracta societas sit et finis negotio impositus est, finitur societas.

6. If the partnership has been formed for a single transaction, when the transaction is completed, the partnership is ended.

D. xvii. 2. 65. 10.

7. Publicatione quoque distrahi societatem manifestum est, scilicet si universa bona socii publicentur: nam cum in ejus locum alius succedit, pro mortuo habetur.

7. It is evident, also, that a partnership is dissolved by confiscation, as if all the property of a partner is confiscated; for this partner, as another person succeeds into his place, is considered dead.

D. xvii. 2. 65. 12.

8. Item si quis ex sociis, mole debiti pręgravatus, bonis suis cesserit et ideo propter publica aut propter privata debita substantia ejus veneat, solvitur societas. Sed hoc casu si adhuc consentiant in societatem, nova videtur incipere societas.

8. So, too, if one of the partners, borne down by the weight of his debts, makes a cession of his goods, and his property is therefore sold to satisfy his debts, public or private, the partnership is dissolved. But in this case, if the parties agree still to continue partners, a new partnership would seem to be begun.

GAI. iii. 153. 154.

The persona of an individual might, we know, be destroyed even in his lifetime and passed on to a successor, as, for instance, by the maxima and media capitis deminutio, and by the publicatio or confiscation of all the goods of the deminutus, which was one of their consequences, so that the fiscus was his successor (D. xlvi. 20. 1), or by the sale of his property in the mass either for the profit of the treasury in the case of criminals (sectio bonorum, the old form of publicatio), or of private individuals in certain cases of insolvency (emptio bonorum), or when he had made a cessio bonorum under the lex Julia. (See Tit. 12 of this Book.) In the time of Justinian sales in one mass of a whole patrimony were obsolete, and therefore confiscation (publicatio), when the fiscus was the successor, and cessio bonorum are alone mentioned here; the latter, however, as taking away the fortune of the partner, and not as destroying his persona.

Of course the partnership might be immediately renewed with the partner whose goods had been confiscated or ceded to creditors, if the other partners were willing to enter into what was really a new partnership, as it might if the partner had lost his civitas by the media deminutio; for partnership, being a contract of the jus gentium, could be formed with a stranger. (GAI. iii. 154.) The minima capitis deminutio did not cause a dissolution of the

without fresh agreement form a new partnership, yet no one could validly make it part of the contract that his heirs should, on his death, be admitted partners, the contract being personal. There was an exception made to this rule in the case of societates vectigales. (D. xvii. 2. 59. pr.)

6. Item si alicujus rei contracta societas sit et finis negotio impositus est, finitur societas.

6. If the partnership has been formed for a single transaction, when the transaction is completed, the partnership is ended.

D. xvii. 2. 65. 10.

7. Publicatione quoque distrahi societatem manifestum est, scilicet si universa bona socii publicentur: nam cum in ejus locum alius succedit, pro mortuo habetur.

7. It is evident, also, that a partnership is dissolved by confiscation, as if all the property of a partner is confiscated; for this partner, as another person succeeds into his place, is considered dead.

D. xvii. 2. 65. 12.

8. Item si quis ex sociis, mole debiti pręgravatus, bonis suis cesserit et ideo propter publica aut propter privata debita substantia ejus veneat, solvitur societas. Sed hoc casu si adhuc consentiant in societatem, nova videtur incipere societas.

8. So, too, if one of the partners, borne down by the weight of his debts, makes a cession of his goods, and his property is therefore sold to satisfy his debts, public or private, the partnership is dissolved. But in this case, if the parties agree still to continue partners, a new partnership would seem to be begun.

GAI. iii. 153. 154.

The persona of an individual might, we know, be destroyed even in his lifetime and passed on to a successor, as, for instance, by the maxima and media capitis deminutio, and by the publicatio or confiscation of all the goods of the deminutus, which was one of their consequences, so that the fiscus was his successor (D. xlviii. 20. 1), or by the sale of his property in the mass either for the profit of the treasury in the case of criminals (sectio bonorum, the old form of publicatio), or of private individuals in certain cases of insolvency (emptio bonorum), or when he had made a cessio bonorum under the lex Julia. (See Tit. 12 of this Book.) In the time of Justinian sales in one mass of a whole patrimony were obsolete, and therefore confiscation (publicatio), when the fiscus was the successor, and cessio bonorum are alone mentioned here; the latter, however, as taking away the fortune of the partner, and not as destroying his persona.

Of course the partnership might be immediately renewed with the partner whose goods had been confiscated or ceded to creditors, if the other partners were willing to enter into what was really a new partnership, as it might if the partner had lost his civitas by the media deminutio; for partnership, being a contract of the jus gentium, could be formed with a stranger. (GAI. iii. 154.) The minima capitis deminutio did not cause a dissolution of the partnership, and a person arrogated or emancipated still remained a partner. (D. xvii. 2. 65. 11; Postre's Gaius, 426.) The arrogator, however, did not become a partner, as a new partner could not be introduced without the consent of the others. Societas quemadmodum ad heredes socii non transit, ita nec ad arrogatorem, ne alioquin invitus quis socius efficiatur cui non vult. (D. xvii. 2. 65. 11.)

9. Socius socio utrum eo nomine tantum teneatur pro socio actione, si quid dolo commiserit, sicut is, qui deponi apud se passus est, an etiam culpæ, id est desidie atque negligentie nomine, quesitum est: prævaluit tamen, etiam culpæ nomine teneri eum. Culpæ autem non ad exactissimam diligentiam dirigenda est: sufficit enim talem diligentiam in communibus rebus adhibere socium, qualem suis rebus adhibere solet. Nam qui parum diligentem socium sibi adsumit de se queri, hoc est sue id imprudentie imputare debet.

9. It has been questioned whether one partner can only be made answerable to another by the action pro socio, if he has been guilty of malicious wrong, as a depositary is, or whether also for a fault, that is, for carelessness and negligence. The opinion has prevailed that he is also answerable for a fault, but the fault is not to be measured by a standard of the most perfect carefulness possible. It is sufficient that he should be as careful of things belonging to the partnership as he is of his own property. For he who accepts as partner a person of careless habits, has only himself to blame, that is must set it down to the score of his own imprudence.

D. xvii. 2. 72.

Societas jure quodammodo fraternitatis in se habet. (D. xvii. 2. 63. pr.) Hence, while each partner had, if sued, an allowance (termed the beneficium competentie) made for him, and was only held responsible to the extent of his means (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 38), yet, on the other hand, if he was condemned in an action pro socio, he was marked with infamy. (D. xvii. 2. 63. pr., 1-3; D. iii. 2. 1.)

The action pro socio was the remedy in almost every case that could arise between partners. It was employed, for instance, to enforce accounts, to get compensation for losses, and to dissolve the partnership. If any partner was guilty of a delict against his partners, such as theft, he would be made amenable by such actions as the actio furti, vi bonorum raptorum, or legis Aquilie, of which we read in the Fourth Book. There was also another action incident to partnerships, called the actio communi dividundo, which was brought to procure a partition, by the judex, of the common property. (D. xvii. 2. 43; Introductio sec. 103.)

TIT. XXVI. DE MANDATO.

Mandatum contrahitur quinque modis, sive sua: tantum gratia aliquis tibi mandat, sive sua: et tua, sive aliena tantum, sive sua et aliena, sive tua et aliena. At si tua tantum gratia tibi mandatum sit, superva-

The contract of mandate is formed in five modes; according as a mandator gives you a mandate for his benefit only, or for his benefit and for yours, or for the benefit of a third person only, or for his benefit and that of a

Actio furti

vi Bonorum

raptorum

Legis Aquilie

Actio communi

dividundo

Introductio

5 benefit 4 km + 8 3/4 person partnership, and a person arrogated or emancipated still remained a partner. (D. xvii. 2. 65. 11; POSTE'S Gaius, 426.) The arrogator, however, did not become a partner, as a new partner could not be introduced without the consent of the others. Societas quemadmodum ad heredes socii non transit, ita nec ad arrogatorem, ne alioquin invitatus quis socius efficiatur cui non vult. (D. xvii. 2. 65. 11.)

9. Socius socio utrum eo nomine tantum teneatur pro socio actione, si quid dolo commiserit, sicut is, qui deponi apud se passus est, an etiam culpæ, id est desidii atque negligentii nomine, quesitum est: prævaluit tamen, etiam culpæ nomine teneri eum. Culpæ autem non ad exactissimam diligentiam dirigenda est: sufficit enim talem diligentiam in communibus rebus adhibere socium, qualem suis rebus adhibere solet. Nam qui parum diligentem socium sibi adsumit de se queri, hoc est sue id imprudentiæ imputare debet.

9. It has been questioned whether one partner can only be made answerable to another by the action pro socio, if he has been guilty of malicious wrong, as a depositary is, or whether also for a fault, that is, for carelessness and negligence. The opinion has prevailed that he is also answerable for a fault, but the fault is not to be measured by a standard of the most perfect carefulness possible. It is sufficient that he should be as careful of things belonging to the partnership as he is of his own property. For he who accepts as partner a person of careless habits, has only himself to blame, that is must set it down to the score of his own imprudence.

D. xvii. 2. 72.

Societas jure quodammodo fraternitatis in se habet. (D. xvii. 2. 63. pr.) Hence, while each partner had, if sued, an allowance (termed the beneficium competentie) made for him, and was only held responsible to the extent of his means (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 38), yet, on the other hand, if he was condemned in an action pro socio, he was marked with infamy. (D. xvii. 2. 63. pr., 1-3; D. iii. 2. 1.)

The action pro socio was the remedy in almost every case that could arise between partners. It was employed, for instance, to enforce accounts, to get compensation for losses, and to dissolve the partnership. If any partner was guilty of a delict against his partners, such as theft, he would be made amenable by such actions as the actio furti, vi bonorum raptorum, or Legis Aquiliæ, of which we read in the Fourth Book. There was also another action incident to partnerships, called the actio communi dividundo, which was brought to procure a partition, by the judeæ, of the common property. (D. xvii. 2. 43; Introd. sec. 103.)

TIT. XXVI. DE MANDATO.

Mandatum contrahitur quinque modis, sive sua tantum gratia aliquis tibi mandet, sive sua et tua, sive aliena tantum, sive sua et aliena, sive tua et aliena. At si tua tantum gratia tibi mandatum sit, superva-

The contract of mandate is formed in five modes; according as a mandator gives you a mandate for his benefit only, or for his benefit and for yours, or for the benefit of a third person only, or for his benefit and that of a third person, or for your benefit and that of a third person. A mandate made for your benefit only is useless, and does not produce between you any obligation or action mandati.

5

cum est mandatum et ob id nulla ex eo obligatio nec mandati inter vos actio nascitur.

D. xvii. 1. 2. pr.; Gai. iii. 155, 156.

In the theory of Roman law one person could not represent another. The person who actually made the contract, who uttered the binding words, or went through the binding formalities, was the only legal contractor; he alone could sue and be sued. The law would not take notice that it was really in behalf of another that he made the contract.

But a friend on whom reliance could be placed might be persuaded to make the contract in his own name. Honour and friendship would then effect what the law would not compel. This friend would give up all that he gained by the contract to the person at whose request he entered into it. The promise to perform this act of friendship was given, in the old times of Roman manners, with an appropriate formality. The person really interested took the friend by the right hand, and told him that he placed in his hand the trust he was anxious to have discharged. The trust, or commission itself, was hence called mandatum (manu dictum). Plautus thus describes the ceremony (Captiv. ii. 3):

TYND. *Hæc per dexteram tuam, te dextera retinens manu,
Obsecro, infidelior mihi ne fuas, quam ego sum tibi.
Tu hoc age, tu mihi herus nunc es, tu patronus, tu pater;
Tibi commendo spes opesque meas.*

PH. Mandasti satis.

The execution of a mandatum was thus a discharge of an office of friendship. Originem ex officio atque amicitia trahit. (D. xvii. 1. 1. 4.) And it never lost the traces of its origin. It was always necessarily gratuitous: the mandatarius, i.e. the person charged with the mandatum, was obliged to bestow on it the care of the most diligent paterfamilias (C. iv. 35. 13), and if he failed to discharge the trust, and was condemned in an actio mandati, he was stamped with infamy. (D. iii. 2. 1; Introd. sec. 48.)

When the introduction of the prætorian system furnished a method by which every equitable claim could be enforced, friends who entered into such an agreement were obliged to discharge their reciprocal duties. The prætor, by the actio mandati directæ given to the mandator, compelled the mandatarius to account for all he received, and to pay over the profits, and, by the actio mandati contrariæ given to the mandatarius, compelled the mandator (i.e. the person who requested the favour) to reimburse, with interest, the mandatarius for all expenses incurred, to indemnify him for all losses, and to free him from all obligations contracted in the execution of the mandate. It is in this sense that the contracts of mandatum may be said to be bilateral.

The prætorian law went a great step further, by allowing the

Mandati

actio

actio

actio

cuum est mandatum et ob id nulla ex eo obligatio nec mandati inter vos actio nascitur.

third person, or for your benefit and that of a third person. A mandate made for your benefit only is useless, and does not produce between you any obligation or action mandati.

D. xvii. 1. 2. pr.; Gai. iii. 155, 156.

In the theory of Roman law one person could not represent another. The person who actually made the contract, who uttered the binding words, or went through the binding formalities, was the only legal contractor; he alone could sue and be sued. The law would not take notice that it was really in behalf of another that he made the contract.

But a friend on whom reliance could be placed might be persuaded to make the contract in his own name. Honour and friendship would then effect what the law would not compel. This friend would give up all that he gained by the contract to the person at whose request he entered into it. The promise to perform this act of friendship was given, in the old times of Roman manners, with an appropriate formality. The person really interested took the friend by the right hand, and told him that he placed in his hand the trust he was anxious to have discharged. The trust, or commission itself, was hence called mandatum (manu datum). Plautus thus describes the ceremony (Captiv. ii. 3):

TYND. *Hæc per dexteram tuam, te dextera retinens manu,
Obsecro, infidelior mihi ne fuas, quam ego sum tibi.
Tu hoc age, tu mihi herus nunc es, tu patronus, tu pater;
Tibi commendo spes opesque meas.*

PII. Mandati satis.

The execution of a mandatum was thus a discharge of an office of friendship. Originem ex officio atque amicitia trahit. (D. xvii. 1. 1. 4.) And it never lost the traces of its origin. It was always necessarily gratuitous: the mandatarius, i.e. the person charged with the mandatum, was obliged to bestow on it the care of the most diligent paterfamilias (C. iv. 35. 13), and if he failed to discharge the trust, and was condemned in an actio mandati, he was stamped with infamy. (D. iii. 2. 1; Introd. sec. 48.)

When the introduction of the prætorian system furnished a method by which every equitable claim could be enforced, friends who entered into such an agreement were obliged to discharge their reciprocal duties. The prætor, by the actio mandati directa given to the mandator, compelled the mandatarius to account for all he received, and to pay over the profits, and, by the actio mandati contraria given to the mandatarius, compelled the mandator (i.e. the person who requested the favour) to reimburse, with interest, the mandatarius for all expenses incurred, to indemnify him for all losses, and to free him from all obligations contracted in the execution of the mandate. It is in this sense that the contracts of mandatum may be said to be bilateral.

The prætorian law went a great step further, by allowing the

Mandati

religionem

in mandati actio given mandator

*in mandati contraria given
mandatarius*

mandator to bring equitable actions against, and to be sued by, the third party, with whom the mandatarius contracted. First as to actions brought by the mandator. Whatever direct actions the mandatarius would properly have brought or was liable to, the mandator was allowed to bring in the shape of actiones utiles; and if the mandator sued or intended to sue, the mandatarius could not sue. As, for instance, where the mandatarius would have brought a condictio, or an actio empti or venditi, the mandator was allowed to bring a condictio utilis, or an actio utilis empti or venditi. (D. xix. 1. 13. 25.) In the case of a special mandate, these actions were allowed as of course; in the case of a general mandate, only when the mandator had no other way of protecting his interests (D. xiv. 3. 2): a mandate being termed special when one man charged another with the execution of one or more particular things, and general when he asked him to represent him in all his affairs.

Secondly as to actions brought against the mandator. There were some acts, of a solemn character, in which one citizen could at no time of Roman law act for another, such as bringing any of the legis actiones, mancipation, making testaments, or the cretio or aditio of an inheritance. (Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 5, note.) Nor did the civil law ever permit any one, except a son or a slave (Tit. 28), to contract for another so as to make the person for whom he contracted directly responsible or directly able to sue on the obligation. But the praetorian system gradually recognised the intervention of an agent. A comitor, i.e. a person authorised formally to conduct a suit, was allowed to act on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant, and fully represented his principal. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 10. pr., note.) The manager of a shop (institor) and the captain of a ship (magister navis) were permitted to bind their employers (Bk. iv. Tit. 7. 2), and by an extension of the actions appropriate to these cases, i.e. by allowing a utilis actio quasi institoria (D. xvii. 1. 10. 5), the praetor made all employers liable for acts of their agents authorised by or profitable to them, and allowed actions to be brought directly against the employer without regard to the procurator or agent; and this was the mode in which the mandator was made responsible. The praetor also gave the mandator the right to sue directly without the consent of the agent (D. iii. 3. 68); a right not given by the actiones institoriae and exercitoriae except in special cases. Thus, ultimately, obligations were acquired by or against the mandator through the agent, and not for him by the agent.

1. Mandantis tantum gratia intervenit mandatum, veluti si quis tibi mandet, ut negotia ejus gereres, vel ut fundum ei emereres, vel ut pro eo sponderes.

1. A mandate is made for the benefit of the mandator only; if, for instance, any one gives you a mandate to transact his business, to buy an estate for him, or to become surety for him.

mandator to bring equitable actions against, and to be sued by, the third party, with whom the mandatarius contracted. First as to actions brought by the mandator. Whatever direct actions the mandatarius would properly have brought or was liable to, the mandator was allowed to bring in the shape of actiones utiles; and if the mandator sued or intended to sue, the mandatarius could not sue. As, for instance, where the mandatarius would have brought a condictio, or an actio empti or venditi, the mandator was allowed to bring a condictio utilis, or an actio utilis empti or venditi. (D. xix. 1. 13. 25.) In the case of a special mandate, these actions were allowed as of course; in the case of a general mandate, only when the mandator had no other way of protecting his interests (D. xiv. 3. 2): a mandate being termed special when one man charged another with the execution of one or more particular things, and general when he asked him to represent him in all his affairs.

Secondly as to actions brought against the mandator. There were some acts, of a solemn character, in which one citizen could at no time of Roman law act for another, such as bringing any of the legis actiones, mancipation, making testaments, or the cretio or aditio of an inheritance. (Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 5, note.) Nor did the civil law ever permit any one, except a son or a slave (Tit. 28), to contract for another so as to make the person for whom he contracted directly responsible or directly able to sue on the obligation. But the praetorian system gradually recognised the intervention of an agent. A comitor, i.e. a person authorised formally to conduct a suit, was allowed to act on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant, and fully represented his principal. (See Bk. iv. Tit. 10. pr., note.) The manager of a shop (institor) and the captain of a ship (magister navis) were permitted to bind their employers (Bk. iv. Tit. 7. 2), and by an extension of the actions appropriate to these cases, i.e. by allowing a utilis actio quasi institoria (D. xvii. 1. 10. 5), the praetor made all employers liable for acts of their agents authorised by or profitable to them, and allowed actions to be brought directly against the employer without regard to the procurator or agent; and this was the mode in which the mandator was made responsible. The praetor also gave the mandator the right to sue directly without the consent of the agent (D. iii. 3. 68); a right not given by the actiones institoriae and exercitoriae except in special cases. Thus, ultimately, obligations were acquired by or against the mandator through the agent, and not for him by the agent.

1. Mandantis tantum gratia intervenit mandatum, veluti si quis tibi mandet, ut negotia ejus gereres, vel ut fundum ei emereres, vel ut pro eo sponderes.

1. A mandate is made for the benefit of the mandator only; if, for instance, any one gives you a mandate to transact his business, to buy an estate for him, or to become surety for him.

This is the usual case of a mandatum. Justinian employs here, it may be remarked, the word sponderes, although sponsores no longer existed. (See Tit. 20.)

2. Tua et mandantis, veluti si mandet tibi, ut pecuniam sub usuris crederes ei, qui in rem ipsius mutaretur, aut si, volente te agere cum eo ex fidejussoria causa, mandet tibi, ut cum reo agas periculo mandantis, vel ut ipsius periculo stipuleris ab eo, quem tibi deleget in id, quod tibi debuerat.

2. A mandate is made for your benefit and that of the mandator; if, for instance, he gives a mandate to you to lend money at interest to a person who borrows it for the purposes of the mandator; or if, when you are about to sue him as a fidejussor, he gives you a mandate to sue the principal at his risk, or to stipulate at his risk for payment of something owed by him to you, with a person whom he appoints as his substitute.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 4; D. xvii. 1. 45. 7. 8.

Volente te agere cum eo ex fidejussoria causa. Under the law anterior to Justinian, the creditor could sue either the debtor or the fidejussor, but not both. If he elected to sue the latter, the fidejussor might give him a mandatum to sue the debtor, and then, if the creditor did so, the fidejussor would be freed from any obligation as fidejussor, but would be bound as mandator; and thus the mandate would be for the benefit of the fidejussor, because he would be sued after the principal, and for the benefit of the creditor, because he could sue the principal first and then the surety in his quality of mandator, whereas he could not ordinarily sue both the principal and the surety, but was obliged to make his choice between them, as the litis contestatio in the action he first brought extinguished the obligation they had jointly made. This could not be of any use after Justinian had decided that the principal debtor should be sued first, and then, if there was any deficiency, the fidejussor. (See Tit. 20. 4.)

Ab eo quem tibi deleget. The debtor points out to the creditor a third person who owes the debtor a sum equal to his debt to the creditor, and asks the creditor to stipulate with this third person for payment of the amount due from the debtor. If the third person does not pay, the debtor is held responsible as mandator. The creditor thus benefits, as he has two persons to sue, and the debtor benefits, because he employs his creditor to collect a debt due to him.

3. Aliena tantum causa intervenit mandatum, veluti si tibi mandet, ut Titii negotia gereres, vel ut Titio fundum emeress, vel ut pro Titio sponderes.

3. A mandate is made for the benefit of a third person, if, for example, the mandator bids you manage the affairs of Titius, or buy an estate for Titius, or become surety for Titius.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 2.

4. Sua et aliena, veluti si de communibus suis et Titii negotiis gerendis tibi mandet, vel ut sibi et Titio fundum emeress, vel ut pro eo

4. A mandate is made for the benefit of the mandator and of a third person, if, for example, the mandator gives you a mandate to manage affairs

This is the usual case of a mandatum. Justinian employs here, it may be remarked, the word sponderes, although sponsores no longer existed. (See Tit. 20.)

2. Tua et mandantis, veluti si mandet tibi, ut pecuniam sub usuris crederes ei, qui in rem ipsius mutaretur, aut si, volente te agere cum eo ex fidejussoria causa, mandet tibi, ut cum reo agas periculo mandantis, vel ut ipsius periculo stipuleris ab eo, quem tibi deleget in id, quod tibi debuerat.

2. A mandate is made for your benefit and that of the mandator; if, for instance, he gives a mandate to you to lend money at interest to a person who borrows it for the purposes of the mandator; or if, when you are about to sue him as a fidejussor, he gives you a mandate to sue the principal at his risk, or to stipulate at his risk for payment of something owed by him to you, with a person whom he appoints as his substitute.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 4; D. xvii. 1. 45. 7, 8.

Volente te agere cum eo ex fidejussoria causa. Under the law anterior to Justinian, the creditor could sue either the debtor or the fidejussor, but not both. If he elected to sue the latter, the fidejussor might give him a mandatum to sue the debtor, and then, if the creditor did so, the fidejussor would be freed from any obligation as fidejussor, but would be bound as mandator; and thus the mandate would be for the benefit of the fidejussor, because he would be sued after the principal, and for the benefit of the creditor, because he could sue the principal first and then the surety in his quality of mandator, whereas he could not ordinarily sue both the principal and the surety, but was obliged to make his choice between them, as the litis contestatio in the action he first brought extinguished the obligation they had jointly made. This could not be of any use after Justinian, had decided that the principal debtor should be sued first, and then, if there was any deficiency, the fidejussor. (See Tit. 20. 4.)

Ab eo quem tibi deleget. The debtor points out to the creditor a third person who owes the debtor a sum equal to his debt to the creditor, and asks the creditor to stipulate with this third person for payment of the amount due from the debtor. If the third person does not pay, the debtor is held responsible as mandator. The creditor thus benefits, as he has two persons to sue, and the debtor benefits, because he employs his creditor to collect a debt due to him.

3. Aliena tantum causa intervenit mandatum, veluti si tibi mandet, ut Titii negotia gereres, vel ut Titio fundum emeress, vel ut pro Titio sponderes.

3. A mandate is made for the benefit of a third person, if, for example, the mandator bids you manage the affairs of Titius, or buy an estate for Titius, or become surety for Titius.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 2.

4. Sua et aliena, veluti si de communibus suis et Titii negotiis gerendis tibi mandet, vel ut sibi et Titio fundum emeress, vel ut pro eo

4. A mandate is made for the benefit of the mandator and of a third person, if, for example, the mandator gives you a mandate to manage affairs et Titio sponderes.

common to himself and Titius, or to buy an estate for himself and Titius, or to become surety for himself and Titius.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 3.

5. Tua et aliena, veluti si tibi mandet, ut Titio sub usuris crederes. Quodsi ut sine usuris crederes, aliena tantum gratia intercedit mandatum.

5. A mandate is made for your benefit and for that of a third person. if, for instance, the mandator bids you to lend money at interest to Titius. Were the money to be lent without interest, the mandate would be only for the benefit of a third person.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 5.

6. Tua tantum gratia intervenit mandatum, veluti si tibi mandet, ut pecunias tuas potius in emptiones prædiorum colloques, quam feneres, vel ex diverso ut feneres potius, quam in emptiones prædiorum colloques. Cujus generis mandatum magis consilium est quam mandatum et ob id non est obligatorium, quia nemo ex consilio mandati obligatur, etiamsi non expediat ei, cui dabitur, cum liberum cuique sit apud se explorare, an expediat consilium. Itaque si otiosam pecuniam domi te habentem hortatus fuerit aliquis, ut rem aliquam emereres vel eam crederes, quamvis non expedierit tibi eam emisse vel credidisse, non tamen tibi mandati tenetur. Et adeo hæc ita sunt, ut quæsitum sit, an mandati teneatur, qui mandavit tibi, ut Titio pecuniam fenerares: sed obtinuit Sabini sententia, obligatorium esse in hoc casu mandatum, quia non aliter Titio credidisses, quam si tibi mandatum esset.

6. A mandate is made for your benefit only, if, for example, the mandator bids you invest your money in the purchase of land rather than put it out to interest, or conversely. Such a mandate is rather a piece of advice than a mandate, and consequently is not obligatory, as no one is bound by giving advice, although it be not judicious, as each may judge for himself what the worth of the advice is. If, therefore, you have a sum of money lying idle in your house, and any one advises you to make a purchase with it, or put it out to interest, although it may not be advantageous to you to have made this purchase, or to have lent your money, yet your adviser is not bound by an action mandati. So much so, that it has been questioned whether a person is bound by this action who has given you a mandate to lend your money at interest to Titius. But the opinion of Sabinus has prevailed, that such a mandate is obligatory, as you would not have lent your money to Titius unless the mandate had been given to you.

GAI. iii. 156; D. xvii. 1. 2. 6.

It was a very narrow line which divided the expression of a mere opinion advising another person to do a thing, and such a request to him to do it as involved the responsibilities of a mandatum. Everything depended on the intention of the parties. The question was, did the person who expressed the opinion, or made the request, mean to say that, if the opinion would not be adopted, or the request granted, unless he made himself responsible for the consequences, he was willing to become responsible? If he did mean this, he was treated as a mandator.

A mandator stood in this and similar cases almost exactly in the place of a fidejussor. Neque enim multum referre præsens quis interrogatus fidejubeat, an absens mandet. (D. xvii. 1.

et Titio sponderes.

common to himself and Titius, or to buy an estate for himself and Titius, or to become surety for himself and Titius.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 3.

5. Tua et aliena, veluti si tibi mandet, ut Titio sub usuris crederes. Quodsi ut sine usuris crederes, aliena tantum gratia intercedit mandatum.

5. A mandate is made for your benefit and for that of a third person. if, for instance, the mandator bids you to lend money at interest to Titius. Were the money to be lent without interest, the mandate would be only for the benefit of a third person.

D. xvii. 1. 2. 5.

6. Tua tantum gratia intervenit mandatum, veluti si tibi mandet, ut pecunias tuas potius in emptiones prædiorum colloques, quam feneres, vel ex diverso ut feneres potius, quam in emptiones prædiorum colloques. Cujus generis mandatum magis consilium est quam mandatum et ob id non est obligatorium, quia nemo ex consilio mandati obligatur, etiamsi non expediat ei, cui dabitur, cum liberum cuique sit apud se explorare, an expediat consilium. Itaque si otiosam pecuniam domi te habentem hortatus fuerit aliquis, ut rem aliquam emereres vel eam crederes, quamvis non expedierit tibi eam emisse vel credidisse, non tamen tibi mandati tenetur. Et adeo hæc ita sunt, ut quæsitum sit, an mandati teneatur, qui mandavit tibi, ut Titio pecuniam fenerares: sed obtinuit Sabinus sententia, obligatorium esse in hoc casu mandatum, quia non aliter Titio credidisses, quam si tibi mandatum esset.

6. A mandate is made for your benefit only, if, for example, the mandator bids you invest your money in the purchase of land rather than put it out to interest, or conversely. Such a mandate is rather a piece of advice than a mandate, and consequently is not obligatory, as no one is bound by giving advice, although it be not judicious, as each may judge for himself what the worth of the advice is. If, therefore, you have a sum of money lying idle in your house, and any one advises you to make a purchase with it, or put it out to interest, although it may not be advantageous to you to have made this purchase, or to have lent your money, yet your adviser is not bound by an action mandati. So much so, that it has been questioned whether a person is bound by this action who has given you a mandate to lend your money at interest to Titius. But the opinion of Sabinus has prevailed, that such a mandate is obligatory, as you would not have lent your money to Titius unless the mandate had been given to you.

GAI. iii. 156; D. xvii. 1. 2. 6.

It was a very narrow line which divided the expression of a mere opinion advising another person to do a thing, and such a request to him to do it as involved the responsibilities of a mandatum. Everything depended on the intention of the parties. The question was, did the person who expressed the opinion, or made the request, mean to say that, if the opinion would not be adopted, or the request granted, unless he made himself responsible for the consequences, he was willing to become responsible? If he did mean this, he was treated as a mandator.

A mandator stood in this and similar cases almost exactly in the place of a fidejussor. Neque enim multum referre præsens quis interrogatus fidejubeat, an absens mandet. (D. xvii. 1.

32.) Accordingly, in the Digest and the Code, the two are treated of under the same head, de fidejussoribus et mandatoribus. For the mandate might be an intercessio, i.e. a mode in which a third party steps in between two others as a surety for one of them, and was subject to the general rules common to accessory contracts, such as the prohibition of the senatusconsultum Velleianum with respect to women, the beneficium discussionis under Justinian, i.e. that the principal should be sued first, the beneficium divisionis under Hadrian's rescript, i.e. that the liabilities of co-sureties should be divided, and, to some extent, the beneficium cessionarium actionum. (See Tit. 20. 4.)

But the mandatum, being a distinct and not an accessory contract, was, in some points, distinguished from a fidejussio. 1. The mandator was sometimes considered more responsible than the fidejussor. If a minor borrowed money under a guarantee, and was restitutus in integrum, Ulpian says it was doubtful whether the loss should fall on the creditor or the fidejussor; but he is clear it ought to fall on the mandator if the guarantee was given by mandate, not by fidejussio. (D. iv. 4. 13. pr.) 2. The debtor and the fidejussor being liable for the same debt, the litis contestatio in a suit against the debtor released the fidejussor; but this was not so in the case of the mandator, who was bound by a separate contract. Justinian altered the law, and made the action against the fidejussor survive, thus, as he says, placing him in the position of the mandator. (C. viii. 41. 28.) 3. If once there was a litis contestatio in a suit against the fidejussor, it was no longer open to the fidejussor to demand that the actions against the debtor and the other fidejussores should be ceded to him, for the litis contestatio had extinguished them; but neither the litis contestatio nor judgment against the debtor affected the claim of the mandator for the cession of actions. (D. xlv. 3. 95. 10.) 4. The fidejussor could only claim that the actions which the creditor actually had should be ceded to him; but the mandator was altogether released if the creditor had abandoned the right of bringing any action he could have brought, because, the contracts being distinct and the creditor bound by a bilateral contract to the mandator, if he had not fulfilled his duty, the mandator was free from his obligation. (D. xlv. 3. 95. 11.)

7. Illud quoque mandatum non est obligatorium, quod contra bonos mores est, veluti si Titius de furto aut damno faciendo aut de injuria facienda tibi mandet. Licet enim penam istius facti nomine praestiteris, non tamen ullam habes adversus Titium actionem.

7. A mandate, again, is not obligatory which is contrary to boni mores; as, for instance, if Titius gives you a mandate to commit a theft, or do a harm or injury; for although you pay the penalty of what you may do, you have not in such a case an action against Titius.

GAL. iii. 157; D. xvii. 1. 22. 6.

8. Is, qui exsequitur mandatum, non debet excedere fines mandati. Ut ecce si quis usque ad centum

8. A mandatary must not exceed the limits of the mandate; for instance, if a mandatary bids you buy land or

32.) Accordingly, in the Digest and the Code, the two are treated or under the same head, de fidejussoribus et mandatoribus. For the mandate might be an intercessio, i.e. a mode in which a third party steps in between two others as a surety for one of them, and was subject to the general rules common to accessory contracts, such as the prohibition of the senatusconsultum Velleianum with respect to women, the beneficium discussionis under Justinian, i.e. that the principal should be sued first, the beneficium divisionis under Hadrian's rescript, i.e. that the liabilities of co-sureties should be divided, and, to some extent, the beneficium cessiondarum actionum. (See Tit. 20. 4.)

But the mandatum, being a distinct and not an accessory contract, was, in some points, distinguished from a fidejussio. 1. The mandator was sometimes considered more responsible than the fidejussor. If a minor borrowed money under a guarantee, and was restitutus in integrum, Ulpian says it was doubtful whether the loss should fall on the creditor or the fidejussor; but he is clear it ought to fall on the mandator if the guarantee was given by mandate, not by fidejussio. (D. iv. 4. 13. pr.) 2. The debtor and the fidejussor being liable for the same debt, the litis contestatio in a suit against the debtor released the fidejussor; but this was not so in the case of the mandator, who was bound by a separate contract. Justinian altered the law, and made the action against the fidejussor survive, thus, as he says, placing him in the position of the mandator. (C. viii. 41. 28.) 3. If once there was a litis contestatio in a suit against the fidejussor, it was no longer open to the fidejussor to demand that the actions against the debtor and the other fidejussores should be ceded to him, for the litis contestatio had extinguished them; but neither the litis contestatio nor judgment against the debtor affected the claim of the mandator for the cession of actions. (D. xlv. 3. 95. 10.) 4. The fidejussor could only claim that the actions which the creditor actually had should be ceded to him; but the mandator was altogether released if the creditor had abandoned the right of bringing any action he could have brought, because, the contracts being distinct and the creditor bound by a bilateral contract to the mandator, if he had not fulfilled his duty, the mandator was free from his obligation. (D. xlv. 3. 95. 11.)

7. Illud quoque mandatum non est obligatorium, quod contra bonos mores est, veluti si Titius de furto aut damno faciendo aut de injuria facienda tibi mandat. Licet enim poenam istius facti nomine praestiteris, non tamen ullam habes adversus Titium actionem.

7. A mandate, again, is not obligatory which is contrary to boni mores; as, for instance, if Titius gives you a mandate to commit a theft, or do a harm or injury; for although you pay the penalty of what you may do, you have not in such a case an action against Titius.

GAI. iii. 157; D. xvii. 1. 22. 6.

8. Is, qui exsequitur mandatum, non debet excedere fines mandati. Ut ecce si quis usque ad centum

8. A mandatory must not exceed the limits of the mandate; for instance, if a mandator bids you buy land or become surety for Titius up to the amount of a hundred aurei, you must not exceed this sum in making the purchase or becoming surety, otherwise you will not have an action mandati; so much so, that Sabinus and Cassius thought that even if you limited your action to a hundred aurei, you would bring it in vain. The authors of the opposite school think that you may rightly bring an action limited to a hundred aurei, and this opinion is doubtless the more gracious. If you lay out less on the purchase, you can certainly bring an action against the mandator; for a person who gives a mandate that an estate shall be bought for him at the price of a hundred aurei, is understood to mean that it should be bought for less if possible.

aureos mandaverit tibi, ut fundum emerēs vel ut pro Titio sponderes, neque pluris emere debes neque in ampliorem pecuniam fidejūbere; alioquin non habebis cum eo mandati actionem: adeo quidem, ut Sabino et Cassio placuerit, etiam si usque ad centum aureos cum eo agere velis, inutiliter te acturum. Diversæ scholæ auctores recte te usque ad centum aureos acturum existimant: quæ sententia sane benignior est. Quod si minoris emeris, habebis scilicet cum eo actionem, quoniam qui mandat, ut sibi centum aureorum fundus emeretur, is utique mandasse intellegitur, ut minoris, si possit, emeretur.

GAI. iii. 161; D. xvii. 1. 3. 2; D. xvii. 1. 4. 5.

Qui excessit, aliud quid facere videtur. (D. xvii. 1. 5.) Sabinus, in giving the opinion mentioned in the text, insisted very rigorously on the effect of the thing done being aliud quid.

9. Recte quoque mandatum contractum, si, dum adhuc integra res sit, revocatum fuerit, evanescit.

9. The mandate, although validly formed, is extinguished, if before it is begun to be executed it is revoked.

GAI. iii. 159.

The power of revoking the mandate, if the revocation did not harm the mandatarius, i.e. if the matter was still res integra, gives a peculiar feature to this contract. The contract was formed, and yet it was not certain to come into operation.

10. Item si adhuc integro mandato mors alterutrius interveniat, id est vel ejus, qui mandaverit, vel ejus, qui mandatum suscepit, solvitur mandatum. Sed utilitatis causa receptum est, si mortuo eo, qui tibi mandaverit, tu ignorans, eum decessisse, exsecutus fueras mandatum, posse te agere mandati actione: alioquin justa et probabilis ignorantia damnum tibi afferat. Et huic simile est, quod placuit, si debitores manumisso dispensatore Titii per ignorantiam liberti solverint, liberari eos: cum alioquin stricta juris ratione non possent liberari, quia alii solvissent, quam cui solvere debuerint.

10. A mandate is also extinguished, if, before it is begun to be executed, the mandator or mandatory dies. But motives of convenience have given rise to the decision, that if, after the death of the mandator, you, in ignorance of his decease, execute the mandate, you may bring an action mandati; otherwise you would be prejudiced by what was allowable and natural ignorance. Similarly it has been decided that, if debtors make a payment to the steward of Titius, after he has been enfranchised, in ignorance of his enfranchisement, they are freed from their obligation, although, in strict law, they could not be freed, as they have made the payment to a person other than him to whom they ought to have made it.

GAI. iii. 160; D. xvii. 1. 26. pr.

aureos mandaverit tibi, ut fundum emereres vel ut pro Titio sponderes, neque pluris emere debes neque in ampliorem pecuniam fidejungere; alioquin non habebis cum eo mandati actionem: adeo quidem, ut Sabino et Cassio placuerit, etiam si usque ad centum aureos cum eo agere velis, inutiliter te acturum. Diverse scholæ auctores recte te usque ad centum aureos acturum existimant: quæ sententia sane benignior est. Quod si minoris emeris, habebis scilicet cum eo actionem, quoniam qui mandat, ut sibi centum aureorum fundus emeretur, is utique mandasse intellegitur, ut minoris, si possit, emeretur.

become surety for Titius up to the amount of a hundred aurei, you must not exceed this sum in making the purchase or becoming surety, otherwise you will not have an action mandati; so much so, that Sabinus and Cassius thought that even if you limited your action to a hundred aurei, you would bring it in vain. The authors of the opposite school think that you may rightly bring an action limited to a hundred aurei, and this opinion is doubtless the more gracious. If you lay out less on the purchase, you can certainly bring an action against the mandator; for a person who gives a mandate that an estate shall be bought for him at the price of a hundred aurei, is understood to mean that it should be bought for less if possible.

GAI. iii. 161; D. xvii. 1. 3. 2; D. xvii. 1. 4. 5.

Qui excessit, aliud quid facere videtur. (D. xvii. 1. 5.) Sabinus, in giving the opinion mentioned in the text, insisted very rigorously on the effect of the thing done being aliud quid.

9. Recte quoque mandatum contractum, si, dum adhuc integra res sit, revocatum fuerit, evanescit.

9. The mandate, although validly formed, is extinguished, if before it is begun to be executed it is revoked.

GAI. iii. 159.

The power of revoking the mandate, if the revocation did not harm the mandatarius, i.e. if the matter was still res integra, gives a peculiar feature to this contract. The contract was formed, and yet it was not certain to come into operation.

10. Item si adhuc integro mandato mors alterutrius interveniat, id est vel ejus, qui mandaverit, vel ejus, qui mandatum suscepit, solvitur mandatum. Sed utilitatis causa receptum est, si mortuo eo, qui tibi mandaverit, tu ignorans, eum decessisse, exsecutus fueras mandatum, posse te agere mandati actione: alioquin justa et probabilis ignorantia damnum tibi afferat. Et huic simile est, quod placuit, si debitores manumisso dispensatore Titii per ignorantiam liberti solverint, liberari eos: cum alioquin stricta juris ratione non possent liberari, quia alii solvissent, quam cui solvere debuerint.

10. A mandate is also extinguished, if, before it is begun to be executed, the mandator or mandatory dies. But motives of convenience have given rise to the decision, that if, after the death of the mandator, you, in ignorance of his decease, execute the mandate, you may bring an action mandati; otherwise you would be prejudiced by what was allowable and natural ignorance. Similarly it has been decided that, if debtors make a payment to the steward of Titius, after he has been enfranchised, in ignorance of his enfranchisement, they are freed from their obligation, although, in strict law, they could not be freed, as they have made the payment to a person other than him to whom they ought to have made it.

GAI. iii. 160; D. xvii. 1. 26. pr.

Manumisso. It would be the same if the slave had not been enfranchised, but had been sold, or had his office of dispensator taken from him without the knowledge of the debtors. (D. xlv. 3. 51.)

11. Mandatum non suscipere liberum est: susceptum autem consummandum aut quam primum renuntiandum est, ut aut per semet ipsum aut per alium eandem rem mandator exsequatur. Nam nisi ita renuntiatur, ut integra causa mandatori reservetur eandem rem explicandi, nihilo minus mandati actio locum habet, nisi si justa causa intercessit aut non renuntiandi aut intempestive renuntiandi.

11. Every one is free to refuse accepting a mandate, but if it is once accepted, it must be executed, or else renounced with all despatch so as to permit the mandator carrying out his purpose himself or through another. For, unless the renunciation is made so that the mandator is still in a position to do this, an action mandati may be brought in spite of the renunciation of the mandatary, unless some good reason has prevented him making the renunciation, or making it within a proper time.

D. xvii. 1. 22. 11.

Nisi si justa causa. For example, a sudden and serious illness, a deadly enmity springing up between the mandator and the mandatarius, or the insolvency of the former. (D. xvii. 1. 23-25.) In the execution of the mandate the mandatarius was bound to use the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (Tit. 27. 1.)

12. Mandatum et in diem differri et sub condicione fieri potest.

12. A mandate may be made to take effect from a particular time, or may be made conditionally.

D. xvii. 1. 1. 3.

13. In summa sciendum est, mandatum, nisi gratuitum sit, in aliam formam negotii cadere: nam mercede constituta, incipit locatio et conductio esse. Et ut generaliter dixerimus: quibus casibus, sine mercede suscepto officio, mandati aut depositi contrahitur negotium, his casibus, interveniente mercede, locatio et conductio contrahi intelligitur. Et ideo si fulloni polienda curandave vestimenta dederis aut sarcinatori sarcienda, nulla mercede constituta neque promissa, mandati competit actio.

13. Lastly, it may be observed, that unless a mandate is gratuitous, it will take the form of some other contract; for, if a consideration is fixed on, it is a contract of letting on hire. And generally we may say, that in every case in which, whenever, the duty being undertaken without pay, there is a contract of mandata or deposit, in every such case, if pay is received, the contract is one of letting to hire. If, therefore, a person gives his clothes to a fuller to be scoured or cleaned, or to a tailor to be mended, without any pay being agreed on or promised, an action mandati may be brought.

GAL. ii. 162; D. xvii. 1. 1. 4.

Although the execution of the mandatum was necessarily gratuitous, yet, without making the contract a locatio conductio, a mandator might offer a reward to the mandatarius, not exactly in payment of, but in gratitude for, his services. Such a recompense was called honorarium, or sometimes salarium, a term that was especially applied to the recompense offered to those who exercised the liberal professions, such as philosophers, rhetoricians,

mandati
from the contract or conditionally

mandati is the contract

mercedem — salarium
as in gratuitum

Manumisso. It would be the same if the slave had not been enfranchised, but had been sold, or had his office of dispensator taken from him without the knowledge of the debtors. (D. xlv. 3. 51.)

11. Mandatum non suscipere liberum est: susceptum autem consummandum aut quam primum renuntiandum est, ut aut per semet ipsum aut per alium eandem rem mandator exsequatur. Nam nisi ita renuntiatur, ut integra causa mandatori reservetur eandem rem explicandi, nihilo minus mandati actio locum habet, nisi si justa causa intercessit aut non renuntiandi aut intempestive renuntiandi.

11. Every one is free to refuse accepting a mandate, but if it is once accepted, it must be executed, or else renounced with all despatch so as to permit the mandator carrying out his purpose himself or through another. For, unless the renunciation is made so that the mandator is still in a position to do this, an action mandati may be brought in spite of the renunciation of the mandatary, unless some good reason has prevented him making the renunciation, or making it within a proper time.

D. xvii. 1. 22. 11.

Nisi si justa causa. For example, a sudden and serious illness, a deadly enmity springing up between the mandator and the mandatarius, or the insolvency of the former. (D. xvii. 1. 23-25.) In the execution of the mandate the mandatarius was bound to use the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (Tit. 27. 1.)

12. Mandatum et in diem differri et sub condicione fieri potest.

12. A mandate may be made to take effect from a particular time, or may be made conditionally.

D. xvii. 1. 1. 3.

13. In summa sciendum est, mandatum, nisi gratuitum sit, in aliam formam negotii cadere: nam mercede constituta, incipit locatio et conductio esse. Et ut generaliter dixerimus: quibus casibus, sine mercede suscepto officio, mandati aut depositi contrahitur negotium, his casibus, interveniente mercede, locatio et conductio contrahi intelligitur. Et ideo si fulloni polienda curandave vestimenta dederis aut sarcinatori sarcienda, nulla mercede constituta neque promissa, mandati competit actio.

13. Lastly, it may be observed, that unless a mandate is gratuitous, it will take the form of some other contract; for, if a consideration is fixed on, it is a contract of letting on hire. And generally we may say, that in every case in which, whenever, the duty being undertaken without pay, there is a contract of mandata or deposit, in every such case, if pay is received, the contract is one of letting to hire. If, therefore, a person gives his clothes to a fuller to be scoured or cleaned, or to a tailor to be mended, without any pay being agreed on or promised, an action mandati may be brought.

GAL. ii. 162; D. xvii. 1. 1. 4.

Although the execution of the mandatum was necessarily gratuitous, yet, without making the contract a locatio conductio, a mandator might offer a reward to the mandatarius, not exactly in payment of, but in gratitude for, his services. Such a recompense was called honorarium, or sometimes salarium, a term that was especially applied to the recompense offered to those who exercised the liberal professions, such as philosophers, rhetoricians,

mandati
from the contract or conditionally

mandati is the contract

mercedem — salarium
as in gratuitum

physicians, advocates, &c. These honoraria could not be made the subject of an action; but the magistrate, prætor, or præses of the province pronounced extra ordinem (see Introd. sec. 108) whether they were due and what was the proper amount. (D. l. 13. 1.)

TIT. XXVII. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS QUASI EX CONTRACTU.

Post generâ contractuum enumerata dispiciamus etiam de his obligationibus, quæ non proprie quidem ex contractu nasci intelleguntur, sed tamen, quia non ex maleficio substantiam capiunt, quasi ex contractu nasci videntur.

Having enumerated the different kinds of contracts, let us treat of those obligations which do not spring, properly speaking, from a contract, but yet, as they do not take their origin from a delict, seem to arise, as it were, from a contract.

If obligations were to be considered as always arising either ex contractu or ex delicto, one man could only be bound to another in one of two ways: either by a mutual exercise of will he had entered into an agreement with him, or he had done him some injury which he ought to repair. But there were many instances in which justice required that he should be considered bound, where no contract had been made, and where nothing to which the law gave the technical term of delictum had been committed. Such cases, however, if separately examined, would approach either to an obligatio ex contractu or to one ex delicto. If it more nearly resembled the former, the binding tie was called an obligatio quasi ex contractu; if the latter, it was called an obligatio quasi ex delicto. (See Introd. sec. 87, 88.)

The leading distinction between obligations ex contractu and those quasi ex contractu is, that in the former one person chooses to bind himself to another, in the latter he is placed in such circumstances that he is thereby bound to another. To take, for instance, the examples given in the Title: if I take upon me the management of my neighbour's affairs, become tutor, have things in common with others who are not my partners, accept an inheritance, or receive money not due to me, the mere fact of my so conducting myself imposes upon me certain duties which the law will force me to fulfil. Of course, if I make an express agreement in any of these cases, I am then bound by the agreement, and not by the circumstances of my position. It is only in the absence of any agreement that I am bound by an obligatio quasi ex contractu. An obligatio quasi ex contractu does not rest on any contract at all; it rests on a fact or event, but there is an analogy between a contract and the kind of fact or events which give rise to an obligatio quasi ex contractu, for they both create rights in personam. (See AUSTIN, Jurisprudence (ed. 1869), p. 944.) The instances of obligations quasi ex contractu which follow are only meant as examples, not as an exhaustive list.

physicians, advocates, &c. These honoraria could not be made the subject of an action; but the magistrate, prætor, or præses of the province pronounced extra ordinem (see Introd. sec. 108) whether they were due and what was the proper amount. (D. l. 13. 1.)

TIT. XXVII. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS QUASI EX CONTRACTU.

Post generâ contractuum enumerata dispiciamus etiam de his obligationibus, quæ non proprie quidem ex contractu nasci intelleguntur, sed tamen, quia non ex maleficio substantiam capiunt, quasi ex contractu nasci videntur.

Having enumerated the different kinds of contracts, let us treat of those obligations which do not spring, properly speaking, from a contract, but yet, as they do not take their origin from a delict, seem to arise, as it were, from a contract.

If obligations were to be considered as always arising either ex contractu or ex delicto, one man could only be bound to another in one of two ways: either by a mutual exercise of will he had entered into an agreement with him, or he had done him some injury which he ought to repair. But there were many instances in which justice required that he should be considered bound, where no contract had been made, and where nothing to which the law gave the technical term of delictum had been committed. Such cases, however, if separately examined, would approach either to an obligatio ex contractu or to one ex delicto. If it more nearly resembled the former, the binding tie was called an obligatio quasi ex contractu; if the latter, it was called an obligatio quasi ex delicto. (See Introd. sec. 87, 88.)

The leading distinction between obligations ex contractu and those quasi ex contractu is, that in the former one person chooses to bind himself to another, in the latter he is placed in such circumstances that he is thereby bound to another. To take, for instance, the examples given in the Title: if I take upon me the management of my neighbour's affairs, become tutor, have things in common with others who are not my partners, accept an inheritance, or receive money not due to me, the mere fact of my so conducting myself imposes upon me certain duties which the law will force me to fulfil. Of course, if I make an express agreement in any of these cases, I am then bound by the agreement, and not by the circumstances of my position. It is only in the absence of any agreement that I am bound by an obligatio quasi ex contractu. An obligatio quasi ex contractu does not rest on any contract at all; it rests on a fact or event, but there is an analogy between a contract and the kind of fact or events which give rise to an obligatio quasi ex contractu, for they both create rights in personam. (See AUSTIN, Jurisprudence (ed. 1869), p. 944.) The instances of obligations quasi ex contractu which follow are only meant as examples, not as an exhaustive list.

1. Igitur cum quis absentis negotia gesserit, ultro citroque inter eos nascuntur actiones, quæ appellantur negotiorum gestorum: sed domino quidem rei gestæ adversus eum, qui gessit, directa competit actio, negotiorum autem gestori contraria. Quas ex nullo contractu proprie nasci manifestum est: quippe ita nascuntur istæ actiones, si sine mandato quisque alienis negotiis gerendis se obtulerit: ex qua causa ii, quorum negotia gesta fuerint, etiam ignorantes obligantur. Idque utilitatis causa receptum est, ne absentium, qui subita festinatione coacti, nulli demandata negotiorum suorum administratione, peregre profecti essent, desererentur negotia: quæ sane nemo curaturus esset, si de eo, quod quis impendisset, nullam habiturus esset actionem. Sicut autem is, qui utiliter gesserit negotia, habet obligatum dominum negotiorum, ita et contra iste quoque tenetur, ut administrationis rationem reddat. Quo casu ad exactissimam quisque diligentiam compellitur reddere rationem: nec sufficit talem diligentiam adhibere, qualem suis rebus adhibere soleret, si modo alius diligentior commodius administraturus esset negotia.

1. Thus, if a person has managed the affairs of another in his absence, they have reciprocally actions negotiorum gestorum, the action belonging to the owner against him who has managed his affairs being an actio directa, and the action given to this person against the owner being an actio contraria. It is evident that these actions cannot properly be said to arise from a contract, for they arise only when one person has, without receiving a mandate, taken upon himself the management of the affairs of another, and consequently those whose affairs are thus managed are bound by an obligation, even without their knowing it. It is from motives of convenience that this has been admitted, to prevent the entire neglect of the affairs of absent persons, who may be forced to depart in haste, without having entrusted the management to any one; and certainly no one would pay any attention to their affairs, unless he could recover by action any expenses he might be put to. On the other hand, just as he who has advantageously managed the affairs of another makes this person liable to him by an obligation, so he himself is bound to render an account of his management. And the standard which he is bound to observe in rendering an account, is that of the most exact diligence, nor is it sufficient that he should use such diligence as he employs in the management of his own affairs, that is, if it is possible that a person of greater diligence would be likely to manage the affairs of the absent person better.

D. iii. 5. 2; D. xlv. 7. 5. pr.; C. ii. 18. 20.

Etiam ignorantes. If the owners had known of the part taken in the management of their affairs, there would have been a mandatum tacitum.

tutela agens tutor
2. Tutores quoque, qui tutelæ iudicio tenentur, non proprie ex contractu obligati intelleguntur (nullum enim negotium inter tutorem et pupillum contrahitur): sed quia sane non ex maleficio tenentur, quasi ex contractu teneri videntur. Et hoc autem casu mutæ sunt actiones: non tantum enim pupillus cum tutore habet tutelæ actionem, sed et ex contrario tutor cum pupillo habet contrariam tutelæ, si vel impenderit aliquid in rem pupilli vel pro eo fuerit obligatus aut rem suam credi-

2. Tutors, again, who are liable to the action tutela, are not, properly speaking, bound by a contract, for there is no contract made between the tutor and the pupil; but as they are certainly not bound by a delict, they seem to be bound quasi ex contractu. In this case, too, there are reciprocal actions, for not only has the pupil an action tutela against the tutor, but, in his turn, the tutor has an actio contraria tutela against the pupil, if he has incurred any expenses in managing the pupil's property, or has entered

1. Igitur cum quis absentis negotia gesserit, ultro citroque inter eos nascuntur actiones, quæ appellantur negotiorum gestorum: sed domino quidem rei gestæ adversus eum, qui gessit, directa competit actio, negotiorum autem gestori contraria. Quas ex nullo contractu proprie nasci manifestum est: quippe ita nascuntur istæ actiones, si sine mandato quisque alienis negotiis gerendis se obtulerit: ex qua causa ii, quorum negotia gesta fuerint, etiam ignorantes obligantur. Idque utilitatis causa receptum est, ne absentium, qui subita festinatione coacti, nulli demandata negotiorum suorum administratione, peregre profecti essent, desererentur negotia: quæ sane nemo curaturus esset, si de eo, quod quis impendisset, nullam habiturus esset actionem. Sicut autem is, qui utiliter gesserit negotia, habet obligatum dominum negotiorum, ita et contra iste quoque tenetur, ut administrationis rationem reddat. Quo casu ad exactissimam quisque diligentiam compellitur reddere rationem: nec sufficit talem diligentiam adhibere, qualem suis rebus adhibere soleret, si modo alius diligentior commodius administraturus esset negotia.

1. Thus, if a person has managed the affairs of another in his absence, they have reciprocally actions negotiorum gestorum, the action belonging to the owner against him who has managed his affairs being an actio directa, and the action given to this person against the owner being an actio contraria. It is evident that these actions cannot properly be said to arise from a contract, for they arise only when one person has, without receiving a mandate, taken upon himself the management of the affairs of another, and consequently those whose affairs are thus managed are bound by an obligation, even without their knowing it. It is from motives of convenience that this has been admitted, to prevent the entire neglect of the affairs of absent persons, who may be forced to depart in haste, without having entrusted the management to any one; and certainly no one would pay any attention to their affairs, unless he could recover by action any expenses he might be put to. On the other hand, just as he who has advantageously managed the affairs of another makes this person liable to him by an obligation, so he himself is bound to render an account of his management. And the standard which he is bound to observe in rendering an account, is that of the most exact diligence, nor is it sufficient that he should use such diligence as he employs in the management of his own affairs, that is, if it is possible that a person of greater diligence would be likely to manage the affairs of the absent person better.

D. iii. 5. 2; D. xlv. 7. 5. pr.; C. ii. 18. 20.

Etiam ignorantes. If the owners had known of the part taken in the management of their affairs, there would have been a mandatum tacitum.

2. Tutores quoque, qui tutelæ judicio tenentur, non proprie ex contractu obligati intelliguntur (nullum enim negotium inter tutorem et pupillum contrahitur): sed quia sane non ex maleficio tenentur, quasi ex contractu teneri videntur. Et hoc autem casu mutuae sunt actiones: non tantum enim pupillus cum tutore habet tutelæ actionem, sed et ex contrario tutor cum pupillo habet contrariam tutelæ, si vel impenderit aliquid in rem pupilli vel pro eo fuerit obligatus aut rem suam credi-

2. Tutors, again, who are liable to the action tutelæ, are not, properly speaking, bound by a contract, for there is no contract made between the tutor and the pupil; but as they are certainly not bound by a delict, they seem to be bound quasi ex contractu. In this case, too, there are reciprocal actions, for not only has the pupil an action tutelæ against the tutor, but, in his turn, the tutor has an actio contraria tutelæ against the pupil, if he has incurred any expenses in managing the pupil's property, or has entered into an obligation for him, or given his own property as security to the pupil's creditors.

tori ejus obligaverit.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 1.

We should add here the corresponding case of the curator. His negotiorum gestio did not give rise to a special action, but to the actio negotiorum gestorum contraria, of which he could avail himself to reimburse himself for all reasonable expenses. (D. iii. 5. 3. 5; D. xxvii. 3. 4. 3.)

Quasi ex contractu teneri videntur. The exact translation would be 'seem to be bound by a tie analogous to that by which persons are bound under contracts;' but as this is too long a phrase to repeat every time the words quasi ex contractu occur, the Latin has been retained in the translation.

3. Item si inter aliquos communis sit res sine societate, veluti quod pariter eis legata donatave esset, et alter eorum alteri ideo teneatur communi dividundo iudicio, quod solus fructus ex ea re perceperit, aut quod socius ejus in eam rem necessarias impensas fecerit: non intellegitur proprie ex contractu obligatus esse, quippe nihil inter se contraxerunt: sed quia non ex maleficio tenetur, quasi ex contractu teneri videtur.

3. So, again, if a thing is common to two or more persons, without there being any partnership between them, as, for instance, if they have received a joint legacy or gift, and one of them is liable to the other by an action communis dividundo, because he alone has enjoyed the fruits of the thing, or because the other party has incurred expenses necessary for the thing, he cannot be properly said to be bound by a contract, for no contract has been made; but as he is not bound by a delict, he is said to be bound quasi ex contractu.

D. xvii. 2. 31, 34.

Necessarias impensas. Useful expenses, and not merely necessary ones, could be recovered. (D. x. 3. 11.)

4. Idem juris est de eo, qui coheredi suo familie ereiscundae iudicio ex his causis obligatus est.

4. It is the same with regard to a person who is bound to his co-heir under similar circumstances by an action familiae ereiscundae.

D. xvii. 2. 34.

The actio familie ereiscundae was that by which any one heres applied to the judge to make a fair division of the inheritance. (See Intro. sec. 103.)

5. Heres quoque legatorum nomine non proprie ex contractu obligatus intellegitur; neque enim cum herede neque cum defuncto ullum negotium legatarius gessisse proprie dici potest: sed quia ex maleficio non est obligatus heres, quasi ex contractu debere intellegitur.

5. The heir, too, is not, properly speaking, bound in regard to legacies by a contract, for the legatee cannot be properly said to have made a contract with the heir or with the deceased; but, as the heir is not bound by a delict, he is considered to be bound quasi ex contractu.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 2.

The circumstance of accepting the inheritance imposed on the tori ejus obligaverit.

into an obligation for him, or given his own property as security to the pupil's creditors.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 1.

We should add here the corresponding case of the curator. His negotiorum gestio did not give rise to a special action, but to the actio negotiorum gestorum contraria, of which he could avail himself to reimburse himself for all reasonable expenses. (D. iii. 5. 3. 5; D. xxvii. 3. 4. 3.)

Quasi ex contractu teneri videntur. The exact translation would be 'seem to be bound by a tie analogous to that by which persons are bound under contracts;' but as this is too long a phrase to repeat every time the words quasi ex contractu occur, the Latin has been retained in the translation.

3. Item si inter aliquos communis sit res sine societate, veluti quod pariter eis legata donatave esset, et alter eorum alteri ideo teneatur communi dividundo iudicio, quod solus fructus ex ea re perceperit, aut quod socius ejus in eam rem necessarias impensas fecerit: non intellegitur proprie ex contractu obligatus esse, quippe nihil inter se contraxerunt: sed quia non ex maleficio tenetur, quasi ex contractu teneri videtur.

3. So, again, if a thing is common to two or more persons, without there being any partnership between them, as, for instance, if they have received a joint legacy or gift, and one of them is liable to the other by an action communi dividundo, because he alone has enjoyed the fruits of the thing, or because the other party has incurred expenses necessary for the thing, he cannot be properly said to be bound by a contract, for no contract has been made; but as he is not bound by a delict, he is said to be bound quasi ex contractu.

D. xvii. 2. 31, 34.

Necessarias impensas. Useful expenses, and not merely necessary ones, could be recovered. (D. x. 3. 11.)

4. Idem juris est de eo, qui coheredi suo familie ereiscundae iudicio ex his causis obligatus est.

4. It is the same with regard to a person who is bound to his co-heir under similar circumstances by an action familie ereiscundae.

D. xvii. 2. 34.

The actio familie ereiscundae was that by which any one heres applied to the judge to make a fair division of the inheritance. (See Intro. sec. 103.)

5. Heres quoque legatorum nomine non proprie ex contractu obligatus intellegitur; neque enim cum herede neque cum defuncto ullum negotium legatarius gessisse proprie dici potest: sed quia ex maleficio non est obligatus heres, quasi ex contractu debere intellegitur.

5. The heir, too, is not, properly speaking, bound in regard to legacies by a contract, for the legatee cannot be properly said to have made a contract with the heir or with the deceased; but, as the heir is not bound by a delict, he is considered to be bound quasi ex contractu.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 2.

The circumstance of accepting the inheritance imposed on the heir the obligation of carrying out the testator's wishes, and this he was compelled to do by the actio ex testamento. If a particular thing was given as a legacy, so that the legatee could bring a vindicatio, he might exercise his choice between the personal and the real action.

6. Item is, cui quis per errorem non debitum solvit, quasi ex contractu debere videtur. Adeo enim non intellegitur proprie ex contractu obligatus, ut, si certiore rationem sequamur, magis, ut supra diximus, ex distractu quam ex contractu possit dici obligatus esse: nam qui solvendi animo pecuniam dat, in hoc dare videtur, ut distrahat potius negotium quam contrahat. Sed tamen proinde is, qui accepit, obligatur, ac si mutuum illi daretur, et ideo condictione tenetur.

6. A person to whom money not due has been paid by mistake, is bound quasi ex contractu. For so far is he from being bound by a contract, that, to reason strictly, we may say, as we have said before, that he is bound rather by the dissolution than by the formation of a contract; for a payment is generally made to dissolve, not to form, a contract; and yet he who receives it in the case we have mentioned is bound exactly as if it had been given him as a mutuum, and is therefore liable to a condictio.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 3.

If a person knowingly made a payment not due, he could not recover what he paid, as the payment was treated as a gift (D. l. 17. 53); nor could he, if he paid what was due by a natural, though not by a legal, obligation, or if he paid sooner than he need have done what he must pay at a certain date; but he could recover if he paid, under a conditional undertaking, before the event had happened. (D. xii. 6. 64.) Whether the error which would permit him to recover might be one arising from ignorance not only of fact but of law, is uncertain. We find on the one hand such statements as Juris ignorantia suum petentibus non nocet (D. xxii. 6. 7), and on the other such as Regula est juris quidem ignorantiam cuique nocere (D. xxii. 6. 9; C. i. 18).

The word 'pay,' 'solvere,' must be taken in a much more extended sense than the payment of money. It must be considered as including anything given to or done for another.

It is here said that the person who receives what is not due is bound not merely quasi ex contractu, but as if he had been bound by a particular contract, viz. mutuum. So the persons interfering in the affairs of another, the tutor and the curator, are bound as if by a mandate, and the persons mentioned in paragr. 3 and 4 as if they were bound by the particular contract of societas.

The remedy of the person who had paid by mistake was termed condictio indebiti, and if the thing paid or given over was money, or anything of which an equal quantity could be given in return, the action was precisely like the condictio certi protecting a mutuum. (See Tit. 13. 2. note 7.) But if it was not of this nature, if, for example, a freedman, bound to render some services to his patron, had by mistake rendered other services, he could recover the value of the services rendered, and this was an uncertain amount. This does not resemble the position of a person recover-heir the obligation of carrying out the testator's wishes, and this he was compelled to do by the actio ex testamento. If a particular thing was given as a legacy, so that the legatee could bring a vindicatio, he might exercise his choice between the personal and the real action.

6. Item is, cui quis per errorem non debitum solvit, quasi ex contractu debere videtur. Adeo enim non intellegitur proprie ex contractu obligatus, ut, si certiore rationem sequamur, magis, ut supra diximus, ex distractu quam ex contractu possit dici obligatus esse: nam qui solvendi animo pecuniam dat, in hoc dare videtur, ut distrahat potius negotium quam contrahat. Sed tamen proinde is, qui accepit, obligatur, ac si mutuum illi daretur, et ideo conditione tenetur.

6. A person to whom money not due has been paid by mistake, is bound quasi ex contractu. For so far is he from being bound by a contract, that, to reason strictly, we may say, as we have said before, that he is bound rather by the dissolution than by the formation of a contract; for a payment is generally made to dissolve, not to form, a contract; and yet he who receives it in the case we have mentioned is bound exactly as if it had been given him as a mutuum, and is therefore liable to a condictio.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 3.

If a person knowingly made a payment not due, he could not recover what he paid, as the payment was treated as a gift (D. l. 17. 53); nor could he, if he paid what was due by a natural, though not by a legal, obligation, or if he paid sooner than he need have done what he must pay at a certain date; but he could recover if he paid, under a conditional undertaking, before the event had happened. (D. xii. 6. 64.) Whether the error which would permit him to recover might be one arising from ignorance not only of fact but of law, is uncertain. We find on the one hand such statements as Juris ignorantia suum petentibus non nocet (D. xxii. 6. 7), and on the other such as Regula est juris quidem ignorantiam cuique nocere (D. xxii. 6. 9; C. i. 18).

The word 'pay,' solvere, must be taken in a much more extended sense than the payment of money. It must be considered as including anything given to or done for another.

It is here said that the person who receives what is not due is bound not merely quasi ex contractu, but as if he had been bound by a particular contract, viz. mutuum. So the persons interfering in the affairs of another, the tutor and the curator, are bound as if by a mandate, and the persons mentioned in paragr. 3 and 4 as if they were bound by the particular contract of societas.

The remedy of the person who had paid by mistake was termed condictio indebiti, and if the thing paid or given over was money, or anything of which an equal quantity could be given in return, the action was precisely like the condictio certi protecting a mutuum. (See Tit. 13. 2. note 7.) But if it was not of this nature, if, for example, a freedman, bound to render some services to his patron, had by mistake rendered other services, he could recover the value of the services rendered, and this was an uncertain amount. This does not resemble the position of a person recovering a mutuum. (D. xii. 6. 26. 12.) The non-liability of a pupil to repay what he had received without being due to him has been noticed in Tit. 14. 1.

7. Ex quibusdam tamen causis repeti non potest, quod per errorem non debitum solutum sit. Namque definiverunt veteres, ex quibus causis infitiando lis crescit, ex his causis non debitum solutum repeti non posse, veluti ex lege Aquilia, item ex legato. Quod veteres quidem in his legatis locum habere voluerunt, quæ certa constituta per damnationem cuicumque fuerunt legata: nostra autem constitutio cum unam naturam omnibus legatis et fideicommissis indulsit, hujusmodi augmentum in omnibus legatis et fideicommissis extendi voluit: sed non omnibus legatariis præbuit, sed tantummodo in his legatis et fideicommissis, quæ sacrosanctis ecclesiis ceterisque venerabilibus locis, quæ religionis vel pietatis intuitu honorificantur, derelicta sunt, quæ si indebita solvantur, non repetuntur.

7. In some cases, however, money paid by mistake cannot be recovered. The ancients have decided that this is so in cases in which the amount recovered is increased if the liability is denied; as, for instance, in actions brought under the lex Aquilia, or with respect to a legacy. The rule was only applied by the ancients, in the case of legacies where specific things were given per damnationem. But our constitution, which has placed all legacies and fideicommissa on the same footing, has decided that this increase should be extended to all legacies and fideicommissa. It has not, however, given it in behalf of all legatees, but only in the case of legacies and fideicommissa left to holy churches and other venerable places held in honour from feelings of religion or piety; such legacies, although paid when not due, cannot be recovered.

GA. ii. 288, and iv. 9, 171; C. iv. 5. 4; C. i. 2. 23.

This penalty, first exacted from those who denied that a judgment pronounced against them had been pronounced, was extended to cases of refusing to pay legacies given per damnationem, to cases under the lex Aquilia (Bk. iv. Tit. 3), and to many other cases. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 19, 23.)

In all cases where by denying his liability the person liable might have an increased amount ultimately recovered against him, it was considered that paying the thing for which he was, or for which he thought himself, liable, was but a mode of escaping from paying a penalty, and that it was paid in order to attain security. If, therefore, it was discovered that the thing need not have been paid, yet, as the person who paid it had paid it to purchase security, he could not recover it back.

Nostra constitutio. This constitution is not to be found in the Code, but we have provisions in the Code bearing on the subject. (See C. vi. 43. 2. 1-3.)

Ceteris venerabilibus locis. Such, for instance, as monasteries, asylums for strangers, orphans, the aged, &c. (C. i. 2. 23.)

ing a mutuum. (D. xii. 6. 26. 12.) The non-liability of a pupil to repay what he had received without being due to him has been noticed in Tit. 14. 1.

7. Ex quibusdam tamen causis repeti non potest, quod per errorem non debitum solutum sit. Namque definiverunt veteres, ex quibus causis infitendo lis crescit, ex his causis non debitum solutum repeti non posse, veluti ex lege Aquilia, item ex legato. Quod veteres quidem in his legatis locum habere voluerunt, quæ certa constituta per damnationem cuicumque fuerunt legata: nostra autem constitutio cum unam naturam omnibus legatis et fideicommissis indulsit, hujusmodi augmentum in omnibus legatis et fideicommissis extendi voluit: sed non omnibus legatariis præbuit, sed tantummodo in his legatis et fideicommissis, quæ sacrosanctis ecclesiis ceterisque venerabilibus locis, quæ religionis vel pietatis intuitu honorificantur, derelicta sunt, quæ si indebita solvantur, non repetuntur.

7. In some cases, however, money paid by mistake cannot be recovered. The ancients have decided that this is so in cases in which the amount recovered is increased if the liability is denied; as, for instance, in actions brought under the lex Aquilia, or with respect to a legacy. The rule was only applied by the ancients, in the case of legacies where specific things were given per damnationem. But our constitution, which has placed all legacies and fideicommissa on the same footing, has decided that this increase should be extended to all legacies and fideicommissa. It has not, however, given it in behalf of all legatees, but only in the case of legacies and fideicommissa left to holy churches and other venerable places held in honour from feelings of religion or piety; such legacies, although paid when not due, cannot be recovered.

Gai. ii. 283, and iv. 9, 171; C. iv. 5. 4; C. i. 2. 23.

This penalty, first exacted from those who denied that a judgment pronounced against them had been pronounced, was extended to cases of refusing to pay legacies given per damnationem, to cases under the lex Aquilia (Bk. iv. Tit. 3), and to many other cases. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 19, 23.)

In all cases where by denying his liability the person liable might have an increased amount ultimately recovered against him, it was considered that paying the thing for which he was, or for which he thought himself, liable, was but a mode of escaping from paying a penalty, and that it was paid in order to attain security. If, therefore, it was discovered that the thing need not have been paid, yet, as the person who paid it had paid it to purchase security, he could not recover it back.

Nostra constitutio. This constitution is not to be found in the Code, but we have provisions in the Code bearing on the subject. (See C. vi. 43. 2. 1-3.)

Ceteris venerabilibus locis. Such, for instance, as monasteries, asylums for strangers, orphans, the aged, &c. (C. i. 2. 23.)

TIT. XXVIII. PER QUAS PERSONAS NOBIS OBLIGATIO ADQUIRITUR.

Expositis generibus obligationum, quæ ex contractu vel quasi ex contractu nascuntur, admonendi sumus, adquiri vobis non solum per vosmet ipsos, sed etiam per eas quoque personas, quæ in vestra potestate sunt, veluti per servos vestros et filios: ut tamen, quod per servos quidem vobis adquiritur, totum vestrum fiat, quod autem per liberos, quos in potestate habetis, ex obligatione fuerit adquisitum, hoc dividatur secundum imaginem rerum proprietatis et usufructus, quam nostra discrevit constitutio: ut, quod ab actione commodum perveniat, hujus usumfructum quidem habeat pater, proprietatem autem filio servetur, scilicet patre actionem movente secundum novellæ nostræ constitutionis divisionem.

After having gone through the different kinds of obligations which arise from a contract, or arise quasi ex contractu, we may observe that you may acquire an obligation, not only by yourselves, but also by those who are in your power, as your slaves or children. But there is this distinction in acquiring by slaves or by children, that what is acquired for you by your slaves is entirely yours, while that which has been acquired by an obligation through children in your power is divided as to the ownership and usufruct according to the scheme as to the ownership and usufruct of things laid down in our constitution. Thus, of all that is gained by an action, the father will have the usufruct, and the ownership will be reserved for the son, that is to say, when the action is brought by the father in conformity with what is laid down by our new constitution.

GAI. iii. 163; C. vi. 61. 8. 3.

By acquiring an obligation is meant that we become creditors, and have a right to the action necessary to enforce the obligation.

As to the division of the usufruct and ownership, see Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 1. It is the object of the obligation, it may be observed, not the obligation itself, that is thus divided between the father and the son. Only the father could bring the action to enforce the obligation (patre actionem movente). (C. vi. 61. 8. 3.)

1. Item per liberos homines et alienos servos, quos bona fide possidetis, adquiritur vobis, sed tantum ex duabus causis, id est si quid ex operis suis vel ex re vestra adquirant.

1. Again, acquisition is made for you by freemen, and by slaves belonging to others, whom you possess bona fide, but only in two cases, namely, when it arises from their labours, or from something belonging to you.

GAI. iii. 164.

See Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 4.

Per liberos homines, i.e. by persons really free, but whom we bona fide believe to be slaves.

2. Per eum quoque servum in quo usumfructum vel usum habetis, similiter ex duabus istis causis vobis adquiritur.

2. Acquisition is equally made for you in the same two cases by a slave of whom you have the usufruct or use.

GAI. iii. 165; D. vii. 8. 14. pr.

TIT. XXVIII. PER QUAS PERSONAS NOBIS OBLIGATIO ADQUIRITUR.

Expositis generibus obligationum, quæ ex contractu vel quasi ex contractu nascuntur, admonendi sumus, adquiri vobis non solum per vosmet ipsos, sed etiam per eas quoque personas, quæ in vestra potestate sunt, veluti per servos vestros et filios: ut tamen, quod per servos quidem vobis adquiritur, totum vestrum fiat, quod autem per liberos, quos in potestate habetis, ex obligatione fuerit acquisitum, hoc dividatur secundum imaginem rerum proprietatis et ususfructus, quam nostra discrevit constitutio: ut, quod ab actione commodum perveniat, hujus ususfructum quidem habeat pater, proprietatem autem filio servetur, scilicet patre actionem movente secundum novellæ nostræ constitutionis divisionem.

After having gone through the different kinds of obligations which arise from a contract, or arise quasi ex contractu, we may observe that you may acquire an obligation, not only by yourselves, but also by those who are in your power, as your slaves or children. But there is this distinction in acquiring by slaves or by children, that what is acquired for you by your slaves is entirely yours, while that which has been acquired by an obligation through children in your power is divided as to the ownership and usufruct according to the scheme as to the ownership and usufruct of things laid down in our constitution. Thus, of all that is gained by an action, the father will have the usufruct, and the ownership will be reserved for the son, that is to say, when the action is brought by the father in conformity with what is laid down by our new constitution.

GAI. iii. 163; C. vi. 61. 8. 3.

By acquiring an obligation is meant that we become creditors, and have a right to the action necessary to enforce the obligation.

As to the division of the usufruct and ownership, see Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 1. It is the object of the obligation, it may be observed, not the obligation itself, that is thus divided between the father and the son. Only the father could bring the action to enforce the obligation (patre actionem movente). (C. vi. 61. 8. 3.)

1. Item per liberos homines et alienos servos, quos bona fide possidetis, adquiritur vobis, sed tantum ex duabus causis, id est si quid ex operis suis vel ex re vestra adquirent.

1. Again, acquisition is made for you by freemen, and by slaves belonging to others, whom you possess bona fide, but only in two cases, namely, when it arises from their labours, or from something belonging to you.

GAI. iii. 164.

See Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 4.

Per liberos homines, i.e. by persons really free, but whom we bona fide believe to be slaves.

2. Per eum quoque servum in quo ususfructum vel usum habetis, similiter ex duabus istis causis vobis adquiritur.

2. Acquisition is equally made for you in the same two cases by a slave of whom you have the usufruct or use.

GAI. iii. 165; D. vii. 8. 14. pr.

See Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 4.

In the case of a slave of whom we have only the use, we can only acquire when the two cases unite, i.e. when his labour is expended on something that is our property, for we cannot derive any benefit from his labour expended elsewhere.

3. Communem servum pro dominica parte dominis acquirere certum est, excepto eo, quod uni nominatim stipulando aut per traditionem accipiendo illi soli acquirit, veluti cum ita stipuletur: 'Titio domino meo dare spondes?' sed si unius domini jussu servus fuerit stipulatus, licet antea dubitabatur, tamen post nostram decisionem res expedita est, ut illi tantum adquirat, qui hoc ei facere jussit, ut supra dictum est.

3. A slave held in common undoubtedly acquires for his different owners in proportion to their interests in him, excepting that, in stipulating or receiving by tradition for one only, whom he mentions by name, he acquires only for this one; for instance, if he stipulates thus, 'Do you engage to give to Titius my master?' But if the slave has stipulated by order of one master only, in spite of former doubts, there is no question since our constitution, but that he acquires, as we have already said, for him alone who has given him the order.

GAI. iii. 167; C. iv. 27. 2.

The text only notices the acquisition of obligations through others as recognised by the civil law, i.e. through slaves and sons in potestate, and does not notice the prætorian changes by which the principal acquired obligations through his agent. (See Tit. 26. pr.)

TIT. XXIX. QUIBUS MODIS OBLIGATIO TOLLITUR.

Tollitur autem omnis obligatio solutione ejus, quod debetur, vel si quis, consentiente creditore, aliud pro alio solverit. Nec tamen interest, quis solvat, utrum ipso, qui debet, an alius pro eo: liberatur enim et alio solvente, sive sciente debitore sive ignorante vel invito solutio fiat. Item si reus solverit, etiam ii, qui pro eo intervenerunt, liberantur. Idem ex contrario contingit, si fidejussor solverit: non enim solus ipse liberatur, sed etiam reus.

Every obligation is dissolved by the payment of the thing due, or of something else given in its place with the consent of the creditor. And it makes no difference whether it is the debtor himself who pays, or some one else for him; for the debtor is freed from the obligation, if payment is made by a third person, and that either with or without the knowledge of the debtor, or even against his will. If the debtor pays, all those who have become surety for him are thereby freed, just as, on the other hand, if a surety pays, not only he himself is freed, but the principal is freed also.

GAI. iii. 168; D. xlv. 3. 53, 38. 2, and 43; D. xlv. 1. 66.

We now pass to considering how an obligation once formed may be dissolved. Solvere, to unloose, dissolve the tie, is the appropriate term for the process, in whatever way it may be accomplished—Solutionis verbum pertinet ad omnem liberationem quoquo modo factam (D. xlv. 3. 54)—although most generally

See Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 4.

In the case of a slave of whom we have only the use, we can only acquire when the two cases unite, i.e. when his labour is expended on something that is our property, for we cannot derive any benefit from his labour expended elsewhere.

3. Communem servum pro dominica parte dominis acquirere certum est, excepto eo, quod uni nominatim stipulando aut per traditionem accipiendo illi soli acquirit, veluti cum ita stipuletur: 'Titio domino meo dare spondes?' sed si unus domini jussu servus fuerit stipulatus, licet antea dubitabatur, tamen post nostram decisionem res expedita est, ut illi tantum adquirat, qui hoc ei facere jussit, ut supra dictum est.

3. A slave held in common undoubtedly acquires for his different owners in proportion to their interests in him, excepting that, in stipulating or receiving by tradition for one only, whom he mentions by name, he acquires only for this one; for instance, if he stipulates thus, 'Do you engage to give to Titius my master?' But if the slave has stipulated by order of one master only, in spite of former doubts, there is no question since our constitution, but that he acquires, as we have already said, for him alone who has given him the order.

GAI. iii. 167; C. iv. 27. 2.

The text only notices the acquisition of obligations through others as recognised by the civil law, i.e. through slaves and sons in potestate, and does not notice the praetorian changes by which the principal acquired obligations through his agent. (See Tit. 26. pr.)

TIT. XXIX. QUIBUS MODIS OBLIGATIO TOLLITUR.

Tollitur autem omnis obligatio solutione ejus, quod debetur, vel si quis, consentiente creditore, aliud pro alio solverit. Nec tamen interest, quis solvat, utrum ipse, qui debet, an alius pro eo: liberatur enim et alio solvente, sive sciente debitore sive ignorante vel invito solutio fiat. Item si reus solverit, etiam ii, qui pro eo intervenerunt, liberantur. Idem ex contrario contingit, si fidejussor solverit: non enim solus ipse liberatur, sed etiam reus.

Every obligation is dissolved by the payment of the thing due, or of something else given in its place with the consent of the creditor. And it makes no difference whether it is the debtor himself who pays, or some one else for him; for the debtor is freed from the obligation, if payment is made by a third person, and that either with or without the knowledge of the debtor, or even against his will. If the debtor pays, all those who have become surety for him are thereby freed, just as, on the other hand, if a surety pays, not only he himself is freed, but the principal is freed also.

GAI. iii. 168; D. xlv. 3. 53, 38. 2, and 43; D. xlv. 1. 66.

We now pass to considering how an obligation once formed may be dissolved. Solvere, to loose, dissolve the tie, is the appropriate term for the process, in whatever way it may be accomplished—Solutionis verbum pertinet ad omnem liberationem quoquo modo factam (D. xlv. 3. 54)—although most generally

*obligatio
dissolvi
1. Pay
2. Solv
3. Solv
4. Solv
5. Solv
6. Solv*

applied to the payment of money, as the mode by which contracts are usually terminated. It is by a slight extension of the strict use of the word that a person was said not solvere obligationem, but solvere pecuniam.

The civil law, which imposed forms on the formation of a contract, imposed corresponding forms on its dissolution. And when these were fulfilled, the debtor was said to be freed from his obligation 'ipso jure.' In later times, in cases where these forms had not been gone through, but yet equity demanded that the debtor should be considered free, the praetor allowed him to repel, by an exception, the creditor who sued him; and it has thence been said, 'obligatio aut ipso jure aut per exceptionem tollitur.'

When it is said in the text that if the fidjussor pays the principal is freed, the case must be understood to be referred to of a fidjussor paying, without using his right of having the actions ceded to him. Payment might be made to the creditor or his authorised agent, to the tutor or curator, or to the pupil if authorised.

Of course, in every stage of the law, payment put an end to the contract. The claims of the contracting parties were satisfied, and nothing more remained to be done. But, supposing payment was not made, but one of the parties was willing to release the other, or one party could claim, for some reason, to be released, certain solemn forms had been entered into, which could not be made of no effect by the mere consent of the parties. Such forms were too solemn in the eyes of the law to lose their power unless other forms equally solemn were gone through. Accordingly, in such cases, where no real payment was made, there was what Gaius calls an imaginaria solutio (iii. 169), varying in the method in which it was made according to the forms, acum, verbis, or litteris, with which the contract had been formed.

If, for instance, the contract had been formed per aes et libram, not less than five witnesses and a libripens were called together. The debtor struck the scale with a piece of money and gave it to the creditor in the name of the whole sum owing. (Gai. iii. 174.) This form was also adopted in cases where payment of a legacy given per damnationem was remitted, probably because the testament was itself supposed to be made per aes et libram, and also in cases where payment of money due by a judicial sentence was remitted, probably because the most formal mode of imaginary payment was adopted when the debt had been contracted in a way which the law considered as specially solemn. (Gai. iii. 175.) This form of imaginary payment was also applicable wherever anything certain of those things which 'pondere, numero (and probably also mensura) constant' was due.

If the contract had been made 'verbis,' the debtor asked the creditor if he held what was due as received, 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' The creditor answered that he did, 'Habeo.' The creditor was said 'acceptum ferre,' and the process applied to the payment of money, as the mode by which contracts are usually terminated. It is by a slight extension of the strict use of the word that a person was said not solvere obligationem, but solvere pecuniam.

The civil law, which imposed forms on the formation of a contract, imposed corresponding forms on its dissolution. And when these were fulfilled, the debtor was said to be freed from his obligation 'ipso jure.' In later times, in cases where these forms had not been gone through, but yet equity demanded that the debtor should be considered free, the praetor allowed him to repel, by an exception, the creditor who sued him; and it has thence been said, 'obligatio aut ipso jure aut per exceptionem tollitur.'

When it is said in the text that if the fidejussor pays the principal is freed, the case must be understood to be referred to of a fidejussor paying, without using his right of having the actions ceded to him. Payment might be made to the creditor or his authorised agent, to the tutor or curator, or to the pupil if authorised.

Of course, in every stage of the law, payment put an end to the contract. The claims of the contracting parties were satisfied, and nothing more remained to be done. But, supposing payment was not made, but one of the parties was willing to release the other, or one party could claim, for some reason, to be released, certain solemn forms had been entered into, which could not be made of no effect by the mere consent of the parties. Such forms were too solemn in the eyes of the law to lose their power unless other forms equally solemn were gone through. Accordingly, in such cases, where no real payment was made, there was what Gaius calls an imaginiaria solutio (iii. 169), varying in the method in which it was made according to the forms, accusum, verbis, or litteris, with which the contract had been formed.

If, for instance, the contract had been formed per aes et libram, not less than five witnesses and a libripens were called together. The debtor struck the scale with a piece of money and gave it to the creditor in the name of the whole sum owing. (Gai. iii. 174.) This form was also adopted in cases where payment of a legacy given per damnationem was remitted, probably because the testament was itself supposed to be made per aes et libram, and also in cases where payment of money due by a judicial sentence was remitted, probably because the most formal mode of imaginary payment was adopted when the debt had been constructed in a way which the law considered as specially solemn. (Gai. iii. 175.) This form of imaginary payment was also applicable wherever anything certain of those things which 'pondere, numero (and probably also mensura) constant' was due.

If the contract had been made 'verbis,' the debtor asked the creditor if he held what was due as received, 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' The creditor answered that he did, 'Habeo.' The creditor was said 'acceptum ferre,' and the process was called 'acceptilatio.' (See next paragr. and GAI. iii. 169, 170.)

If the contract had been made 'litteris,' the debtor probably entered on his tabulae the expenditure (expensilatio) of the sum due, with the consent of the creditor, but we cannot learn anything from Gaius on the subject.

If the contract had been made 're,' the mere return of the thing was a sufficient sign that the contract was at an end. There was a visible act, and the whole object of the forms by which contracts were made and dissolved was to substitute visible acts for mere expressions of consent. Where the contract, as belonging to the jus gentium, could be made merely by consent, it could also be dissolved by consent. (See paragr. 4.)

1. Item per acceptilationem tollitur obligatio. Est autem acceptilatio imaginaria solutio. Quod enim ex verborum obligatione Titio debetur, id si velit Titius remittere, poterit sic fieri, ut patiatur hæc verba debitorum dicere: 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' et Titius respondeat 'Habeo;' sed et Græce potest acceptum fieri, dummodo sic fiat, ut Latinis verbis solet: ἔχεις λαβὼν δηνάρια τόσα; ἔχω λαβών. Quo genere, ut diximus, tantum eæ obligationes solvuntur, quæ ex verbis consistunt, non etiam ceteræ: consentaneum enim visum est, verbis factam obligationem posse aliis verbis dissolvi. Sed id, quod ex alia causa debetur, potest in stipulationem deduci et per acceptilationem dissolvi. Sicut autem quod debetur, pro parte recte solvitur, ita in partem debiti acceptilatio fieri potest.

1. An obligation is also put an end to by acceptance. This is an imaginary payment; for if Titius wished to remit payment of that which is due to him by a verbal contract, he can do so by permitting the debtor to put to him the following question, 'Do you acknowledge to have received that which I promised you?' Titius then answering, 'I do.' The acknowledgment may also be made in Greek, provided it is made as it would be in Latin, ἔχεις λαβὼν δηνάρια τόσα; ἔχω λαβών. In this way verbal contracts are dissolved, but not contracts made in other ways: it seemed natural that an obligation formed by words should be able to be dissolved by words; but anything due by any other kind of contract may be made the subject of a stipulation, and the debtor be freed by acceptance. And as part of a debt may be paid, so acceptance may be made of a part only.

GAI. iii. 169, 170, 172; D. xvi. 4. 8. 4; D. xvi. 4. 9.

Properly the acceptilatio only operated as a release when the contract had been made verbis, but it was held, in all cases, to contain by implication a pact or agreement not to sue, and therefore an exceptio could be grounded on it to repel the creditor who had entered into it. Si acceptilatio inutilis fuit, tacita pactione id actum videtur, ne peteretur (D. ii. 14. 27. 9). The jurists, however, found a means of making the acceptilatio extend to every kind of contract. It was looked on as a stipulation which operated as a novation of the old contract, that is, which did away with the former contract, and substituted a new one in its place.

2. Est prodita stipulatio, quæ vulgo Aquiliana appellatur, per quam stipulationem contingit, ut omnium rerum obligatio in stipula-

2. A stipulation has been invented, commonly called the Aquilian, by which every obligation, whatever may be the thing it concerns, is put into the

was called 'acceptilatio.' (See next paragr. and GAI. iii. 169, 170.)

If the contract had been made 'litteris,' the debtor probably entered on his tabulæ the expenditure (expensilatio) of the sum due, with the consent of the creditor, but we cannot learn anything from Gaius on the subject.

If the contract had been made 're,' the mere return of the thing was a sufficient sign that the contract was at an end. There was a visible act, and the whole object of the forms by which contracts were made and dissolved was to substitute visible acts for mere expressions of consent. Where the contract, as belonging to the jus gentium, could be made merely by consent, it could also be dissolved by consent. (See paragr. 4.)

1. Item per acceptilationem tollitur obligatio. Est autem acceptilatio imaginaria solutio. Quod enim ex verborum obligatione Titio debetur, id si velit Titius remittere, poterit sic fieri, ut patiatur hæc verba debitorum dicere: 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' et Titius respondeat 'Habeo;' sed et Græce potest acceptum fieri, dummodo sic fiat, ut Latinis verbis solet: ἔχεις λαβὼν δηνάρια τόσα; ἔχω λαβὼν. Quo genere, ut diximus, tantum eæ obligationes solvuntur, quæ ex verbis consistunt, non etiam ceteræ: consentaneum enim visum est, verbis factam obligationem posse aliis verbis dissolvi. Sed id, quod ex alia causa debetur, potest in stipulationem deduci et per acceptilationem dissolvi. Sicut autem quod debetur, pro parte recte solvitur, ita in partem debiti acceptilatio fieri potest.

1. An obligation is also put an end to by acceptance. This is an imaginary payment; for if Titius wished to remit payment of that which is due to him by a verbal contract, he can do so by permitting the debtor to put to him the following question, 'Do you acknowledge to have received that which I promised you?' Titius then answering, 'I do.' The acknowledgment may also be made in Greek, provided it is made as it would be in Latin, ἔχεις λαβὼν δηνάρια τόσα; ἔχω λαβὼν. In this way verbal contracts are dissolved, but not contracts made in other ways: it seemed natural that an obligation formed by words should be able to be dissolved by words; but anything due by any other kind of contract may be made the subject of a stipulation, and the debtor be freed by acceptance. And as part of a debt may be paid, so acceptance may be made of a part only.

GAI. iii. 169, 170, 172; D. xvi. 4. 8. 4; D. xvi. 4. 9.

Properly the acceptilatio only operated as a release when the contract had been made verbis, but it was held, in all cases, to contain by implication a pact or agreement not to sue, and therefore an exceptio could be grounded on it to repel the creditor who had entered into it. Si acceptilatio inutilis fuit, tacita pactione id actum videtur, ne peteretur (D. ii. 14. 27. 9). The jurists, however, found a means of making the acceptilatio extend to every kind of contract. It was looked on as a stipulation which operated as a novation of the old contract, that is, which did away with the former contract, and substituted a new one in its place.

2. Est prodita stipulatio, quæ vulgo Aquiliana appellatur, per quam stipulationem contingit, ut omnium rerum obligatio in stipula-

2. A stipulation has been invented, commonly called the Aquilian, by which every obligation, whatever may be the thing it concerns, is put into the applied to the payment of money, as the mode by which contracts are usually terminated. It is by a slight extension of the strict use of the word that a person was said not solvere obligationem, but solvere pecuniam.

The civil law, which imposed forms on the formation of a contract, imposed corresponding forms on its dissolution. And when these were fulfilled, the debtor was said to be freed from his obligation 'ipso jure.' In later times, in cases where these forms had not been gone through, but yet equity demanded that the debtor should be considered free, the prætor allowed him to repel, by an exception, the creditor who sued him; and it has thence been said, 'obligatio aut ipso jure aut per exceptionem tollitur.'

When it is said in the text that if the fidejussor pays the principal is freed, the case must be understood to be referred to of a fidejussor paying, without using his right of having the actions ceded to him. Payment might be made to the creditor or his authorised agent, to the tutor or curator, or to the pupil if authorised.

Of course, in every stage of the law, payment put an end to the contract. The claims of the contracting parties were satisfied, and nothing more remained to be done. But, supposing payment was not made, but one of the parties was willing to release the other, or one party could claim, for some reason, to be released, certain solemn forms had been entered into, which could not be made of no effect by the mere consent of the parties. Such forms were too solemn in the eyes of the law to lose their power unless other forms equally solemn were gone through. Accordingly, in such cases, where no real payment was made, there was what Gaius calls an imaginaria solutio (iii. 169), varying in the method in which it was made according to the forms, nummum, verbis, or litteris, with which the contract had been formed.

If, for instance, the contract had been formed per aes et libram, not less than five witnesses and a libripens were called together. The debtor struck the scale with a piece of money and gave it to the creditor in the name of the whole sum owing. (GAI. iii. 174.) This form was also adopted in cases where payment of a legacy given per damnationem was remitted, probably because the testament was itself supposed to be made per aes et libram, and also in cases where payment of money due by a judicial sentence was remitted, probably because the most formal mode of imaginary payment was adopted when the debt had been contracted in a way which the law considered as specially solemn. (GAI. iii. 175.) This form of imaginary payment was also applicable whenever anything certain of those things which 'pondere, numero (and probably also mensura) constant' was due.

If the contract had been made 'verbis,' the debtor asked the creditor if he held what was due as received, 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' The creditor answered that he did, 'Habeo.' The creditor was said 'acceptum ferre,' and the process applied to the payment of money, as the mode by which contracts are usually terminated. It is by a slight extension of the strict use of the word that a person was said not solvere obligationem, but solvere pecuniam.

The civil law, which imposed forms on the formation of a contract, imposed corresponding forms on its dissolution. And when these were fulfilled, the debtor was said to be freed from his obligation 'ipso jure.' In later times, in cases where these forms had not been gone through, but yet equity demanded that the debtor should be considered free, the prætor allowed him to repel, by an exception, the creditor who sued him; and it has thence been said, 'obligatio aut ipso jure aut per exceptionem tollitur.'

When it is said in the text that if the fidejussor pays the principal is freed, the case must be understood to be referred to of a fidejussor paying, without using his right of having the actions ceded to him. Payment might be made to the creditor or his authorised agent, to the tutor or curator, or to the pupil if authorised.

Of course, in every stage of the law, payment put an end to the contract. The claims of the contracting parties were satisfied, and nothing more remained to be done. But, supposing payment was not made, but one of the parties was willing to release the other, or one party could claim, for some reason, to be released, certain solemn forms had been entered into, which could not be made of no effect by the mere consent of the parties. Such forms were too solemn in the eyes of the law to lose their power unless other forms equally solemn were gone through. Accordingly, in such cases, where no real payment was made, there was what Gaius calls an imaginaria solutio (iii. 169), varying in the method in which it was made according to the forms, nummum, verbis, or litteris, with which the contract had been formed.

If, for instance, the contract had been formed per aes et libram, not less than five witnesses and a libripens were called together. The debtor struck the scale with a piece of money and gave it to the creditor in the name of the whole sum owing. (GAI. iii. 174.) This form was also adopted in cases where payment of a legacy given per damnationem was remitted, probably because the testament was itself supposed to be made per aes et libram, and also in cases where payment of money due by a judicial sentence was remitted, probably because the most formal mode of imaginary payment was adopted when the debt had been contracted in a way which the law considered as specially solemn. (GAI. iii. 175.) This form of imaginary payment was also applicable wherever anything certain of those things which 'pondere, numero (and probably also mensura) constant' was due.

If the contract had been made 'verbis,' the debtor asked the creditor if he held what was due as received, 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' The creditor answered that he did, 'Habeo.' The creditor was said 'acceptum ferre,' and the process was called 'acceptilatio.' (See next paragr., and GAL. iii. 169, 170.)

If the contract had been made 'litteris,' the debtor probably entered on his tabule the expenditure (expensilatio) of the sum due, with the consent of the creditor, but we cannot learn anything from Gaius on the subject.

If the contract had been made 're,' the mere return of the thing was a sufficient sign that the contract was at an end. There was a visible act, and the whole object of the forms by which contracts were made and dissolved was to substitute visible acts for mere expressions of consent. Where the contract, as belonging to the jus gentium, could be made merely by consent, it could also be dissolved by consent. (See paragr. 4.)

1. Item per acceptilationem tollitur obligatio. Est autem acceptilatio imaginaria solutio. Quod enim ex verborum obligatione Titio debetur, id si velit Titius remittere, poterit sic fieri, ut patiatnr hae verba debitorum dicere: 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' et Titius respondeat 'Habeo;' sed et Graece potest acceptum fieri, dummodo sic fiat, ut Latinis verbis solet: ἔχει λαβὼν δηνάρια τόσα; ἔχω λαβὼν. Quo genere, ut diximus, tantum earum obligationes solvuntur, quae ex verbis consistunt, non etiam ceterae: consentaneum enim visum est, verbis factam obligationem posse aliis verbis dissolvi. Sed id, quod ex alia causa debetur, potest in stipulationem deduci et per acceptilationem dissolvi. Sicut autem quod debetur, pro parte recte solvitur, ita in partem debiti acceptilatio fieri potest.

1. An obligation is also put an end to by acceptance. This is an imaginary payment; for if Titius wishes to remit payment of that which is due to him by a verbal contract, he can do so by permitting the debtor to put to him the following question, 'Do you acknowledge to have received that which I promised you?' Titius then answering, 'I do.' The acknowledgment may also be made in Greek, provided it is made as it would be in Latin, ἔχει λαβὼν δηνάρια τόσα; ἔχω λαβὼν. In this way verbal contracts are dissolved, but not contracts made in other ways: it seemed natural that an obligation formed by words should be able to be dissolved by words; but anything due by any other kind of contract may be made the subject of a stipulation, and the debtor be freed by acceptance. And as part of a debt may be paid, so acceptance may be made of a part only.

GAL. iii. 169, 170, 172; D. xlvii. 4. 8. 4; D. xlvii. 4. 9.

Properly the acceptilatio only operated as a release when the contract had been made verbis, but it was held, in all cases, to contain by implication a pact or agreement not to sue, and therefore an exceptio could be grounded on it to repel the creditor who had entered into it. Si acceptilatio inutilis fuit, tacita pactione id actum videtur, ne peteretur (D. ii. 14. 27. 9). The jurists, however, found a means of making the acceptilatio extend to every kind of contract. It was looked on as a stipulation which operated as a novation of the old contract, that is, which did away with the former contract, and substituted a new one in its place.

2. Est prodita stipulatio, quae vulgo Aquiliana appellatur, per quam stipulationem contingit, ut omnium rerum obligatio in stipula-

2. A stipulation has been invented, commonly called the Aquilian, by which every obligation, whatever may be the thing it concerns, is put into the

was called 'acceptilatio.' (See next paragr., and GAI. iii. 169, 170.)

If the contract had been made 'litteris,' the debtor probably entered on his tabule the expenditure (expensilatio) of the sum due, with the consent of the creditor, but we cannot learn anything from Gaius on the subject.

If the contract had been made 're,' the mere return of the thing was a sufficient sign that the contract was at an end. There was a visible act, and the whole object of the forms by which contracts were made and dissolved was to substitute visible acts for mere expressions of consent. Where the contract, as belonging to the jus gentium, could be made merely by consent, it could also be dissolved by consent. (See paragr. 4.)

1. Item per acceptilationem tollitur obligatio. Est autem acceptilatio imaginaria solutio. Quod enim ex verborum obligatione Titio debetur, id si velit Titius remittere, poterit sic fieri, ut patiatur hæc verba debitorem dicere: 'Quod ego tibi promisi, habesne acceptum?' et Titius respondeat 'Habeo;' sed et Græce potest acceptum fieri, dummodo sic fiat, ut Latinis verbis solet: ἔχεις λαβὼν δηρία τόσα; ἔχω λαβὼν. Quo genere, ut diximus, tantum earum obligationes solvuntur, quæ ex verbis consistunt, non etiam ceteræ: consentaneum enim visum est, verbis factam obligationem posse aliis verbis dissolvi. Sed id, quod ex alia causa debetur, potest in stipulationem deduci et per acceptilationem dissolvi. Sicut autem quod debetur, pro parte recte solvitur, ita in partem debiti acceptilatio fieri potest.

1. An obligation is also put an end to by acceptance. This is an imaginary payment; for if Titius wishes to remit payment of that which is due to him by a verbal contract, he can do so by permitting the debtor to put to him the following question, 'Do you acknowledge to have received that which I promised you?' Titius then answering, 'I do.' The acknowledgment may also be made in Greek, provided it is made as it would be in Latin, ἔχεις λαβὼν δηρία τόσα; ἔχω λαβὼν. In this way verbal contracts are dissolved, but not contracts made in other ways: it seemed natural that an obligation formed by words should be able to be dissolved by words; but anything due by any other kind of contract may be made the subject of a stipulation, and the debtor be freed by acceptance. And as part of a debt may be paid, so acceptance may be made of a part only.

GAI. iii. 169, 170, 172; D. xlv. 4. 8. 4; D. xlv. 4. 9.

Properly the acceptilatio only operated as a release when the contract had been made verbis, but it was held, in all cases, to contain by implication a pact or agreement not to sue, and therefore an exceptio could be grounded on it to repel the creditor who had entered into it. Si acceptilatio inutilis fuit, tacita pactione id actum videtur, ne peteretur (D. ii. 14. 27. 9). The jurists, however, found a means of making the acceptilatio extend to every kind of contract. It was looked on as a stipulation which operated as a novation of the old contract, that is, which did away with the former contract, and substituted a new one in its place.

2. Est prodita stipulatio, quæ vulgo Aquiliana appellatur, per quam stipulationem contingit, ut omnium rerum obligatio in stipula-

2. A stipulation has been invented, commonly called the Aquilian, by which every obligation, whatever may be the thing it concerns, is put into the

tionem deducatur et ea per acceptilationem tollatur. Stipulatio enim Aquiliana novat omnes obligationes et a Gallo Aquilio ita composita est: 'Quidquid te mihi ex quacumque causa dare facere oportet, oportebit oportere te, præsens in diemve, quarumque rerum mihi tecum actio, quæque abs te petitio vel adversus te persecutio est, erit, quodque tu meum habes, tenes, possides, possideresve dolove malo fecisti, quominus possideres, quanti quæque earum rerum res erit, tantam pecuniam dari stipulatus est Aulus Agerius, spondit Numerius Negidius.' Item e diverso Numerius Negidius interrogavit Aulum Agerium: 'Quidquid tibi hodierno die per Aquilianam stipulationem spondi, id omne habesne acceptum?' Respondit Aulus Agerius: 'Habeo acceptum' vel et 'acceptum tuli.'

form of a stipulation, and afterwards dissolved by acceptilation. This Aquilian stipulation effects a novation of all obligations, and was framed in the following terms by Gallus Aquilius:—'Whatever for any cause you are or shall be or might be bound to give or do for me, either now or at a future day; everything for which I have or shall have an actio with you, a petitio from you, or a persecutio against you; everything of mine which you have, hold, or possess, or might possess, or which you have made yourself not to possess through some wilful fault of your own, whatever shall be the value of each of these things, so much Aulus Agerius stipulated should be given him in money, and Numerius Negidius engaged to give it;' on the other hand, Numerius Negidius put to Aulus Agerius the question, 'All that I have promised you to-day by the Aquilian stipulation, do you acknowledge it as received?' and Aulus Agerius answered, 'I acknowledge it as received,' or 'I have entered it as received.'

D. ii. 15. 4; D. xlv. 4. 18. 1.

This Aquilius Gallus was the friend of Cicero, whose colleague he was in the prætorship (B.C. 65). He was the pupil of Mucius, and the teacher of Sulpicius, and is mentioned in the Digest (i. 2. 2. 42) as of great authority with the people. He is said to have devised a means by which postumi sui might be instituted (D. xxviii. 2. 29. pr.; see Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 1, note); and Cicero informs us that he was also the author of certain formulæ in the actions of theft (De Off. iii. 14.)

We may remark with what care and forethought Aquilius Gallus has made his formula applicable to all possible cases. 'Causa' is the generical expression. 'Oportet, oportebit oportere te' embrace the present, the future, and the conditional. 'Præsens in diemve' (some texts add 'aut sub conditione') refer to what are termed the 'modalities' to which contracts are liable. 'Actio' is the 'actio in personam'; 'petitio' is the 'actio in rem'; 'persecutio' is the extraordinary proceeding before a magistrate; 'habet' refers to 'dominium'; 'tenes' to physical detention; 'possides' to possession. The expression, 'dolove malo fecisti, quominus possideres,' was added to express the obligation which bound a person who had fraudulently destroyed a thing in his possession to prevent the owner reclaiming it. The stipulatio Aquiliana was equally applicable if the object was to effect a novation intended to operate as the foundation of a new contract to be really fulfilled by both the parties. (D. ii. 15. 2. and 9. 2.)

Stipulatus est, spondit; this is the language of the cautio, or written record of the stipulation and the acceptilatio.

tionem deducatur et ea per acceptilationem tollatur. Stipulatio enim Aquiliana novat omnes obligationes et a Gallo Aquilio ita composita est: 'Quidquid te mihi ex quacumque causa dare facere oportet, oportebit oportere te, præsens in diemve, quarumque rerum mihi tecum actio, quæque abs te petitio vel adversus te persecutio est, erit, quodque tu meum habes, tenes, possides, possideres dolove malo fecisti, quo minus possideres, quanti quæque earum rerum res erit, tantam pecuniam dari stipulatus est Aulus Agerius, sponpondit Numerius Negidius.' Item e diverso Numerius Negidius interrogavit Aulum Agerium: 'Quidquid tibi hodierno die per Aquilianam stipulationem sponpondi, id omne habesne acceptum?' Respondit Aulus Agerius: 'Habeo acceptum' vel et 'acceptum tuli.'

form of a stipulation, and afterwards dissolved by acceptilation. This Aquilian stipulation effects a novation of all obligations, and was framed in the following terms by Gallus Aquilius:— 'Whatever for any cause you are or shall be or might be bound to give or do for me, either now or at a future day; everything for which I have or shall have an actio with you, a petitio from you, or a persecutio against you; everything of mine which you have, hold, or possess, or might possess, or which you have made yourself not to possess through some wilful fault of your own, whatever shall be the value of each of these things, so much Aulus Agerius stipulated should be given him in money, and Numerius Negidius engaged to give it;' on the other hand, Numerius Negidius put to Aulus Agerius the question, 'All that I have promised you to-day by the Aquilian stipulation, do you acknowledge it as received?' and Aulus Agerius answered, 'I acknowledge it as received,' or 'I have entered it as received.'

D. ii. 15. 4; D. xlv. 4. 18. 1.

This Aquilius Gallus was the friend of Cicero, whose colleague he was in the prætorship (B.C. 65). He was the pupil of Mucius, and the teacher of Sulpicius, and is mentioned in the Digest (i. 2. 2. 42) as of great authority with the people. He is said to have devised a means by which postumi sui might be instituted (D. xxviii. 2. 29. pr.; see Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 1, note); and Cicero informs us that he was also the author of certain formulæ in the actions of theft (De Off. iii. 14.)

We may remark with what care and forethought Aquilius Gallus has made his formula applicable to all possible cases. 'Causa' is the generical expression. 'Oportet, oportebit oportere te' embrace the present, the future, and the conditional. 'Præsens in diemve' (some texts add 'aut sub conditione') refer to what are termed the 'modalities' to which contracts are liable. 'Actio' is the 'actio in personam'; 'petitio' is the 'actio in rem'; 'persecutio' is the extraordinary proceeding before a magistrate; 'habet' refers to 'dominium'; 'tenes' to physical detention; 'possides' to possession. The expression, 'dolove malo fecisti, quo minus possideres,' was added to express the obligation which bound a person who had fraudulently destroyed a thing in his possession to prevent the owner reclaiming it. The stipulatio Aquiliana was equally applicable if the object was to effect a novation intended to operate as the foundation of a new contract to be really fulfilled by both the parties. (D. ii. 15. 2. and 9. 2.)

Stipulatus est, sponpondit; this is the language of the cautio, or written record of the stipulation and the acceptilatio.

3. Præterea novatione tollitur obligatio. Veluti si id, quod tu Seio debeas, a Titio dari stipulatus sit. Nam interventu novæ personæ nova nascitur obligatio et prima tollitur translata in posteriorem, adeo ut interdum, licet posterior stipulatio inutilis sit, tamen prima novationis jure tollatur: veluti si id, quod Titio tu debebas, a pupillo sine tutoris auctoritate stipulatus fuerit, quo casu res amittitur: nam et prior debitor liberatur et posterior obligatio nulla est. Non idem juris est, si servo quis stipulatus fuerit: nam tunc prior proinde obligatus manet, ac si postea nullus stipulatus fuisset. Sed si eadem persona sit, a qua postea stipuleris, ita demum novatio fit, si quid in posteriore stipulatione novi sit, forte si condicio aut dies aut fidejussor adiciatur aut detrahatur. Quod autem diximus, si condicio adiciatur, novationem fieri, sic intellegi oportet, ut ita dicamus factam novationem, si condicio extiterit: alioquin si defecerit, durat prior obligatio. Sed cum hoc quidem inter veteres constabat, tunc fieri novationem, cum novandi animo in secundam obligationem itum fuerat: per hoc autem dubium erat, quando novandi animo videretur hoc fieri, et quasdam de hoc præsumptiones alii in aliis casibus introducebant: ideo nostra processit constitutio, quæ apertissime definivit, tunc solum fieri novationem, quotiens hoc ipsum inter contrahentes expressum fuerit, quod propter novationem prioris obligationis convenerunt; alioquin manere et pristinam obligationem et secundam ei accedere, ut maneat ex utraque causa obligatio secundum nostræ constitutionis definitiones, quas licet ex ipsius lectione apertius cognoscere.

3. An obligation is also dissolved by novation, as, for instance, if Seius stipulates with Titius for that which is due to Seius from you. For by the intervention of a new debtor a new obligation arises, and the former obligation is extinguished by being transferred into the latter; so much so, that it may happen, that although the latter stipulation is void, yet the former, by the effect of the novation, ceases to exist; as, for instance, if Titius stipulates with a pupil not authorised by his tutor for a debt due to Titius from you, in this case Titius loses his whole claim, for the first debtor is freed, and the second obligation is void. But the case is different if it is a slave with whom he stipulates, for then the original debtor remains bound as if no one had made a subsequent stipulation. But if it is the original debtor himself with whom you make the second stipulation, there will be no novation, unless the subsequent stipulation contains something new, as, for instance, the addition or suppression of a condition, a term, or a surety. In saying that if a condition is added there is a novation, we must be understood to mean that the novation will take place if the condition is accomplished, but that if it is not accomplished, the former obligation remains binding. The ancients were of opinion that the novation only took place when the second obligation was entered into for the purpose of making the novation, and doubts consequently arose as to when this intention was to be supposed to exist, and different presumptions were laid down by those who treated the subject according to the different cases they had to settle. In consequence, our constitution was published, in which it was clearly decided that novation shall only take place when the contracting parties have expressly declared that their object in making the new contract is to extinguish the old one: otherwise the former obligation will remain binding, while the second is added to it, so that each contract will give rise to an obligation still in force, according to the provisions of our constitution, which may be more fully learned by reading the constitution itself.

3. Præterea novatione tollitur obligatio. Veluti si id, quod tu Seio debeas, a Titio dari stipulatus sit. Nam interventu novæ personæ nova nascitur obligatio et prima tollitur translata in posteriorem, adeo ut interdum, licet posterior stipulatio inutilis sit, tamen prima novationis jure tollatur: veluti si id, quod Titio tu debebas, a pupillo sine tutoris auctoritate stipulatus fuerit, quo casu res amittitur: nam et prior debitor liberatur et posterior obligatio nulla est. Non idem juris est, si servo quis stipulatus fuerit: nam tunc prior proinde obligatus manet, ac si postea nullus stipulatus fuisset. Sed si eadem persona sit, a qua postea stipuleris, ita demum novatio fit, si quid in posteriore stipulatione novi sit, forte si condicio aut dies aut fidejussor adjiaciatur aut detrahatur. Quod autem diximus, si condicio adjiaciatur, novationem fieri, sic intellegi oportet, ut ita dicamus factam novationem, si condicio extiterit: alioquin si defecerit, durat prior obligatio. Sed cum hoc quidem inter veteres constabat, tunc fieri novationem, cum novandi animo in secundam obligationem itum fuerat: per hoc autem dubium erat, quando novandi animo videretur hoc fieri, et quasdam de hoc præsumptiones alii in aliis casibus introducebant: ideo nostra processit constitutio, quæ apertissime definivit, tunc solum fieri novationem, quotiens hoc ipsum inter contrahentes expressum fuerit, quod propter novationem prioris obligationis convenerunt; alioquin manere et pristinam obligationem et secundam ei accedere, ut maneat ex utraque causa obligatio secundum nostræ constitutionis definitiones, quas licet ex ipsius lectione apertius cognoscere.

3. An obligation is also dissolved by novation, as, for instance, if Seius stipulates with Titius for that which is due to Seius from you. For by the intervention of a new debtor a new obligation arises, and the former obligation is extinguished by being transferred into the latter; so much so, that it may happen, that although the latter stipulation is void, yet the former, by the effect of the novation, ceases to exist; as, for instance, if Titius stipulates with a pupil not authorised by his tutor for a debt due to Titius from you, in this case Titius loses his whole claim, for the first debtor is freed, and the second obligation is void. But the case is different if it is a slave with whom he stipulates, for then the original debtor remains bound as if no one had made a subsequent stipulation. But if it is the original debtor himself with whom you make the second stipulation, there will be no novation, unless the subsequent stipulation contains something new, as, for instance, the addition or suppression of a condition, a term, or a surety. In saying that if a condition is added there is a novation, we must be understood to mean that the novation will take place if the condition is accomplished, but that if it is not accomplished, the former obligation remains binding. The ancients were of opinion that the novation only took place when the second obligation was entered into for the purpose of making the novation, and doubts consequently arose as to when this intention was to be supposed to exist, and different presumptions were laid down by those who treated the subject according to the different cases they had to settle. In consequence, our constitution was published, in which it was clearly decided that novation shall only take place when the contracting parties have expressly declared that their object in making the new contract is to extinguish the old one: otherwise the former obligation will remain binding, while the second is added to it, so that each contract will give rise to an obligation still in force, according to the provisions of our constitution, which may be more fully learned by reading the constitution itself.

Novation is the dissolution of one obligation by the formation of another. Ulpian says: 'Novatio est prioris debiti in aliam obligationem vel civilem vel naturalem transfusio atque translatio hoc est, cum ex precedenti causa ita nova constituitur, ut prior perimatur. Novatio enim a novo nomen accepit, et a nova obligatione.' (D. xlv. 2. 1. pr.)

Every kind of contract could be superseded by novation, but the new contract must be either litteris (see Tit. 21) or by stipulation, and the predominance of the use of stipulations as the instruments of novation was so great that the jurists generally refer to it alone. Qualiscumque obligatio sit quae precessit, novari verbis potest (D. xlv. 2. 1. 1.)

It was necessary that the obligation superseded should be existing at the time; but whether it was civil, praetorian, or natural was immaterial. (D. xlv. 2. 1. 1.) And it was also necessary that the stipulation which superseded it should be binding, either civilly or naturally. In the text we have two instances of contracts which are not binding civilly, owing to the incapacity of the parties, one made with a pupil, and one with a slave, and a distinction is drawn between them. The stipulation made with the pupil is a stipulation, though only one binding naturally: the pupil is a Roman citizen, and can pronounce the word spondeo; but a stipulation made with a slave, except when the slave speaks merely as the mouthpiece of his master, is no stipulation at all. The slave cannot use the words of the formulary. There is no contract verbis to supersede the existing obligation.

By a novation (a new debtor might be substituted, even without the consent of the original debtor.) If it was done with the consent of the original debtor, the new debtor was termed delegatus, and the process delegatio. If it was done without his consent, the new debtor was termed the expromissor, and the process expromissio; but these terms, expromissor and expromissio, were also used in a wider sense, as implying the new debtor and the mode of contracting generally, without implying that the consent of the old debtor had not been given to the substitution. (D. xiii. 7. 10.)

Of course, if both parties to the original contract were willing, a new creditor could be substituted as well as a new debtor, by a novation; and if a new debtor was delegated who already owed a debt to the old debtor, there would necessarily be a change of creditor as well as debtor. A owes to B, and B to C an equal sum. If B tells A to pay C, C has a new debtor, and A a new creditor.

In the passage of Gaius (iii. 177) on which the text is based, it is said that if a sponsor was added, there was a new contract. Sponsores being obsolete, Justinian substitutes fidejussor; but although a contract might be extinguished by a surety being added, this would not be so if the parties did not mean it to have this effect.

If the original contract was made in any other way than by a stipulation, it could be superseded by a stipulation containing the

Novation is the dissolution of one obligation by the formation of another. Ulpian says: 'Novatio est prioris debiti in aliam obligationem vel civilem vel naturalem transfusio atque translatio hoc est, cum ex precedenti causa ita nova constituatur, ut prior perimatur. Novatio enim a novo nomen accepit, et a nova obligatione.' (D. xlv. 2. 1. pr.)

Every kind of contract could be superseded by novation, but the new contract must be either litteris (see Tit. 21) or by stipulation, and the predominance of the use of stipulations as the instruments of novation was so great that the jurists generally refer to it alone. Qualiscumque obligatio sit quæ præcessit, novari verbis potest (D. xlv. 2. 1. 1.)

It was necessary that the obligation superseded should be existing at the time; but whether it was civil, prætorian, or natural was immaterial. (D. xlv. 2. 1. 1.) And it was also necessary that the stipulation which superseded it should be binding, either civilly or naturally. In the text we have two instances of contracts which are not binding civilly, owing to the incapacity of the parties, one made with a pupil, and one with a slave, and a distinction is drawn between them. The stipulation made with the pupil is a stipulation, though only one binding naturally: the pupil is a Roman citizen, and can pronounce the word spondeo; but a stipulation made with a slave, except when the slave speaks merely as the mouthpiece of his master, is no stipulation at all. The slave cannot use the words of the formulary. There is no contract verbis to supersede the existing obligation.

By a novation (a new debtor might be substituted, even without the consent of the original debtor). If it was done with the consent of the original debtor, the new debtor was termed delegatus, and the process delegatio. If it was done without his consent, the new debtor was termed the expromissor, and the process expromissio; but these terms, expromissor and expromissio, were also used in a wider sense, as implying the new debtor and the mode of contracting generally, without implying that the consent of the old debtor had not been given to the substitution. (D. xiii. 7. 10.)

Of course, if both parties to the original contract were willing, a new creditor could be substituted as well as a new debtor, by a novation; and if a new debtor was delegated who already owed a debt to the old debtor, there would necessarily be a change of creditor as well as debtor. A owes to B, and B to C an equal sum. If B tells A to pay C, C has a new debtor, and A a new creditor.

In the passage of Gaius (iii. 177) on which the text is based, it is said that if a sponsor was added, there was a new contract. Sponsores being obsolete, Justinian substitutes fidejussor; but although a contract might be extinguished by a surety being added, this would not be so if the parties did not mean it to have this effect.

If the original contract was made in any other way than by a stipulation, it could be superseded by a stipulation containing the same terms. But if it was made by a stipulation, then, unless some alteration was made in it, the new stipulation would be, in fact, the old one, and there could be no novatio, unless some new term was added. But suppose a new stipulation was made with a condition introduced into it, was the old stipulation extinguished at once by novation? The text lays down the general principle that it was not extinguished, as it is said in the Digest (xlv. 2. 14) non statim fit novatio, sed tunc demum cum conditio extiterit; the old contract endured until the condition was accomplished, and if the condition failed the old contract remained binding. But some of the jurists said that to extinguish the first contract might be the intention of the parties in making the second contract, or it might not. The question of novation was therefore a question of the intention of the parties in each particular case. Justinian lays down in the text that, unless the parties expressly declare it to be their wish that the first contract shall be extinguished by the second, the first contract shall be considered as subsisting.

In personal actions something like novation took place at two points of the suit (GAI. iii. 180)—at the litis contestatio (see Introd. sec. 105), and when judgment had been given. After the litis contestatio, the plaintiff could sue in a fresh action on what was, at this period of the suit, ascertained to be his legal position, but not on the contract itself. After judgment was given, he could sue on the judgment. But in both cases all the beneficial accessories of the original contract were continued on to the new—such, for instance, as pledges given in security remained, and interest continued to run on, litis contestata usura currit (D. xxii. 1. 35), and so this juridical novation did not, like novation proper, quite supersede the original contract. (D. xlv. 2. 29.)

4. Hoc amplius eæ obligationes, quæ consensu contrahuntur, contraria voluntate dissolvuntur. Nam si Titius et Seius inter se consenserunt, ut fundum Tusculanum emptum Seius haberet centum aureorum, deinde re nondum secuta, id est neque pretio soluto neque fundo tradito, placuerit inter eos, ut discederetur ab emptione et venditione, invicem liberantur. Idem est et in conductione et locatione et omnibus contractibus, qui ex consensu descendunt, sicut jam dictum est.

4. Moreover, those obligations which are formed by consent alone, are dissolved by the expression of a contrary wish. If Titius and Seius have agreed that Seius shall purchase an estate at Tusculum for a hundred aurei, and then, before the contract has been executed, that is, before the price has been paid, or delivery made of the estate, they agree to abandon the agreement for the sale, they are mutually freed from their obligation. It is the same in the contract of letting on hire, and, as we have just said, in all other contracts formed by consent alone.

D. xlv. 3. 80; D. xviii. 5. 5. 1.

This paragraph must be understood with the limitation that the contract could only be rescinded integris omnibus, i.e. if each party could possibly be placed in the position he held before. The text rather loosely expresses this by 're nondum secuta.' If all things were not integra, but the parties agreed to make them so, this same terms. But if it was made by a stipulation, then, unless some alteration was made in it, the new stipulation would be, in fact, the old one, and there could be no novatio, unless some new term was added. But suppose a new stipulation was made with a condition introduced into it, was the old stipulation extinguished at once by novation? The text lays down the general principle that it was not extinguished, as it is said in the Digest (xlv. 2. 14) non statim fit novatio, sed tunc demum cum conditio extiterit; the old contract endured until the condition was accomplished, and if the condition failed the old contract remained binding. But some of the jurists said that to extinguish the first contract might be the intention of the parties in making the second contract, or it might not. The question of novation was therefore a question of the intention of the parties in each particular case. Justinian lays down in the text that, unless the parties expressly declare it to be their wish that the first contract shall be extinguished by the second, the first contract shall be considered as subsisting.

In personal actions something like novation took place at two points of the suit (GAI. iii. 180)—at the litis contestatio (see Intro. sec. 105), and when judgment had been given. After the litis contestatio, the plaintiff could sue in a fresh action on what was, at this period of the suit, ascertained to be his legal position, but not on the contract itself. After judgment was given, he could sue on the judgment. But in both cases all the beneficial accessories of the original contract were continued on to the new—such, for instance, as pledges given in security remained, and interest continued to run on, litis contestata usura currunt (D. xxii. 1. 35), and so this juridical novation did not, like novation proper, quite supersede the original contract. (D. xlv. 2. 29.)

4. Hoc amplius eae obligationes, quae consensu contrahuntur, contraria voluntate dissolvuntur. Nam si Titius et Seius inter se consenserunt, ut fundum Tusculanum emptum Seius haberet centum aureorum, deinde re nondum secuta, id est neque pretio soluto neque fundo tradito, placuerit inter eos, ut discederetur ab emptione et venditione, invicem liberantur. Idem est et in conductione et locatione et omnibus contractibus, qui ex consensu descendunt, sicut jam dictum est.

4. Moreover, those obligations which are formed by consent alone, are dissolved by the expression of a contrary wish. If Titius and Seius have agreed that Seius shall purchase an estate at Tusculum for a hundred aurei, and then, before the contract has been executed, that is, before the price has been paid, or delivery made of the estate, they agree to abandon the agreement for the sale, they are mutually freed from their obligation. It is the same in the contract of letting on hire, and, as we have just said, in all other contracts formed by consent alone.

D. xlv. 3. 80; D. xviii. 5. 1.

This paragraph must be understood with the limitation that the contract could only be rescinded integris omnibus, i.e. if each party could possibly be placed in the position he held before. The text rather loosely expresses this by 're nondum secuta.' If all things were not integra, but the parties agreed to make them so, this would be a new contract extinguishing the old contract by novation, not an extinction of the contract by mere consent.

There were other modes by which a contract was dissolved, as if the subject of the contract being a thing certain perished without the fault of any party; or if the qualities of debtor and creditor were united in the same person, as, for instance, if the debtor became heir of the creditor, which is termed confusio; or if one debt was set off against another (compensatio), which, however, if the actions proper to the contract were actions stricti juris, would only give rise to an exception, and not to an extinction of the contract: in actions bonæ fidei, where equitable grounds of defence need not be stated in the formula, the compensatio would be necessarily taken notice of, and in such cases the contract may be said to have been virtually (see Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 39) put an end to by the compensatio. There were also many other things which, although they left the contract still subsisting, prevented an action being brought on it. These will be treated of in the next book under the head of exceptions.

would be a new contract extinguishing the old contract by novation, not an extinction of the contract by mere consent.

There were other modes by which a contract was dissolved, as if the subject of the contract being a thing certain perished without the fault of any party ; or if the qualities of debtor and creditor were united in the same person, as, for instance, if the debtor became heir of the creditor, which is termed confusio ; or if one debt was set off against another (compensatio), which, however, if the actions proper to the contract were actions stricti juris, would only give rise to an exception, and not to an extinction of the contract : in actions bonæ fidei, where equitable grounds of defence need not be stated in the formula, the compensatio would be necessarily taken notice of, and in such cases the contract may be said to have been virtually (see Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 39) put an end to by the compensatio. There were also many other things which, although they left the contract still subsisting, prevented an action being brought on it. These will be treated of in the next book under the head of exceptions.

LIBER QUARTUS.

TIT. I. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS, QUÆ EX DELICTO NASCUNTUR.

Cum expositum sit superiore libro de obligationibus ex contractu et quasi ex contractu, sequitur, ut de obligationibus ex maleficio dispiciamus. Sed illæ quidem, ut suo loco tradidimus, in quattuor genera dividuntur: hæc vero unius generis sunt, nam omnes ex re nascuntur, id est ex ipso maleficio, veluti ex furto aut rapina aut damno aut injuria.

As we have treated in the preceding Book of obligations arising ex contractu and quasi ex contractu, we have now to treat of obligations arising ex maleficio. Of the obligations treated of in the last Book, there are, as we have said, four kinds; of those we are now to treat of, there is but one kind, for they all arise re, that is, from the actual wrongdoing, as, for example, from theft, from robbery, or damage, or injury.

GAL. iii. 182; D. xlv. 7. 4.

This part of the Institutes only treats of delicta, i.e. violations of the rights of property, of status, in short of any of the rights in rem, such as liberty, security, and reputation, so far as they produce obligations and are the grounds of private actions. It is not the evil intent which makes an act a delict. Many acts done with evil intent are excluded from delicts, many done without evil intent are included among them. Those acts only were delicts which had been characterised and provided against as such by the ancient civil legislation, and to which a particular action was attached. (See Introd. sec. 88.) In this and the three following Titles we have the four principal kinds of delicts treated of, viz. furtum, vi bona rapta, damni injuria, and injuria.

All the obligations attached to delicts are said in the text nasci ex re, i.e. from the evil act or thing done, ex ipso maleficio, to contrast them with the various modes in which obligations ex contractu are formed.

Ut de obligationibus ex maleficio dispiciamus. Many texts read, ut de obligationibus ex maleficio et quasi ex maleficio dispiciamus.

1. Furtum est contrectatio rei fraudulosa vel ipsius rei vel etiam

1. Theft is the fraudulent dealing with a thing itself, or with its use, or

LIBER QUARTUS.

TIT. I. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS, QUÆ EX DELICTO NASCUNTUR.

Cum expositum sit superiore libro de obligationibus ex contractu et quasi ex contractu, sequitur, ut de obligationibus ex maleficio dispiciamus. Sed illæ quidem, ut suo loco tradidimus, in quattuor genera dividuntur: hæc vero unius generis sunt, nam omnes ex re nascuntur, id est ex ipso maleficio, veluti ex furto aut rapina aut damno aut injuria.

As we have treated in the preceding Book of obligations arising ex contractu and quasi ex contractu, we have now to treat of obligations arising ex maleficio. Of the obligations treated of in the last Book, there are, as we have said, four kinds; of those we are now to treat of, there is but one kind, for they all arise re, that is, from the actual wrongdoing, as, for example, from theft, from robbery, or damage, or injury.

GAI. iii. 182; D. xlv. 7. 4.

This part of the Institutes only treats of delicta, i.e. violations of the rights of property, of status, in short of any of the rights in rem, such as liberty, security, and reputation, so far as they produce obligations and are the grounds of private actions. It is not the evil intent which makes an act a delict. Many acts done with evil intent are excluded from delicts, many done without evil intent are included among them. Those acts only were delicts which had been characterised and provided against as such by the ancient civil legislation, and to which a particular action was attached. (See Introd. sec. 88.) In this and the three following Titles we have the four principal kinds of delicts treated of, viz. furtum, vi bona repta, damni injuria, and injuria.

All the obligations attached to delicts are said in the text nasci ex re, i.e. from the evil act or thing done, ex ipso maleficio, to contrast them with the various modes in which obligations ex contractu are formed.

Ut de obligationibus ex maleficio dispiciamus. Many texts read, ut de obligationibus ex maleficio et quasi ex maleficio dispiciamus.

1. Furtum est contrectatio rei fraudulosa vel ipsius rei vel etiam with a thing itself, or with its use, or

1. Theft is the fraudulent dealing usus ejus possessionisve : quod lege naturali prohibitum est admittere. its possession; an act which is prohibited by natural law.

D. xlvii. 2. 1. 3.

The definition of theft includes the term contrectatio rei, to show that evil intent is not sufficient; there must be an actual touching or seizing of the thing; fraudulosa to show that the thing must be seized with evil intent; and rei, usus, possessionis, to show the different interests in a thing that might be the subject of theft. It might seem that it would have made the definition more complete to have said contrectatio rei alienae. Perhaps the word alienae was left out because it was quite possible that the dominus or real owner of a thing should commit a theft in taking it from the possessor, as, for instance, in the case of a debtor stealing a thing given in pledge; and yet the res was scarcely aliena to the dominus.

Many texts, after the words contrectatio fraudulosa, add lucri faciendi gratia, i.e. with a design to profit by the act, whether the profit be that of gaining a benefit for oneself, or that of inflicting an injury on another. These words are found in the passage of the Digest (xlvii. 2. 1. 3) from which this definition of theft is taken, but the authority of the manuscripts seems against admitting them here.

Only things moveable could be the subject of theft. (D. xlvii. 2. 25.) But this phrase included things moved from the soil, such as trees, fruit, crops, chalk, &c. (D. xlvii. 2. 25. 2 and 57.)

2. Furtum autem vel a furvo id est nigro dictum est, quod clam et obscure fit et plerumque nocte: vel a fraude: vel a ferendo, id est auferendo: vel a Græco sermone, qui φῶρας appellant fures. Immo etiam Græci ἀπὸ τοῦ φέρειν φῶρας dixerunt.

2. The word furtum comes either from furvum, which means 'black,' because it is committed secretly and obscurely, and usually in the night; or from fraus; or from ferre, that is 'taking away,' or from the Greek word φῶρ, meaning a thief, which again, the Greeks say, comes from φέρειν, to carry away.

D. xlvii. 2. 1.

3. Furtorum autem genera duo sunt, manifestum et nec manifestum. Nam conceptum et oblatum species potius actionis sunt furto coherentes quam genera furtorum, sicut inferius apparebit. Manifestus fur est, quem Græci ἐπ' αὐτοφάργῳ appellant: nec solum is, qui in ipso furto deprehenditur, sed etiam is, qui eo loco deprehenditur, quo fit, veluti qui in domo furtum fecit et, nondum egressus januam, deprehensus fuerit, et qui in oliveto olivarum aut in vineto uvarum furtum fecit, quamdiu in eo oliveto aut in vineto fur deprehensus sit: immo ulterius furtum manifestum

3. Of theft there are two kinds, theft manifest and theft not manifest; for the thefts termed conceptum and oblatum are rather kinds of actions attaching to theft than kinds of theft, as will appear below. A manifest thief is one whom the Greeks term ἐπ' αὐτοφάργῳ, being not only one taken in the fact, but also one taken in the place where the theft is committed; as, for example, before he has passed on his way out through the door of the house where he has committed a theft, or in a plantation of olives or a vineyard where he has been stealing olives or grapes. We must also extend manifest theft to the case of a thief seen or usus ejus possessionisve: quod lege naturali prohibitum est admittere. its possession; an act which is prohibited by natural law.

D. xlvii. 2. 1. 3.

The definition of theft includes the term contrectatio rei, to show that evil intent is not sufficient; there must be an actual touching or seizing of the thing; fraudulosa to show that the thing must be seized with evil intent; and rei, usus, possessionis, to show the different interests in a thing that might be the subject of theft. It might seem that it would have made the definition more complete to have said contrectatio rei alienae. Perhaps the word alienae was left out because it was quite possible that the dominus or real owner of a thing should commit a theft in taking it from the possessor, as, for instance, in the case of a debtor stealing a thing given in pledge; and yet the res was scarcely aliena to the dominus.

Many texts, after the words contrectatio fraudulosa, add lucri faciendi gratia, i.e. with a design to profit by the act, whether the profit be that of gaining a benefit for oneself, or that of inflicting an injury on another. These words are found in the passage of the Digest (xlvii. 2. 1. 3) from which this definition of theft is taken, but the authority of the manuscripts seems against admitting them here.

Only things moveable could be the subject of theft. (D. xlvii. 2. 25.) But this phrase included things moved from the soil, such as trees, fruit, crops, chalk, &c. (D. xlvii. 2. 25. 2 and 57.)

2. Furtum autem vel a furvo id est nigro dictum est, quod clam et obscure fit et plerumque nocte: vel a fraude: vel a ferendo, id est auferendo: vel a Græco sermone, qui φάρας appellant fures. Immo etiam Græci ἀπὸ τοῦ φέρειν φάρας dixerunt.

2. The word furtum comes either from furvum, which means 'black,' because it is committed secretly and obscurely, and usually in the night; or from fraus; or from ferre, that is 'taking away,' or from the Greek word φάρας, meaning a thief, which again, the Greeks say, comes from φέρειν, to carry away.

D. xlvii. 2. 1.

3. Furto autem genera duo sunt, manifestum et nec manifestum. Nam conceptum et oblatum species potius actionis sunt furto coherentes quam genera furto, sicut inferius apparebit. Manifestus fur est, quem Græci ἐπ' αὐτοφάρεσσι appellant: nec solum is, qui in ipso furto deprehenditur, sed etiam is, qui eo loco deprehenditur, quo fit, veluti qui in domo furtum fecit et, nondum egressus januam, deprehensus fuerit, et qui in oliveto olivarum aut in vineto uvarum furtum fecit, quamdiu in eo oliveto aut in vineto fur deprehensus sit: immo ulterius furtum manifestum

3. Of theft there are two kinds, theft manifest and theft not manifest; for the thefts termed conceptum and oblatum are rather kinds of actions attaching to theft than kinds of theft, as will appear below. A manifest thief is one whom the Greeks term ἐπ' αὐτοφάρεσσι, being not only one taken in the fact, but also one taken in the place where the theft is committed; as, for example, before he has passed on his way out through the door of the house where he has committed a theft, or in a plantation of olives or a vineyard where he has been stealing olives or grapes. We must also extend manifest theft to the case of a thief seen or seized by the owner or any one else in a public or private place, while still holding the thing he has stolen, before he has reached the place where he meant to take and deposit it. But if he once has taken it to its destination, although he is afterwards taken with the thing stolen, he is not a manifest thief. What we mean by a not manifest theft may be gathered from what we have said, for a theft which is not a manifest theft is a not-manifest theft.

extendendum est, quamdiu eam rem fur tenens visus vel deprehensus fuerit sive in publico sive in privato vel a domino vel ab alio, antequam eo pervenerit, quo perferre ac depone rem destinasset. Sed si per tulit, quo destinavit, tametsi deprehendatur cum re furtiva, non est manifestus fur. Nec manifestum furtum quid sit, ex his, quæ diximus, intellegitur: nam quod manifestum non est, id scilicet nec manifestum est.

GAL. iii. 183-185; D. xlvii. 2. 3. and 5.

The distinction between furtum manifestum and nec manifestum is found in the law of the Twelve Tables, which affixed to a furtum manifestum the penalty of death if committed by a slave, and the penalty of being given over as a slave to the person injured if committed by a freeman; and attached to a furtum nec manifestum the penalty of double the value of the thing stolen, whether committed by a freeman or a slave. The prætor retained the penalty fixed in the latter case, but in the former altered the penalty to the payment of four times the value of the thing stolen, whether the theft was committed by a slave or a freeman. (GAL. iii. 189.)

Gaius tells us that the jurists were divided on the point of what it was that constituted a furtum manifestum; some thinking the thief must be taken in the act, some that he need only be taken on the spot, some that he need only be taken with the thing stolen on him before he had transported it to its destination (this is the opinion received in the text), and some that time and place were immaterial so that he was taken with the thing stolen on him. (GAL. iii. 189, 190.)

4. Conceptum furtum dicitur, cum apud aliquem testibus præsentibus furtiva res quesita et inventa sit; nam in eum propria actio constituta est, quamvis fur non sit, quæ appellatur concepti. Oblatum furtum dicitur, cum res furtiva ab aliquo tibi oblata sit eaque apud te concepta sit, utique si ea mente tibi data fuerit, ut apud te potius quam apud eum, qui dederit, conciperetur: nam tibi, apud quem concepta sit, propria adversus eum, qui obtulit, quamvis fur non sit, constituta est actio, quæ appellatur oblatis. Est etiam prohibiti furti actio adversus eum, qui furtum querere testibus præsentibus volentem prohibuerit. Præterea pœna constituitur edicto prætoris per actionem furti non exhibiti adversus eum, qui furtivam rem apud se quæ-

4. There is what is termed conceptum furtum, when a thing stolen has been sought and found in the presence of witnesses in any one's house; for although this person may not be the actual thief, he is liable to a special action termed concepti. There is what is termed furtum oblatum, if a thing stolen has been placed in your house and then found there; that is, if the person who placed it in your house did so, that it might be found rather in your house than in his. For you, in whose house it has been found, would have against him who placed it in your house, although he was not the actual thief, a special action termed oblatis. There is also the action prohibiti furti against a person who prevents another who wishes to seek in the presence of witnesses for a thing stolen; there is, seized by the owner or any one else in a public or private place, while still holding the thing he has stolen, before he has reached the place where he meant to take and deposit it. But if he once has taken it to its destination, although he is afterwards taken with the thing stolen, he is not a manifest thief. What we mean by a not manifest theft may be gathered from what we have said, for a theft which is not a manifest theft is a not-manifest theft.

extendendum est, quamdiu eam rem fur tenens visus vel deprehensus fuerit sive in publico sive in privato vel a domino vel ab alio, antequam eo pervenerit, quo perferre ac depone rem destinasset. Sed si per tulit, quo destinavit, tametsi deprehendatur cum re furtiva, non est manifestus fur. Nec manifestum furtum quid sit, ex his, quæ diximus, intellegitur: nam quod manifestum non est, id scilicet nec manifestum est.

GAL. iii. 183-185; D. xlvii. 2. 3. and 5.

The distinction between furtum manifestum and nec manifestum is found in the law of the Twelve Tables, which affixed to a furtum manifestum the penalty of death if committed by a slave, and the penalty of being given over as a slave to the person injured if committed by a freeman; and attached to a furtum nec manifestum the penalty of double the value of the thing stolen, whether committed by a freeman or a slave. The prætor retained the penalty fixed in the latter case, but in the former altered the penalty to the payment of four times the value of the thing stolen, whether the theft was committed by a slave or a freeman. (GAL. iii. 189.)

Gaius tells us that the jurists were divided on the point of what it was that constituted a furtum manifestum; some thinking the thief must be taken in the act, some that he need only be taken on the spot, some that he need only be taken with the thing stolen on him before he had transported it to its destination (this is the opinion received in the text), and some that time and place were immaterial so that he was taken with the thing stolen on him. (GAL. iii. 189, 190.)

4. Conceptum furtum dicitur, cum apud aliquem testibus præsentibus furtiva res quesita et inventa sit; nam in eum propria actio constituta est, quamvis fur non sit, quæ appellatur concepti. Oblatum furtum dicitur, cum res furtiva ab aliquo tibi oblata sit eaque apud te concepta sit, utique si ea mente tibi data fuerit, ut apud te potius quam apud eum, qui dederit, conciperetur: nam tibi, apud quem concepta sit, propria adversus eum, qui obtulit, quamvis fur non sit, constituta est actio, quæ appellatur oblatis. Est etiam prohibiti furti actio adversus eum, qui furtum querere testibus præsentibus volentem prohibuerit. Præterea pœna constituitur edicto prætoris per actionem furti non exhibitum adversus eum, qui furtivam rem apud se quæ-

4. There is what is termed conceptum furtum, when a thing stolen has been sought and found in the presence of witnesses in any one's house; for although this person may not be the actual thief, he is liable to a special action termed concepti. There is what is termed furtum oblatum, if a thing stolen has been placed in your house and then found there; that is, if the person who placed it in your house did so, that it might be found rather in your house than in his. For you, in whose house it has been found, would have against him who placed it in your house, although he was not the actual thief, a special action termed oblatis. There is also the action prohibiti furti against a person who prevents another who wishes to seek in the presence of witnesses for a thing stolen; there is, too, by means of the action furti non exhibiti, a penalty provided by the edict of the prætor against a person who has not produced a thing stolen which has been searched for and found in his house. But these actions, concepti, oblati, furti prohibiti, and furti non exhibiti, have fallen into disuse; for search for things stolen is not now made according to the ancient practice, and therefore these actions have naturally ceased to be in use, as all who knowingly have received and concealed a thing stolen are liable to the action furti nec manifesti.

sitam et inventam non exhibuit. Sed hæ actiones, id est concepti et oblati et furti prohibiti nec non furti non exhibiti, in desuetudinem abierunt. Cum enim requisitio rei furtivæ hodie secundum veterem observationem non fit: merito ex consequentia etiam præfatæ actiones ab usu communi recesserunt, cum manifestissimum est, quod omnes, qui scientes rem furtivam susceperint et celaverint, furti nec manifesti obnoxii sunt.

GAI. iii. 186-188.

To the furtum conceptum and the furtum oblatum a penalty of triple the value of the thing stolen was affixed by the Twelve Tables, and retained by the prætor. To the furtum prohibitum, not noticed in the Twelve Tables, a penalty of quadruple the value was affixed by the prætor. (GAI. iii. 192.) The Twelve Tables noticed a kind of furtum conceptum of which no mention is made here; it was called furtum lance licioque conceptum. The searcher entered the house of the supposed receiver, having nothing on his person but a cincture (licium) round his waist, and a plate (lanæ) which he held with both his hands, so that there could be no suspicion that he had brought in with him the thing supposed to be stolen. If he then found the thing in the house, the receiver was punished as if he had committed a furtum manifestum. (GAI. iii. 192.) This mode of search and the action founded on it were suppressed by the lex Æbutia. (AUL. GELL. Noct. Att. xvi. 10.) The actions furti concepti, oblati, and prohibiti, were still in use in the time of Gaius.

Ulpian (D. l. 16. 13. 1) explains the meaning of the word pœna. Pœna is the punishment of an offence, noxæ vindicta. It is contrasted with multa. Pœna is a punishment imposed by some general law, affecting possibly the caput and existimatio of the person punished. Multa is a fine, imposed ex arbitrio by magistrates and the præsides provinciarum; a money fine in later law (pecuniaria), a fine of cattle and sheep in earlier times (pecuaria).

The value of the thing was the rei verum pretium, its worth under all the circumstances of the case. So if a slave was stolen, who was in a position to enter on an inheritance at his master's bidding, and then died before entering, the pretium hereditatis, the value of the inheritance thus lost, was calculated in the value of the slave stolen. (D. xlvii. 2. 50. pr.)

5. Pœna manifesti furti quadrupli est tam ex servi persona quam ex liberi, nec manifesti dupli.

5. The penalty for manifest theft is quadruple the value of the thing stolen, whether the thief be a slave or a freeman; that for theft not manifest is double.

GAI. iii. 189, 190.

sitam et inventam non exhibuit. Sed hæ actiones, id est concepti et oblati et furti prohibiti nec non furti non exhibiti, in desuetudinem abierunt. Cum enim requisitio rei furtivæ hodie secundum veterem observationem non fit: merito ex consequentia etiam præfatæ actiones ab usu communi recesserunt, cum manifestissimum est, quod omnes, qui scientes rem furtivam susceperint et celaverint, furti nec manifesti obnoxii sunt.

too, by means of the action furti non exhibiti, a penalty provided by the edict of the prætor against a person who has not produced a thing stolen which has been searched for and found in his house. But these actions, concepti, oblati, furti prohibiti, and furti non exhibiti, have fallen into disuse; for search for things stolen is not now made according to the ancient practice, and therefore these actions have naturally ceased to be in use, as all who knowingly have received and concealed a thing stolen are liable to the action furti nec manifesti.

GAI. iii. 186-188.

To the furtum conceptum and the furtum oblatum a penalty of triple the value of the thing stolen was affixed by the Twelve Tables, and retained by the prætor. To the furtum prohibitum, not noticed in the Twelve Tables, a penalty of quadruple the value was affixed by the prætor. (GAI. iii. 192.) The Twelve Tables noticed a kind of furtum conceptum of which no mention is made here; it was called furtum lance licioque conceptum. The searcher entered the house of the supposed receiver, having nothing on his person but a cincture (licium) round his waist, and a plate (lanæ) which he held with both his hands, so that there could be no suspicion that he had brought in with him the thing supposed to be stolen. If he then found the thing in the house, the receiver was punished as if he had committed a furtum manifestum. (GAI. iii. 192.) This mode of search and the action founded on it were suppressed by the lex Æbutia. (AUL. GELL. Noct. Att. xvi. 10.) The actions furti concepti, oblati, and prohibiti, were still in use in the time of Gaius.

Ulpian (D. l. 16. 13. 1) explains the meaning of the word pœna. Pœna is the punishment of an offence, noxæ vindicta. It is contrasted with multa. Pœna is a punishment imposed by some general law, affecting possibly the caput and existimatio of the person punished. Multa is a fine, imposed ex arbitrio by magistrates and the præsides provinciarum; a money fine in later law (pecuniaria), a fine of cattle and sheep in earlier times (pecuaria).

The value of the thing was the rei verum pretium, its worth under all the circumstances of the case. So if a slave was stolen, who was in a position to enter on an inheritance at his master's bidding, and then died before entering, the pretium hereditatis, the value of the inheritance thus lost, was calculated in the value of the slave stolen. (D. xlvii. 2. 50. pr.)

5. Pœna manifesti furti quadrupli est tam ex servi persona quam ex liberi, nec manifesti dupli.

5. The penalty for manifest theft is quadruple the value of the thing stolen, whether the thief be a slave or a freeman; that for theft not manifest is double.

GAI. iii. 189, 190.

6. Furtum autem fit non solum, cum quis intercipiendi causa rem alienam amovet, sed generaliter cum quis alienam rem invito domino contrectat. Itaque sive creditor pignore sive is, apud quem res deposita est, ea re utatur sive is, qui rem utendum accepit, in alium usum eam transferat, quam cujus gratia ei data est, furtum committit. Veluti si quis argentum utendum accepit quasi amicos ad cenam invitaturus et id peregre secum tulerit, aut si quis equum gestandi causa commodatum sibi longius aliquo duxerit, quod veteres scripserunt de eo, qui in aciem equum perduxisset.

6. It is theft, not only when any one takes away a thing belonging to another, in order to appropriate it, but generally when any one deals with the property of another contrary to the wishes of its owner. Thus, if the creditor uses the thing pledged or the depositary the thing deposited, or a person who has received a thing to make use of it in one way employs it in another way, it is a theft; for example, if any one borrows plate on the pretence of intending to invite friends to supper, and then carries it away with him to a distance, or if any one borrows a horse, as for a ride, and takes it much farther than suits such a purpose, as if, to use a suggestion made in the writings of the ancients, he has taken it into battle.

GAI. iii. 195, 196; D. xlvii. 2. 54. pr.

7. Placuit tamen, eos, qui rebus commodatis aliter uterentur, quam utendas acceperint, ita furtum committere, si se intellegant id invito domino facere eunque, si intellexisset, non permissurum, ac si permissurum credant, extra crimen videri: optima sane distinctione, quia furtum sine affectu furandi non committitur.

7. A person, however, who borrows a thing, and applies it to a purpose other than that for which it was lent, only commits theft, if he knows that he is acting against the wishes of the owner, and that the owner, if he was informed, would not permit it; for if he really thinks the owner would permit it, he does not commit a crime; and this is a very proper distinction, for there is no theft without the intention to commit theft.

GAI. iii. 197; D. xli. 3. 37. pr.

8. Sed et si credat aliquis, invito domino se rem commodatam sibi contrectare, domino autem volente id fiat, dicitur furtum non fieri. Unde illud quaesitum est, cum Titius servum Mævii sollicitaverit, ut quasdam res domino subriperet et ad eum perferret, et servus id ad Mævium pertulerit, Mævius, dum vult Titium in ipso delicto deprehendere, permisit servo quasdam res ad eum perferre, utrum furti an servi corrupti iudicio teneatur Titius, an neutro? Et cum nobis super hac dubitatione suggestum est et antiquorum prudentium super hoc alterationes perspeximus, quibusdam neque furti neque servi corrupti actionem præstantibus, quibusdam furti tantummodo: nos huiusmodi calliditati obviam euntes, per nostram decisionem sanximus, non solum furti actionem, sed etiam servi corrupti contra eum dari: licet enim

8. And even if the borrower thinks he is applying the thing borrowed contrary to the wishes of the owner, yet if the owner as a matter of fact approves of the application, there is, it is said, no theft. Whence the following question arises: Titius has urged the slave of Mævius to steal from his master certain things, and to bring them to him; the slave informs his master, who, wishing to seize Titius in the act, permits the slave to take certain things to Titius: is Titius liable to an action furti, or to one servi corrupti, or to neither? This doubtful question was submitted to us, and we examined the conflicting opinions of the ancient jurists on the subject, some of whom thought Titius was liable to neither of these actions, while others thought he was only liable to the action of theft; and to prevent such subtleties, we have decided that in this case both these actions may be brought. For, although

6. Furtum autem fit non solum, cum quis intercipiendi causa rem alienam amovet, sed generaliter cum quis alienam rem invito domino contrectat. Itaque sive creditor pignore sive is, apud quem res deposita est, ea re utatur sive is, qui rem utendam accepit, in alium usum eam transferat, quam ejus gratia ei data est, furtum committit. Veluti si quis argentum utendum acceperit quasi amicos ad cenam invitaturus et id peregre secum tulerit, aut si quis equum gestandi causa commodatum sibi longius aliquo duxerit, quod veteres scripserunt de eo, qui in aciem equum perduxisset.

GAI. iii. 195, 196; D. xlvii. 2. 54. pr.

7. Placuit tamen, eos, qui rebus commodatis aliter uterentur, quam utendas acceperint, ita furtum committere, si se intellegant id invito domino facere eumque, si intellexisset, non permissurum, ac si permissurum credant, extra crimen videri: optima sane distinctione, quia furtum sine affectu furandi non committitur.

GAI. iii. 197; D. xli. 3. 37. pr.

8. Sed et si credat aliquis, invito domino se rem commodatam sibi contrectare, domino autem volente id fiat, dicitur furtum non fieri. Unde illud quaesitum est, cum Titius servum Mævii sollicitaverit, ut quasdam res domino subriperet et ad eum perferret, et servus id ad Mævium pertulerit, Mævius, dum vult Titium in ipso delicto deprehendere, permisit servo quasdam res ad eum perferre, utrum furti an servi corrupti judicio teneatur Titius, an neutro? Et cum nobis super hac dubitatione suggestum est et antiquorum prudentium super hoc alterationes perspeximus, quibusdam neque furti neque servi corrupti actionem præstantibus, quibusdam furti tantummodo: nos hujusmodi calliditati obviam euntes, per nostram decisionem sanximus, non solum furti actionem, sed etiam servi corrupti contra eum dari: licet enim

6. It is theft, not only when any one takes away a thing belonging to another, in order to appropriate it, but generally when any one deals with the property of another contrary to the wishes of its owner. Thus, if the creditor uses the thing pledged or the depositary the thing deposited, or a person who has received a thing to make use of it in one way employs it in another way, it is a theft; for example, if any one borrows plate on the pretence of intending to invite friends to supper, and then carries it away with him to a distance, or if any one borrows a horse, as for a ride, and takes it much farther than suits such a purpose, as if, to use a suggestion made in the writings of the ancients, he has taken it into battle.

7. A person, however, who borrows a thing, and applies it to a purpose other than that for which it was lent, only commits theft, if he knows that he is acting against the wishes of the owner, and that the owner, if he was informed, would not permit it; for if he really thinks the owner would permit it, he does not commit a crime; and this is a very proper distinction, for there is no theft without the intention to commit theft.

8. And even if the borrower thinks he is applying the thing borrowed contrary to the wishes of the owner, yet if the owner as a matter of fact approves of the application, there is, it is said, no theft. Whence the following question arises: Titius has urged the slave of Mævius to steal from his master certain things, and to bring them to him; the slave informs his master, who, wishing to seize Titius in the act, permits the slave to take certain things to Titius: is Titius liable to an action furti, or to one servi corrupti, or to neither? This doubtful question was submitted to us, and we examined the conflicting opinions of the ancient jurists on the subject, some of whom thought Titius was liable to neither of these actions, while others thought he was only liable to the action of theft; and to prevent such subtleties, we have decided that in this case both these actions may be brought. For, although is servus deterior a sollicitatore minime factus est et ideo non concurrant regulæ, quæ servi corrupti actionem introducerent, tamen consilium corruptoris ad perniciem prohibitatis servi introductum est, ut sit ei pœnalis actio imposita, tamquam re ipsa fuisset servus corruptus, ne ex hujusmodi impunitate et in alium servum, qui possit corrumpi, tale facinus a quibusdam pertentetur.

the slave has not been corrupted, and the case does not seem therefore within the rules of the action servi corrupti, yet the intention to corrupt the slave is indisputable, and he is therefore to be punished exactly as if the slave had been really corrupted, lest his impunity should incite others to act in the same criminal way towards a slave more easy to corrupt.

GAI. iii. 198; C. vi. 2. 20.

Was the slave corrupted? No; he had given a signal proof of his fidelity. Was the thing stolen? No; the owner had consented to its being taken. Thus had reasoned those who refused either action. Justinian avoids these subtleties, and decides that crime shall at any rate be punished, and reparation be made for a wrongful act. As to the actio servi corrupti, see D. xi. 3.

9. Interdum etiam liberorum hominum furtum fit, veluti si quis liberorum nostrorum, qui in potestate nostra sunt, subreptus fuerit.

9. Sometimes there may be a theft of free persons, as if one of our children in our power is carried away.

GAI. iii. 199.

Gaius adds, as an example, the case of a wife in manu being stolen. It was not the value of the person stolen which in such cases formed the measure of the penalty, for the value of a free person could not be calculated; but it was the loss occasioned by the theft to the person in whose power the subject of the theft was.

10. Aliquando autem etiam suæ rei quisque furtum committit, veluti si debitor rem, quam creditori pignoris causa dedit, subtraxerit.

10. A man may even commit a theft of his own property, as if a debtor takes fraudulently from a creditor a thing he has pledged to him.

GAI. iii. 200; D. xlvii. 2. 66. pr.

11. Interdum furti tenetur, qui ipse furtum non fecerit: qualis est, cujus ope et consilio furtum factum est. In quo numero est, qui tibi nummos excussit, ut alius eos raperet, aut obstitit tibi, ut alius rem tuam surriperet, vel oves aut boves tuas fugaverit, ut alius eas exciperet: et hoc veteres scripserunt de eo, qui panno rubro fugavit armentum. Sed si quid eorum per lasciviam et non data opera ut furtum admitteretur, factum est, in factum actio dari debet. At ubi ope Mævii Titius furtum fecerit, ambo furti tenentur. Ope consilio ejus quoque furtum admitti videtur, qui scalas forte fenestris supponit aut ipsas fenestras vel ostium effringit, ut alius furtum faceret, quive ferra-

11. A person may be liable to an action of theft, although he has not himself committed a theft, as, for instance, a person who has lent his aid and planned the crime. Among such is one who makes your money fall from your hand that another may seize upon it; or places himself in your way that another may carry off something belonging to you; or drives your sheep or oxen that another may make away with them, as, to take an instance given by the old lawyers, by frightening a herd with a piece of scarlet cloth. But if such acts are only the work of reckless folly, with no design of assisting in the commission of a theft, the proper action is one in factum. But if Mævius assists Titius to commit a robbery, both are liable to an

is servus deterior a sollicitatore minime factus est et ideo non concurrant regulæ, quæ servi corrupti actionem introducerent, tamen consilium corruptoris ad perniciem probitatis servi introductum est, ut sit ei pœnalis actio imposita, tamquam re ipsa fuisset servus corruptus, ne ex hujusmodi impunitate et in alium servum, qui possit corrumpi, tale facinus a quibusdam pertentetur.

the slave has not been corrupted, and the case does not seem therefore within the rules of the action servi corrupti, yet the intention to corrupt the slave is indisputable, and he is therefore to be punished exactly as if the slave had been really corrupted, lest his impunity should incite others to act in the same criminal way towards a slave more easy to corrupt.

GAI. iii. 198; C. vi. 2. 20.

Was the slave corrupted? No; he had given a signal proof of his fidelity. Was the thing stolen? No; the owner had consented to its being taken. Thus had reasoned those who refused either action. Justinian avoids these subtleties, and decides that crime shall at any rate be punished, and reparation be made for a wrongful act. As to the actio servi corrupti, see D. xi. 3.

9. Interdum etiam liberorum hominum furtum fit, veluti si quis liberorum nostrorum, qui in potestate nostra sunt, subreptus fuerit.

9. Sometimes there may be a theft of free persons, as if one of our children in our power is carried away.

GAI. iii. 199.

Gaius adds, as an example, the case of a wife in manu being stolen. It was not the value of the person stolen which in such cases formed the measure of the penalty, for the value of a free person could not be calculated; but it was the loss occasioned by the theft to the person in whose power the subject of the theft was.

10. Aliquando autem etiam suæ rei quisque furtum committit, veluti si debitor rem, quam creditori pignoris causa dedit, subtraxerit.

10. A man may even commit a theft of his own property, as if a debtor takes fraudulently from a creditor a thing he has pledged to him.

GAI. iii. 200; D. xlvii. 2. 66. pr.

11. Interdum furti tenetur, qui ipse furtum non fecerit: qualis est, cujus ope et consilio furtum factum est. In quo numero est, qui tibi nummos excussit, ut alius eos raperet, aut obstitit tibi, ut alius rem tuam surriperet, vel oves aut boves tuas fugaverit, ut alius eas exciperet: et hoc veteres scripserunt de eo, qui panno rubro fugavit armentum. Sed si quid eorum per lasciviam et non data opera ut furtum admitteretur, factum est, in factum actio dari debet. At ubi ope Mævii Titius furtum fecerit, ambo furti tenentur. Ope consilio ejus quoque furtum admitti videtur, qui scalas forte fenestris supponit aut ipsas fenestras vel ostium effringit, ut alius furtum faceret, quive ferra-

11. A person may be liable to an action of theft, although he has not himself committed a theft, as, for instance, a person who has lent his aid and planned the crime. Among such is one who makes your money fall from your hand that another may seize upon it; or places himself in your way that another may carry off something belonging to you; or drives your sheep or oxen that another may make away with them, as, to take an instance given by the old lawyers, by frightening a herd with a piece of scarlet cloth. But if such acts are only the work of reckless folly, with no design of assisting in the commission of a theft, the proper action is one in factum. But if Mævius assists Titius to commit a robbery, both are liable to an action of theft. A person, again, assists in a theft who places ladders under a window, or breaks a window or a door, that another may commit a theft; or who lends tools to break a door, or ladders to place under a window, knowing the purpose to which they are to be applied. But a person who does not actually assist, but only advises and urges the commission of a theft, is not liable to an action of theft.

menta ad effringendum aut scalas, ut fenestris supponerentur, commodaverit, sciens, cujus gratia commodaverit. Certe qui nullam operam ad furtum faciendum adhibuit, sed tantum consilium dedit atque hortatus est ad furtum faciendum, non tenetur furti.

GAEL. iii. 202; D. xlvii. 2. 54. 4; D. xlvii. 2. 36.

12. Hi, qui in parentium vel dominorum potestate sunt, si rem eis subripiant, furtum quidem illis faciunt et res in furtivam causam cadit nec ob id ab ullo usucapi potest, antequam in domini potestatem revertatur; sed furti actio non nascitur, quia nec ex alia ulla causa potest inter eos actio nasci: si vero ope consilio alterius furtum factum fuerit, quia utique furtum committitur, convenienter ille furti tenetur, quia verum est, ope consilio ejus furtum factum esse.

12. Those who are in the power of an ascendant or master, if they steal anything belonging to the person in whose power they are, commit a theft against him. The thing stolen, in such a case, is considered to be furtiva, and therefore no right in it can be acquired by usucaption before it has returned into the hands of the owner; but no action of theft can be brought, because the relation of the parties is such that no action whatever can arise between them. But if the theft has been committed by the assistance and advice of another, as a theft is actually committed, this person will be subject to the action of theft, as a theft is undoubtedly committed through his aid and advice.

D. xlvii. 2. 17. pr.; D. xlvii. 2. 36. 1.

13. Furti autem actio ei competit, cujus interest, rem salvam esse, licet dominus non sit: itaque nec domino aliter competit, quam si ejus intersit, rem non perire.

13. An action of theft may be brought by any one who is interested in the safety of the thing, although he is not the owner; and the proprietor, consequently, cannot bring this action unless he is interested in the thing not perishing.

GAEL. iii. 203; D. xlvii. 2. 10.

The right to bring the actio furti may belong to several persons at the same time. For instance, both the owner and the usufructuary had sufficient interest in the thing to support an action. But mere interest in a thing was not sufficient unless the thing had been delivered to, and was or had been in the possession of, the plaintiff. A person, for instance, to whom a thing was due by stipulation, could not bring an actio furti if the thing was stolen; he could only compel the actual owner to allow him to bring an actio furti in the owner's name; nor could an unsecured creditor bring an actio furti for a thing stolen from his debtor. (D. xlvii. 2. 14. 1 and 49.)

14. Unde constat, creditorem de pignore subrepto furti agere posse,

14. Hence, a creditor may bring this action if a thing pledged to him

menta ad effringendum aut scalas, ut fenestris supponerentur, commodaverit, sciens, cujus gratia commodaverit. Certe qui nullam operam ad furtum faciendum adhibuit, sed tantum consilium dedit atque hortatus est ad furtum faciendum, non tenetur furti.

action of theft. A person, again, assists in a theft who places ladders under a window, or breaks a window or a door, that another may commit a theft; or who lends tools to break a door, or ladders to place under a window, knowing the purpose to which they are to be applied. But a person who does not actually assist, but only advises and urges the commission of a theft, is not liable to an action of theft.

GAJ. iii. 202; D. xlvii. 2. 54. 4; D. xlvii. 2. 36.

12. Hi, qui in parentium vel dominorum potestate sunt, si rem eis subripiant, furtum quidem illis faciunt et res in furtivam causam cadit nec ob id ab ullo usucapi potest, antequam in domini potestatem revertatur; sed furti actio non nascitur, quia nec ex alia ulla causa potest inter eos actio nasci: si vero ope consilio alterius furtum factum fuerit, quia utique furtum committitur, convenienter ille furti tenetur, quia verum est, ope consilio ejus furtum factum esse.

12. Those who are in the power of an ascendant or master, if they steal anything belonging to the person in whose power they are, commit a theft against him. The thing stolen, in such a case, is considered to be furtiva, and therefore no right in it can be acquired by usucapion before it has returned into the hands of the owner; but no action of theft can be brought, because the relation of the parties is such that no action whatever can arise between them. But if the theft has been committed by the assistance and advice of another, as a theft is actually committed, this person will be subject to the action of theft, as a theft is undoubtedly committed through his aid and advice.

D. xlvii. 2. 17. pr.; D. xlvii. 2. 36. 1.

13. Furti autem actio ei competit, cujus interest, rem salvam esse, licet dominus non sit: itaque nec domino aliter competit, quam si ejus intersit, rem non perire.

13. An action of theft may be brought by any one who is interested in the safety of the thing, although he is not the owner; and the proprietor, consequently, cannot bring this action unless he is interested in the thing not perishing.

GAJ. iii. 203; D. xlvii. 2. 10.

The right to bring the actio furti may belong to several persons at the same time. For instance, both the owner and the usufructuary had sufficient interest in the thing to support an action. But mere interest in a thing was not sufficient unless the thing had been delivered to, and was or had been in the possession of, the plaintiff. A person, for instance, to whom a thing was due by stipulation, could not bring an actio furti if the thing was stolen; he could only compel the actual owner to allow him to bring an actio furti in the owner's name; nor could an unsecured creditor bring an actio furti for a thing stolen from his debtor. (D. xlvii. 2. 14. 1 and 49.)

14. Unde constat, creditorem de pignore subrepto furti agere posse,

14. Hence, a creditor may bring this action if a thing pledged to him

etiāmsi idoneum debitorem habeat, quia expedit ei, pignori potius incumbere quam in personam agere: adeo quidem ut, quamvis ipse debitor eam rem subripuerit, nihilo minus creditori competat actio furti.

is stolen, although his debtor is solvent, because it may be more advantageous to him to rely upon his pledge than to bring an action against his debtor personally; so much so, that although it is the debtor himself that has stolen the thing pledged, yet the creditor can bring an action of theft.

GAI. iii. 204; D. xlvii. 2. 12. 2.

15. Item si fullo poliēda curandave aut sarcinator sarcienda vestimenta mercede certa acceperit eaque furto amiserit, ipse furti habet actionem, non dominus, quia domini nihil interest, eam rem non perisse, cum iudicio locati a fullone aut sarcinatore rem suam persequi potest. Sed et bonæ fidei emptori, subrepta re, quam emerit, quamvis dominus non sit, omnimodo competit furti actio, quemadmodum et creditori. Fulloni vero et sarcinatori non aliter furti competere placuit, quam si solvendo sint, hoc est si domino rei æstimationem solvere possint: nam si solvendo non sunt, tunc quia ab eis suum dominus consequi non possit, ipsi domino furti actio competit, quia hoc casu ipsius interest, rem salvam esse. Idem est et si in parte solvendo sint fullo aut sarcinator.

15. So, too, if a fuller receives clothes to scour or clean, or a tailor receives them to mend, for a certain fixed sum, and has them stolen from him, it is he and not the owner who is able to bring an action of theft, for the owner is not considered as interested in their safety, having an action locati, by which he may recover the thing stolen, against the fuller or tailor. But if a thing is stolen from a bona fide purchaser, he is entitled, like a creditor, to an action of theft, although he is not the proprietor. But an action of theft is not maintainable by the fuller or tailor, unless he is solvent, that is, unless he is able to pay the owner the value of the thing lost; for if the fuller or tailor is insolvent, then the owner, as he cannot recover anything from them, is allowed to bring an action of theft, as he has in this case an interest in the safety of the thing. And it is the same although the fuller or tailor is partially solvent.

GAI. iii. 205; D. xlvii. 2. 12. pr.; D. xlvii. 2. 20. 1.

non bring 3
The owner has no interest in recovering the penalty if he can get compensation from the person whose services he has hired to the full amount of any loss he sustains by the theft; but he would still be able to bring an action, i.e. a vindicatio, an actio ad exhibendum, or a condictio, to get the thing itself, or its value, from the thief. (See paragr. 19.)

actio
Dati
16. Quæ de fullone et sarcinatore diximus, eadem et ad eum, cui commodata res est, transferenda veteres existimabant: nam ut ille fullo mercedem accipiēdo custodiam præstat, ita is quoque, qui commodum utendi percipit, similiter necesse habet custodiam præstare. Sed nostra providentia etiam hoc in decisionibus nostris emendavit, ut in domini sit voluntate, sive commodati actionem adversus eum, qui rem commodatam accepit, movere desiderat, sive furti adversus eum, qui rem subripuit, et alterutra

16. What we have said of the fuller and tailor was applied by the ancients to the borrower on gratuitous loan. For as the fuller, by accepting a sum for his labour, makes himself answerable for the safe keeping of the thing, so does a borrower by accepting the use of the thing he borrows. But our wisdom has introduced in our decisions an improvement on this point, and the owner may now bring an action commodati against the borrower, or of theft against the thief; but when once his choice is made, he cannot change his mind and have recourse to the

etiāmsi idoneum debitorem habeat, quia expedit ei, pignori potius incumbere quam in personam agere: adeo quidem ut, quamvis ipse debitor eam rem subripuerit, nihilo minus creditori competat actio furti.

is stolen, although his debtor is solvent, because it may be more advantageous to him to rely upon his pledge than to bring an action against his debtor personally; so much so, that although it is the debtor himself that has stolen the thing pledged, yet the creditor can bring an action of theft.

GAI. iii. 204; D. xlvii. 2. 12. 2.

15. Item si fullo poliēda curandave aut sarcinator sarcienda vestimenta mercede certa acceperit eaque furto amiserit, ipse furti habet actionem, non dominus, quia domini nihil interest, eam rem non perisse, cum iudicio locati a fullone aut sarcinatore rem suam persequi potest. Sed et bonæ fidei emptori, subrepta re, quam emerit, quamvis dominus non sit, omnimodo competit furti actio, quemadmodum et creditori. Fulloni vero et sarcinatori non aliter furti competere placuit, quam si solvendo sint, hoc est si domino rei æstimationem solvere possint: nam si solvendo non sunt, tunc quia ab eis suum dominus consequi non possit, ipsi domino furti actio competit, quia hoc casu ipsius interest, rem salvam esse. Idem est et si in parte solvendo sint fullo aut sarcinator.

15. So, too, if a fuller receives clothes to scour or clean, or a tailor receives them to mend, for a certain fixed sum, and has them stolen from him, it is he and not the owner who is able to bring an action of theft, for the owner is not considered as interested in their safety, having an action locati, by which he may recover the thing stolen, against the fuller or tailor. But if a thing is stolen from a bona fide purchaser, he is entitled, like a creditor, to an action of theft, although he is not the proprietor. But an action of theft is not maintainable by the fuller or tailor, unless he is solvent, that is, unless he is able to pay the owner the value of the thing lost; for if the fuller or tailor is insolvent, then the owner, as he cannot recover anything from them, is allowed to bring an action of theft, as he has in this case an interest in the safety of the thing. And it is the same although the fuller or tailor is partially solvent.

GAI. iii. 205; D. xlvii. 2. 12. pr.; D. xlvii. 2. 20. 1.

The owner has no interest in recovering the penalty if he can get compensation from the person whose services he has hired to the full amount of any loss he sustains by the theft; but he would still be able to bring an action, i.e. a vindicatio, an actio ad exhibendum, or a condictio, to get the thing itself, or its value, from the thief. (See paragr. 19.)

16. Quæ de fullone et sarcinatore diximus, eadem et ad eum, cui commodata res est, transferenda veteres existimabant: nam ut ille fullo mercedem accipiēdo custodiam præstat, ita is quoque, qui commodum utendi percipit, similiter necesse habet custodiam præstare. Sed nostra providentia etiam hoc in decisionibus nostris emendavit, ut in domini sit voluntate, sive commodati actionem adversus eum, qui rem commodatam accepit, movere desiderat, sive furti adversus eum, qui rem subripuit, et alterutra

16. What we have said of the fuller and tailor was applied by the ancients to the borrower on gratuitous loan. For as the fuller, by accepting a sum for his labour, makes himself answerable for the safe keeping of the thing, so does a borrower by accepting the use of the thing he borrows. But our wisdom has introduced in our decisions an improvement on this point, and the owner may now bring an action commodati against the borrower, or of theft against the thief; but when once his choice is made, he cannot change his mind and have recourse to the earum electa dominum non posse ex pœnitentia ad alteram venire actionem. Sed si quidem furem elegerit, illum, qui rem utendam accepit, penitus liberari. Sin autem commodator veniat adversus eum, qui rem utendam accepit, ipsi quidem nullo modo competere posse adversus furem furti actionem, eum autem, qui pro re commodata convenitur, posse adversus furem furti habere actionem, ita tamen, si dominus sciens, rem esse subreptam, adversus eum, cui res commodata fuit, pervenit: sin autem nescius et dubitans, rem non esse apud eum, commodati actionem instituit, postea autem, re comperta, voluit remittere quidem commodati actionem, ad furti autem pervenire, tunc licentia ei concedatur et adversus furem venire, nullo obstaculo ei opponendo, quoniam incertus constitutus movit adversus eum, qui rem utendam accepit, commodati actionem (nisi domino ab eo satisfactum est: tunc etenim omnimodo furem a domino quidem furti actione liberari, suppositum autem esse ei, qui pro re sibi commodata domino satisfecit), cum manifestissimum est, etiam si ab initio dominus actionem instituit commodati ignarus, rem esse subreptam, postea autem, hoc ei cognito, adversus furem transivit, omnimodo liberari eum, qui rem commodatam accepit, quemcumque causæ exitum dominus adversus furem habuerit: eadem definitione obtinente, sive in partem sive in solidum solvendo sit is, qui rem commodatam accepit.

GAL. iii. 206; C. vi. 2. 22. 1, 2.

The concluding words of the paragraph mean that the owner is put to his election once for all, and if he sues the borrower, and finds the borrower cannot pay, he cannot have recourse to an actio furti against the thief.

17. Sed is, apud quem res deposita est, custodiam non prestat, sed tantum in eo obnoxius est, si quid ipse dolo malo fecerit: qua de causa si res ei subrepta fuerit, quia restituendæ ejus nomine depositi non tenetur nec ob id ejus interest, rem salvam esse, furti agere non potest, sed furti actio domino competit.

other action. If he elects to sue the thief, the borrower is quite freed; if he elects to sue the borrower, he cannot bring an action of theft against the thief, but the borrower may, that is, provided that the owner elects to sue the borrower, knowing that the thing has been stolen. If he is ignorant or uncertain of this, and therefore sues the borrower, and then subsequently learns the true state of the case, and wishes to have recourse to an action of theft, he will be permitted to sue the thief without any difficulty being thrown in his way, for it was in ignorance of the real fact that he sued the borrower; unless, indeed, his claim has been satisfied by the borrower, for then the thief is quite free from any action of theft on the part of the owner, but the borrower takes the place of the owner in the power of bringing this action. On the other hand, it is very evident that if the owner originally brings an action commodati, in ignorance that the thing has been stolen, and subsequently, learning this, prefers to proceed against the thief, the borrower is thereby entirely freed, whatever may be the issue of the suit against the thief, the same rule holding good, whether the borrower is wholly or only partially solvent.

17. A depositary is not answerable for the safe keeping of the thing deposited, but is only answerable for wilful wrong; therefore, if the thing is stolen from him, as he is not bound by the contract of deposit to restore it, and has no interest in its safety, he cannot bring an action of theft, but it is the owner alone who can bring this action.

GAL. iii. 207; D. xlvii. 2. 14. 3.

earum electa dominum non posse ex pœnitentia ad alteram venire actionem. Sed si quidem furem elegerit, illum, qui rem utendam accepit, penitus liberari. Sin autem commodator veniat adversus eum, qui rem utendam accepit, ipsi quidem nullo modo competere posse adversus furem furti actionem, eum autem, qui pro re commodata convenitur, posse adversus furem furti habere actionem, ita tamen, si dominus sciens, rem esse subreptam, adversus eum, cui res commodata fuit, pervenit: sin autem nescius et dubitans, rem non esse apud eum, commodati actionem instituit, postea autem, re comperta, voluit remittere quidem commodati actionem, ad furti autem pervenire, tunc licentia ei concedatur et adversus furem venire, nullo obstaculo ei opponendo, quoniam incertus constitutus movit adversus eum, qui rem utendam accepit, commodati actionem (nisi domino ab eo satisfactum est: tunc etenim omnimodo furem a domino quidem furti actione liberari, suppositum autem esse ei, qui pro re sibi commodata domino satisfecit), cum manifestissimum est, etiam si ab initio dominus actionem instituit commodati ignarus, rem esse subreptam, postea autem, hoc ei cognito, adversus furem transivit, omnimodo liberari eum, qui rem commodatam accepit, quemcumque causæ exitum dominus adversus furem habuerit: eadem definitione obtinente, sive in partem sive in solidum solvendo sit is, qui rem commodatam accepit.

GAL. iii. 206; C. vi. 2. 22. 1, 2.

The concluding words of the paragraph mean that the owner is put to his election once for all, and if he sues the borrower, and finds the borrower cannot pay, he cannot have recourse to an actio furti against the thief.

17. Sed is, apud quem res deposita est, custodiam non prestat, sed tantum in eo obnoxius est, si quid ipse dolo malo fecerit: qua de causa si res ei subrepta fuerit, quia restituendæ ejus nomine depositi non tenetur nec ob id ejus interest, rem salvam esse, furti agere non potest, sed furti actio domino competit.

other action. If he elects to sue the thief, the borrower is quite freed; if he elects to sue the borrower, he cannot bring an action of theft against the thief, but the borrower may, that is, provided that the owner elects to sue the borrower, knowing that the thing has been stolen. If he is ignorant or uncertain of this, and therefore sues the borrower, and then subsequently learns the true state of the case, and wishes to have recourse to an action of theft, he will be permitted to sue the thief without any difficulty being thrown in his way, for it was in ignorance of the real fact that he sued the borrower; unless, indeed, his claim has been satisfied by the borrower, for then the thief is quite free from any action of theft on the part of the owner, but the borrower takes the place of the owner in the power of bringing this action. On the other hand, it is very evident that if the owner originally brings an action commodati, in ignorance that the thing has been stolen, and subsequently, learning this, prefers to proceed against the thief, the borrower is thereby entirely freed, whatever may be the issue of the suit against the thief, the same rule holding good, whether the borrower is wholly or only partially solvent.

17. A depositary is not answerable for the safe keeping of the thing deposited, but is only answerable for wilful wrong; therefore, if the thing is stolen from him, as he is not bound by the contract of deposit to restore it, and has no interest in its safety, he cannot bring an action of theft, but it is the owner alone who can bring this action.

GAL. iii. 207; D. xlvii. 2. 14. 3.

We must, in all cases of theft, bear in mind that an actio furti might also be brought against any one who had 'ope consilio' participated in the theft, and the whole amount of the penalty could be recovered separately against each thief and each person taking an indirect part in the theft. (D. xlvii. 2. 21. 9.)

Custodiam non præstat is equivalent to saying that he is not answerable for culpa levis.

18. In summa sciendum est, quæsitum esse, an impubes rem alienam amovendo furtum faciat. Et placet, quia furtum ex affectu consistit, ita demum obligari eo crimine impubem, si proximus pubertati sit et ob id intellegat, se delinquere.

18. It must be finally observed, that the question has been asked whether, if a person under the age of puberty takes away the property of another, he commits a theft. The answer is, that as it is the intention that makes the theft, such a person is only bound by the obligation springing from the delict if he is near the age of puberty, and consequently understands that he is doing wrong.

GAL. iii. 208.

See Bk. iii. Tit. 19. 10 note.

19. Furti actio sive dupli sive quadrupli tantum ad pœnæ persecutionem pertinet: nam ipsius rei persecutio rem extrinsecus habet dominus, quam aut vindicando aut condicendo potest auferre. Sed vindicatio quidem adversus possessorem est, sive fur ipse possidet sive alius quilibet: condictio autem adversus ipsum furem heredemve ejus, licet non possideat, competit.

19. The action of theft, whether brought to recover double or quadruple, has no other object than the recovery of the penalty. For the owner has also a means of recovering the thing itself, either by a vindicatio or a condictio. The former may be brought against the possessor, whether the thief or any one else; the latter may be brought against the thief or the heir of the thief, although not in possession of the thing stolen.

GAL. iv. 8; D. xlvii. 2. 54. 3.

The thief and those who assisted him had to pay a penalty as a punishment for their wrongdoing; but something more remained for the thief himself to do; he had to restore the thing stolen or its value. The owner could bring a vindicatio or an actio ad exhibendum, which were both actiones arbitrarie (Tit. 6. 31); that is, the thief was directed to restore the thing or exhibit it, and if he did not do so, then the judge condemned him to pay what, under the circumstances, it was reasonable he should pay. These actiones might be brought against any possessor, against the thief, or any one who had received possession from the thief. As a general rule the person who could bring a vindicatio could not bring a condictio for the same thing; for in the vindicatio he asserted that the property in the thing was his, whereas in the condictio he asserted that the defendant ought to make over (dare oportere) the property in the thing to him, and these were inconsistent assertions. In the case of theft, however, the plaintiff had an option given him odio furum to bring what was termed a con-

We must, in all cases of theft, bear in mind that an actio furti might also be brought against any one who had 'ope consilio' participated in the theft, and the whole amount of the penalty could be recovered separately against each thief and each person taking an indirect part in the theft. (D. xlvii. 2. 21. 9.)

Custodiam non præstat is equivalent to saying that he is not answerable for culpa levis.

18. In summa sciendum est, quæsitum esse, an impubes rem alienam amovendo furtum faciat. Et placet, quia furtum ex affectu consistit, ita demum obligari eo crimine impubem, si proximus pubertati sit et ob id intellegat, se delinquere.

18. It must be finally observed, that the question has been asked whether, if a person under the age of puberty takes away the property of another, he commits a theft. The answer is, that as it is the intention that makes the theft, such a person is only bound by the obligation springing from the delict if he is near the age of puberty, and consequently understands that he is doing wrong.

GAI. iii. 208.

See Bk. iii. Tit. 19. 10 note.

19. Furti actio sive dupli sive quadrupli tantum ad pœnæ persecutionem pertinet: nam ipsius rei persecutio æm extrinsecus habet dominus, quàm aut vindicando aut condicendo potest auferre. Sed vindicatio quidem adversus possessorem est, sive fur ipse possidet sive alius quilibet: condictio autem adversus ipsum furem heredemve ejus, licet non possideat, competit.

19. The action of theft, whether brought to recover double or quadruple, has no other object than the recovery of the penalty. For the owner has also a means of recovering the thing itself, either by a vindicatio or a condictio. The former may be brought against the possessor, whether the thief or any one else; the latter may be brought against the thief or the heir of the thief, although not in possession of the thing stolen.

GAI. iv. 8; D. xlvii. 2. 54. 3.

The thief and those who assisted him had to pay a penalty as a punishment for their wrongdoing; but something more remained for the thief himself to do; he had to restore the thing stolen or its value. The owner could bring a vindicatio or an actio ad exhibendum, which were both actiones arbitrarie (Tit. 6. 31); that is, the thief was directed to restore the thing or exhibit it, and if he did not do so, then the judge condemned him to pay what, under the circumstances, it was reasonable he should pay. These actiones might be brought against any possessor, against the thief, or any one who had received possession from the thief. As a general rule the person who could bring a vindicatio could not bring a condictio for the same thing; for in the vindicatio he asserted that the property in the thing was his, whereas in the condictio he asserted that the defendant ought to make over (dare oportere) the property in the thing to him, and these were inconsistent assertions. In the case of theft, however, the plaintiff had an option given him odio furum to bring what was termed a con- dictio furtiva (Tit. 6. 14), and it might sometimes be advantageous to have this option. For example, the thing might have perished, and it was a rule that res extinctæ vindicari non possunt. Extinctæ res, licet vindicari non possint, condici tamen furibus possunt (GAI. ii. 79).

This condictio furtiva might be brought against the heirs of the thief, whereas the actio furti, which inflicted a punishment for a personal wrongful act, could only be brought against the thief himself. Every action against a thief or those who assisted him might be brought by the heirs of any one entitled to bring it. (See Tit. 12.)

TIT. II. VI BONORUM RAPTORUM.

Qui res alienas rapit, tenetur quidem etiam furti (quis enim magis alienam rem invito domino contrectat, quam qui vi rapit? Ideoque recte dictum est, eum improbum furem esse): sed tamen propriam actionem ejus delicti nomine prætor introduxit, quæ appellatur vi bonorum raptorum et est intra annum quadrupli, post annum simpli. Quæ actio utilis est, etiamsi quis unam rem, licet minimam, rapuerit. Quadruplum autem non totum pœna est et extra pœnam rei persecutio, sicut in actione furti manifesti diximus: sed in quadruplo inest et rei persecutio, ut pœna tripli sit, sive comprehendatur raptor in ipso delicto sive non. Ridiculum est enim, levioris esse condicionis eum, qui vi rapit, quam qui clam amovet.

A person who takes by force a thing belonging to another is liable to an action of theft, for who can better be said to take the property of another against his will than he who takes it by force? And he is therefore rightly said to be an improbus fur. The prætor, however, has introduced a peculiar action in the case of this delict, called vi bonorum raptorum; by which, if brought within a year after the robbery, quadruple the value of the thing taken may be recovered; but if brought after the expiration of a year, then the single value only can be recovered. This action may be brought even against a person who has only taken by force a single thing, even of the most trifling value. But this quadruple of the value is not altogether a penalty, the recovery of the thing being something additional, as in the action of furtum manifestum; for the recovery of the thing is included, so that the penalty is only of three times the value. And it is the same, whether the robber was or was not taken in the actual commission of the crime. For it would be ridiculous that a person who uses force should be treated more leniently than he who secretly removes a thing.

GAI. iv. 8.

The edict of the prætor, introducing this action, ran as follows: Si cui dolo malo, hominibus coactis, damni quid factum esse dicetur, sive cujus bona rapta esse dicentur: in eum qui id fecisse dicetur judicium dabo. (D. xlvii. 8. 2. pr.)

It was necessary that the act of violence should be committed with evil intent (dolo malo). If, for instance, a publicanus

dictio furtiva (Tit. 6. 14), and it might sometimes be advantageous to have this option. For example, the thing might have perished, and it was a rule that res extinctæ vindicari non possunt. Extinctæ res, licet vindicari non possint, condici tamen furibus possunt (GAI. ii. 79).

This condictio furtiva might be brought against the heirs of the thief, whereas the actio furti, which inflicted a punishment for a personal wrongful act, could only be brought against the thief himself. Every action against a thief or those who assisted him might be brought by the heirs of any one entitled to bring it. (See Tit. 12.)

TIT. II. VI BONORUM RAPTORUM.

Qui res alienas rapit, tenetur quidem etiam furti (quis enim magis alienam rem invito domino contrectat, quam qui vi rapit? Ideoque recte dictum est, eum improbum furem esse): sed tamen propriam actionem ejus delicti nomine prætor introduxit, quæ appellatur vi bonorum raptorum et est intra annum quadrupli, post annum simpli. Quæ actio utilis est, etiamsi quis unam rem, licet minimam, rapuerit. Quadruplum autem non totum pœna est et extra pœnam rei persecutio, sicut in actione furti manifesti diximus: sed in quadruplo inest et rei persecutio, ut pœna tripli sit, sive comprehendatur raptor in ipso delicto sive non. Ridiculum est enim, levioris esse condicionis eum, qui vi rapit, quam qui clam amovet.

A person who takes by force a thing belonging to another is liable to an action of theft, for who can better be said to take the property of another against his will than he who takes it by force? And he is therefore rightly said to be an improbus fur. The prætor, however, has introduced a peculiar action in the case of this delict, called vi bonorum raptorum; by which, if brought within a year after the robbery, quadruple the value of the thing taken may be recovered; but if brought after the expiration of a year, then the single value only can be recovered. This action may be brought even against a person who has only taken by force a single thing, even of the most trifling value. But this quadruple of the value is not altogether a penalty, the recovery of the thing being something additional, as in the action of furtum manifestum; for the recovery of the thing is included, so that the penalty is only of three times the value. And it is the same, whether the robber was or was not taken in the actual commission of the crime. For it would be ridiculous that a person who uses force should be treated more leniently than he who secretly removes a thing.

GAI. iv. 8.

The edict of the prætor, introducing this action, ran as follows: Si cui dolo malo, hominibus coactis, damni quid factum esse dicetur, sive cujus bona rapta esse dicentur: in eum qui id fecisse dicetur judicium dabo. (D. xlvii. 8. 2. pr.)

It was necessary that the act of violence should be committed with evil intent (dolo malo). If, for instance, a publicanus

carried off a flock of sheep, thinking that some offence had been committed against the lex vectigalis, although he was mistaken, this action could not be brought against him. (D. xlvii. 8. 2. 20.) Even if the thief was alone, or one thing, however small, was carried off, yet the action might be brought, although the words hominibus coactis and bona rapta occur in the edict. It, like the action of theft, could only be brought if the thing or things taken were moveables. (C. ix. 33. 1.)

The text explains how the amount recovered under it differed from that recovered under an actio furti. Under the actio vi bonorum raptorum the thing itself was recovered, or its value if the thief no longer had it in his possession, and also three times the estimated value of the thing itself; while the actio furti was only penal. (See paragr. 19 of last Title.)

The plaintiff might, if he pleased, bring the actio furti instead; and he might bring this action after the expiration of a year prevented his bringing that vi bonorum raptorum. If he first brought the latter action, he could not afterwards bring the actio furti; but he could first bring the actio furti, and afterwards bring the actio vi bonorum raptorum for the excess recoverable by that action. (D. xlvii. 8. 1.)

This action united in its effects the vindictio or condictio, and also the recovery of a penalty. As it was partly penal, it could not be brought against the heirs of the thief. (D. xlvii. 8. 2. 27.) The offence of taking goods by force could also be made the subject of a criminal charge. (Tit. 18. 8.)

1. Quia tamen ita competit hæc actio, si dolo malo quisque rapuerit: qui aliquo errore inductus, suam rem esse, et imprudens juris eo animo rapuit, quasi domino liceat rem suam etiam per vim auferre possessoribus, absolvi debet. Cui scilicet conveniens est, nec furti teneri eum, qui eodem hoc animo rapuit. Sed ne, dum talia excogitentur, inveniatur via, per quam raptorem impune suam exerceant avaritiam: melius divalibus constitutionibus pro hac parte prospectum est, ut nemini liceat vi rapere rem mobilem vel se moventem, licet suam eandem rem existimet: sed si quis contra statuta fecerit, rei quidem suæ dominio cadere, sin autem aliena sit, post rei restitutionem etiam æstimationem ejusdem rei præstare. Quod non solum in mobilibus rebus, quæ rapi possunt, constitutiones optinere censuerunt, sed etiam in invasionibus, quæ circa res soli fiunt, ut ex hac causa omni rapina homines abstineant.

1. As, however, this action can only be brought against a person who robs with the intent of committing a wilful wrong, if any one takes by force a thing, thinking himself, by a mistake, to be the owner, and, in ignorance of the law, believing it permitted to an owner to take away, even by force, a thing belonging to himself from persons in whose possession it is, he ought to be held discharged of this action; and on the same principles a person carrying off a thing under similar circumstances would not be liable to an action of theft. But lest robbers, under the cover of such an excuse, should find means of gratifying their avarice with impunity, the imperial constitutions have made a wise alteration, by providing that no one may carry off by force a thing that is moveable, or moves itself, although he thinks himself the owner. If any one acts contrary to these constitutions, he is, if the thing is his, to cease to be owner of it; if it is not, he is not only to restore the thing taken, but also to pay its value. The constitutions have carried off a flock of sheep, thinking that some offence had been committed against the lex vectigalis, although he was mistaken, this action could not be brought against him. (D. xlvii. 8. 2. 20.) Even if the thief was alone, or one thing, however small, was carried off, yet the action might be brought, although the words hominibus coactis and bona rapta occur in the edict. It, like the action of theft, could only be brought if the thing or things taken were moveables. (C. ix. 33. 1.)

The text explains how the amount recovered under it differed from that recovered under an actio furti. Under the actio vi bonorum raptorum the thing itself was recovered, or its value if the thief no longer had it in his possession, and also three times the estimated value of the thing itself; while the actio furti was only penal. (See paragr. 19 of last Title.)

The plaintiff might, if he pleased, bring the actio furti instead; and he might bring this action after the expiration of a year prevented his bringing that vi bonorum raptorum. If he first brought the latter action, he could not afterwards bring the actio furti; but he could first bring the actio furti, and afterwards bring the actio vi bonorum raptorum for the excess recoverable by that action. (D. xlvii. 8. 1.)

This action united in its effects the vindictio or condictio, and also the recovery of a penalty. As it was partly penal, it could not be brought against the heirs of the thief. (D. xlvii. 8. 2. 27.) The offence of taking goods by force could also be made the subject of a criminal charge. (Tit. 18. 8.)

1. Quia tamen ita competit hæc actio, si dolo malo quisque rapuerit: qui aliquo errore inductus, suam rem esse, et imprudens juris eo animo rapuit, quasi domino liceat rem suam etiam per vim auferre possessoribus, absolvi debet. Cui scilicet conveniens est, nec furti teneri eum, qui eodem hoc animo rapuit. Sed ne, dum talia excogitentur, inveniatur via, per quam raptores impune suam exerceant avaritiam: melius divalibus constitutionibus pro hac parte prospectum est, ut nemini liceat vi rapere rem mobilem vel se moventem, licet suam eandem rem existimet: sed si quis contra statuta fecerit, rei quidem suæ dominio cadere, sin autem aliena sit, post rei restitutionem etiam æstimationem ejusdem rei præstare. Quod non solum in mobilibus rebus, quæ rapi possunt, constitutiones optinere censuerunt, sed etiam in invasionibus, quæ circa res soli fiunt, ut ex hac causa omni rapina homines abstineant.

1. As, however, this action can only be brought against a person who robs with the intent of committing a wilful wrong, if any one takes by force a thing, thinking himself, by a mistake, to be the owner, and, in ignorance of the law, believing it permitted to an owner to take away, even by force, a thing belonging to himself from persons in whose possession it is, he ought to be held discharged of this action; and on the same principles a person carrying off a thing under similar circumstances would not be liable to an action of theft. But lest robbers, under the cover of such an excuse, should find means of gratifying their avarice with impunity, the imperial constitutions have made a wise alteration, by providing that no one may carry off by force a thing that is moveable, or moves itself, although he thinks himself the owner. If any one acts contrary to these constitutions, he is, if the thing is his, to cease to be owner of it; if it is not, he is not only to restore the thing taken, but also to pay its value. The constitutions have declared these rules applicable, not only in the case of moveables of a nature to be carried off by force, but also to forcible entries made upon things pertaining to the soil, in order that every kind of violent robbery may be prevented.

D. xlvii. 8, 2. 18; C. viii. 4, 7.

The constitution referred to was enacted in A.D. 389 by the Emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius. It provided a much more effectual remedy for forcible disturbance than had been given by the interdict unde vi. It applied, which the interdict did not, to moveables as well as immoveables, and it not only made the wrongdoer give up the thing, but it made him, if he was the owner, lose the property in the thing, and, if he was not the owner, pay its value. (See Tit. 15. 6.)

2. In hac actione non utique spectatur, rem in bonis actoris esse: nam sive in bonis sit sive non sit, si tamen ex bonis sit, locum hæc actio habebit. Quare sive commodata sive locata sive etiam pignerata sive deposita sit apud Titium sic, ut intersit ejus, eam non auferri, veluti si in re deposita culpam quoque promisit, sive bona fide possideat, sive usufructum in ea quis habeat vel quod aliud jus, ut intersit ejus, non rapti: dicendum est, competere ei hanc actionem, ut non dominium accipiat, sed illud solum, quod ex bonis ejus, qui rapinam passus est, id est quod ex substantia ejus ablatum esse proponatur. Et generaliter dicendum est, ex quibus causis furti actio competit in re clam facta, ex iisdem causis omnes habere hanc actionem.

2. In this action it is clearly not necessary that the thing should have been part of the goods of the plaintiff; for whether it has been part of his goods or not, yet if it has been taken from among his goods, the action may be brought. Consequently, if anything has been let, lent, or given in pledge to Titius, or deposited with him, so that he has an interest in its not being taken away by force, as if, for instance, he has engaged to be answerable for any fault committed respecting it; or if he possesses it bona fide, or has the usufruct of it, or has any other legal interest in its not being taken away by force, this action may be brought, not to give him the ownership in the thing, but merely to restore him what he has lost by the thing being taken away by violence from out of his goods, that is, from out of his substance. And generally, we may say, that the same causes which would give rise to an action of theft, if the act is committed secretly, will give ground for this action, if it is committed with force.

D. xlvii. 8. 2. 22-24.

In order to make the punishment of an open and flagrant violation of law more severe than that of a secret theft, the very slightest interest in the thing taken was sufficient to enable a plaintiff to bring the action vi bonorum raptorum. For instance, a mere depositary could bring it, although his interest was not great enough to permit of his bringing an actio furti.

declared these rules applicable, not only in the case of moveables of a nature to be carried off by force, but also to forcible entries made upon things pertaining to the soil, in order that every kind of violent robbery may be prevented.

D. xlvii. 8, 2. 18; C. viii. 4, 7.

The constitution referred to was enacted in A.D. 389 by the Emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius. It provided a much more effectual remedy for forcible disturbance than had been given by the interdict unde vi. It applied, which the interdict did not, to moveables as well as immoveables, and it not only made the wrongdoer give up the thing, but it made him, if he was the owner, lose the property in the thing, and, if he was not the owner, pay its value. (See Tit. 15. 6.)

2. In hac actione non utique spectatur, rem in bonis actoris esse: nam sive in bonis sit sive non sit, si tamen ex bonis sit, locum hæc actio habebit. Quare sive commodata sive locata sive etiam pignerata sive deposita sit apud Titium sic, ut intersit ejus, eam non auferri, veluti si in re deposita culpam quoque promisit, sive bona fide possideat, sive usufructum in ea quis habeat vel quod aliud jus, ut intersit ejus, non rapi: dicendum est, competere ei hanc actionem, ut non dominium accipiat, sed illud solum, quod ex bonis ejus, qui rapinam passus est, id est quod ex substantia ejus ablatum esse proponatur. Et generaliter dicendum est, ex quibus causis furti actio competit in re clam facta, ex iisdem causis omnes habere hanc actionem.

2. In this action it is clearly not necessary that the thing should have been part of the goods of the plaintiff; for whether it has been part of his goods or not, yet if it has been taken from among his goods, the action may be brought. Consequently, if anything has been let, lent, or given in pledge to Titius, or deposited with him, so that he has an interest in its not being taken away by force, as if, for instance, he has engaged to be answerable for any fault committed respecting it; or if he possesses it bona fide, or has the usufruct of it, or has any other legal interest in its not being taken away by force, this action may be brought, not to give him the ownership in the thing, but merely to restore him what he has lost by the thing being taken away by violence from out of his goods, that is, from out of his substance. And generally, we may say, that the same causes which would give rise to an action of theft, if the act is committed secretly, will give ground for this action, if it is committed with force.

D. xlvii. 8. 2. 22-24.

In order to make the punishment of an open and flagrant violation of law more severe than that of a secret theft, the very slightest interest in the thing taken was sufficient to enable a plaintiff to bring the action vi bonorum raptorum. For instance, a mere depositary could bring it, although his interest was not great enough to permit of his bringing an actio furti.

TIT. III. DE LEGE AQUILIA.

Damni injuriæ actio constituitur per legem Aquiliam. Cujus primo capite cautum est, ut si quis hominem alienum alienamve quadrupedem, quæ pecudum numero sit, injuria occiderit, quanti ea res in eo anno plurimi fuit, tantum domino dare damnetur.

The action damni injuriæ is established by the lex Aquilia, of which the first head provides, that if any one shall have wrongfully killed a slave, or a four-footed beast, being one of those reckoned among cattle, belonging to another, he shall be condemned to pay the owner the greatest value which the thing has possessed at any time within a year previously.

GAI. iii. 210 ; D. ix. 2. 2. pr.

The lex Aquilia was, as Ulpian informs us (D. ix. 2. 1), a plebiscitum made on the proposition of the tribune Aquilius. It made an alteration in all the previous laws, including those of the Twelve Tables, which had treated of damage wrongfully done (de damno injuria). Theophilus says it was passed at the time of the secession of the plebs, meaning, probably, that to the Janiculum, in the year 468 A.U.C. (Paraphrase on paragr. 15.)

A fragment of Gaius in the Digest (D. ix. 2. 2. pr.) contains the terms of this first head of the lex Aquilia: 'Qui servum servamve alienum alienamve quadrupedem vel pecudem injuria occiderit, quanti id in eo anno plurimi fuit, tantum res dare domino damnatus esto.'

1. Quod autem non præcise de quadrupede, sed de ea tantum, quæ pecudum numero est, cavetur, eo pertinet, ut neque de feris bestiis neque de canibus cautum esse intellegamus, sed de his tantum, quæ proprie pasci dicuntur, quales sunt equi, muli, asini, boves, oves, capræ. De suis quoque idem placuit: nam et sues pecorum appellatione continentur, quia et hi gregatim pascuntur: sic denique et Homerus in Odyssea ait, sicut Ælius Marcius in suis institutionibus refert:

Ἀγέεις τὸν γε σύεσσι παρήμενον· αἱ δὲ νέμονται
Πᾶρ Κόρακος πέρηρ, ἐπὶ τε κρήνῃ Ἀρεθοῦσῃ.

1. As the law does not speak generally of four-footed beasts, but only of those which are reckoned among cattle, we may consider its provisions as not applying to wild animals or dogs, but only to animals which may be properly said to graze, as horses, mules, asses, sheep, oxen, goats. It has been held to apply also to swine, for they are included in the term cattle, seeing that they feed in herds. Thus Homer says, as Ælius Marcius quotes in his Institutes:

'You will find him seated by his swine, and they are feeding by the rock of Corax, near the spring Arethusa.'

D. ix. 2. 2. 2; D. xxxii. 65. 4.

The passage is from Od. xiii. 407.

2. Injuria autem occidere intellegitur, qui nullo jure occidit. Itaque qui latronem occidit, non tenetur, utique si aliter periculum effugere

2. To kill wrongfully is to kill without any right; consequently, a person who kills a robber is not liable to this action, that is, if he could not

TIT. III. DE LEGE AQUILIA.

Damni injuriæ actio constituitur per legem Aquiliam. Cujus primo capite cautum est, ut si quis hominem alienum alienamve quadrupedem, quæ pecudum numero sit, injuria occiderit, quanti ea res in eo anno plurimi fuit, tantum domino dare damnetur.

The action damni injuriæ is established by the lex Aquilia, of which the first head provides, that if any one shall have wrongfully killed a slave, or a four-footed beast, being one of those reckoned among cattle, belonging to another, he shall be condemned to pay the owner the greatest value which the thing has possessed at any time within a year previously.

GAI. iii. 210 ; D. ix. 2. 2. pr.

The lex Aquilia was, as Ulpian informs us (D. ix. 2. 1), a plebiscitum made on the proposition of the tribune Aquilius. It made an alteration in all the previous laws, including those of the Twelve Tables, which had treated of damage wrongfully done (de damno injuria). Theophilus says it was passed at the time of the secession of the plebs, meaning, probably, that to the Janiculum, in the year 468 A.U.C. (Paraphrase on paragr. 15.)

A fragment of Gaius in the Digest (D. ix. 2. 2. pr.) contains the terms of this first head of the lex Aquilia: 'Qui servum servamve alienum alienamve quadrupedem vel pecudem injuria occiderit, quanti id in eo anno plurimi fuit, tantum res dare domino damnas esto.'

1. Quod autem non præcise de quadrupede, sed de ea tantum, quæ pecudum numero est, cavetur, eo pertinet, ut neque de feris bestiis neque de canibus cautum esse intellegamus, sed de his tantum, quæ proprie pasci dicuntur, quales sunt equi, muli, asini, boves, oves, capræ. De suis quoque idem placuit: nam et sues pecorum appellatione continentur, quia et hi gregatim pascuntur: sic denique et Homerus in Odyssea ait, sicut Ælius Marcius in suis institutionibus refert:

Δῆεις τὸν γε σύεσσι παρήμενον· αἱ
δὲ νέμονται
Πὰρ Κόρακος πέτρῃ, ἐπὶ τε κρήνῃ
'Ἀρεθοῦσῃ.

1. As the law does not speak generally of four-footed beasts, but only of those which are reckoned among cattle, we may consider its provisions as not applying to wild animals or dogs, but only to animals which may be properly said to graze, as horses, mules, asses, sheep, oxen, goats. It has been held to apply also to swine, for they are included in the term cattle, seeing that they feed in herds. Thus Homer says, as Ælius Marcius quotes in his Institutes:

'You will find him seated by his swine, and they are feeding by the rock of Corax, near the spring Arethusa.'

D. ix. 2. 2. 2; D. xxxii. 65. 4.

The passage is from Od. xiii. 407.

2. Injuria autem occidere intellegitur, qui nullo jure occidit. Itaque qui latronem occidit, non tenetur, utique si aliter periculum effugere

2. To kill wrongfully is to kill without any right; consequently, a person who kills a robber is not liable to this action, that is, if he could not non potest.

otherwise avoid the danger with which he was threatened.

D. ix. 2. 5. pr. and 1.

It was not necessary to consider the intent with which the damage was done. Was it done 'nullo jure'? if so, the lex Aquilia applied.

3. Ac ne is quidem hac lege tenetur, qui casu occidit, si modo culpa ejus nulla invenitur: nam alioquin non minus quam ex dolo ex culpa quisque hac lege tenetur.

3. Nor is a person made liable by this law, who has killed by accident, provided there is no fault on his part. for this law punishes fault as well as wilful wrongdoing.

GAI. iii. 202, 211.

4. Itaque si quis, dum jaculis ludit vel exercitatur, transeuntem servum tuum trajecerit, distinguitur. Nam si id a milite quidem in Campo locove, ubi solitum est exercitari, admissum est, nulla culpa ejus intellegitur: si alius tale quid admisit, culpæ reus est. Idem juris est de milite, si is in alio loco, quam qui exercitandis militibus destinatus est, id admisit.

4. Consequently, if any one playing or practising with a javelin, pierces with it your slave as he goes by, there is a distinction made. If the accident is caused by a soldier, while practising in the Campus Martius, or other place appropriated to military exercises, there is no fault on his part; but any one else besides a soldier causing a similar accident is chargeable with a fault, and the soldier himself would be in fault, if he inflicted such an injury in any other place than one appropriated to military exercises.

D. ix. 2. 9. 4.

5. Item si putator ex arbore dejecto ramo servum tuum transeuntem occiderit, si prope viam publicam aut vicinalem id factum est neque præclamavit, ut casus evitari possit, culpæ reus est: si præclamavit, neque ille curavit cavere, extra culpam est putator. Æque extra culpam esse intellegitur, si seorsum a via forte vel in medio fundo cædebat, licet non præclamavit, quia eo loco nulli extraneo jus fuerat versandi.

5. If, again, any one, in pruning a tree, by letting a bough fall, kills your slave who is passing, and this takes place beside a public way or an occupation road, and he has not cried out to make persons take care, he is in fault; but if he called out, and the passer-by would not take care, he is not to blame. He is also equally free from blame if he was cutting far from any public way, or in the middle of a field, even though he has not called out, for by such a place no stranger has a right to pass.

D. ix. 2. 31.

6. Præterea si medicus, qui servum tuum secuit, dereliquerit curationem atque ob id mortuus fuerit servus, culpæ reus est.

6. So, again, a physician who has performed an operation on your slave, and then neglected to attend to his cure, so that the slave dies, is guilty of a fault.

D. ix. 2. 8. pr.

7. Imperitia quoque culpæ adnumeratur, veluti si medicus ideo servum tuum occiderit, quod eum male secuerit aut perperam ei medicamentum dederit.

7. Unskilfulness is also reckoned as a fault, as if a physician kills your slave by unskilfully performing an operation on him, or by giving him wrong medicines.

D. ix. 2. 7. 8; D. ix. 2. 8. pr.; D. l. 17. 132.

non potest.

otherwise avoid the danger with which he was threatened.

D. ix. 2. 5. pr. and 1.

It was not necessary to consider the intent with which the damage was done. Was it done 'nullo jure'? if so, the lex Aquilia applied.

3. Ac ne is quidem hac lege tenetur, qui casu occidit, si modo culpa ejus nulla invenitur: nam alioquin non minus quam ex dolo ex culpa quisque hac lege tenetur.

3. Nor is a person made liable by this law, who has killed by accident, provided there is no fault on his part. for this law punishes fault as well as wilful wrongdoing.

GAL. iii. 202, 211.

4. Itaque si quis, dum jaculis ludit vel exercitatur, transeuntem servum tuum trajecerit, distinguitur. Nam si id a milite quidem in Campo locove, ubi solitum est exercitari, admissum est, nulla culpa ejus intellegitur: si alius tale quid admisit, culpæ reus est. Idem juris est de milite, si is in alio loco, quam qui exercitandis militibus destinatus est, id admisit.

4. Consequently, if any one playing or practising with a javelin, pierces with it your slave as he goes by, there is a distinction made. If the accident is caused by a soldier, while practising in the Campus Martius, or other place appropriated to military exercises, there is no fault on his part; but any one else besides a soldier causing a similar accident is chargeable with a fault, and the soldier himself would be in fault, if he inflicted such an injury in any other place than one appropriated to military exercises.

D. ix. 2. 9. 4.

5. Item si putator ex arbore dejecto ramo servum tuum transeuntem occiderit, si prope viam publicam aut vicinalem id factum est neque præclamavit, ut casus evitari possit, culpæ reus est: si præclamavit, neque ille curavit cavere, extra culpam est putator. Æque extra culpam esse intellegitur, si seorsum a via forte vel in medio fundo cædebat, licet non præclamavit, quia eo loco nulli extraneo jus fuerat versandi.

5. If, again, any one, in pruning a tree, by letting a bough fall, kills your slave who is passing, and this takes place beside a public way or an occupation road, and he has not cried out to make persons take care, he is in fault; but if he called out, and the passer-by would not take care, he is not to blame. He is also equally free from blame if he was cutting far from any public way, or in the middle of a field, even though he has not called out, for by such a place no stranger has a right to pass.

D. ix. 2. 31.

6. Præterea si medicus, qui servum tuum secuit, dereliquerit curationem atque ob id mortuus fuerit servus, culpæ reus est.

6. So, again, a physician who has performed an operation on your slave, and then neglected to attend to his cure, so that the slave dies, is guilty of a fault.

D. ix. 2. 8. pr.

7. Imperitia quoque culpæ adnumeratur, veluti si medicus ideo servum tuum occiderit, quod eum male secuerit aut perperam ei medicamentum dederit.

7. Unskilfulness is also reckoned as a fault, as if a physician kills your slave by unskilfully performing an operation on him, or by giving him wrong medicines.

D. ix. 2. 7. 8; D. ix. 2. 8. pr.; D. l. 17. 132.

8. Impetu quoque mularum, quas nullo propter imperitiam retinere non potuerit, si servus tuus oppressus fuerit, culpæ reus est nullo. Sed et si propter infirmitatem retinere eas non potuerit, cum alius firmior retinere potuisset, æque culpæ tenetur. Eadem placuerunt de eo quoque, qui, cum equo veheretur, impetum ejus aut propter infirmitatem aut propter imperitiam suam retinere non potuerit.

D. ix. 2. 8. 1.

9. His autem verbis legis ' quanti id in eo anno plurimi fuerit ' illa sententia exprimitur, ut si quis hominem tuum, qui hodie claudus aut luscus aut mancus erit, occiderit, qui in eo anno integer aut pretiosus fuerit, non tanti teneatur, quanti is hodie erit, sed quanti in eo anno plurimi fuerit. Qua ratione creditum est, penalem esse hujus legis actionem, quia non solum tanti quisque obligatur, quantum damni dederit, sed aliquando longe pluris: ideoque constat, in heredem eam actionem non transire, quæ transitura fuisset, si ultra damnum numquam lis æstimaretur.

GAI. iii. 214; D. ix. 2. 23. 3, 8.

10. Illud non ex verbis legis, sed ex interpretatione placuit, non solum perempti corporis æstimationem habendam esse secundum ea, quæ diximus, sed eo amplius quidquid præterea, perempto eo corpore, damni vobis adlatum fuerit, veluti si servum tuum heredem ab aliquo institutum ante quis occiderit, quam is jussu tuo adiret: nam hereditatis quoque amissæ rationem esse habendam constat. Item si ex pari mularum unam vel ex quadriga equorum unum occiderit, vel ex comædis unus servus fuerit occisus: non solum occisi fit æstimatio, sed eo amplius id quoque computatur, quanto depretiati sunt, qui supersunt.

GAI. iii. 212; D. ix. 2. 22. 1.

11. Liberum est autem ei, cujus servus fuerit occisus, et privato judicio legis Aquiliæ damnum persequi et capitalis criminis eum reum facere.

GAI. iii. 213.

8. So, too, if a muleteer, through his want of skill, cannot manage his mules, and runs over your slave, he is guilty of a fault. As, also, he would be, if he could not hold them in on account of his weakness, provided that a stronger man could have held them in. The same decision applies to a person on horseback who is unable to manage his horse, owing to physical weakness or want of skill.

9. The words of the law above quoted, ' the greatest value the thing has possessed at any time within a year previously,' mean that if your slave is killed, being at the time of his death lame, one-eyed, or maimed, but having been within a year quite sound and of considerable value, the person who kills him is bound to pay, not his actual value, but the greatest value he ever possessed within the year. Hence, this action may be said to be penal, as a person is bound under it not only for the damage he has done, but sometimes for much more; and, therefore, the action does not pass against his heir, as it would do if the condemnation did not exceed the amount of the actual damage.

10. It has been decided, not by virtue of the actual wording of the law, but by interpretation, that not only is the value of the thing perishing to be estimated as we have said, but also the loss which in any way we incur by its perishing; as, for instance, if your slave having been instituted heir by some one is killed before he enters at your command on the inheritance, the loss of the inheritance should be taken account of. So, too, if one of a pair of mules, or of a set of four horses, or one slave of a band of comedians, is killed, account is to be taken not only of the value of the thing killed, but also of the diminished value of what remains.

11. The master of a slave who is killed may bring a private action for the damages given by the lex Aquilia, and also bring a capital charge against the murderer.

8. Impetu quoque mularum, quas mulio propter imperitiam retinere non potuerit, si servus tuus oppressus fuerit, culpæ reus est mulio. Sed et si propter infirmitatem retinere eas non potuerit, cum alius firmior retinere potuisset, æque culpæ tenetur. Eadem placuerunt de eo quoque, qui, cum equo veheretur, impetum ejus aut propter infirmitatem aut propter imperitiam suam retinere non potuerit.

8. So, too, if a muleteer, through his want of skill, cannot manage his mules, and runs over your slave, he is guilty of a fault. As, also, he would be, if he could not hold them in on account of his weakness, provided that a stronger man could have held them in. The same decision applies to a person on horseback who is unable to manage his horse, owing to physical weakness or want of skill.

D. ix. 2. 8. 1.

9. His autem verbis legis ' quanti id in eo anno plurimi fuerit ' illa sententia exprimitur, ut si quis hominem tuum, qui hodie claudus aut luscus aut mancus erit, occiderit, qui in eo anno integer aut pretiosus fuerit, non tanti teneatur, quanti is hodie erit, sed quanti in eo anno plurimi fuerit. Quæ ratione creditum est, penalem esse hujus legis actionem, quia non solum tanti quisque obligatur, quantum damni dederit, sed aliquando longe pluris : ideoque constat, in heredem eam actionem non transire, quæ transitura fuisset, si ultra damnum nunquam lis æstimaretur.

9. The words of the law above quoted, ' the greatest value the thing has possessed at any time within a year previously,' mean that if your slave is killed, being at the time of his death lame, one-eyed, or maimed, but having been within a year quite sound and of considerable value, the person who kills him is bound to pay, not his actual value, but the greatest value he ever possessed within the year. Hence, this action may be said to be penal, as a person is bound under it not only for the damage he has done, but sometimes for much more ; and, therefore, the action does not pass against his heir, as it would do if the condemnation did not exceed the amount of the actual damage.

GAI. iii. 214 ; D. ix. 2. 23. 3, 8.

10. Illud non ex verbis legis, sed ex interpretatione placuit, non solum perempti corporis æstimationem habendam esse secundum eam, quæ diximus, sed eo amplius quidquid præterea, perempto eo corpore, damni vobis adlatum fuerit, veluti si servum tuum heredem ab aliquo institutum ante quis occiderit, quam is jussu tuo adiret : nam hereditatis quoque amissæ rationem esse habendam constat. Item si ex pari mularum unam vel ex quadriga equorum unum occiderit, vel ex comædis unus servus fuerit occisus : non solum occisi fit æstimatio, sed eo amplius id quoque computatur, quanto depretiati sunt, qui supersunt.

10. It has been decided, not by virtue of the actual wording of the law, but by interpretation, that not only is the value of the thing perishing to be estimated as we have said, but also the loss which in any way we incur by its perishing ; as, for instance, if your slave having been instituted heir by some one is killed before he enters at your command on the inheritance, the loss of the inheritance should be taken account of. So, too, if one of a pair of mules, or of a set of four horses, or one slave of a band of comedians, is killed, account is to be taken not only of the value of the thing killed, but also of the diminished value of what remains.

GAI. iii. 212 ; D. ix. 2. 22. 1.

11. Liberum est autem ei, cujus servus fuerit occisus, et privato judicio legis Aquiliæ damnum persequi et capitalis criminis eum reum facere.

11. The master of a slave who is killed may bring a private action for the damages given by the lex Aquilia, and also bring a capital charge against the murderer.

GAI. iii. 213.

A crimen capitale was one which affected the caput of the condemned. The lex Cornelia (D. ix. 2. 23. 9; see also Title 18. 5 of this Book) gave the master the power to bring a criminal accusation against the murderer. The Code (iii. 35. 3) contains a rescript of the Emperor Gordian, stating it as undoubted law that a criminal accusation did not prevent a master also bringing a private action under the lex Aquilia. The crimen capitale could be brought only in cases of murder, not in cases of homicide.

12. Caput secundum legis Aquiliae in usu non est.

12. The second head of the lex Aquilia is not now in use.

GAL. iii. 215; D. ix. 2. 27. 4.

We learn from Gaius (GAL. iii. 215) that the second head of the lex Aquilia gave an action for the full value of the injury sustained to a stipulator, whose claim was extinguished by an adstipulator releasing the debtor by acceptance. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 1.) The stipulator might also have brought an actio mandati against the adstipulator, if he preferred doing so; but, as we see from Title 16 of this Book (paragr. 1), proceeding under the lex Aquilia gave the plaintiff the advantage of having the amount he recovered doubled if the defendant denied his liability. (GAL. iii. 216.)

13. Capite tertio de omni cetero damno cavetur. Itaque si quis servum vel eam quadrupedem, quae pecudum numero est, vulneraverit sive eam quadrupedem, quae pecudum numero non est, veluti canem aut feram bestiam, vulneraverit aut occiderit, hoc capite actio constituitur. In ceteris quoque omnibus animalibus, item in omnibus rebus, quae anima carent, damnum injuria datum hac parte vindicatur. Si quid enim ustum aut ruptum aut fractum fuerit, actio ex hoc capite constituitur: quamquam potnerit sola ruptum appellatio in omnes istas causas sufficere: ruptum enim intellegitur quoquo modo corruptum. Unde non solum usta aut fracta, sed etiam scissa et collisa et effusa et quoquo modo perempta atque deteriora facta hoc verbo continentur: denique responsum est, si quis in alienum vinum aut oleum id immiserit, quo naturalis bonitas vini vel olei corrumpetur, ex hac parte legis enim teneri.

13. The third head provides for every kind of damage; and therefore, if a slave, or a four-footed beast of those reckoned among cattle, is wounded, or a four-footed beast of those not reckoned among cattle, as a dog or wild beast, is wounded, or killed, an action may be brought under the third head. Compensation may also be obtained under it for all wrongful injury to animals or inanimate things, and, in fact, for anything burnt, broken, or fractured, although the word broken (ruptum) would have sufficed for all these cases; for a thing is ruptum which is in any way spoilt (corruptum), so that not only things burnt or fractured, but also things cut, bruised, spilt, or in any way destroyed or deteriorated, may be said to be rupta. It has also been decided, that any one who mixes anything with the oil or wine of another, so as to spoil the goodness of the wine or oil, is liable under this head of the lex Aquilia.

GAL. iii. 217; D. ix. 2. 27. 13, 15.

The terms of this third head of the Aquilian law are given by Ulpian (D. ix. 2. 27. 5): 'Ceterarum rerum, praeter hominem

A crimen capitale was one which affected the caput of the condemned. The lex Cornelia (D. ix. 2. 23. 9; see also Title 18. 5 of this Book) gave the master the power to bring a criminal accusation against the murderer. The Code (iii. 35. 3) contains a rescript of the Emperor Gordian, stating it as undoubted law that a criminal accusation did not prevent a master also bringing a private action under the lex Aquilia. The crimen capitale could be brought only in cases of murder, not in cases of homicide.

12. Caput secundum legis Aquiliæ in usu non est.

12. The second head of the lex Aquilia is not now in use.

GAL. iii. 215; D. ix. 2. 27. 4.

We learn from Gaius (GAL. iii. 215) that the second head of the lex Aquilia gave an action for the full value of the injury sustained to a stipulator, whose claim was extinguished by an adstipulator releasing the debtor by acceptance. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 1.) The stipulator might also have brought an actio mandati against the adstipulator, if he preferred doing so; but, as we see from Title 16 of this Book (paragr. 1), proceeding under the lex Aquilia gave the plaintiff the advantage of having the amount he recovered doubled if the defendant denied his liability. (GAL. iii. 216.)

13. Capite tertio de omni cetero damno cavetur. Itaque si quis servum vel eam quadrupedem, quæ pecudum numero est, vulneraverit sive eam quadrupedem, quæ pecudum numero non est, veluti canem aut feram bestiam, vulneraverit aut occiderit, hoc capite actio constituitur. In ceteris quoque omnibus animalibus, item in omnibus rebus, quæ anima carent, damnum injuria datum hac parte vindicatur. Si quid enim ustum aut ruptum aut fractum fuerit, actio ex hoc capite constituitur: quamquam potuerit sola ruptum appellari in omnes istas causas sufficere: ruptum enim intelligitur quoquo modo corruptum. Unde non solum usta aut fracta, sed etiam scissa et collisa et effusa et quoquo modo perempta atque deteriora facta hoc verbo continentur: denique responsum est, si quis in alienum vinum aut oleum id immiserit, quo naturalis bonitas vini vel olei corrumpetur, ex hac parte legis eum teneri.

13. The third head provides for every kind of damage; and therefore, if a slave, or a four-footed beast of those reckoned among cattle, is wounded, or a four-footed beast of those not reckoned among cattle, as a dog or wild beast, is wounded, or killed, an action may be brought under the third head. Compensation may also be obtained under it for all wrongful injury to animals or inanimate things, and, in fact, for anything burnt, broken, or fractured, although the word broken (ruptum) would have sufficed for all these cases; for a thing is ruptum which is in any way spoilt (corruptum), so that not only things burnt or fractured, but also things cut, bruised, spilt, or in any way destroyed or deteriorated, may be said to be rupta. It has also been decided, that any one who mixes anything with the oil or wine of another, so as to spoil the goodness of the wine or oil, is liable under this head of the lex Aquilia.

GAL. iii. 217; D. ix. 2. 27. 13, 15.

The terms of this third head of the Aquilian law are given by Ulpian (D. ix. 2. 27. 5): 'Ceterarum rerum, præter hominem et pecudem occisos, si quis alteri damnum faxit, quod usserit, fregerit, ruperit injuria, quanti ea res erit in diebus triginta proximis, tantum res domino dare damnas esto.

14. Illud palam est, sicut ex primo capite ita demum quisque tenetur, si dolo aut culpa ejus homo aut quadrupes occisos occisave fuerit, ita ex hoc capite ex dolo aut culpa de cetero damno quemque teneri. Hoc tamen capite non quanti in eo anno, sed quanti in diebus triginta proximis res fuerit, obligatur is, qui damnum dederit.

14. It is evident that, as a person is liable under the first head, if by wilful injury or by his fault he kills a slave or a four-footed beast, so, by this head, a person is liable for every other damage, if there is wrongful injury or fault in what he does. But under this head, the offender is bound to pay the greatest value the thing has possessed, not within the year next preceding, but the thirty days next preceding.

GAL. iii. 218; D. ix. 2. 30. 3.

15. Ac ne 'plurimi' quidem verbum adjicitur; sed Sabino recte placuit, perinde habendam estimationem, ac si etiam hac parte 'plurimi' verbum adjectum fuisset: nam plebem Romanam, quæ Aquilio tribuno rogante hanc legem tulit, contentam fuisse, quod prima parte eo verbo usa est.

15. Even the word plurimi, i.e. of the greatest value, is not expressed in this case. But Sabinus was rightly of opinion, that the estimation ought to be made as if this word was in the law, since it must have been that the plebeians, who were the authors of this law on the motion of the tribune Aquilius, thought it sufficient to have used the word in the first head of the law.

GAL. iii. 218; D. ix. 2. 29. 8; D. ix. 2. 1. 1.

16. Ceterum placuit, ita demum ex hac lege actionem esse, si quis [præcipue] corpore suo damnum dederit. Ideoque in eum, qui alio modo damnum dederit, utiles actiones dari solent: veluti si quis hominem alienum aut pecus ita incluserit, ut fame necaretur, aut jumentum tam vehementer egerit, ut rumperetur, aut pecus in tantum exagitaverit, ut præcipitaretur, aut si quis alieno servo persuaserit, ut in arborem ascenderet vel in puteum descenderet, et is ascendendo vel descendendo aut mortuus fuerit aut aliqua parte corporis læsus erit, utilis in eum actio datur. Sed si quis alienum servum de ponte aut ripa in flumen dejecerit et is suffocatus fuerit, eo, quod projecit corpore suo, damnum dedisse non difficiliter intellegi poterit ideoque ipsa lege Aquilia tenetur. Sed si non corpore damnum fuerit datum neque corpus læsum fuerit, sed alio modo damnum alicui contigit, cum non sufficit neque directa neque utilis Aquilia, placuit eum, qui obnoxius fuerit, in factum actione teneri: veluti si quis, misericordia

16. But the direct action under this law can only be brought if any one has, with his own body, done damage, and consequently utiles actiones are given against the person who does damage in any other way. For instance, a utilis actio is given against one who shuts up a slave or a beast, so as to produce death by hunger; who drives a beast so fast as to seriously injure it, or scares cattle so that they rush over a precipice, or persuades another man's slave to climb a tree, or go down into a well, and the slave in climbing or descending is killed or maimed. But if any one has flung the slave of another from a bridge or a bank into a river, and the slave is drowned, then, as he has actually flung him down, there can be no difficulty in deciding that he has caused the damage with his own body, and consequently he is directly liable under the lex Aquilia. But if no damage has been done by the body of the wrongdoer, and the body of the object affected has not been injured, but damage has been done to the person or thing in some other way, then, since the actio directa and the actio utilis are

et pecudem occisos, si quis alteri damnum faxit, quod usserit, fregerit, ruperit injuria, quanti ea res erit in diebus triginta proximis, tantum res domino dare damnas esto.

14. Illud palam est, sicut ex primo capite ita demum quisque tenetur, si dolo aut culpa ejus homo aut quadrupes occisos occisave fuerit, ita ex hoc capite ex dolo aut culpa de cetero damno quemque teneri. Hoc tamen capite non quanti in eo anno, sed quanti in diebus triginta proximis res fuerit, obligatur is, qui damnum dederit.

14. It is evident that, as a person is liable under the first head, if by wilful injury or by his fault he kills a slave or a four-footed beast, so, by this head, a person is liable for every other damage, if there is wrongful injury or fault in what he does. But under this head, the offender is bound to pay the greatest value the thing has possessed, not within the year next preceding, but the thirty days next preceding.

GAL. iii. 218; D. ix. 2. 30. 3.

15. Ac ne 'plurimi' quidem verbum adjicitur; sed Sabino recte placuit, perinde habendam estimationem, ac si etiam hac parte 'plurimi' verbum adjectum fuisset: nam plebem Romanam, quæ Aquilio tribuno rogante hanc legem tulit, contentam fuisse, quod prima parte eo verbo usa est.

15. Even the word plurimi, i.e. of the greatest value, is not expressed in this case. But Sabinus was rightly of opinion, that the estimation ought to be made as if this word was in the law, since it must have been that the plebeians, who were the authors of this law on the motion of the tribune Aquilius, thought it sufficient to have used the word in the first head of the law.

GAL. iii. 218; D. ix. 2. 29. 8; D. ix. 2. 1. 1.

16. Ceterum placuit, ita demum ex hac lege actionem esse, si quis [præcipue] corpore suo damnum dederit. Ideoque in eum, qui alio modo damnum dederit, utiles actiones dari solent: veluti si quis hominem alienum aut pecus ita incluserit, ut fame necaretur, aut jumentum tam vehementer egerit, ut rumperetur, aut pecus in tantum exagitaverit, ut præcipitaretur, aut si quis alieno servo persuaserit, ut in arborem ascenderet vel in puteum descenderet, et is ascendendo vel descendendo aut mortuus fuerit aut aliqua parte corporis læsus erit, utilis in eum actio datur. Sed si quis alienum servum de ponte aut ripa in flumen dejecerit et is suffocatus fuerit, eo, quod projecit corpore suo, damnum dedisse non difficiliter intellegi poterit ideoque ipsa lege Aquilia tenetur. Sed si non corpore damnum fuerit datum neque corpus læsum fuerit, sed alio modo damnum alicui contigit, cum non sufficit neque directa neque utilis Aquilia, placuit eum, qui obnoxius fuerit, in factum actione teneri: veluti si quis, misericordia

16. But the direct action under this law can only be brought if any one has, with his own body, done damage, and consequently utiles actiones are given against the person who does damage in any other way. For instance, a utilis actio is given against one who shuts up a slave or a beast, so as to produce death by hunger; who drives a beast so fast as to seriously injure it, or scares cattle so that they rush over a precipice, or persuades another man's slave to climb a tree, or go down into a well, and the slave in climbing or descending is killed or maimed. But if any one has flung the slave of another from a bridge or a bank into a river, and the slave is drowned, then, as he has actually flung him down, there can be no difficulty in deciding that he has caused the damage with his own body, and consequently he is directly liable under the lex Aquilia. But if no damage has been done by the body of the wrongdoer, and the body of the object affected has not been injured, but damage has been done to the person or thing in some other way, then, since the actio directa and the actio utilis are both inapplicable, it has been decided that an actio in factum shall lie against the wrongdoer; for instance, if any one through compassion has loosed the fetters of a slave, to enable him to escape.

ductus, alienum servum compeditum solverit, ut fugeret.

GAL. iii. 219; D. ix. 2. 33. 1; D. iv. 3. 7. 7.

If the injury was done, to use the language of the jurists, corpore corpori, that is, with direct bodily force to the body of a slave or beast, the actio (legis) Aquiliæ had place. If it was done corpore, but indirectly and not corpore, the actio utilis Aquiliæ had place. If it was done neither to the body, nor yet with direct bodily force, the actio must be brought in factum, that is on the particular circumstances of the case.

Si quis præcipue. Huschke suggests that præcipue has crept into the text from the gloss of a commentator who meant to suggest that the injury might be done with an instrument held in the hand, and so forming part of the body, of the wrongdoer.

The directa actio Aquiliæ could only be brought by the owner: the utilis might be brought by the possessor, usufructuary, and others having an interest less than that of ownership. (D. ix. 2. 11. 6, 10.)

As the action under the lex Aquilia was penal, if the damage was caused by more persons than one, the whole sum could be recovered separately against each offender. (D. ix. 2. 11. 2.)

If the defendant denied his liability, the penalty under the lex Aquilia was doubled, adversus inficiantem in duplum actio est. (D. ix. 2. 2. 1.)

It might very often happen that the person injured could also bring an action arising from a contract against the doer of the injury, as, for instance, an actio pro socio, mandati, depositi, if the person who did the injury was a partner, a mandatary, or depositary of the person to whom the injury was done. In such a case he could either bring an action on the contract, or proceed under the lex Aquilia. He could not do both; but if he brought the action on the contract, and then found that if he had proceeded under the lex Aquilia he would have recovered a larger sum, he was allowed to bring an action under the lex Aquilia to recover the surplus. (D. ix. 2. 7. 8; D. xlv. 7. 34. 2.)

The subject of damnum is hardly noticed in the Institutes, except in connection with the lex Aquilia. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 18. 2.) By damnum is meant the diminution or deterioration of a man's property, and it is treated of in the Digest according as it is factum, that is already done, or infectum, that is apprehended, as if an adjoining house seemed likely to fall. (D. xxxix. 2.) Damnum factum, more usually termed simply damnum, might arise from a mere accident, or from the free will of another. If it arose in the latter way, it might have arisen in the exercise of a right enjoyed by the person causing it, and then no reparation had to be made for both inapplicable, it has been decided that an actio in factum shall lie against the wrongdoer; for instance, if any one through compassion has loosed the fetters of a slave, to enable him to escape.

ductus, alienum servum compeditum solverit, ut fugeret.

GAI. iii. 219; D. ix. 2. 33. 1; D. iv. 3. 7. 7.

If the injury was done, to use the language of the jurists, corpore corpori, that is, with direct bodily force to the body of a slave or beast, the actio (legis) Aquiliæ had place. If it was done corpore, but indirectly and not corpore, the actio utilis Aquiliæ had place. If it was done neither to the body, nor yet with direct bodily force, the actio must be brought in factum, that is on the particular circumstances of the case.

Si quis præcipue. Huschke suggests that præcipue has crept into the text from the gloss of a commentator who meant to suggest that the injury might be done with an instrument held in the hand, and so forming part of the body, of the wrongdoer.

The directa actio Aquiliæ could only be brought by the owner: the utilis might be brought by the possessor, usufructuary, and others having an interest less than that of ownership. (D. ix. 2. 11. 6, 10.)

As the action under the lex Aquilia was penal, if the damage was caused by more persons than one, the whole sum could be recovered separately against each offender. (D. ix. 2. 11. 2.)

If the defendant denied his liability, the penalty under the lex Aquilia was doubled, adversus inficiantem in duplum actio est. (D. ix. 2. 2. 1.)

It might very often happen that the person injured could also bring an action arising from a contract against the doer of the injury, as, for instance, an actio pro socio, mandati, depositi, if the person who did the injury was a partner, a mandatary, or depositary of the person to whom the injury was done. In such a case he could either bring an action on the contract, or proceed under the lex Aquilia. He could not do both; but if he brought the action on the contract, and then found that if he had proceeded under the lex Aquilia he would have recovered a larger sum, he was allowed to bring an action under the lex Aquilia to recover the surplus. (D. ix. 2. 7. 8; D. xlv. 7. 34. 2.)

The subject of damnum is hardly noticed in the Institutes, except in connection with the lex Aquilia. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 18. 2.) By damnum is meant the diminution or deterioration of a man's property, and it is treated of in the Digest according as it is factum, that is already done, or infectum, that is apprehended, as if an adjoining house seemed likely to fall. (D. xxxix. 2.) Damnum factum, more usually termed simply damnum, might arise from a mere accident, or from the free will of another. If it arose in the latter way, it might have arisen in the exercise of a right enjoyed by the person causing it, and then no reparation had to be made for causing it, non videtur vim facere qui jure suo utitur (D. l. 17. 155); or it might have been done wrongfully, damnum injuria datum, and then the person injured was entitled to compensation according to the rates provided by the lex Aquilia, if the damage came within the scope of the law; if it did not, then an actio in factum was given (D. ix. 2. 33. 1), and compensation was made at rates differing according to the degree of wrong. If there had been dolus or culpa lata, the compensation was regulated by the value peculiar to the person injured: if the degree of culpa had been less, the common value was the measure of the compensation. In cases of damnum infectum, the owner of the property threatened could call on the owner of the property from which danger was apprehended to give security against any loss which might thus arise. (D. xxxix. 2. 7. pr.)

TIT. IV. DE INJURIIS.

Generaliter injuria dicitur omne, quod non jure fit: specialiter alias contumelia, quæ a contemnendo dicta est, quam Græci ὕβρις appellant, alias culpa, quam Græci ἀδικημα dicunt, sicut in lege Aquilia damnum injuria accipitur, alias iniquitas et injustitia, quam Græci ἀδικία vocant. Cum enim prætor vel judex non jure contra quem pronuntiat, injuriam accepisse dicitur.

Injuria, in its general sense, signifies every action contrary to law: in a special sense, it means, sometimes, the same as contumelia (insult), which is derived from contemnere, and is in Greek ὕβρις; sometimes the same as culpa (fault), in Greek ἀδικημα, as in the lex Aquilia, which speaks of damage done injuria; sometimes it has the sense of iniquity, injustice, or in Greek ἀδικία; for a person against whom the prætor or judge pronounces an unjust sentence is said to have received an injuria.

D. xlvii. 10. 1. pr.

Injuria, then, is used in three special senses—1, a wrongful act, an act done nullo jure; 2, the fault committed by a judge who gives judgment not according to jus; 3, an outrage or affront. It is of injuria in this last sense that the present title treats.

1. Injuria autem committitur non solum, cum quis pugno puta aut fustibus cæsus vel etiam verberatus erit, sed etiam si cui convicium factum fuerit, sive ejus bona quasi debitoris possessa fuerint ab eo, qui intellegebat nihil eum sibi debere, vel si quis ad infamiam alicujus libellum aut carmen scripserit, composuerit, ediderit dolove malo fecerit, quo quid eorum fieret, sive quis matremfamilias aut prætextatum prætextatamve adsectatus fuerit, sive ejus pudicitia attentata esse dicetur: et denique aliis pluribus

1. An injury is committed not only when any one is wounded or beaten, as, for example, with the fist or a club, but also when public insult is offered to any one; as when possession is taken of the goods of any one on the pretence that he is a debtor to the wrongdoer, who knows he has no claim on him: or when any one has written, composed, and published a book or defamatory verses against another, or has maliciously contrived that any such thing should be done; or when any one has followed after an honest woman, or a young boy or girl, or has attempted causing it, non videtur vim facere qui jure suo utitur (D. l. 17. 155); or it might have been done wrongfully, damnum injuria datum, and then the person injured was entitled to compensation according to the rates provided by the lex Aquilia, if the damage came within the scope of the law; if it did not, then an actio in factum was given (D. ix. 2. 33. 1), and compensation was made at rates differing according to the degree of wrong. If there had been dolus or culpa lata, the compensation was regulated by the value peculiar to the person injured: if the degree of culpa had been less, the common value was the measure of the compensation. In cases of damnum infectum, the owner of the property threatened could call on the owner of the property from which danger was apprehended to give security against any loss which might thus arise. (D. xxxix. 2. 7. pr.)

TIT. IV. DE INJURIIS.

Generaliter injuria dicitur omne, quod non jure fit: specialiter alias contumelia, quæ a contemnendo dicta est, quam Græci ὕβρις appellant, alias culpa, quam Græci ἀδίκημα dicunt, sicut in lege Aquilia damnum injuria accipitur, alias iniquitas et injustitia, quam Græci ἀδικία vocant. Cum enim prætor vel judex non jure contra quem pronuntiat, injuriam accepisse dicitur.

Injuria, in its general sense, signifies every action contrary to law: in a special sense, it means, sometimes, the same as contumelia (insult), which is derived from contemnere, and is in Greek ὕβρις; sometimes the same as culpa (fault), in Greek ἀδίκημα, as in the lex Aquilia, which speaks of damage done injuria; sometimes it has the sense of iniquity, injustice, or in Greek ἀδικία; for a person against whom the prætor or judge pronounces an unjust sentence is said to have received an injuria.

D. xlvii. 10. 1. pr.

Injuria, then, is used in three special senses—1, a wrongful act, an act done nullo jure; 2, the fault committed by a judge who gives judgment not according to jus; 3, an outrage or affront. It is of injuria in this last sense that the present title treats.

1. Injuria autem committitur non solum, cum quis pugno puta aut fustibus cæsus vel etiam verberatus erit, sed etiam si cui convicium factum fuerit, sive cujus bona quasi debitoris possessa fuerint ab eo, qui intellegebat nihil eum sibi debere, vel si quis ad infamiam alicujus libellum aut carmen scripserit, composuerit, ediderit dolove malo fecerit, quo quid eorum fieret, sive quis matremfamilias aut prætextatum prætextatamve adsectatus fuerit, sive cujus pudicitia attentata esse diceretur: et denique aliis pluribus

1. An injury is committed not only when any one is wounded or beaten, as, for example, with the fist or a club, but also when public insult is offered to any one; as when possession is taken of the goods of any one on the pretence that he is a debtor to the wrongdoer, who knows he has no claim on him; or when any one has written, composed, and published a book or defamatory verses against another, or has maliciously contrived that any such thing should be done; or when any one has followed after an honest woman, or a young boy or girl, or has attempted modis admitti injuriam manifestum est. the chastity of any one; and, in short, it is manifest that in many other ways injury is committed.

GAI. iii. 220.

Convicium. Ulpian gives (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 4) the following derivation of the word: 'Convicium autem dicitur vel a concitatione vel a conventu, hoc est a collatione vocum; quum enim in unum complures voces conferuntur, convicium appellatur, quasi convocium,' any proceeding which publicly insults or annoys another, as gathering a crowd round a man's house, or shouting out scandal respecting another to a mob.

Matremfamilias, i.e. every married woman of honest character.

Prætextatum, -am, i.e. still wearing the prætexta, which was put off at the age of puberty.

Adsectatus fuerit. Ulpian says (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 22), 'Adsectatur qui tacitus frequenter sequitur, assidua enim frequentia quasi præbet nonnullam infamiam.'

Pudicitia attentata. Paul says (D. xlvii. 10. 10), 'Attentari pudicitia dicitur cum id agitur, ut ex pudico impudicus fiat.'

2. Patitur autem quis injuriam non solum per semet ipsum, sed etiam per liberos suos, quos in potestate habet: item per uxorem suam, id enim magis prævaluit. Itaque si filiae alicujus, quæ Titio nupta est, injuriam feceris, non solum filiae nomine tecum injuriarum agi potest, sed etiam patris quoque et mariti nomine. Contra autem, si viro injuria facta sit, uxor injuriarum agere non potest: defendi enim uxores a viris, non viros ab uxoribus æquum est. Sed et socer nurus nomine, cujus vir in potestate est, injuriarum agere potest.

2. A man may receive an injury, not only in his own person, but in that of his children in his power, and also in that of his wife, according to the opinion that has prevailed. If, therefore, you injure a daughter in the power of her father, and married to Titius, the action for the injury may be brought, not only in the name of the daughter herself, but also in that of the father and in that of the husband. But, if a husband has sustained an injury, the wife cannot bring the actio injuriarum, for the husband is rightly the protector of the wife, not the wife of the husband. But the father-in-law may also bring this action in the name of his daughter-in-law, if her husband is in his power.

GAI. iii. 221; D. xlvii. 10. 2; D. xlvii. 10. 1. 3.

Each person injured could bring an action. Take, for instance, the case of a married woman. She, her husband, her own father, and her husband's, have each an action, supposing both she and her husband are in potestate. But a person in potestate, though he had an action, could not bring it himself, except in certain cases, as in the absence of the paterfamilias. The paterfamilias would bring the action, and could sue either in his son's name or his own. The amount recovered in the respective actions differed according to the dignity of the person bringing it. It might happen, for instance, that the son was of higher rank than the father. Cum utrique tam filio quam patri adq- facienda aestimatio est: cum possi modis admitti injuriam manifestum est. the chastity of any one; and, in short, it is manifest that in many other ways injury is committed.

GAL. iii. 220.

Convicium. Ulpian gives (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 4) the following derivation of the word: 'Convicium autem dicitur vel a concitatione vel a conventu, hoc est a collatione vocum; quum enim in unum complures voces conferuntur, convicium appellatur, quasi convocium,' any proceeding which publicly insults or annoys another, as gathering a crowd round a man's house, or shouting out scandal respecting another to a mob.

Matremfamilias, i.e. every married woman of honest character.

Prætextatum, -am, i.e. still wearing the prætexta, which was put off at the age of puberty.

Adsectatus fuerit. Ulpian says (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 22), 'Adsectatus qui tacitus frequenter sequitur, assidua enim frequentia quasi præbet nonnullam infamiam.'

Pudicitia attentata. Paul says (D. xlvii. 10. 10), 'Attentari pudicitia dicitur cum id agitur, ut ex pudico impudicus fiat.'

2. Patitur autem quis injuriam non solum per semet ipsum, sed etiam per liberos suos, quos in potestate habet: item per uxorem suam, id enim magis prævaluit. Itaque si filiæ alicujus, quæ Titio nupta est, injuriam feceris, non solum filiæ nomine tecum injuriarum agi potest, sed etiam patris quoque et mariti nomine. Contra autem, si viro injuria facta sit, uxor injuriarum agere non potest: defendi enim uxores a viris, non viros ab uxoribus æquum est. Sed et socer nurus nomine, cujus vir in potestate est, injuriarum agere potest.

2. A man may receive an injury, not only in his own person, but in that of his children in his power, and also in that of his wife, according to the opinion that has prevailed. If, therefore, you injure a daughter in the power of her father, and married to Titius, the action for the injury may be brought, not only in the name of the daughter herself, but also in that of the father and in that of the husband. But, if a husband has sustained an injury, the wife cannot bring the actio injuriarum, for the husband is rightly the protector of the wife, not the wife of the husband. But the father-in-law may also bring this action in the name of his daughter-in-law, if her husband is in his power.

GAL. iii. 221; D. xlvii. 10. 2; D. xlvii. 10. 1. 3.

Each person injured could bring an action. Take, for instance, the case of a married woman. She, her husband, her own father, and her husband's, have each an action, supposing both she and her husband are in potestate. But a person in potestate, though he had an action, could not bring it himself, except in certain cases, as in the absence of the paterfamilias. The paterfamilias would bring the action, and could sue either in his son's name or his own. The amount recovered in the respective actions differed according to the dignity of the person bringing it. It might happen, for instance, that the son was of higher rank than the father. Cum utrique tam filio quam patri ad idem actio daretur, utriusque facienda æstimatio est: cum possi quam patri injuria facta esse. (D. xlvii. 10. 30, 31.) Although the wife was in power of the father, yet her husband could always bring an action for injury done to her, grounded on his natural duty to protect her.

3. Servis autem ipsis quidem nulla injuria fieri intellegitur, sed domino per eos fieri videtur: non tamen iisdem modis, quibus etiam per liberos et uxores, sed ita cum quid atrocius commissum fuerit et quod aperte ad contumeliam domini respicit: veluti si quis alienum servum verberaverit, et in hunc casum actio proponitur. At si quis servo convicium fecerit vel pugno eum percusserit, nulla in eum actio domino competit.

3. An injury cannot, properly speaking, be done to a slave, but it is the master who, through the slave, is considered to be injured: not, however, in the same way as through a child or wife, but only when the act is of a character grave enough to make it a manifest insult to the master, as if a person has flogged the slave of another, in which case this action is given against him. But a master cannot bring an action against a person who has publicly insulted his slave, or struck him with his fist.

GAI. iii. 222.

Under the civil law the master could not bring an action for injury done to his slave, unless the injury was done with intent to hurt or annoy the master. But the prætor gave an action plenius jure, i.e. which could be brought as a matter of right, if the slave was beaten or tortured without the master's orders, and an action cognita causa, i.e. allowed if the circumstances of the case seemed, on inquiry, to furnish good ground for it, if the injury had been slighter. (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 34.) Regard was had, in making this inquiry, and in estimating the amount of damage, to the class of slaves to which the slave belonged. (See paragr. 7.) The slave himself could in no case bring an action for injury sustained by him.

4. Si communi servo injuria facta sit, æquum est, non pro ea parte, qua dominus quisque est, æstimationem injuriæ fieri, sed ex dominorum persona, quia ipsis fit injuria.

4. If an injury has been done to a slave held in common, equity demands that it shall be estimated not according to their respective shares in him, but according to their respective position, for it is the masters who are injured.

If the co-proprietors brought the action for injury done, or intended to be done, to them through their slave, then, as it is said in the text, it made no difference what was the amount of their interest in the slave. Each had equally had an insult offered him. But the co-proprietors might bring a prætorian action for harm done to the slave, when no insult or hurt was intended to them; but the only question was, how much was the slave damaged and made unfit for work, and then the amount recovered was divided between them, proportionately to their respective interests in the slave. (See note on last paragr., and D. xlvii. 10. 13.)

5. Quodsi ususfructus in servo Titii est, proprietatis Mævii est,

5. If Titius has the usufruct, and Mævius the property, in a slave, the quam patri injuria facta esse. (D. xlvii. 10. 30, 31.) Although the wife was in power of the father, yet her husband could always bring an action for injury done to her, grounded on his natural duty to protect her.

3. Servis autem ipsis quidem nulla injuria fieri intellegitur, sed domino per eos fieri videtur: non tamen iisdem modis, quibus etiam per liberos et uxores, sed ita cum quid atrocius commissum fuerit et quod aperte ad contumeliam domini respicit: veluti si quis alienum servum verberaverit, et in hunc casum actio proponitur. At si quis servo convicium fecerit vel pugno eum percusserit, nulla in eum actio domino competit.

3. An injury cannot, properly speaking, be done to a slave, but it is the master who, through the slave, is considered to be injured: not, however, in the same way as through a child or wife, but only when the act is of a character grave enough to make it a manifest insult to the master, as if a person has flogged the slave of another, in which case this action is given against him. But a master cannot bring an action against a person who has publicly insulted his slave, or struck him with his fist.

GAI. iii. 222.

Under the civil law the master could not bring an action for injury done to his slave, unless the injury was done with intent to hurt or annoy the master. But the prætor gave an action pleno jure, i.e. which could be brought as a matter of right, if the slave was beaten or tortured without the master's orders, and an action cognita causa, i.e. allowed if the circumstances of the case seemed, on inquiry, to furnish good ground for it, if the injury had been slighter. (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 34.) Regard was had, in making this inquiry, and in estimating the amount of damage, to the class of slaves to which the slave belonged. (See paragr. 7.) The slave himself could in no case bring an action for injury sustained by him.

4. Si communi servo injuria facta sit, æquum est, non pro ea parte, qua dominus quisque est, æstimationem injuriæ fieri, sed ex dominorum persona, quia ipsis fit injuria.

4. If an injury has been done to a slave held in common, equity demands that it shall be estimated not according to their respective shares in him, but according to their respective position, for it is the masters who are injured.

If the co-proprietors brought the action for injury done, or intended to be done, to them through their slave, then, as it is said in the text, it made no difference what was the amount of their interest in the slave. Each had equally had an insult offered him. But the co-proprietors might bring a prætorian action for harm done to the slave, when no insult or hurt was intended to them; but the only question was, how much was the slave damaged and made unfit for work, and then the amount recovered was divided between them, proportionately to their respective interests in the slave. (See note on last paragr., and D. xlvii. 10. 16.)

5. Quodsi ususfructus in servo Titii est, proprietas Mævii est,

5. If Titius has the usufruct, and Mævius the property, in a slave, the magis Mævio injuria fieri intellegitur.

injury is considered to be done rather to Mævius than to Titius.

D. xlvii. 10. 15. 47.

It might, however, happen that it could be shown that the intention was to injure and insult the usufructuary more than the proprietor. (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 48.)

6. Sed si libero, qui tibi bona fide servit, injuria facta sit, nulla tibi actio dabitur, sed suo nomine is experiri poterit: nisi in contumeliam tuam pulsatus sit, tunc enim competit et tibi injuriarum actio. Idem ergo est et in servo alieno bona fide tibi serviente, ut totiens admittatur injuriarum actio, quotiens in tuam contumeliam injuria ei facta sit.

6. If the injury has been done to a freeman, who serves you bona fide as a slave, you have no action, but he can bring an action in his own name, unless he has been injured merely to insult you, for, in that case, you also may bring the actio injuriarum. So, too, with regard to a slave of another who serves you bona fide, you may bring this action whenever the slave is injured for the purpose of insulting you.

D. xlvii. 10. 15. 48.

7. Pœna autem injuriarum ex lege duodecim tabularum propter membrum quidem ruptum talio erat: propter os vero fractum nummaria pœna erant constitutæ quasi in magna veterum paupertate. Sed postea prætores permittebant ipsis, qui injuriarum passi sunt, eam æstimare, ut iudex vel tanti condemnaret, quanti injuriam passus æstimaverit, vel minoris, prout ei visum fuerit. Sed pœna quidem injuriæ, quæ ex lege duodecim tabularum introducta est, in desuetudinem abiit: quam autem prætores introduxerunt, quæ etiam honoraria appellatur, in judiciis frequentatur. Nam secundum gradum dignitatis vitæque honestatem crescit aut minuitur æstimatio injuriæ: qui gradus condemnationis et in servili persona non immerito servatur, ut aliud in servo actore, aliud in mediî actus homine, aliud in vilissimo vel compedito constitatur.

7. The penalty for injuries under the law of the Twelve Tables was a limb for a limb, but if only a bone was fractured, pecuniary compensation was exacted proportionate to the great poverty of the times. Afterwards the prætor permitted the injured parties themselves to estimate the injury, so that the judge should condemn the defendants to pay the sum estimated, or less, as he might think proper. The penalty for injury appointed by the Twelve Tables has fallen into desuetude, but that introduced by the prætors, and termed honoraria, is adopted in the administration of justice. For according to the rank and character of the person injured, the estimate is greater or less: and a similar gradation is observed, not improperly, even with regard to a slave, one amount being payable in the case of a slave who is a steward, a second in that of a slave holding an office of an intermediate class, and a third in that of one of the lowest rank, or one condemned to wear fetters.

GAI. iii. 223, 224; D. xlvii. 10. 15. 44.

The greater part of the edict of the prætor on this subject is given by Ulpian in different parts of the extracts from his writings. (See D. xlvii. 10. 15.)

8. Sed et lex Cornelia de injuriis loquitur et injuriarum actionem introduxit. Quæ competit ob eam rem, quod se pulsatum quis verberatumve domumve suam vi in-

8. The lex Cornelia also speaks of injuries, and introduced an actio injuriarum, which may be brought when any one alleges that he has been struck or beaten, or that his house has been magis Mævio injuria fieri intel- injury is considered to be done rather legitur. to Mævius than to Titius.

D. xlvii. 10. 15. 47.

It might, however, happen that it could be shown that the intention was to injure and insult the usufructuary more than the proprietor. (D. xlvii. 10. 15. 48.)

6. Sed si libero, qui tibi bona fide servit, injuria facta sit, nulla tibi actio dabitur, sed suo nomine is experiri poterit: nisi in contumeliam tuam pulsatus sit, tunc enim competit et tibi injuriarum actio. Idem ergo est et in servo alieno bona fide tibi serviente, ut totiens admittatur injuriarum actio, quotiens in tuam contumeliam injuria ei facta sit.

6. If the injury has been done to a freeman, who serves you bona fide as a slave, you have no action, but he can bring an action in his own name, unless he has been injured merely to insult you, for, in that case, you also may bring the actio injuriarum. So, too, with regard to a slave of another who serves you bona fide, you may bring this action whenever the slave is injured for the purpose of insulting you.

D. xlvii. 10. 15. 48.

7. Poena autem injuriarum ex lege duodecim tabularum propter membrum quidem ruptum talio erat: propter os vero fractum nummariæ poenæ erant constitutæ quasi in magna veterum paupertate. Sed postea prætores permittebant ipsis, qui injuriam passi sunt, eam æstimare, ut judex vel tanti condemnnet, quanti injuriam passus æstimaverit, vel minoris, prout ei visum fuerit. Sed poena quidem injuriæ, quæ ex lege duodecim tabularum introducta est, in desuetudinem abiit: quam autem prætores introduxerunt, quæ etiam honoraria appellatur, in judiciis frequentatur. Nam secundum gradum dignitatis vitæque honestatem crescit aut minuitur æstimatio injuriæ: qui gradus condemnationis et in servili persona non immerito servatur, ut aliud in servo actore, aliud in medii actus homine, aliud in vilissimo vel compedito constitatur.

7. The penalty for injuries under the law of the Twelve Tables was a limb for a limb, but if only a bone was fractured, pecuniary compensation was exacted proportionate to the great poverty of the times. Afterwards the prætor permitted the injured parties themselves to estimate the injury, so that the judge should condemn the defendants to pay the sum estimated, or less, as he might think proper. The penalty for injury appointed by the Twelve Tables has fallen into desuetude, but that introduced by the prætors, and termed honoraria, is adopted in the administration of justice. For according to the rank and character of the person injured, the estimate is greater or less: and a similar gradation is observed, not improperly, even with regard to a slave, one amount being payable in the case of a slave who is a steward, a second in that of a slave holding an office of an intermediate class, and a third in that of one of the lowest rank, or one condemned to wear fetters.

GAI. iii. 223, 224; D. xlvii. 10. 15. 44.

The greater part of the edict of the prætor on this subject is given by Ulpian in different parts of the extracts from his writings. (See D. xlvii. 10. 15.)

8. Sed et lex Cornelia de injuriis loquitur et injuriarum actionem introduxit. Quæ competit ob eam rem, quod se pulsatum quis verberatumve domumve suam vi introitam esse dicat. Domum autem accipimus, sive in propria domo quis habitat sive in conducta vel gratis sive hospitio receptus sit.

8. The lex Cornelia also speaks of injuries, and introduced an actio injuriarum, which may be brought when any one alleges that he has been struck or beaten, or that his house has been

broken into. And the term 'house' applies whether a man lives in his own house or in a hired one, or in one he has without payment, or if he has been received as a guest.

D. xlvii. 10. 5. pr. and 2.

The lex Cornelia de sicariis (see Tit. 18. 5), though chiefly directed against murderers, also contained provisions against other deeds of violence. Lex itaque Cornelia ex tribus causis dedit actionem: quod quis pulsatus verberatusve domusve ejus vi introita sit. (D. xlvii. 10. 5. pr.) A civil, as well as a criminal, action could be brought under the lex Cornelia. (D. xlvii. 10. 37. 1.)

9. Atrox injuria aestimatur vel ex facto, veluti si quis ab aliquo vulneratus fuerit vel fustibus cæsus: vel ex loco, veluti si cui in theatro vel in foro vel in conspectu prætoris injuria facta sit: vel ex persona, veluti si magistratus injuriam passus fuerit, vel si senatori ab humili injuria facta sit, aut parenti patronoque fiat a liberis vel libertis; aliter enim senatoris et parentis patronique, aliter extranei et humilis personæ injuria aestimatur. Nonnumquam et locus vulneris atrocem injuriam facit, veluti si in oculo quis percussus sit. Parvi autem refert, utrum patrifamilias an filiofamilias talis injuria facta sit: nam et hæc atrox aestimabitur.

9. An injury is said to be of a grave character, either from the nature of the act, as if any one is wounded or beaten with clubs by another; or from the nature of the place, as when an injury is done in a theatre, a forum, or in the presence of the prætor; or from the quality of the person, as when it is a magistrate that has received the injury, or a senator has sustained it at the hands of a person of low condition, or an ascendant or patron at the hands of a child or freedman. For the injury done to a senator, an ascendant, or a patron is estimated differently from an injury done to a person of low condition or to a stranger. Sometimes it is the part of the body injured that gives the character of gravity to the injury, as if any one has been struck in the eye. Nor does it make any difference whether such an injury has been done to a paterfamilias or a filiusfamilias, for in the latter case also it is considered of a grave character.

GAI. iii. 225; D. xlvii. 10. 7. 8; D. xlvii. 10. 8, 9, 1, 2.

If the injury was atrox, a freedman might bring an action against his patron, and the emancipated son against his father, but not otherwise. (D. xlvii. 10. 7. 2, 3.) And the prætor himself, in cases of atrox injuria, when he gave the formula to the judge, fixed the maximum of the condemnation, and the judge would not, as a rule, condemn the defendant in a less sum. (GAI. iii. 224.)

10. In summa sciendum est, de omni injuria eum, qui passus est, posse vel criminaliter agere vel civiliter. Et si quidem civiliter agatur, aestimatione facta secundum quod dictum est, pœna imponitur.

10. Lastly, it must be observed, that in every case of injury he who has received it may bring either a criminal or a civil action. In the latter, it is a sum estimated as we have said that constitutes the penalty; in troitam esse dicat. Domum autem accipimus, sive in propria domo quis habitat sive in conducta vel gratis sive hospitio receptus sit.

broken into. And the term 'house' applies whether a man lives in his own house or in a hired one, or in one he has without payment, or if he has been received as a guest.

D. xlvii. 10. 5. pr. and 2.

The lex Cornelia de sicariis (see Tit. 18. 5), though chiefly directed against murderers, also contained provisions against other deeds of violence. Lex itaque Cornelia ex tribus causis dedit actionem: quod quis pulsatus verberatusve domusve ejus vi introita sit. (D. xlvii. 10. 5. pr.) A civil, as well as a criminal, action could be brought under the lex Cornelia. (D. xlvii. 10. 37. 1.)

9. Atrox injuria æstimatur vel ex facto, veluti si quis ab aliquo vulneratus fuerit vel fustibus cæsus: vel ex loco, veluti si cui in theatro vel in foro vel in conspectu prætoris injuria facta sit: vel ex persona, veluti si magistratus injuriam passus fuerit, vel si senatori ab humili injuria facta sit, aut parenti patronoque fiat a liberis vel libertis; aliter enim senatoris et parentis patronique, aliter extranei et humilis personæ injuria æstimatur. Nonnumquam et locus vulneris atrocem injuriam facit, veluti si in oculo quis percussus sit. Parvi autem refert, utrum patrifamilias an filiofamilias talis injuria facta sit: nam et hæc atrox æstimabitur.

9. An injury is said to be of a grave character, either from the nature of the act, as if any one is wounded or beaten with clubs by another; or from the nature of the place, as when an injury is done in a theatre, a forum, or in the presence of the prætor; or from the quality of the person, as when it is a magistrate that has received the injury, or a senator has sustained it at the hands of a person of low condition, or an ascendant or patron at the hands of a child or freedman. For the injury done to a senator, an ascendant, or a patron is estimated differently from an injury done to a person of low condition or to a stranger. Sometimes it is the part of the body injured that gives the character of gravity to the injury, as if any one has been struck in the eye. Nor does it make any difference whether such an injury has been done to a paterfamilias or a filiusfamilias, for in the latter case also it is considered of a grave character.

GAI. iii. 225; D. xlvii. 10. 7. 8; D. xlvii. 10. 8, 9. 1, 2.

If the injury was atrox, a freedman might bring an action against his patron, and the emancipated son against his father, but not otherwise. (D. xlvii. 10. 7. 2, 3.) And the prætor himself, in cases of atrox injuria, when he gave the formula to the judge, fixed the maximum of the condemnation, and the judge would not, as a rule, condemn the defendant in a less sum. (GAI. iii. 224.)

10. In summa sciendum est, de omni injuria eum, qui passus est, posse vel criminaliter agere vel civiliter. Et si quidem civiliter agatur, æstimatione facta secundum quod dictum est, pena imponitur.

10. Lastly, it must be observed, that in every case of injury he who has received it may bring either a criminal or a civil action. In the latter, it is a sum estimated as we have said that constitutes the penalty; in the former, the judge, in the exercise of his duty, inflicts on the offender an extraordinary punishment. We must, however, remark, that a constitution of Zeno permits men of the rank of illustres, or of any higher rank, to bring or defend by a procurator the actio injuriarum if brought criminally, as may be seen more clearly by reading the constitution itself.

Sin autem criminaliter, officio judicis extraordinaria poena reo irrogatur: hoc videlicet observando, quod Zenoniana constitutio introduxit, ut viri illustres quique supra eos sunt, et per procuratores possint actionem injuriarum criminaliter vel persequi vel suscipere secundum ejus tenorem, qui ex ipsa manifestius apparet.

D. xlvii. 10. 6; C. ix. 35. 11.

It was only as a very peculiar exception that criminal actions could, like private actions, be brought or defended through a procurator.

The viri illustres constituted the highest rank of the imperial officials—such as the prætorian and urban prefects, the masters of the horse, and the seven ministers of the palace. (GIBBON, ch. 17.)

11. Non solum autem in injuriarum tenetur, qui fecit injuriam, hoc est qui percussit: verum ille quoque continebitur, qui dolo fecit vel qui curavit, ut cui mala pugno percuteretur.

11. Not only is he liable to the actio injuriarum who has inflicted the injury, as, for instance, the person who has struck the blow; but he also who has maliciously caused or contrived that any one should be struck in the face with the fist.

D. xlvii. 10. 11. pr.

12. Hæc actio dissimulatione aboletur: et ideo, si quis injuriam dereliquerit, hoc est statim passus ad animum suum non revocaverit, postea ex pœnitentia remissam injuriam non poterit recolare.

12. This action is extinguished by a person acting as if he had not received an injury; and, therefore, a person who has taken no account of the injury, that is, who immediately on receiving it has shown no resentment at it, cannot afterwards change his mind and resuscitate the injury he has allowed to rest.

D. xlvii. 10. 11. 1.

If the person injured, though expressing indignation at the time, did not take any steps towards enforcing reparation within a year, the action was extinct. (D. xlvii. 10. 17. 6; C. ix. 35. 5.) The action was personal to the person injured, and could not be transmitted to his heirs, unless before his death the action had already proceeded as far as the litis contestatio. (D. xlvii. 10. 13. pr.)

of obligatione quæ ex delicto

TIT. V. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS, QUÆ QUASI EX DELICTO NASCUNTUR.

Si judex litem suam fecerit, non proprie ex maleficio obligatus videtur. Sed quia neque ex contractu obligatus est et utique peccasse ali-

If a judge makes a cause his own, he does not, properly speaking, seem to be bound ex maleficio; but as he is not bound ex contractu, and as the former, the judge, in the exercise of his duty, inflicts on the offender an extraordinary punishment. We must, however, remark, that a constitution of Zeno permits men of the rank of illustres, or of any higher rank, to bring or defend by a procurator the actio injuriarum if brought criminally, as may be seen more clearly by reading the constitution itself.

Sin autem criminaliter, officio iudicis extraordinaria poena reo irrogatur: hoc videlicet observando, quod Zenoniana constitutio introduxit, ut viri illustres quique supra eos sunt, et per procuratores possint actionem injuriarum criminaliter vel persequi vel suscipere secundum ejus tenorem, qui ex ipsa manifestius apparet.

D. xlvii. 10. 6; C. ix. 35. 11.

It was only as a very peculiar exception that criminal actions could, like private actions, be brought or defended through a procurator.

The virii illustres constituted the highest rank of the imperial officials—such as the prætorian and urban prefects, the masters of the horse, and the seven ministers of the palace. (GIBBON, ch. 17.)

11. Non solum autem est injuriarum tenetur, qui fecit injuriam, hoc est qui percussit: verum ille quoque continebitur, qui dolo fecit vel qui curavit, ut cui mala pugno percuteretur.

11. Not only is he liable to the actio injuriarum who has inflicted the injury, as, for instance, the person who has struck the blow; but he also who has maliciously caused or contrived that any one should be struck in the face with the fist.

D. xlvii. 10. 11. pr.

12. Hæc actio dissimulatione aboletur: et ideo, si quis injuriam dereliquerit, hoc est statim passus ad animum suum non revocaverit, postea ex poenitentia remissam injuriam non poterit recolere.

12. This action is extinguished by a person acting as if he had not received an injury; and, therefore, a person who has taken no account of the injury, that is, who immediately on receiving it has shown no resentment at it, cannot afterwards change his mind and resuscitate the injury he has allowed to rest.

D. xlvii. 10. 11. 1.

If the person injured, though expressing indignation at the time, did not take any steps towards enforcing reparation within a year, the action was extinct. (D. xlvii. 10. 17. 6; C. ix. 35. 5.) The action was personal to the person injured, and could not be transmitted to his heirs, unless before his death the action had already proceeded as far as the litis contestatio. (D. xlvii. 10. 13. pr.)

of obligationis per delicto

TIT. V. DE OBLIGATIONIBUS, QUÆ QUASI EX DELICTO NASCUNTUR.

Si iudex litem suam fecerit, non proprie ex maleficio obligatus videtur. Sed quia neque ex contractu obligatus est et utique peccasse ali-

If a judge makes a cause his own, he does not, properly speaking, seem to be bound ex maleficio; but as he is not bound ex contractu, and as quid intellegitur, licet per imprudentiam: ideo videtur quasi ex maleficio teneri, et in quantum de ea re æquum religioni judicantis videbitur, pœnam sustinebit.

he has, nevertheless, done a wrong, although perhaps only from ignorance, he seems to be bound as it were ex maleficio, and will be condemned to the amount which seems equitable to the conscience of the judge.

D. 1. 13. 6.

The Roman law characterised rather arbitrarily certain wrongful acts as delicts, and then, as there were many other wrongful acts which bound the wrongdoer to make reparation, and as it could not be said that the wrongdoer was bound ex delicto, he was said to be bound quasi ex delicto, i.e. there was an evident analogy between the mode in which the obligation arose from other kinds of wrongdoing and that in which it arose from the kinds of wrongdoing technically called delicts. The principle was exactly the same, but the particular act did not happen to be among those technically termed delicts. The first instance given is that of a judge qui litem suam fecerit, that is, who, through favour, corruption, or fear (D. v. 1. 15. 1), or even ignorance of law (licet per imprudentiam), gives a manifestly wrong sentence, and who thus makes the lis or suit to be sua, that is, affect himself by rendering him responsible for the sentence. Gaius gives an example in the case of a judge condemning a defendant in a sum different from that fixed in the formula. (GAI. iv. 52.)

The defendant might, if he pleased, instead of bringing an action against the judge, appeal from his decision (see Tit. 17. pr. note); and in some cases, as when the judge had violated public law, or been corrupted, he might treat the decision as null, and commence the action afresh (D. xlix. 1. 19); but his adversary might be insolvent, or his indignation, or many other reasons, might make him prefer suing the judge.

Ducaurroy points out that the distinction made between the seemingly parallel cases of an ignorant physician and an ignorant judge, the fault of the former being punished under the lex Aquilia, the latter being bound quasi ex delicto, arises from the injury of the physician being done to the body. The severity of the penalty against a judge who was merely ignorant of the law, is owing probably to the great checks against ignorance which the judge possessed, if he pleased to avail himself of them in the advice of the 'prudentes,' whose business it was to assist him, and in the possibility of having recourse to the magistrate who had given the action to him.

1. Item is, ex cujus cœnaculo vel proprio ipsius vel conducto vel in quo gratis habitabat, dejectum effusumve aliquid est, ita ut alicui noceretur, quasi ex maleficio obligatus intellegitur: ideo autem non proprie ex maleficio obligatus intellegitur, quia plerumque ob alterius

1. So, too, he who occupies, whether as proprietor, hirer, or gratuitously, an apartment, from which anything has been thrown or poured down, which has done damage to another, is said to be bound quasi ex maleficio, for he is not exactly bound ex maleficio, as it is generally by the fault of another, a slave, quid intellegitur, licet per imprudentiam: ideo videtur quasi ex maleficio teneri, et in quantum de ea re æquum religioni judicantis videbitur, pœnam sustinebit.

he has, nevertheless, done a wrong, although perhaps only from ignorance, he seems to be bound as it were ex maleficio, and will be condemned to the amount which seems equitable to the conscience of the judge.

D. 1. 13. 6.

The Roman law characterised rather arbitrarily certain wrongful acts as delicts, and then, as there were many other wrongful acts which bound the wrongdoer to make reparation, and as it could not be said that the wrongdoer was bound ex delicto, he was said to be bound quasi ex delicto, i.e. there was an evident analogy between the mode in which the obligation arose from other kinds of wrongdoing and that in which it arose from the kinds of wrongdoing technically called delicts. The principle was exactly the same, but the particular act did not happen to be among those technically termed delicts. The first instance given is that of a judge qui litem suam fecerit, that is, who, through favour, corruption, or fear (D. v. 1. 15. 1), or even ignorance of law (licet per imprudentiam), gives a manifestly wrong sentence, and who thus makes the lis or suit to be sua, that is, affect himself by rendering him responsible for the sentence. Gaius gives an example in the case of a judge condemning a defendant in a sum different from that fixed in the formula. (GAI. iv. 52.)

The defendant might, if he pleased, instead of bringing an action against the judge, appeal from his decision (see Tit. 17. pr. note); and in some cases, as when the judge had violated public law, or been corrupted, he might treat the decision as null, and commence the action afresh (D. xlix. 1. 19); but his adversary might be insolvent, or his indignation, or many other reasons, might make him prefer suing the judge.

Ducaurroy points out that the distinction made between the seemingly parallel cases of an ignorant physician and an ignorant judge, the fault of the former being punished under the lex Aquilia, the latter being bound quasi ex delicto, arises from the injury of the physician being done to the body. The severity of the penalty against a judge who was merely ignorant of the law, is owing probably to the great checks against ignorance which the judge possessed, if he pleased to avail himself of them in the advice of the 'prudentes,' whose business it was to assist him, and in the possibility of having recourse to the magistrate who had given the action to him.

1. Item is, ex cujus cœnaculo vel proprio ipsius vel conducto vel in quo gratis habitabat, dejectum effusumve aliquid est, ita ut alicui noceretur, quasi ex maleficio obligatus intellegitur: ideo autem non proprie ex maleficio obligatus intellegitur, quia plerumque ob alterius

1. So, too, he who occupies, whether as proprietor, hirer, or gratuitously, an apartment, from which anything has been thrown or poured down, which has done damage to another, is said to be bound quasi ex maleficio, for he is not exactly bound ex maleficio, as it is generally by the fault of another, a slave, culpam tenetur aut servi aut liberi. Cui similis est is, qui ea parte, qua vulgo iter fieri solet, id positum aut suspensum habet, quod potest, si ceciderit, alicui nocere: quo casu pœna decem aureorum constituta est. De eo vero, quod dejectum effusumve est, dupli quanti damnum datum sit, constituta est actio. Ob hominem vero liberum occisum quinquaginta aureorum pœna constituitur: si vero vivet nocitumque ei esse dicetur, quantum ob eam rem æquum iudici videtur, actio datur: iudex enim computare debet mercedes medicis præstitas ceteraque impendia, quæ in curatione facta sunt, præterea operarum, quibus caruit aut cariturus est ob id, quod inutilis factus est.

for instance, or a child, that he is bound. It is the same with regard to a person who, where there is a public way, keeps something placed or suspended, which may, if it fall, hurt any one; in this case, a penalty has been fixed of ten aurei. With respect to things thrown or poured down, an action is given for double the amount of the damage done; and if a freeman has been killed, there is a penalty of fifty aurei. If he is not killed, but only hurt, the action is given for the amount which the judge considers equitable under the circumstances; the judge ought to take into account the fees paid to the physician, and all the other expenses of the man's illness, as well as the employment which he has lost, or will lose, by being incapacitated.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 5; D. ix. 3. 5. 6; D. ix. 3. 1. pr.; D. ix. 3. 7.

The edict of the prætor, in the cases referred to in the text, is given, D. ix. 3. 1. pr.; and D. ix. 3. 5. 6.

The action given in each case was popularis (D. ix. 3. 5. 13), that is, any one might bring it, but in the case of a freeman being killed, his heirs or relations, if they brought an action, were preferred to strangers. (D. ix. 3. 5. 5.)

2. Si filiusfamilias seorsum a patre habitaverit et quid ex cenaculo ejus dejectum effusumve sit, sive quid positum suspensumve habuerit, ejus casus periculosus est: Juliano placuit, in patrem nullam esse actionem, sed cum ipso filio agendum. Quod et in filiofamilias iudice observandum est, qui litem suam fecerit.

2. If a filiusfamilias lives apart from his father, and from a room in his house anything is thrown or poured down, or anything is placed or suspended, the fall of which would be dangerous, Julian thinks that no action could be brought against the father, but only against the son. The same rule should hold good with respect to a filiusfamilias who, being a judge, has made a cause his own.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 5; D. v. 1. 15. pr.

The filiusfamilias could be sued himself for delicts, but the father was not obliged to repair the injury done even to the extent of the son's peculium, which was only made to meet the contracts or quasi-contracts of the son; but if a slave had done the injury the master was always bound to repair the damage, or to abandon the slave. (See Tit. 8. 7.)

3. Item exercitor navis aut cauponæ aut stabuli de damno, dolo aut furto, quod in nave aut in caupona aut in stabulo factum erit, quasi ex maleficio teneri videtur, si modo ipsius nullum est maleficium, sed alicujus eorum, quorum opera navem aut cauponam aut stabulum exer-

3. The master of a ship, of an inn, or a stable, is liable quasi ex maleficio for any damage, through fraud or theft, occurring in the ship, inn, or stable, that is, if it is not he who has committed the wrongful deed, but some one employed in the service of the ship, inn, or stable. For as the ac-

culpam tenetur aut servi aut liberi. Cui similis est is, qui ea parte, qua vulgo iter fieri solet, id positum aut suspensum habet, quod potest, si ceciderit, alicui nocere: quo casu poena decem aureorum constituta est. De eo vero, quod dejectum effusumve est, dupli quanti damnum datum sit, constituta est actio. Ob hominem vero liberum occisum quinquaginta aureorum poena constituitur: si vero vivet nocitumque ei esse dicetur, quantum ob eam rem æquum iudici videtur, actio datur: iudex enim computare debet mercedes medicis præstitas ceteraque impendia, quæ in curatione facta sunt, præterea operarum, quibus caruit aut cariturus est ob id, quod inutilis factus est.

for instance, or a child, that he is bound. It is the same with regard to a person who, where there is a public way, keeps something placed or suspended, which may, if it fall, hurt any one; in this case, a penalty has been fixed of ten aurei. With respect to things thrown or poured down, an action is given for double the amount of the damage done; and if a freeman has been killed, there is a penalty of fifty aurei. If he is not killed, but only hurt, the action is given for the amount which the judge considers equitable under the circumstances; the judge ought to take into account the fees paid to the physician, and all the other expenses of the man's illness, as well as the employment which he has lost, or will lose, by being incapacitated.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 5; D. ix. 3. 5. 6; D. ix. 3. 1. pr.; D. ix. 3. 7.

The edict of the prætor, in the cases referred to in the text, is given, D. ix. 3. 1. pr.; and D. ix. 3. 5. 6.

The action given in each case was popularis (D. ix. 3. 5. 13), that is, any one might bring it, but in the case of a freeman being killed, his heirs or relations, if they brought an action, were preferred to strangers. (D. ix. 3. 5. 5.)

2. Si filiusfamilias seorsum a patre habitaverit et quid ex cœnaculo ejus dejectum effusumve sit, sive quid positum suspensumve habuerit, cujus casus periculosus est: Juliano placuit, in patrem nullam esse actionem, sed cum ipso filio agendum. Quod et in filiofamilias iudice observandum est, qui litem suam fecerit.

2. If a filiusfamilias lives apart from his father, and from a room in his house anything is thrown or poured down, or anything is placed or suspended, the fall of which would be dangerous, Julian thinks that no action could be brought against the father, but only against the son. The same rule should hold good with respect to a filiusfamilias who, being a judge, has made a cause his own.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 5; D. v. 1. 15. pr.

The filiusfamilias could be sued himself for delicts, but the father was not obliged to repair the injury done even to the extent of the son's peculium, which was only made to meet the contracts or quasi-contracts of the son; but if a slave had done the injury the master was always bound to repair the damage, or to abandon the slave. (See Tit. 8. 7.)

3. Item exercitor navis aut cauponæ aut stabuli de damno, dolo aut furto, quod in nave aut in caupona aut in stabulo factum erit, quasi ex maleficio teneri videtur, si modo ipsius nullum est maleficio, sed alicujus eorum, quorum opera navem aut cauponam aut stabulum exer-

3. The master of a ship, of an inn, or a stable, is liable quasi ex maleficio for any damage, through fraud or theft, occurring in the ship, inn, or stable, that is, if it is not he who has committed the wrongful deed, but some one employed in the service of the ship, inn, or stable. For as the action given against him does not arise ex contractu, and as he is so far in fault in employing bad persons as his servants, he seems to be bound quasi ex maleficio. In these cases it is an action in factum that is given, and it may be brought by the heir, but not against the heir.

ceret: cum enim neque ex contractu sit adversus eum constituta hæc actio et aliquatenus culpæ reus est, quod opera malorum hominum uteretur, ideo quasi ex maleficio teneri videtur. In his autem casibus in factum actio competit, quæ heredi quidem datur, adversus heredem autem non competit.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 6; D. ix. 3. 5. 13.

The action was for double the value of the thing damaged or lost. (D. xlvii. 5. 2.) The person injured might also, at his option, have an actio furti, or Aquilæ, as the case might be, against the actual wrongdoer. (D. xlvii. 5.) This action was different from that given by the prætor against innkeepers and others for the restoration of things confided to them. (D. iv. 9.)

270

TIT. VI. DE ACTIONIBUS.

Superest, ut de actionibus loquamur. Actio autem nihil aliud est, quam jus persequendi iudicio, quod sibi debetur.

It now remains that we speak of actions. An action is nothing else than the right of suing before a judge for that which is due to us.

D. xlv. 7. 51.

We now come to the last division of the Institutes, that which treats of actions and the subsidiary subjects of exceptions and interdicts. A sketch has been given in the Introduction (sec. 90-111) of the old legal actions, of the formulary system, and of the system of extraordinaria iudicia, by which, long before the time of Justinian, the formulary system had been replaced. In treating of actions the Institutes make such constant reference to the formulary system, and generally to the prætorian law on the subject, that it is necessary, for the comprehension of this part of the Institutes, to set out with a knowledge of the law of actions while the formulary system prevailed. For a statement of the mode in which this system replaced the older actions, and of the scheme of the formula, the reader is referred to sections 98 to 106 of the Introduction. But it will be convenient to add here an outline of the principal divisions of actions under the prætorian system, and to connect these divisions with the corresponding paragraphs of this Sixth Title.

1. Actions in rem, in personam. A main division of actions is that into real actions and personal actions, a division based on the difference in the thing which the plaintiff claims to be due. In a real action, the plaintiff claims that, as against all the world, a thing corporeal or incorporeal is his. The intentio of such an action ran—Si paret hominem ex jure Quiritium Auli Agerii esse. But under the formulary system every condemnation was in ceret: cum enim neque ex contractu sit adversus eum constituta hæc actio et aliquatenus culpæ reus est, quod opera malorum hominum uteretur, ideo quasi ex maleficio teneri videtur. In his autem casibus in factum actio competit, quæ heredi quidem datur, adversus heredem autem non competit.

tion given against him does not arise ex contractu, and as he is so far in fault in employing bad persons as his servants, he seems to be bound quasi ex maleficio. In these cases it is an action in factum that is given, and it may be brought by the heir, but not against the heir.

D. xlv. 7. 5. 6; D. ix. 3. 5. 13.

The action was for double the value of the thing damaged or lost. (D. xlvii. 5. 2.) The person injured might also, at his option, have an actio furti, or Aquilæ, as the case might be, against the actual wrongdoer. (D. xlvii. 5.) This action was different from that given by the prætor against innkeepers and others for the restoration of things confided to them. (D. iv. 9.)

270

TIT. VI. DE ACTIONIBUS.

Superest, ut de actionibus loquamur. Actio autem nihil aliud est, quam jus persequendi iudicio, quod sibi debetur.

It now remains that we speak of actions. An action is nothing else than the right of suing before a judge for that which is due to us.

D. xlv. 7. 51.

We now come to the last division of the Institutes, that which treats of actions and the subsidiary subjects of exceptions and interdicts. A sketch has been given in the Introduction (sec. 90-111) of the old legal actions, of the formulary system, and of the system of extraordinaria iudicia, by which, long before the time of Justinian, the formulary system had been replaced. In treating of actions the Institutes make such constant reference to the formulary system, and generally to the prætorian law on the subject, that it is necessary, for the comprehension of this part of the Institutes, to set out with a knowledge of the law of actions while the formulary system prevailed. For a statement of the mode in which this system replaced the older actions, and of the scheme of the formula, the reader is referred to sections 98 to 106 of the Introduction. But it will be convenient to add here an outline of the principal divisions of actions under the prætorian system, and to connect these divisions with the corresponding paragraphs of this Sixth Title.

1. Actions in rem, in personam. A main division of actions is that into real actions and personal actions, a division based on the difference in the thing which the plaintiff claims to be due. In a real action, the plaintiff claims that, as against all the world, a thing corporeal or incorporeal is his. The intentio of such an action ran—Si paret hominem ex jure Quiritium Auli Agerii esse. But under the formulary system every condemnation was in a sum of money. It was the value of the thing, not the thing, that was awarded, and so the condemnatio in a real action ran—Quanti ea res erit, tantam pecuniam Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio condemna; si non paret, absolve. Actions in rem were, however, as is explained below, arbitrarie, i.e. the judge ordered the unsuccessful defendant to restore the thing, and, if he failed to do so, condemned him in the sum of money. This was supposed to meet all the circumstances of the case. It seems, too, that, at any rate in the time of Ulpian, if the thing being in the possession of the defendant was not restored according to the order, force was employed under the direction of the judge to put the plaintiff in possession of it. (D. vi. 1. 68; see note on paragr. 31.) In all actions, when a defendant did not pay, he was liable, under the legislation of Antoninus Pius, to have sufficient of his goods to meet the liability seized and sold. (D. xlii. 1. 31.) (As to modes of execution see Introd. sec. 108, 111.)

A personal action was one in which the plaintiff claimed that the defendant should give, do, or make good something to or for him—Qua intendimus dare, facere, prestare oportere. For prestare, as in the action of theft (Gai. iv. 37), the words damnum decidere, to make good the loss, were sometimes substituted. Condictio, used sometimes in the general sense of a personal action, had a special sense. Originally the condictio was the action by which the plaintiff demanded that the defendant should give, i.e. make over the full property in, something, and the thing to be given was something certum. It was therefore specially attached to unilateral contracts, i.e. to contracts made re (which, it will be remembered, are, with the exception of mutuum, bilateral only indirectly) or verbis or litteris, or to such obligations quasi ex contractu as that to restore money unduly paid. But the condictio was extended to things uncertain, to the giving or doing something which was not fixed; and the condictio in its primary application received the name of condictio certi, and in its extended application that of condictio incerti, and the condictio certi, or simply condictio, was limited by usage to actions brought on contracts re, verbis, or litteris, while condictiones certi, brought on other grounds, received special names, as the condictio indebiti, brought to enforce the repayment of money unduly paid. The condictio incerti always received a special name, according to the obligation it was brought to enforce, as ex stipulatu. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 15. pr.) Lastly, as the old condictio certi was, when first introduced by the lex Silia (510 A.U.C.), given to enforce the giving of a fixed sum of money, and only extended by the lex Calpurnia (520 A.U.C.) to enforce the giving of other fixed things, the condictio, when brought for anything else except a fixed sum of money, and whether certi or incerti, was spoken of as triticaria (D. xiii. 3. 1. pr.), from triticum, wheat, one of the objects comprised in the extension made by the lex Calpurnia. The intentio in the condictio certi ran—Si paret oportere dare (decem aureos);

a sum of money. It was the value of the thing, not the thing, that was awarded, and so the condemnatio in a real action ran—Quanti ea res erit, tantam pecuniam Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio condemna; si non paret, absolve. Actions in rem were, however, as is explained below, arbitrarie, i.e. the judge ordered the unsuccessful defendant to restore the thing, and, if he failed to do so, condemned him in the sum of money. This was supposed to meet all the circumstances of the case. It seems, too, that, at any rate in the time of Ulpian, if the thing being in the possession of the defendant was not restored according to the order, force was employed under the direction of the judge to put the plaintiff in possession of it. (D. vi. l. 68; see note on paragr. 31.) In all actions, when a defendant did not pay, he was liable, under the legislation of Antoninus Pius, to have sufficient of his goods to meet the liability seized and sold. (D. xlii. l. 31.) (As to modes of execution see Introd. sec. 108, 111.)

A personal action was one in which the plaintiff claimed that the defendant should give, do, or make good something to or for him—Qua intendimus dare, facere, prestare oportere. For prestare, as in the action of theft (Gai. iv. 37), the words damnum decidere, to make good the loss, were sometimes substituted. Condictio, used sometimes in the general sense of a personal action, had a special sense. Originally the condictio was the action by which the plaintiff demanded that the defendant should give, i.e. make over the full property in, something, and the thing to be given was something certum. It was therefore specially attached to unilateral contracts, i.e. to contracts made re (which, it will be remembered, are, with the exception of mutuum, bilateral only indirectly) or verbis or litteris, or to such obligations quasi ex contractu as that to restore money unduly paid. But the condictio was extended to things uncertain, to the giving or doing something which was not fixed; and the condictio in its primary application received the name of condictio certi, and in its extended application that of condictio incerti, and the condictio certi, or simply condictio, was limited by usage to actions brought on contracts re, verbis, or litteris, while condictiones certi, brought on other grounds, received special names, as the condictio indebiti, brought to enforce the repayment of money unduly paid. The condictio incerti always received a special name, according to the obligation it was brought to enforce, as ex stipulatu. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 15. pr.) Lastly, as the old condictio certi was, when first introduced by the lex Silia (510 A.U.C.), given to enforce the giving of a fixed sum of money, and only extended by the lex Calpurnia (520 A.U.C.) to enforce the giving of other fixed things, the condictio, when brought for anything else except a fixed sum of money, and whether certi or incerti, was spoken of as triticaria (D. xiii. 3. 1. pr.), from triticum, wheat, one of the objects comprised in the extension made by the lex Calpurnia. The intentio in the condictio certi ran—Si paret oportere dare (decem aureos);

and in the condictio incerti—Quicquid paret dare, facere oportere. Every action facere being necessarily uncertain, the condemnatio was necessarily uncertain, and so it was when dare even in condictiones certi, if the action was for anything but a fixed sum of money. If, for example, the action was to give a fixed amount of wheat, as every condemnatio was in a pecuniary shape, the defendant was condemned in the value, whatever it might be, of that amount of wheat—Quanti ea res erit.

2: Actions in jus, in factum, directæ, utiles, fictitiæ, in factum præscriptis verbis. These terms applied to actions indicate the modes in which the prætor extended or modified the law by the shape he gave to the formula. In shaping actions the prætor introduced changes of two kinds. First, he gave actions for the enforcement of rights altogether outside the old civil law, but sanctioned by the edict; or, secondly, he extended existing actions (generally civil, but sometimes prætorian) to cases and persons outside the limits in which these actions could be brought.

The principal mode in which he effected the first object was to frame the action so as to be in factum. Probably the actio in factum concepta shows the formula as framed in its earliest stage. The demonstratio and intentio were confounded or united in it. The prætor merely said, 'If such a fact appears to be true, condemn the defendant.' Such a formula would enable the prætor to give legal remedies to persons who, under the civil law, could not sue, as peregrini or filiifamiliarum, or to give a legal remedy where none previously existed. When, on the other hand, the formula was applied to actions properly within the sphere of the civil law, then the formula had reference to this law; and in the intentio, separated from the demonstratio, it was said, 'If the plaintiff has such and such a legal right, or the defendant is legally bound (oportet) to give or do, then condemn.' Reference being made to the law in this way, the formula was said to be in jus concepta.

When there was an existing action and the prætor wished to extend it to persons or cases not within its sphere, the existing action was termed directa, and the extended action utilis. In framing actiones utiles, the prætor had two resources. He either gave an actio in factum, i.e. stated that if a fact was ascertained the defendant was to be condemned, so that actiones in factum were used both to give a new remedy and to enlarge an existing action, or he devised a fictitious action in jus (actio fictitia). He said, 'If something was true which is not true, then what would the plaintiff's legal rights be?' For example, if a plaintiff claimed as if he had acquired by usucapion before the time of usucapion had run, the prætor said, si anno possedisset, what would be the plaintiff's rights? and the judge treated the plaintiff as if the year had run. (GAI. iv. 30–38.)

Lastly, in such a case as that of an innominate contract executed on one side, the prætor gave an action in jus termed actio

and in the condictio incerti—Quicquid paret dare, facere oportere. Every action facere being necessarily uncertain, the condemnatio was necessarily uncertain, and so it was when dare even in condictiones certi, if the action was for anything but a fixed sum of money. If, for example, the action was to give a fixed amount of wheat, as every condemnatio was in a pecuniary shape, the defendant was condemned in the value, whatever it might be, of that amount of wheat—Quanti ea res erit.

2: Actions in jus, in factum, directæ, utiles, fictitiæ, in factum præscriptis verbis. These terms applied to actions indicate the modes in which the prætor extended or modified the law by the shape he gave to the formula. In shaping actions the prætor introduced changes of two kinds. First, he gave actions for the enforcement of rights altogether outside the old civil law, but sanctioned by the edict; or, secondly, he extended existing actions (generally civil, but sometimes prætorian) to cases and persons outside the limits in which these actions could be brought.

The principal mode in which he effected the first object was to frame the action so as to be in factum. Probably the actio in factum concepta shows the formula as framed in its earliest stage. The demonstratio and intentio were confounded or united in it. The prætor merely said, 'If such a fact appears to be true, condemn the defendant.' Such a formula would enable the prætor to give legal remedies to persons who, under the civil law, could not sue, as peregrini or filiifamiliarum, or to give a legal remedy where none previously existed. When, on the other hand, the formula was applied to actions properly within the sphere of the civil law, then the formula had reference to this law; and in the intentio, separated from the demonstratio, it was said, 'If the plaintiff has such and such a legal right, or the defendant is legally bound (oportet) to give or do, then condemn.' Reference being made to the law in this way, the formula was said to be in jus concepta.

When there was an existing action and the prætor wished to extend it to persons or cases not within its sphere, the existing action was termed directa, and the extended action utilis. In framing actiones utiles, the prætor had two resources. He either gave an actio in factum, i.e. stated that if a fact was ascertained the defendant was to be condemned, so that actiones in factum were used both to give a new remedy and to enlarge an existing action, or he devised a fictitious action in jus (actio fictitia). He said, 'If something was true which is not true, then what would the plaintiff's legal rights be?' For example, if a plaintiff claimed as if he had acquired by usucapion before the time of usucapion had run, the prætor said, si anno possedisset, what would be the plaintiff's rights? and the judge treated the plaintiff as if the year had run. (GAI. iv. 30–38.)

Lastly, in such a case as that of an innominate contract executed on one side, the prætor gave an action in jus termed actio

in factum præscriptis verbis, which was exactly like an action in jus on a nominate contract, only that, as the contract did not fall under one of the recognised heads, the facts had to be stated in order to show how the legal obligation had arisen.

3. Actiones stricti juris, bonæ fidei, arbitrarie. This division depends on the varying amount of latitude given to the judge. The action might be one in jus concepta, and within the limits of the civil law; and then the judge had simply to decide the question submitted to him without taking into account any considerations of equity. But in some actions of this kind the prætor added the words ex fide bona, quod æquius, melius, or some equivalent expression; and then the judge imported equitable considerations, i.e. he took notice of dolus without an exceptio doli mali being inserted; he looked to customs and usages; he took cognisance of set-off (compensatio), without the set-off being distinctly brought before him by the formula; he allowed interest from the time of default. The actions in which the judge had this latitude allowed him were termed bonæ fidei actiones, as opposed to those stricti juris, where he had no such latitude; and, speaking generally, unilateral obligations gave rise to actions stricti juris, and bilateral obligations gave rise to actions bonæ fidei. This division referred, however, to personal actions. In real actions the judge had a latitude by the actions being what was termed arbitrarie, i.e. an order to restore the thing was made, and if the thing was not restored (nisi restituat), then the defendant was condemned in a pecuniary equivalent fixed after taking all circumstances into account, and, as has been stated above, the defendant, if in possession, was forced to give up the thing. Some special personal actions, such as the actio ad exhibendum, were also made arbitrarie.

Actions in factum were not exactly stricti juris or bonæ fidei, terms only applied to actions in jus conceptæ, but practically they approached bonæ fidei actions, as the prætor directed a condemnation if the facts were found as he thought proper to state them; some of them were made arbitrarie; and all conditiones incerti were so far like actions bonæ fidei that the judge had to fix the pecuniary value, as he might think proper, of an uncertain thing.

4. Judicia legitima, imperio continentia.—There is one more division of actions to be noticed in connection with the formulary system. We may ask as to actions (1) how long the right of bringing the action lasts after it has once arisen; (2) within what time the suit must be finished, so that, if the suit is not finished in the time, it must be recommenced; (3) whether the effect of the judgment is to bar fresh proceedings. Under the formulary system the answer to these questions was determined by technical distinctions, depending partly on the nature of the action, and partly on the authority of the magistrate. To sum up the results briefly, we may say (1) that all actions could be in factum præscriptis verbis, which was exactly like an action in jus on a nominate contract, only that, as the contract did not fall under one of the recognised heads, the facts had to be stated in order to show how the legal obligation had arisen.

3. Actiones stricti juris, bonæ fidei, arbitrarie. This division depends on the varying amount of latitude given to the judge. The action might be one in jus concepta, and within the limits of the civil law; and then the judge had simply to decide the question submitted to him without taking into account any considerations of equity. But in some actions of this kind the prætor added the words ex fide bona, quod æquius, melius, or some equivalent expression; and then the judge imported equitable considerations, i.e. he took notice of dolus without an exceptio doli mali being inserted; he looked to customs and usages; he took cognisance of set-off (compensatio), without the set-off being distinctly brought before him by the formula; he allowed interest from the time of default. The actions in which the judge had this latitude allowed him were termed bonæ fidei actiones, as opposed to those stricti juris, where he had no such latitude; and, speaking generally, unilateral obligations gave rise to actions stricti juris, and bilateral obligations gave rise to actions bonæ fidei. This division referred, however, to personal actions. In real actions the judge had a latitude by the actions being what was termed arbitrarie, i.e. an order to restore the thing was made, and if the thing was not restored (nisi restituat), then the defendant was condemned in a pecuniary equivalent fixed after taking all circumstances into account, and, as has been stated above, the defendant, if in possession, was forced to give up the thing. Some special personal actions, such as the actio ad exhibendum, were also made arbitrarie.

Actions in factum were not exactly stricti juris or bonæ fidei, terms only applied to actions in jus concepte, but practically they approached bonæ fidei actions, as the prætor directed a condemnation if the facts were found as he thought proper to state them; some of them were made arbitrarie; and all condictiones incerti were so far like actions bonæ fidei that the judge had to fix the pecuniary value, as he might think proper, of an uncertain thing.

4. Judicia legitima, imperio continentia.—There is one more division of actions to be noticed in connection with the formulary system. We may ask as to actions (1) how long the right of bringing the action lasts after it has once arisen; (2) within what time the suit must be finished, so that, if the suit is not finished in the time, it must be recommenced; (3) whether the effect of the judgment is to bar fresh proceedings. Under the formulary system the answer to these questions was determined by technical distinctions, depending partly on the nature of the action, and partly on the authority of the magistrate. To sum up the results briefly, we may say (1) that all actions could be brought at any time after the cause of action had arisen, except prætorian actions for a penalty or in derogation of a statute (see note on Tit. 12. pr.); (2) that judicia legitima, i.e. the proceedings in actions in which the parties were Roman citizens, and there was only one judge, also a Roman citizen, and the cause was tried in Rome or within a mile of Rome, must, under the lex Julia judicaria, be finished within eighteen months after the formula was given, and those in other actions were measured by the authority of the magistrate, judiciu imperio continentia, and must be finished within the term of office of the magistrate who gave the formula (GAI. iv. 104, 105); and (3) that when judicia legitima were in personam, and there was an intentio juris civilis, the judgment in them barred further proceedings, but that in all other actions, and in judicia legitima when the formula was in factum, fresh proceedings were not barred, but could be stopped by an exception. (GAI. iv. 106, 107; see note on Tit. 13. 5.) But this is a very subsidiary division of actions; the other three—viz. that according to the nature of the thing demanded, that according to the shape of the formula, and that according to the latitude given to the judge—are the principal divisions of actions. But, obviously, the same action may come under more than one division. Thus the actio Serviana (par. 7) was a real action in factum; the action de constituta pecunia (par. 9) was a personal action in factum; the actio empti (par. 28) was a personal bonæ fidei action in jus concepta.

The Institutes in this Title notice six divisions of actions: (1) that according to the nature of the thing demanded (in rem and in personam) (par. 1-11), and (2) that according to the latitude given to the judge (par. 28-31). As the formulary system had passed away, they do not ostensibly notice the division according to the shape of the formula, but they refer to one of its main features by noticing the distinction of actions (3) according as the action was a prætorian application of the civil law, or was a new creation of the prætor (par. 3-13). The other divisions noticed are subordinate, and refer (4) to the effect of the condemnatio, according as the action was penal or not (par. 16-20); (5) according as the condemnatio was for the simple value, or for the double, treble, or quadruple value (par. 21-27); and (6) according as the whole sum in which the defendant might have been condemned was recoverable or not (par. 36-40).

1. Omnium actionum, quibus inter aliquos apud iudices arbitrosve de qua re queritur, summa divisio in duo genera deducitur: aut enim in rem sunt aut in personam. Namque agit unusquisque aut cum eo, qui ei obligatus est vel ex contractu vel ex maleficio, quo casu proditæ actiones in personam sunt, per quas intendit, adversarium ei dare facere

1. All actions whatever, by which any matter is submitted to the decision of judges or of arbitrators, may be divided into two classes; for actions are either real or personal. Either the plaintiff sues the defendant, because he is made answerable to him by contract, or by a delict, in which case the plaintiff brings a personal action, alleging that his adversary is bound

Person answerable by contract (e.g. & Person not answerable

brought at any time after the cause of action had arisen, except prætorian actions for a penalty or in derogation of a statute (see note on Tit. 12. pr.); (2) that judicia legitima, i.e. the proceedings in actions in which the parties were Roman citizens, and there was only one judge, also a Roman citizen, and the cause was tried in Rome or within a mile of Rome, must, under the lex Julia judicaria, be finished within eighteen months after the formula was given, and those in other actions were measured by the authority of the magistrate, judicia imperio continentia, and must be finished within the term of office of the magistrate who gave the formula (GAI. iv. 104, 105); and (3) that when judicia legitima were in personam, and there was an intentio juris civilis, the judgment in them barred further proceedings, but that in all other actions, and in judicia legitima when the formula was in factum, fresh proceedings were not barred, but could be stopped by an exception. (GAI. iv. 106, 107; see note on Tit. 13. 5.) But this is a very subsidiary division of actions; the other three—viz. that according to the nature of the thing demanded, that according to the shape of the formula, and that according to the latitude given to the judge—are the principal divisions of actions. But, obviously, the same action may come under more than one division. Thus the actio Serviana (par. 7) was a real action in factum; the action de constituta pecunia (par. 9) was a personal action in factum; the actio empti (par. 28) was a personal bonæ fidei action in jus concepta.

The Institutes in this Title notice six divisions of actions: (1) that according to the nature of the thing demanded (in rem and in personam) (par. 1-11), and (2) that according to the latitude given to the judge (par. 28-31). As the formulary system had passed away, they do not ostensibly notice the division according to the shape of the formula, but they refer to one of its main features by noticing the distinction of actions (3) according as the action was a prætorian application of the civil law, or was a new creation of the prætor (par. 3-13). The other divisions noticed are subordinate, and refer (4) to the effect of the condemnatio, according as the action was penal or not (par. 16-20); (5) according as the condemnatio was for the simple value, or for the double, treble, or quadruple value (par. 21-27); and (6) according as the whole sum in which the defendant might have been condemned was recoverable or not (par. 36-40).

1. Omnium actionum, quibus inter aliquos apud iudices arbitrosve de qua re queritur, summa divisio in duo genera deducitur: aut enim in rem sunt aut in personam. Namque agit unusquisque aut cum eo, qui ei obligatus est vel ex contractu vel ex maleficio, quo casu proditæ actiones in personam sunt, per quas intendit, adversarium ei dare facere

1. All actions whatever, by which any matter is submitted to the decision of judges or of arbitrators, may be divided into two classes; for actions are either real or personal. Either the plaintiff sues the defendant, because he is made answerable to him by contract, or by a delict, in which case the plaintiff brings a personal action, alleging that his adversary is bound to give to, or to do something for, him, or making some other similar allegation. Or else the plaintiff brings an action against a person not made answerable to him by any obligation, but with whom he disputes the right to something, and for such cases real actions are given; as, for example, if a man is in possession of a corporeal thing, which Titius maintains to be his property, while the possessor says that he himself is the proprietor, here, if Titius asserts that the thing is his, the action is real.

Personas answerable by contract & delict; not answerable

oportere et aliis quibusdam modis: aut cum eo agit, qui nullo jure ei obligatus est, movet tamen alicui de aliqua re controversiam. Quo casu proditæ actiones in rem sunt. Veluti si rem corporalem possideat quis, quam Titius suam esse affirmet, et possessor dominum se esse dicat: nam si Titius suam esse intendat, in rem actio est.

GAI. iv. 1-3; D. xlv. 7. 25. pr.

2. Æque si agat, jus sibi esse re, fundo forte vel ædibus utendifruendi vel per fundum vicini eundi, agendi vel ex fundo vicini aquam ducendi, in rem actio est. Ejusdem generis est actio de jure prædiorum urbanorum, veluti si agat, jus sibi esse altius ædes suas tollendi prospiciendive vel projiciendi aliquid vel immittendi in vicini ædes. Contra quoque de usufructu et de servitutibus prædiorum rusticorum, item prædiorum urbanorum invicem quoque proditæ sunt actiones, ut quis intendat, jus non esse adversario utendifruendi, eundi, agendi aquam ducendi, item altius tollendi, prospiciendi, projiciendi, immittendi: istæ quoque actiones in rem sunt, sed negativæ. Quod genus actionis in controversiis rerum corporalium proditum non est: nam in his is agit, qui non possidet: ei vero, qui possidet, non est actio prodita, per quam neget, rem alterius esse. Sane uno casu qui possidet, nihilo minus actoris partes obtinet, sicut in latioribus digestorum libris opportunius apparebit.

2. So, too, if any one alleges that he has a right to the usufruct, for instance, of land, or of a house, or that he has a right of going, or driving his cattle, or of conducting water, over the land of his neighbour, the action is real; as also are actions relating to servitudes of city estates, as when a man alleges a right to raise his house, a right to an uninterrupted view, a right to make part of his house project, or of inserting the beams of his building into his neighbour's walls. On the other hand there are actions relating to usufructs, and the servitudes of country and city estates, which are the reverse of these; as when the complainant alleges that his adversary is not entitled to the usufruct, or has not the right to go, to drive, to conduct water, to raise his house, to have an uninterrupted view, to throw out projections, or to insert his beams. These actions are equally real, but are negative, and cannot therefore be used in disputes respecting things corporeal, for in these disputes it is the person out of possession who brings the action: for a possessor cannot bring an action to deny that the thing is the property of the other party. There is, however, one case, in which a possessor may act the part of plaintiff; which will be more fully seen if reference is made to the books of the Digest.

GAI. iv. 3; D. viii. 5. 2; D. xxxix. 1. 15.

Usufructs, uses, rural and urban servitudes, might be the objects of real actions. These actions were either confessorie or negative; in the former the plaintiff claimed to exercise a servitude over the immoveables of another, in the latter he maintained that a servitude which another attempted to exercise over an immoveable belonging to the plaintiff was not due.

oportere et aliis quibusdam modis: aut cum eo agit, qui nullo jure ei obligatus est, movet tamen alicui de aliqua re controversiam. Quo casu proditæ actiones in rem sunt. Veluti si rem corporalem possideat quis, quam Titius suam esse affirmet, et possessor dominum se esse dicat: nam si Titius suam esse intendat, in rem actio est.

to give to, or to do something for, him, or making some other similar allegation. Or else the plaintiff brings an action against a person not made answerable to him by any obligation, but with whom he disputes the right to something, and for such cases real actions are given; as, for example, if a man is in possession of a corporeal thing, which Titius maintains to be his property, while the possessor says that he himself is the proprietor, here, if Titius asserts that the thing is his, the action is real.

GAI. iv. 1-3; D. xlv. 7. 25. pr.

2. Æque si agat, jus sibi esse re, fundo forte vel ædibus utendi, fruendi vel per fundum vicini eundi, agendi vel ex fundo vicini aquam ducendi, in rem actio est. Eiusdem generis est actio de jure prædiorum urbanorum, veluti si agat, jus sibi esse altius ædes suas tollendi prospiciendive vel projiciendi aliquid vel immittendi in vicini ædes. Contra quoque de usufructu et de servitutibus prædiorum rusticorum, item prædiorum urbanorum invicem quoque proditæ sunt actiones, ut quis intendat, jus non esse adversario utendifruendi, eundi, agendi aquamve ducendi, item altius tollendi, prospiciendi, projiciendi, immittendi: istæ quoque actiones in rem sunt, sed negativæ. Quod genus actionis in controversiis rerum corporalium proditum non est: nam in his is agit, qui non possidet: ei vero, qui possidet, non est actio prodita, per quam neget, rem alterius esse. Sane uno casu qui possidet, nihilo minus actoris partes obtinet, sicut in latioribus digestorum libris opportunius apparebit.

2. So, too, if any one alleges that he has a right to the usufruct, for instance, of land, or of a house, or that he has a right of going, or driving his cattle, or of conducting water, over the land of his neighbour, the action is real; as also are actions relating to servitudes of city estates, as when a man alleges a right to raise his house, a right to an uninterrupted view, a right to make part of his house project, or of inserting the beams of his building into his neighbour's walls. On the other hand there are actions relating to usufructs, and the servitudes of country and city estates, which are the reverse of these; as when the complainant alleges that his adversary is not entitled to the usufruct, or has not the right to go, to drive, to conduct water, to raise his house, to have an uninterrupted view, to throw out projections, or to insert his beams. These actions are equally real, but are negative, and cannot therefore be used in disputes respecting things corporeal, for in these disputes it is the person out of possession who brings the action: for a possessor cannot bring an action to deny that the thing is the property of the other party. There is, however, one case, in which a possessor may act the part of plaintiff; which will be more fully seen if reference is made to the books of the Digest.

GAI. iv. 3; D. viii. 5. 2; D. xxxix. 1. 15.

Usufructs, uses, rural and urban servitudes, might be the objects of real actions. These actions were either confessorie or negative; in the former the plaintiff claimed to exercise a servitude over the immoveables of another, in the latter he maintained that a servitude which another attempted to exercise over an immoveable belonging to the plaintiff was not due.

The actio confessoria might be brought either when a person claiming a servitude found this right contested, or when any obstacle, as if a tree overhung a way over which a servitude vive or actus was claimed, prevented the free enjoyment of the servitude. (D. viii. 5. 4. 5.)

The actio confessoria might be brought by the person claiming the servitude, whether he was or was not in possession, that is, in quasi-possession, of the servitude. For example, a man claims a servitude non altius tollendi—that his neighbour should not build his house higher than that of the claimant. Before the neighbour has built his house higher the claimant of the servitude is in possession of the servitude. He has his servitude and enjoys the advantages of it. After the neighbour has built his house higher, the claimant of the servitude has his servitude, but is no longer in possession of it. In either case the claimant of the servitude might bring his actio confessoria (D. viii. 5. 6. 1), although, if he was still in possession, he was further secured by being allowed to apply, if he pleased, for a prohibitory interdict (see Tit. 15) after interdicts were granted to protect servitudes.

The actio negativa was virtually an affirmative action brought by the owner of the immoveable, claiming that the thing was his, freed from the servitude. Originally the possession of a servitude was not protected by interdicts, and the use of the actio negativa was to protect the enjoyment of the thing free from the servitude, or, in other words, to protect the enjoyment of that fragment of the dominium which constituted the servitude, as well as of all other fragments, while the possession of the thing itself was protected by the interdicts uti possidetis. (Tit. 15. 4.) Subsequently the possession of servitudes was protected by interdicts, but still the actio negativa remained as a concurrent remedy with the possessory interdict to protect the enjoyment of that fragment of the dominium which constituted the servitude, just as the actio confessoria remained as a concurrent remedy with the prohibitory interdict to prevent a servitude being infringed.

Sane uno casu. It is a subject of much dispute what is the one case in which the possessor could be plaintiff. Perhaps the words are but a summary of what has gone before. 'There is, indeed, but one case of a person in possession being plaintiff, that, namely, of the possessor of an incorporeal thing.' Perhaps they refer to a person repelling by an exceptio iusti domini the actio Publiciana noticed in par. 4, as such a person had to prove he was owner.

3. Sed istæ quidem actiones, quarum mentionem habuimus, et si quæ sunt similes, ex legitimis et civilibus causis descendunt. Aliæ autem sunt, quas prætor ex sua jurisdictione comparatas habet tam in rem quam in personam, quas et ipsas necessarium est exemplis

3. The actions just mentioned, and those of a similar nature, are derived from particular laws and from the jus civile; but there are others, both real and personal, which the prætor, by virtue of his jurisdiction, has introduced, and of which it is necessary to give some examples: thus the prætor

The actio confessoria might be brought either when a person claiming a servitude found this right contested, or when any obstacle, as if a tree overhung a way over which a servitude vivo or actus was claimed, prevented the free enjoyment of the servitude. (D. viii. 5. 4. 5.)

The actio confessoria might be brought by the person claiming the servitude, whether he was or was not in possession, that is, in quasi-possession, of the servitude. For example, a man claims a servitude non altius tollendi—that his neighbour should not build his house higher than that of the claimant. Before the neighbour has built his house higher the claimant of the servitude is in possession of the servitude. He has his servitude and enjoys the advantages of it. After the neighbour has built his house higher, the claimant of the servitude has his servitude, but is no longer in possession of it. In either case the claimant of the servitude might bring his actio confessoria (D. viii. 5. 6. 1), although, if he was still in possession, he was further secured by being allowed to apply, if he pleased, for a prohibitory interdict (see Tit. 15) after interdicts were granted to protect servitudes.

The actio negativa was virtually an affirmative action brought by the owner of the immoveable, claiming that the thing was his, freed from the servitude. Originally the possession of a servitude was not protected by interdicts, and the use of the actio negativa was to protect the enjoyment of the thing free from the servitude, or, in other words, to protect the enjoyment of that fragment of the dominium which constituted the servitude, as well as of all other fragments, while the possession of the thing itself was protected by the interdicts uti possidetis. (Tit. 15. 4.) Subsequently the possession of servitudes was protected by interdicts, but still the actio negativa remained as a concurrent remedy with the possessory interdict to protect the enjoyment of that fragment of the dominium which constituted the servitude, just as the actio confessoria remained as a concurrent remedy with the prohibitory interdict to prevent a servitude being infringed.

Sane uno casu. It is a subject of much dispute what is the one case in which the possessor could be plaintiff. Perhaps the words are but a summary of what has gone before. 'There is, indeed, but one case of a person in possession being plaintiff, that, namely, of the possessor of an incorporeal thing.' Perhaps they refer to a person repelling by an exceptio iusti domini the actio Publiciana noticed in par. 4, as such a person had to prove he was owner.

3. Sed istæ quidem actiones, quarum mentionem habuimus, et si quæ sunt similes, ex legitimis et civilibus causis descendunt. Aliæ autem sunt, quas prætor ex sua jurisdictione comparatas habet tam in rem quam in personam, quas et ipsas necessarium est exemplis

3. The actions just mentioned, and those of a similar nature, are derived from particular laws and from the jus civile; but there are others, both real and personal, which the prætor, by virtue of his jurisdiction, has introduced, and of which it is necessary to give some examples: thus the prætor

ostendere. Ecce plerumque ita permittit in rem agere, ut vel actor diceret, se quasi usucepisse, quod usu non cepit, vel ex diverso possessorem diceret, adversarium suum usu non cepisse, quod usuceperit.

often permits a real action to be brought, by which the plaintiff is allowed to allege that he has acquired, as it were by usucapio, something which he has not so acquired; or by which, on the contrary, he alleges that his adversary, the possessor, has not acquired something by usucapio, which, in reality, he has so acquired.

D. xlv. 7. 25. 2.

The second division of actions, given in this Title, is that of civil and prætorian. The two methods principally adopted by the prætor to give an action in cases not provided for by the civil law, were, as already stated (pr. note 2), either to construct a formula on a fictitious hypothesis, or make the action one in factum concepta. The three following paragraphs give examples of fictitious actions in rem.

Justinian notices five prætorian actions in rem, viz. the actio Publiciana, the actio in rem rescissoria, the actio Pauliana, the actio Serviana, and the actio quasi Serviana, and gives as instances of the numerous prætorian actions in personam, the actions de pecunia constituta, de peculio, &c. (See par. 8 et seq.)

4. Namque si cui ex justa causa res aliena tradita fuerit, veluti ex causa emptionis aut donationis aut dotis aut legatorum, necdum ejus rei dominus effectus est, si ejus rei casu possessionem amisit, nullam habet directam in rem actionem ad eam rem persequendam: quippe ita proditæ sunt jure civili actiones, ut quis dominium suum vindicet. Sed quia sane durum erat, eo casu deficere actionem, inventa est a prætore actio, in qua dicit is, qui possessionem amisit, eam rem se usucepisse et ita vindicat suam esse. Quæ actio Publiciana appellatur, quoniam primum a Publicio prætore in edicto proposita est.

4. For instance, if anything belonging to another is delivered by a legal mode, as by purchase, gift, dos, or legacy, to a person who has not yet become proprietor of the thing delivered, if he chances to lose the possession, he has no direct real action for its recovery; inasmuch as the civil law only permits such actions to be brought by the proprietor. But, as it was very hard that there should be no action given in such a case, the prætor has introduced one, in which the person who has lost the possession alleges that he has acquired the thing in question by usucapio, although he has not really so acquired it, and he thus claims it as his own. This action is called the actio Publiciana, because it was first placed in the edict by the prætor Publicius.

GAI. iv. 36.

When any one except the real owner of the thing (dominus) delivered over a thing on a ground and in a mode which would have sufficed to pass the property, if he had had it to pass, or if an owner of a thing transferred a thing by a mode insufficient to pass the dominium, as if a res mancipi was delivered without mancipation, the person, in either of these cases, to whom the thing was delivered, being a bona fide possessor, could perfect his title to it by usucapion; but if he lost the thing out of his possesostendere. Ecce plerumque ita permittit in rem agere, ut vel actor diceret, se quasi usucepisse, quod usu non cepisset, vel ex diverso possessorem diceret, adversarium suum usu non cepisse, quod usuceperit.

often permits a real action to be brought, by which the plaintiff is allowed to allege that he has acquired, as it were by usucapio, something which he has not so acquired; or by which, on the contrary, he alleges that his adversary, the possessor, has not acquired something by usucapio, which, in reality, he has so acquired.

D. xliv. 7. 25. 2.

The second division of actions, given in this Title, is that of civil and prætorian. The two methods principally adopted by the prætor to give an action in cases not provided for by the civil law, were, as already stated (pr. note 2), either to construct a formula on a fictitious hypothesis, or make the action one in factum concepta. The three following paragraphs give examples of fictitious actions in rem.

Justinian notices five prætorian actions in rem, viz. the actio Publiciana, the actio in rem rescissoria, the actio Pauliana, the actio Serviana, and the actio quasi Serviana, and gives as instances of the numerous prætorian actions in personam, the actions de pecunia constituta, de peculio, &c. (See par. 8 et seq.)

Actio Publiciana

4. Namque si cui ex justa causa res aliena tradita fuerit, veluti ex causa emptionis aut donationis aut dotis aut legatorum, necdum ejus rei dominus effectus est, si ejus rei casu possessionem amiserit, nullam habet directam in rem actionem ad eam rem persequendam: quippe ita proditæ sunt jure civili actiones, ut quis dominium suum vindicet. Sed quia sane durum erat, eo casu deficere actionem, inventa est a prætore actio, in qua dicit is, qui possessionem amisit, eam rem se usucepisse et ita vindicat suam esse. Quæ actio Publiciana appellatur, quoniam primum a Publicio prætore in edicto proposita est.

4. For instance, if anything belonging to another is delivered by a legal mode, as by purchase, gift, dos, or legacy, to a person who has not yet become proprietor of the thing delivered, if he chances to lose the possession, he has no direct real action for its recovery; inasmuch as the civil law only permits such actions to be brought by the proprietor. But, as it was very hard that there should be no action given in such a case, the prætor has introduced one, in which the person who has lost the possession alleges that he has acquired the thing in question by usucapio, although he has not really so acquired it, and he thus claims it as his own. This action is called the actio Publiciana, because it was first placed in the edict by the prætor Publicius.

GAI. iv. 36.

When any one except the real owner of the thing (dominus) delivered over a thing on a ground and in a mode which would have sufficed to pass the property, if he had had it to pass, or if an owner of a thing transferred a thing by a mode insufficient to pass the dominium, as if a res mancipi was delivered without mancipation, the person, in either of these cases, to whom the thing was delivered, being a bona fide possessor, could perfect his title to it by usucapion; but if he lost the thing out of his possession after it was delivered to him, but before the time necessary to complete the usucapion had expired, the civil law gave him no remedy, for he was not the dominus, and none but a dominus could claim a thing by 'vindicatio.' The actio Publiciana, an actio fictitia in ius concepta, was therefore given for his relief by the prætor Publicius, perhaps the Publicius mentioned as prætor by Cicero (Pro Cluent. 45). In this action the plaintiff was allowed to state what was in fact not true, that the usucapion was complete, and thus to claim as if his ownership was absolute. If the thing had fallen into the hands of a person who himself claimed to be really the dominus, and to have a bona fide ground of repelling the actio Publiciana, it could be repelled by an exception termed the exceptio iusti domini. (D. vi. 2. 16.)

If it had fallen into the hands of a person who did not claim to be the owner, but who had so acquired it as to be in a situation to perfect his title by usucapion, i.e. who was also a bona fide possessor, and the plaintiff brought an actio Publiciana for it before the time of the usucapion had expired, the title of the actual holder of the thing was considered the better; for in pari causa melior est conditio possidentis. The formula of the action ran thus: 'Judex esto. Si quem hominem Aulus Agerius emit et is ei traditus esset, anno possedisset, tum si eum hominem, de quo agitur, ejus ex jure Quiritium esse oporteret,' &c. (GAI. iv. 36.)

The actio Publiciana might also be useful to a person who was really the owner; for, while the distinction between res Mancipi and nec Mancipi was retained, the owner of a thing requiring to be passed by mancipation might have himself received it by mancipation, but be unable to show that the person who transferred it to him was really the dominus, and had in his turn received it by mancipation. If he lost the thing before he had perfected the title by usucapion, he could not bring a vindicatio, but was obliged to have recourse to the actio Publiciana; and before the legislation of Justinian this action was especially useful to persons who had received a transfer of things which, like provincial lands, could not be made the subject of a perfect dominium, and the title to which could not be perfected by usucapion (see Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr. note); for they were allowed to bring this fictitious action if they were deprived of the possession, at any rate after the time entitling them to use the præscriptio longi temporis had elapsed. (C. vii. 39. 8.)

5. Rursus ex diverso si quis, cum rei publicæ causa abesset vel in hostium potestate esset, rem ejus, qui in civitate esset, usuceperit, permittitur domino, si possessor rei publicæ causa abesse desiderit, tunc intra annum, rescissa usucapione, eam petere, id est ita petere, ut dicat, possessorem usu non cepisse et ob id suam esse rem. Quod

5. Conversely, if any one, while abroad in the service of his country, or a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, has acquired by usucapion a thing which belongs to another person resident at home, then the proprietor is permitted, within a year after the return of the possessor, to sue for the thing by rescinding the usucapion; that is, he may allege that the possession after it was delivered to him, but before the time necessary to complete the usucapion had expired, the civil law gave him no remedy, for he was not the dominus, and none but a dominus could claim a thing by 'vindicatio.' The actio Publiciana, an actio fictitia in ius concepta, was therefore given for his relief by the prætor Publicius, perhaps the Publicius mentioned as prætor by Cicero (Pro Cluent. 45). In this action the plaintiff was allowed to state what was in fact not true, that the usucapion was complete, and thus to claim as if his ownership was absolute. If the thing had fallen into the hands of a person who himself claimed to be really the dominus, and to have a bona fide ground of repelling the actio Publiciana, it could be repelled by an exception termed the exceptio iusti domini. (D. vi. 2. 16.)

If it had fallen into the hands of a person who did not claim to be the owner, but who had so acquired it as to be in a situation to perfect his title by usucapion, i.e. who was also a bona fide possessor, and the plaintiff brought an actio Publiciana for it before the time of the usucapion had expired, the title of the actual holder of the thing was considered the better; for in pari causa melior est conditio possidentis. The formula of the action ran thus: 'Judex esto. Si quem hominem Aulus Agerius emit et is ei traditus esset, anno possedisset, tum si eum hominem, de quo agitur, ejus ex jure Quiritium esse oporteret,' &c. (GAI. iv. 36.)

The actio Publiciana might also be useful to a person who was really the owner; for, while the distinction between res Mancipi and nec Mancipi was retained, the owner of a thing requiring to be passed by mancipation might have himself received it by mancipation, but be unable to show that the person who transferred it to him was really the dominus, and had in his turn received it by mancipation. If he lost the thing before he had perfected the title by usucapion, he could not bring a vindicatio, but was obliged to have recourse to the actio Publiciana; and before the legislation of Justinian this action was especially useful to persons who had received a transfer of things which, like provincial lands, could not be made the subject of a perfect dominium, and the title to which could not be perfected by usucapion (see Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr. note); for they were allowed to bring this fictitious action if they were deprived of the possession, at any rate after the time entitling them to use the præscriptio longi temporis had elapsed. (C. vii. 39. 8.)

5. Rursus ex diverso si quis, cum rei publicæ causa abesset vel in hostium potestate esset, rem ejus, qui in civitate esset, usuceperit, permittitur domino, si possessor rei publicæ causa abesse desiderit, tunc intra annum, rescissa usucapione, eam petere, id est ita petere, ut dicat, possessorem usu non cepisse et ob id suam esse rem. Quod

5. Conversely, if any one, while abroad in the service of his country, or a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, has acquired by usucapion a thing which belongs to another person resident at home, then the proprietor is permitted, within a year after the return of the possessor, to sue for the thing by rescinding the usucapion; that is, he may allege that the possesgenus actionis et aliis, simili æquitate motus, prætor accommodat, sicut ex latiore digestorum seu pandectarum volumine intellegere licet.

sor has not acquired by usucapio, and that the thing therefore is his. Similar feelings of equity have led the prætor to grant this species of action to some other persons also, as may be learned from the larger treatise of the Digest or Pandects.

D. iv. 6. 21; D. iv. 1. 1; D. iv. 6. 1. 1.

This paragraph gives the converse case. Before, the usucapion was not complete, and the action supplied what was wanting to it. Here the usucapion is complete, and the action takes away its effect.

Such an action might be wanted in either of two cases. Either the proprietor of the thing might be absent, or deprived, on some legitimate ground, of the power of attending to his affairs, and during this time the usucapion might have been completed against him; or the possessor, the person in whose favour the time of usucapion was running, might have been absent, and the proprietor, not being able to sue him, might have been unable to stop the usucapion. In either of these cases this actio in rem, called rescissoria, because the usucapion was rescinded, came to the aid of the proprietor. It is to be remarked that Justinian notices only the latter of the two cases, and yet he had provided a much more simple remedy in behalf of proprietors, who were allowed to interrupt the usucapion of an absent possessor by a protestation made before a magistrate. (C. vii. 40. 2.)

This actio rescissoria, an actio fictitia in jus concepta, had to be brought within a year, commencing from the time when it first became possible to bring the action. Intra annum, quo primum de ea re experiri potestas erit. (D. iv. 6. 1. 1.) The year was a utilis annus, and its length, therefore, varied in different cases, for which Justinian substituted the uniform term of four years. (C. v. 53. 7.)

Quibusdam et aliis. Such as the restitutio in integrum, by which the prætor protected a person under the age of twenty-five years. (See Bk. i. Tit. 23. pr. note.)

6. Item si quis in fraudem creditorum rem suam alicui tradiderit, bonis ejus a creditoribus ex sententia præsidis possessis, permittitur ipsis creditoribus, rescissa traditione, eam rem petere, id est dicere, eam rem traditam non esse et ob id in bonis debitoris mansisse.

6. Again, if a debtor delivers to a third person anything that is his property in order to defraud his creditors, who have been put in possession of his goods by order of the præses, the creditors are permitted to rescind the delivery, and bring an action for the thing delivered; that is, they may allege that the thing was not delivered, and that it therefore has continued to be a part of the debtor's goods.

Theophilus tells us that this action, an actio fictitia in jus concepta, was called the actio Pauliana. The lex Alia Sentia (see Bk. i. Tit. 6) had made enfranchisements in fraud of creditors genus actionis et aliis, simili æquitate motus, prætor accommodat, sicut ex latiore digestorum seu pandectarum volumine intellegere licet.

sor has not acquired by usucapio, and that the thing therefore is his. Similar feelings of equity have led the prætor to grant this species of action to some other persons also, as may be learned from the larger treatise of the Digest or Pandects.

D. iv. 6. 21; D. iv. 1. 1; D. iv. 6. 1. 1.

This paragraph gives the converse case. Before, the usucapion was not complete, and the action supplied what was wanting to it. Here the usucapion is complete, and the action takes away its effect.

Such an action might be wanted in either of two cases. Either the proprietor of the thing might be absent, or deprived, on some legitimate ground, of the power of attending to his affairs, and during this time the usucapion might have been completed against him; or the possessor, the person in whose favour the time of usucapion was running, might have been absent, and the proprietor, not being able to sue him, might have been unable to stop the usucapion. In either of these cases this actio in rem, called rescissoria, because the usucapion was rescinded, came to the aid of the proprietor. It is to be remarked that Justinian notices only the latter of the two cases, and yet he had provided a much more simple remedy in behalf of proprietors, who were allowed to interrupt the usucapion of an absent possessor by a protestation made before a magistrate. (C. vii. 40. 2.)

This actio rescissoria, an actio fictitia in jus concepta, had to be brought within a year, commencing from the time when it first became possible to bring the action. Intra annum, quo primum de ea re experiri potestas erit. (D. iv. 6. 1. 1.) The year was a utilis annus, and its length, therefore, varied in different cases, for which Justinian substituted the uniform term of four years. (C. v. 53. 7.)

Quibusdam et aliis. Such as the restitutio in integrum, by which the prætor protected a person under the age of twenty-five years. (See Bk. i. Tit. 23. pr. note.)

6. Item si quis in fraudem creditorum rem suam alicui tradiderit, bonis ejus a creditoribus ex sententia præsidis possessis, permittitur ipsis creditoribus, rescissa traditione, eam rem petere, id est dicere, eam rem traditam non esse et ob id in bonis debitoris mansisse.

6. Again, if a debtor delivers to a third person anything that is his property in order to defraud his creditors, who have been put in possession of his goods by order of the præses, the creditors are permitted to rescind the delivery, and bring an action for the thing delivered; that is, they may allege that the thing was not delivered, and that it therefore has continued to be a part of the debtor's goods.

Theophilus tells us that this action, an actio fictitia in jus concepta, was called the actio Pauliana. The lex Alia Sentia (see Bk. i. Tit. 6) had made enfranchisements in fraud of creditors void; but the law did not extend to alienations; and the prætor, therefore, when the creditors had taken possession of the effects of the debtor, permitted them to reclaim anything which had been alienated after insolvency and with intent to defraud.

This actio Pauliana in rem (says Ortolan) is not spoken of elsewhere in the whole corpus juris of Justinian. It must not be confounded with the actio Pauliana in personam treated of in the Digest (xxii. 1. 38. pr. and 4), which was given not only in case of alienation, but of every act whereby the debtor had fraudulently diminished his assets. The intentio of the actio in personam was directed not, as that of the actio in rem, which forms the subject of this paragraph, against any one who happened to be the person detaining the thing claimed, but against either (1) the debtor, or (2) persons who, having notice of the fraud, acquired any part of the assets, or (3) persons without notice, who profited by the fraudulent act, in this last case, however, the liability being limited to the extent to which they had profited. (D. xlii. 8. 6. 11; D. xlii. 8. 9.)

7. Item Serviana et quasi Serviana, quæ etiam hypothecaria vocatur, ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione substantiam capit. Serviana autem experitur quis de rebus coloni, quæ pignoris jure pro mercedibus fundi ei tenentur; quasi Serviana autem qua creditores pignora hypothecasve persequuntur. Inter pignus autem et hypothecam quantum ad actionem hypothecariam nihil interest: nam de qua re inter creditorem et debitorem convenerit, ut sit pro debito obligata, utraque hac appellatione continetur. Sed in aliis differentia est: nam pignoris appellatione eam proprie contineri dicimus, quæ simul etiam traditur creditori, maxime si mobilis sit: at eam, quæ sine traditione nuda conventionione tenetur, proprie hypothecæ appellatione contineri dicimus.

7. The actio Serviana, and the actio quasi-Serviana also called hypothecaria, equally take their rise from the prætor's jurisdiction. The actio Serviana is brought to get possession of the effects of a farmer which are held as a pledge to secure the rent of the land. The actio quasi-Serviana is that by which creditors sue for things pledged or mortgaged to them; and, as regards this action, there is no difference between a pledge and a hypotheca; for the two terms are indifferently applied to anything which the debtor and creditor agree shall be bound as security for the debt: but in other points there is a distinction between them. The term pledge is properly applied to a thing which has actually been delivered to a creditor, especially if the thing is a moveable; the term hypotheca to anything bound by simple agreement without delivery.

D. xx. 2. 4; D. xx. 1. 17; D. xx. 5. 1; D. xiii. 7. 9. 2.

We have already given a slight sketch of the jus pignoris, and the relative position of the creditor and debtor, at the end of the fifth Title of the Second Book. The interest of the creditor was not thought sufficient to support a vindicatio if he lost the thing pledged out of his possession, or wished to get the thing subjected to a hypotheca into his possession; but a prætorian action enabled him to effect this. The actio Serviana mentioned in this paragraph (to be distinguished from that mentioned in GAI. iv. 35) was given to enforce the claim of the landlord to the farming instruments, which, without any special agreement were considered, in void; but the law did not extend to alienations; and the prætor, therefore, when the creditors had taken possession of the effects of the debtor, permitted them to reclaim anything which had been alienated after insolvency and with intent to defraud.

This actio Pauliana in rem (says Ortolan) is not spoken of elsewhere in the whole corpus juris of Justinian. It must not be confounded with the actio Pauliana in personam treated of in the Digest (xxii. 1. 38. pr. and 4), which was given not only in case of alienation, but of every act whereby the debtor had fraudulently diminished his assets. The intentio of the actio in personam was directed not, as that of the actio in rem, which forms the subject of this paragraph, against any one who happened to be the person detaining the thing claimed, but against either (1) the debtor, or (2) persons who, having notice of the fraud, acquired any part of the assets, or (3) persons without notice, who profited by the fraudulent act, in this last case, however, the liability being limited to the extent to which they had profited. (D. xlii. 8. 6. 11; D. xlii. 8. 9.)

7. Item Serviana et quasi Serviana, quæ etiam hypothecaria vocatur, ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione substantiam capit. Serviana autem experitur quis de rebus coloni, quæ pignoris jure pro mercedibus fundi ei tenentur; quasi Serviana autem qua creditores pignora hypothecasve persequuntur. Inter pignus autem et hypothecam quantum ad actionem hypothecariam nihil interest: nam de qua re inter creditorem et debitorem conveniret, ut sit pro debito obligata, utraque hac appellatione continetur. Sed in aliis differentia est: nam pignoris appellatione eam proprie contineri dicimus, quæ simul etiam traditur creditori, maxime si mobilis sit: at eam, quæ sine traditione nuda conventionione tenetur, proprie hypothecæ appellatione contineri dicimus.

7. The actio Serviana, and the actio quasi-Serviana also called hypothecaria, equally take their rise from the prætor's jurisdiction. The actio Serviana is brought to get possession of the effects of a farmer which are held as a pledge to secure the rent of the land. The actio quasi-Serviana is that by which creditors sue for things pledged or mortgaged to them; and, as regards this action, there is no difference between a pledge and a hypotheca; for the two terms are indifferently applied to anything which the debtor and creditor agree shall be bound as security for the debt: but in other points there is a distinction between them. The term pledge is properly applied to a thing which has actually been delivered to a creditor, especially if the thing is a moveable; the term hypotheca to anything bound by simple agreement without delivery.

D. xx. 2. 4; D. xx. 1. 17; D. xx. 5. 1; D. xiii. 7. 9. 2.

We have already given a slight sketch of the jus pignoris, and the relative position of the creditor and debtor, at the end of the fifth Title of the Second Book. The interest of the creditor was not thought sufficient to support a vindicatio if he lost the thing pledged out of his possession, or wished to get the thing subjected to a hypotheca into his possession; but a prætorian action enabled him to effect this. The actio Serviana mentioned in this paragraph (to be distinguished from that mentioned in GAI. iv. 35) was given to enforce the claim of the landlord to the farming instruments, which, without any special agreement were considered, in law, to be held as a pledge for the rent of the farm, and the actio quasi-Serviana was an extension of this, giving a means to every creditor of enforcing his right to anything pledged or mortgaged. Both actions were in factum.

Maxime si mobilis sit. An immoveable might of course be given in pledge; but it would generally happen that things given in pledge were moveables.

A thing subjected to successive hypothecæ belonged, as we have said in treating of the real right given by the jus pignoris (Bk. ii. Tit. 5), to the person in whose favour the first hypotheca was constituted. If, therefore, a creditor, whose hypotheca was subsequent, brought the actio quasi-Serviana against a creditor whose hypotheca was prior, he would be repelled by an exception. (C. viii. 18. 6.) Even a creditor having a pignus, i.e. having been put in possession, was postponed to a prior creditor who had only a hypotheca. (D. xx. 1. 10.)

8. In personam quoque actiones ex sua jurisdictione propositas habet prætor, veluti de pecunia constituta: cui similis videbatur receptitia; sed ex nostra constitutione, cum et, si quid plenius habebat, hoc in pecuniam constitutam transfusum est, ea quasi supervacua jussa est cum sua auctoritate a nostris legibus recedere. Item prætor proposuit de peculio servorum filiorumque familias et ex qua quæritur, an actor juraverit, et alias complures.

8. There are also personal actions which the prætor has introduced in the exercise of his jurisdiction, as, for instance, the action de pecunia constituta, which that called receptitia much resembled. But by our constitution the actio receptitia has been rendered superfluous by all its advantages being transferred to the actio pecunie constituta, and has, therefore, lost its authority, and disappeared from our legislation. The prætor has likewise introduced an action concerning the peculium of slaves and of filii familias, and an action in which the question is tried, whether the plaintiff has made oath, and many others.

C. iv. 18. 2. pr. and 1.

9. De pecunia autem constituta cum omnibus agitur, quicumque vel pro se vel pro alio soluturos se constituerint, nulla scilicet stipulatione interposita. Nam aliquin si stipulanti promiserint, jure civili tenentur.

9. The actio de constituta pecunia may be brought against any person who has engaged to pay money, either for himself or another, that is, without having made a stipulation; for, if he has promised a stipulator, he is bound by the civil law.

D. xiii. 5. 5. 2.

The actio de constituta pecunia was an action by which the prætor enforced a mere pact or agreement (not a stipulation, for then the action would have been ex stipulatu) by which a person promised again what he already owed, or promised what another owed, fixing the time for payment. This agreement (constitutum) did not operate as a novation, but was enforced as subsidiary to the main contract. Originally the actio de constituta pecunia only applied to things which could form the subject of a matrimonium, i.e. things quæ numero, pondere, mensurave constant; and in law, to be held as a pledge for the rent of the farm, and the actio quasi-Serviana was an extension of this, giving a means to every creditor of enforcing his right to anything pledged or mortgaged. Both actions were in factum.

Maxime si mobilis sit. An immoveable might of course be given in pledge; but it would generally happen that things given in pledge were moveables.

A thing subjected to successive hypothecæ belonged, as we have said in treating of the real right given by the jus pignoris (Bk. ii. Tit. 5), to the person in whose favour the first hypotheca was constituted. If, therefore, a creditor, whose hypotheca was subsequent, brought the actio quasi-Serviana against a creditor whose hypotheca was prior, he would be repelled by an exception. (C. viii. 18. 6.) Even a creditor having a pignus, i.e. having been put in possession, was postponed to a prior creditor who had only a hypotheca. (D. xx. 1. 10.)

8. In personam quoque actiones ex sua jurisdictione propositas habet prætor, veluti de pecunia constituta: cui similis videbatur receptitia; sed ex nostra constitutione, cum et, si quid plenius habebat, hoc in pecuniam constitutam transfusum est, ea quasi supervacua jussa est cum sua auctoritate a nostris legibus recedere. Item prætor proposuit de peculio servorum filiorumque familias et ex qua quæritur, an actor juraverit, et alias complures.

8. There are also personal actions which the prætor has introduced in the exercise of his jurisdiction, as, for instance, the action de pecunia constituta, which that called receptitia much resembled. But by our constitution the actio receptitia has been rendered superfluous by all its advantages being transferred to the actio pecunie constituta, and has, therefore, lost its authority, and disappeared from our legislation. The prætor has likewise introduced an action concerning the peculium of slaves and of filii familias, and an action in which the question is tried, whether the plaintiff has made oath, and many others.

C. iv. 18. 2. pr. and 1.

9. De pecunia autem constituta cum omnibus agitur, quicumque vel pro se vel pro alio soluturos se constituerint, nulla scilicet stipulatione interposita. Nam aliquin si stipulanti promiserint, jure civili tenentur.

9. The actio de constituta pecunia may be brought against any person who has engaged to pay money, either for himself or another, that is, without having made a stipulation; for, if he has promised a stipulator, he is bound by the civil law.

D. xiii. 5. 5. 2.

The actio de constituta pecunia was an action by which the prætor enforced a mere pact or agreement (not a stipulation, for then the action would have been ex stipulatu) by which a person promised again what he already owed, or promised what another owed, fixing the time for payment. This agreement (constitutum) did not operate as a novation, but was enforced as subsidiary to the main contract. Originally the actio de constituta pecunia only applied to things which could form the subject of a mutuum, i.e. things quæ numero, pondere, mensurave constant; and in certain cases it could be brought only within a year. (C. iv. 18. 2. pr.) The pecunia was said to be constituta because it was agreed to be paid on a particular day. The actio receptitia was an action given against bankers (argentarii) who promised to satisfy the demands of a creditor of one of their customers. This creditor was said recipere diem, to have a day fixed by the banker for payment of his claim, and hence the action was called receptitia. The mere promise of the banker was considered enough to ground an action on, an exception to the ordinary rules of the civil law which must have grown out of the peculiar character of a banker's business. What the civil law confined to bankers only the prætor extended to every one alike; and whenever any one who owed a debt to another or had funds of another in his hand, promised to pay the money owed by or deposited with him on a particular day, the prætor gave the action de constituta pecunia to enforce the fulfilment of the promise.

Justinian abolished the actio receptitia, and invested the actio de constituta pecunia with privileges which had before belonged exclusively to the actio receptitia; for he made it in all cases perpetual, and he allowed it to be brought whatever was the nature of the thing promised. (C. iv. 18. 2.)

The pact to pay might be advantageous to the creditor, if it was the debt of another that was agreed to be paid, or if the antecedent obligation was only a natural one, or if the time in which the original debt could be sued on was on the point of expiring.

10. Actionem autem de peculio ideo adversus patrem dominumve comparavit prætor, quia licet ex contractu filiorum servorumve ipso jure non teneantur, æquum tamen esset, peculio tenus, quod veluti patrimonium est filiorum filiarumque, item servorum, condemnari eos.

10. The prætor has introduced actions de peculio against fathers and masters, because, although they are not, according to the civil law, bound by the contracts of their children and slaves, yet they ought in equity to be bound to the extent of the peculium, which is a kind of patrimony of sons and daughters, and of slaves.

D. xv. 1. 47. 6.

Actions de peculio are treated of in par. 4 of next Title.

11. Item si quis postulante adversario juraverit, deberi sibi pecuniam, quam peteret, neque ei solvatur, justissime accommodat ei talem actionem, per quam non illud quaeritur, an ei pecunia debeatur, sed an juraverit.

11. Also, if any one, when called upon by his adversary, makes oath that the debt which he sues for is due and unpaid, the prætor most justly grants him an action, in which the inquiry is not whether the debt is due, but whether the oath has been made.

D. xii. 2. 3; D. xii. 2. 5. 2.

Either party might challenge the other to swear to the truth of his statement. This might be done out of court, and if the party challenged took the oath, his statement could no longer be impugned by the person who had challenged him. For instance, if the creditor, being challenged, swore that the debt was due, the certain cases it could be brought only within a year. (C. iv. 18. 2. pr.) The pecunia was said to be constituta because it was agreed to be paid on a particular day. The actio receptitia was an action given against bankers (argentarii) who promised to satisfy the demands of a creditor of one of their customers. This creditor was said recipere diem, to have a day fixed by the banker for payment of his claim, and hence the action was called receptitia. The mere promise of the banker was considered enough to ground an action on, an exception to the ordinary rules of the civil law which must have grown out of the peculiar character of a banker's business. What the civil law confined to bankers only the prætor extended to every one alike; and whenever any one who owed a debt to another or had funds of another in his hand, promised to pay the money owed by or deposited with him on a particular day, the prætor gave the action de constituta pecunia to enforce the fulfilment of the promise.

Justinian abolished the actio receptitia, and invested the actio de constituta pecunia with privileges which had before belonged exclusively to the actio receptitia; for he made it in all cases perpetual, and he allowed it to be brought whatever was the nature of the thing promised. (C. iv. 18. 2.)

The pact to pay might be advantageous to the creditor, if it was the debt of another that was agreed to be paid, or if the antecedent obligation was only a natural one, or if the time in which the original debt could be sued on was on the point of expiring.

10. Actionem autem de peculio ideo adversus patrem dominumve comparavit prætor, quia licet ex contractu filiorum servorumve ipso jure non teneantur, æquum tamen esset, peculio tenus, quod veluti patrimonium est filiorum filiarumque, item servorum, condemnari eos.

10. The prætor has introduced actions de peculio against fathers and masters, because, although they are not, according to the civil law, bound by the contracts of their children and slaves, yet they ought in equity to be bound to the extent of the peculium, which is a kind of patrimony of sons and daughters, and of slaves.

D. xv. 1. 47. 6.

Actions de peculio are treated of in par. 4 of next Title.

11. Item si quis postulante adversario juraverit, deberi sibi pecuniam, quam peteret, neque ei solvatur, justissime accommodat ei talem actionem, per quam non illud quaeritur, an ei pecunia debeatur, sed an juraverit.

11. Also, if any one, when called upon by his adversary, makes oath that the debt which he sues for is due and unpaid, the prætor most justly grants him an action, in which the inquiry is not whether the debt is due, but whether the oath has been made.

D. xii. 2. 3; D. xii. 2. 5. 2.

Either party might challenge the other to swear to the truth of his statement. This might be done out of court, and if the party challenged took the oath, his statement could no longer be impugned by the person who had challenged him. For instance, if the creditor, being challenged, swore that the debt was due, the debtor was obliged to pay. The only question, therefore, which could be subsequently referred to a court of justice was whether the oath had or had not been taken, inquiry into which circumstance was made under an actio in factum given by the prætor.

12. Pœnales quoque actiones prætor bene multas ex sua jurisdictione introduxit: veluti adversus eum, qui quid ex albo ejus corrupisset: et in eum, qui patronum vel parentem in jus vocasset, cum id non impetrasset: item adversus eum, qui vi exemerit eum, qui in jus vocaretur, cujusve dolo alius exemerit: et alias innumerabiles.

12. The prætor has also introduced very many penal actions by virtue of his jurisdiction. As, for instance, against a person who has tampered with the prætor's album; against those who summon patron or ascendant without obtaining previous permission; against those who carry away by force any one summoned to appear before a magistrate, or fraudulently induce a third person to carry him off; and very many other actions.

GAL. iv. 46.

The album was the tablet suspended in the forum, containing the ordinances of the prætor. Any attempt to injure or deface it was punished by an action de albo corrupto. (D. ii. 1. 7. pr.)

In eum, qui patronum, &c.; see Tit. 16. 3.

The actio de in jus vocato vi exempto was given against a person who rescued with violence any one who, after disobeying a notice to appear in jure, was being forcibly conveyed before the magistrate. The penalty was the amount at which the plaintiff estimated his claim in the action he had commenced against the person rescued, while this person rescued remained still liable to the action he had been summoned to answer. The actions under all the heads mentioned in this paragraph were in factum. (D. ii. 7. 5. 1.)

13. Præjudiciales actiones in rem esse videntur, quales sunt, per quas queritur, an aliquis liber vel an libertus sit, vel de partu agnoscendo. Ex quibus fere una illa legitimam causam habet, per quam queritur, an aliquis liber sit: ceteræ ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione substantiam capiunt.

13. Pre-judicial actions seem to be real actions; such are those by which it is inquired whether a man is born free, or has been made free, or whether he is the offspring of his reputed father. But of these, that alone by which it is inquired whether a man is free, belongs to the civil law. The others spring from the prætor's jurisdiction.

GAL. iv. 44; C. viii. 47. 9.

The object of a præjudicialis actio was to ascertain a fact, the establishing of which was a necessary preliminary to further judicial proceedings. (See Introd. sec. 104.) Such actions differ from actions in rem, because in an actio præjudicialis no one is condemned, only the fact is ascertained; but they are said in the text to resemble actions in rem, because they were not brought on any obligation, and because in the intentio, which indeed composed the whole formula in this case, no mention was made of any particular person against whom the action was directed.

Questions of status, such as those of paternity, filiation, pa-debtor was obliged to pay. The only question, therefore, which could be subsequently referred to a court of justice was whether the oath had or had not been taken, inquiry into which circumstance was made under an actio in factum given by the prætor.

12. Pœnales quoque actiones prætor bene multas ex sua jurisdictione introduxit: veluti adversus eum, qui quid ex albo ejus corrupisset: et in eum, qui patronum vel parentem in jus vocasset, cum id non impetrasset: item adversus eum, qui vi exemerit eum, qui in jus vocaretur, cujusve dolo alius exemerit: et alias innumerabiles.

12. The prætor has also introduced very many penal actions by virtue of his jurisdiction. As, for instance, against a person who has tampered with the prætor's album; against those who summon patron or ascendant without obtaining previous permission; against those who carry away by force any one summoned to appear before a magistrate, or fraudulently induce a third person to carry him off; and very many other actions.

GAL. iv. 46.

The album was the tablet suspended in the forum, containing the ordinances of the prætor. Any attempt to injure or deface it was punished by an action de albo corrupto. (D. ii. 1. 7. pr.)

In eum, qui patronum, &c.; see Tit. 16. 3.

The actio de in jus vocato vi exempto was given against a person who rescued with violence any one who, after disobeying a notice to appear in jure, was being forcibly conveyed before the magistrate. The penalty was the amount at which the plaintiff estimated his claim in the action he had commenced against the person rescued, while this person rescued remained still liable to the action he had been summoned to answer. The actions under all the heads mentioned in this paragraph were in factum. (D. ii. 7. 5. 1.)

13. Præjudiciales actiones in rem esse videntur, quales sunt, per quas queritur, an aliquis liber vel an libertus sit, vel de partu agnoscendo. Ex quibus fere una illa legitimam causam habet, per quam queritur, an aliquis liber sit: ceteræ ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione substantiam capiunt.

13. Pre-judicial actions seem to be real actions; such are those by which it is inquired whether a man is born free, or has been made free, or whether he is the offspring of his reputed father. But of these, that alone by which it is inquired whether a man is free, belongs to the civil law. The others spring from the prætor's jurisdiction.

GAL. iv. 44; C. viii. 47. 9.

The object of a præjudicialis actio was to ascertain a fact, the establishing of which was a necessary preliminary to further judicial proceedings. (See Introd. sec. 104.) Such actions differ from actions in rem, because in an actio præjudicialis no one is condemned, only the fact is ascertained; but they are said in the text to resemble actions in rem, because they were not brought on any obligation, and because in the intentio, which indeed composed the whole formula in this case, no mention was made of any particular person against whom the action was directed.

Questions of status, such as those of paternity, filiation, patronage, and the like, were most commonly the subjects of actiones prejudiciales, but were by no means the only ones. We hear of others, such as quanta dos sit (GAL. iv. 44); an ea res de qua agitur major sit centum sestertiis (PAUL. Sent. v. 9. 1); an bona jure venierint (D. xlii. 5. 30).

The liberalis causa, the suit in which the status of a supposed slave was ascertained, was originally nothing else but a vindicatio. The person called the assertor libertatis claimed him, and the master of the slave defended his possession. If the decision was in favour of the assertor, it was still open to another person to attempt to prove that the subject of the suit was really a slave; if the decision was in favour of the master, another assertor could bring a fresh suit; but there could only be three assertores in all. If the supposed slave was thrice adjudged a slave, his status could be no further questioned. Justinian entirely altered the action, by allowing the slave himself to claim his liberty, and making the first decision final. (C. vii. 17. 1.)

14. Sic itaque discretis actionibus, certum est, non posse actorem rem suam ita ab aliquo petere 'si paret eum dare oportere:' nec enim quod actoris est, id ei dari oportet, quia scilicet dari cuiquam id intellegitur, quod ita datur, ut ejus fiat, nec res, quæ jam actoris est, magis ejus fieri potest. Plane odio furum, quo magis pluribus actionibus teneantur, effectum est, ut extra pœnam dupli aut quadrupli rei recipiendæ nomine fures etiam hac actione teneantur 'si paret eos dare oportere,' quamvis sit adversus eos etiam hæc in rem actio, per quam rem suam quis esse petit.

14. Actions being thus divided, it is certain that a plaintiff cannot sue for his own property by such a formula as this, 'If it appears that the defendant ought to give.' For it is not a duty to give the plaintiff that which is his own. To give a thing is to transfer the property in it, and that which is already the property of the plaintiff cannot belong to him more than it does already. However, to show detestation for thieves, and to make them liable to a greater number of actions, it has been determined, that besides the penalty of double or quadruple the amount taken, they may, for the recovery of the thing taken, be subjected to the action, 'If it appear that they ought to give;' although the party injured may also bring the real action against them, by which the plaintiff demands the thing as proprietor.

GAL. iv. 4.

We have already seen (Tit. 1. 19) that the plaintiff might benefit by being allowed to bring a personal instead of a real action, as the things taken might have perished. But why should the condictio be so shaped as described in the text? The reason was this: the plaintiff, by being allowed to frame his action with the word dare, which was technically wrong, as this implied to transfer the full ownership, whereas the plaintiff remained the owner of the thing stolen, had the advantage, under the formulary system, of recovering the sponsio pœnalis (GAL. iv. 171), or wager of one-third of the value of the thing, which was added to a condictio certi. (See Introd. sec. 99.)

tronaage, and the like, were most commonly the subjects of actiones prejudiciales, but were by no means the only ones. We hear of others, such as quanta dos sit (GAL. iv. 44); an ea res de qua agitur major sit centum sestertiis (PAUL. Sent. v. 9. 1); an bona jure venierint (D. xlii. 5. 30).

The liberalis causa, the suit in which the status of a supposed slave was ascertained, was originally nothing else but a vindicatio. The person called the assertor libertatis claimed him, and the master of the slave defended his possession. If the decision was in favour of the assertor, it was still open to another person to attempt to prove that the subject of the suit was really a slave; if the decision was in favour of the master, another assertor could bring a fresh suit; but there could only be three assertores in all. If the supposed slave was thrice adjudged a slave, his status could be no further questioned. Justinian entirely altered the action, by allowing the slave himself to claim his liberty, and making the first decision final. (C. vii. 17. 1.)

14. Sic itaque discretis actionibus, certum est, non posse actorem rem suam ita ab aliquo petere 'si paret eum dare oportere:' nec enim quod actoris est, id ei dari oportet, quia scilicet dari cuiquam id intellegitur, quod ita datur, ut ejus fiat, nec res, quæ jam actoris est, magis ejus fieri potest. Plane odio furum, quo magis pluribus actionibus teneantur, effectum est, ut extra penam dupli aut quadrupli rei recipiendæ nomine fures etiam hac actione teneantur 'si paret eos dare oportere,' quamvis sit adversus eos etiam hæc in rem actio, per quam rem suam quis esse petit.

14. Actions being thus divided, it is certain that a plaintiff cannot sue for his own property by such a formula as this, 'If it appears that the defendant ought to give.' For it is not a duty to give the plaintiff that which is his own. To give a thing is to transfer the property in it, and that which is already the property of the plaintiff cannot belong to him more than it does already. However, to show detestation for thieves, and to make them liable to a greater number of actions, it has been determined, that besides the penalty of double or quadruple the amount taken, they may, for the recovery of the thing taken, be subjected to the action, 'If it appear that they ought to give;' although the party injured may also bring the real action against them, by which the plaintiff demands the thing as proprietor.

GAL. iv. 4.

We have already seen (Tit. 1. 19) that the plaintiff might benefit by being allowed to bring a personal instead of a real action, as the things taken might have perished. But why should the condictio be so shaped as described in the text? The reason was this: the plaintiff, by being allowed to frame his action with the word dare, which was technically wrong, as this implied to transfer the full ownership, whereas the plaintiff remained the owner of the thing stolen, had the advantage, under the formulary system, of recovering the sponsio pœnalis (GAL. iv. 171), or wager of one-third of the value of the thing, which was added to a condictio certi. (See Introd. sec. 99.)

15. Appellamus autem in rem quidem actiones vindicationes: in personam vero actiones, quibus dare facere oportere intenditur, condictiones. Condicere enim est denunciare prisca lingua: nunc vero abusive dicimus condictionem actionem in personam, qua actor intendit, dari sibi oportere: nulla enim hoc tempore eo nomine denuntiatio fit.

15. Real actions are called vindications; and personal actions, in which it is maintained that something ought to be done or given, are called condictiones: for condicere, in old language, meant the same as denuntiare; and it is improperly that condiction is now used as the name of the personal action, by which the plaintiff contends that something ought to be given to him, for there is no denuntiatio now actually in use.

GAI. iv. 5, 18.

Gaius says, 'actor adversario denuntiabat, ut ad judicem capiendum die xxx. adesset' (iv. 18). Thus the proper meaning of condictio is the appointing of a day.

16. Sequens illa divisio est, quod quaedam actiones rei persequendæ gratia comparatæ sunt, quædam pœnæ persequendæ, quædam mixtæ sunt.

16. Actions may be next divided into actions given to recover the thing, actions given to recover a penalty, and mixed actions.

GAI. iv. 6.

We now come to the third division of actions, that, namely, according to the object for which they were brought; they were divided under this head into three classes—those in which it was sought to get a thing, rei persecutoriæ, including all real actions and all personal actions, except those in which something beyond the simple value was recovered, those in which it was sought to enforce a penalty, and those (mixtæ) in which both these objects were united.

17. Rei persequendæ causa comparatæ sunt omnes in rem actiones. Earum vero actionum, quæ in personam sunt, hæc quidem, quæ ex contractu nascuntur, fere omnes rei persequendæ causa comparatæ videntur: veluti quibus mutuum pecuniam vel in stipulatum deductam petit actor, item commodati, depositi, mandati, pro socio, ex empto, vendito, locato, conducto. Plane si depositi agatur eo nomine, quod tumultus, incendii, ruinæ, naufragii causa depositum sit, in duplum actionem prætor reddit, si modo cum ipso, apud quem depositum sit, aut cum herede ejus ex dolo ipsius agitur: quo casu mixta est actio.

17. For the recovery of the thing are given all real actions; and of personal actions almost all those which arise from contract, as the action for a sum lent or stipulated for, and the actions proper to commodatum, deposit, mandate, partnership, sale, or letting on hire. But, no doubt, when the action on a deposit is brought for a thing deposited by reason of a riot, a fire, the fall of a building, or a shipwreck, the prætor gives the action for the double of the value of the thing deposited, provided the suit is brought against the depositary himself, or against his heir, if personally guilty of dolus malus, in which case the action is mixed.

GAI. iv. 7; D. xvi. 3. 1. 1-4; D. xvi. 3. 18.

The action against a fraudulent depositary was not in duplum, unless the depositor had been forced by fire, shipwreck, the fall of a building, or other sudden calamity, to make the deposit. If,

15. Appellamus autem in rem quidem actiones vindicationes: in personam vero actiones, quibus dare facere oportere intenditur, condictiones. Condicere enim est denuntiare prisca lingua: nunc vero abusive dicimus condictionem actionem in personam, qua actor intendit, dari sibi oportere: nulla enim hoc tempore eo nomine denuntiatio fit.

15. Real actions are called vindications; and personal actions, in which it is maintained that something ought to be done or given, are called condictiones: for condicere, in old language, meant the same as denuntiare; and it is improperly that condiction is now used as the name of the personal action, by which the plaintiff contends that something ought to be given to him, for there is no denuntiatio now actually in use.

GAI. iv. 5, 18.

Gaius says, 'actor adversario denuntiabat, ut ad judicem capiendum die xxx. adesset' (iv. 18). Thus the proper meaning of condictio is the appointing of a day.

16. Sequens illa divisio est, quod quedam actiones rei persequendæ gratia comparatæ sunt, quedam pœnæ persequendæ, quedam mixtæ sunt.

16. Actions may be next divided into actions given to recover the thing, actions given to recover a penalty, and mixed actions.

GAI. iv. 6.

We now come to the third division of actions, that, namely, according to the object for which they were brought; they were divided under this head into three classes—those in which it was sought to get a thing, rei persecutoriæ, including all real actions and all personal actions, except those in which something beyond the simple value was recovered, those in which it was sought to enforce a penalty, and those (mixtæ) in which both these objects were united.

17. Rei persequendæ causa comparatæ sunt omnes in rem actiones. Earum vero actionum, quæ in personam sunt, hæ quidem, quæ ex contractu nascuntur, fere omnes rei persequendæ causa comparatæ videntur: veluti quibus mutuum pecuniam vel in stipulatum deductam petit actor, item commodati, depositi, mandati, pro socio, ex empto, vendito, locato, conducto. Plane si depositi agatur eo nomine, quod tumultus, incendii, ruinæ, naufragii causa depositum sit, in duplum actionem prætor reddit, si modo cum ipso, apud quem depositum sit, aut cum herede ejus ex dolo ipsius agitur: quo casu mixta est actio.

17. For the recovery of the thing are given all real actions; and of personal actions almost all those which arise from contract, as the action for a sum lent or stipulated for, and the actions proper to commodatum, deposit, mandate, partnership, sale, or letting on hire. But, no doubt, when the action on a deposit is brought for a thing deposited by reason of a riot, a fire, the fall of a building, or a shipwreck, the prætor gives the action for the double of the value of the thing deposited, provided the suit is brought against the depositary himself, or against his heir, if personally guilty of dolus malus, in which case the action is mixed.

GAI. iv. 7; D. xvi. 3. 1. 1-4; D. xvi. 3. 18.

The action against a fraudulent depositary was not in duplum, unless the depositor had been forced by fire, shipwreck, the fall of a building, or other sudden calamity, to make the deposit. If, without being so forced, he had selected the depositary, then the action was only for the single value. It was his own fault not to have chosen an honest man. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 14. 3.)

18. Ex maleficiis vero prodite actiones aliæ tantum pœnæ persequendæ causa comparatæ sunt, aliæ tam pœnæ quam rei persequendæ et ob id mixtæ sunt. Penam tantum persequitur quis actione furti; sive enim manifesti agatur quadrupli sive nec manifesti dupli, de sola pœna agitur: nam ipsam rem propria actione persequitur quis, id est suam esse petens, sive fur ipse eam rem possideat, sive alius quilibet: eo amplius adversus furem etiam conditio est rei.

18. Actions arising from a delict are either for the penalty only, or both for the thing and the penalty, which makes them mixed. But, in an action of theft, nothing more is sued for than the penalty; whether, as in manifest theft, the quadruple, or, in theft not manifest, the double, is sued for. The owner recovers the thing itself by a separate action, by claiming it as proprietor, whether it is in the possession of a thief or of any one else. He may also bring against the thief a condiction for the thing.

GAI. iv. 8; D. xiii. 1. 7. 1.

Persons who suffered from crimes had a private action against the wrongdoer for compensation, quite apart from, and independent of, the prosecution of the offender for his outrage on the laws of society. There was, indeed, something more than an exact compensation enforced by the private actions; for, by way of penalty, the defendant had often to pay two, three, or four times the amount of loss actually sustained, and also to give back the thing or its value; but still this penalty was given as a punishment for the injury to the individual, and not as a punishment for the infraction of public law.

19. Vi autem bonorum raptorum actio mixta est, quia in quadruplo rei persecutio continetur, pœna autem tripli est. Sed et legis Aquiliæ actio de damno mixta est, non solum si adversus infittantem in duplum agatur, sed interdum et si in simplicum quisque agit. Veluti si quis hominem claudum aut luscum occiderit, qui in eo anno integer et magni pretii fuerit; tanti enim damnatur, quanti is homo in eo anno plurimum fuerit, secundum jam traditam divisionem. Item mixta est actio contra eos, qui relicta sacrosanctis ecclesiis vel aliis venerabilibus locis legati vel fideicommissi nomine dare distulerint usque adeo, ut etiam in iudicium vocarentur: tunc etenim et ipsam rem vel pecuniam, quæ relicta est, dare compelluntur et aliud tantum pro pœna, et ideo in duplum ejus fit condemnatio.

19. An action for goods taken by force is a mixed action, because the thing taken is included under the quadruple value to be recovered by the action; and thus the penalty is but triple. The action introduced by the lex Aquilia, for wrongful damage, is also a mixed action; not only when brought for double value against a man denying liability, but sometimes when the action is only for the single value; for instance, if a man has killed a slave, who at the time of his death was lame, or wanted an eye, but within the year, previous to his decease, was free from any defect, and of great value, here, according to the distinction previously laid down, the wrongdoer is condemned to pay an amount representing the greatest value of the slave within the year. The action is also mixed which is brought against those who have delayed the payment of a legacy, or fideicommissum, left to our holy churches, or other sacred places, until at last they have been summoned before a magistrate; for

without being so forced, he had selected the depositary, then the action was only for the single value. It was his own fault not to have chosen an honest man. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 14. 3.)

18. Ex maleficiis vero prodite actiones aliæ tantum pœnæ persequendæ causa comparatæ sunt, aliæ tam pœnæ quam rei persequendæ et ob id mixtæ sunt. Penam tantum persequitur quis actione furti; sive enim manifesti agatur quadrupli sive nec manifesti dupli, de sola pœna agitur: nam ipsam rem propria actione persequitur quis, id est suam esse petens, sive fur ipse eam rem possideat, sive alius quilibet: eo amplius adversus furem etiam conditio est rei.

18. Actions arising from a delict are either for the penalty only, or both for the thing and the penalty, which makes them mixed. But, in an action of theft, nothing more is sued for than the penalty; whether, as in manifest theft, the quadruple, or, in theft not manifest, the double, is sued for. The owner recovers the thing itself by a separate action, by claiming it as proprietor, whether it is in the possession of a thief or of any one else. He may also bring against the thief a condiction for the thing.

GAI. iv. 8; D. xiii. 1. 7. 1.

Persons who suffered from crimes had a private action against the wrongdoer for compensation, quite apart from, and independent of, the prosecution of the offender for his outrage on the laws of society. There was, indeed, something more than an exact compensation enforced by the private actions; for, by way of penalty, the defendant had often to pay two, three, or four times the amount of loss actually sustained, and also to give back the thing or its value; but still this penalty was given as a punishment for the injury to the individual, and not as a punishment for the infraction of public law.

19. Vi autem bonorum raptorum actio mixta est, quia in quadruplo rei persecutio continetur, pœna autem tripli est. Sed et legis Aquiliæ actio de damno mixta est, non solum si adversus infittantem in duplum agatur, sed interdum et si in simplicum quisque agit. Veluti si quis hominem claudum aut luscum occiderit, qui in eo anno integer et magni pretii fuerit; tanti enim damnatur, quanti is homo in eo anno plurimum fuerit, secundum jam traditam divisionem. Item mixta est actio contra eos, qui relicta sacrosanctis ecclesiis vel aliis venerabilibus locis legati vel fideicommissi nomine dare distulerint usque adeo, ut etiam in iudicium vocarentur: tunc etenim et ipsam rem vel pecuniam, quæ relicta est, dare compelluntur et aliud tantum pro pœna, et ideo in duplum ejus fit condemnatio.

19. An action for goods taken by force is a mixed action, because the thing taken is included under the quadruple value to be recovered by the action; and thus the penalty is but triple. The action introduced by the lex Aquilia, for wrongful damage, is also a mixed action; not only when brought for double value against a man denying liability, but sometimes when the action is only for the single value; for instance, if a man has killed a slave, who at the time of his death was lame, or wanted an eye, but within the year, previous to his decease, was free from any defect, and of great value, here, according to the distinction previously laid down, the wrongdoer is condemned to pay an amount representing the greatest value of the slave within the year. The action is also mixed which is brought against those who have delayed the payment of a legacy, or fideicommissum, left to our holy churches, or other sacred places, until at last they have been summoned before a magistrate; for then they are compelled to give the thing, or to pay the money left by the deceased, and in addition an equivalent thing or an equal sum, by way of penalty; and thus they are condemned in a double amount.

C. ix. 33. 1; D. ix. 2. 23. 3-6; C. i. 3. 46. pr. and 7.

Interdum et si in simplum. An action could be brought in simplum under the lex Aquilia, if the object of the action was not to determine whether the defendant had done the injury, but to fix the sum which would be the proper compensation for it. It could not be brought in simplum to determine the fact of the defendant having done the injury: for if he denied it, the action was in duplum; if he confessed it, there was no need of an action to prove what he confessed.

Sacrosanctis ecclesiis. The punishment had formerly been enforced in case of all legacies in which specific things had been given per damnationem. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 27. 7.)

Dare distulerint. Formerly the punishment had only been inflicted in case of an absolute refusal of the legacy. (C. i. 3. 46. 7.)

The use in this paragraph of the word mixta in the sense of 'brought at once to recover a thing and to enforce a penalty,' seems to have suggested the reference in the next paragraph to actions which were mixta in a very different sense, viz., 'both real and personal.'

20. Quædam actiones mixtam causam optinere videntur tam in rem quam in personam. Qualis est familiae erciscundæ actio, quæ competit coheredibus de dividenda hereditate: item communi dividundo, quæ inter eos redditur, inter quos aliquid commune ex quacumque causa est, ut id dividatur: item finium regundorum, quæ inter eos agitur, qui confines agros habent. In quibus tribus judiciis permittitur judici rem alicui ex litigatoribus ex bono et æquo adjudicare et, si unius pars prægravari videbitur, eum in vicem certa pecunia alteri condemnare.

20. Some actions are also mixed, as being both real and personal; as, for instance, the action familiæ erciscundæ, brought between co-heirs for the partition of the inheritance; the action de communi dividundo, between partners for the division of things held for any reason in common; also, the action finium regundorum, between owners of contiguous estates. And, in these three actions, the judge, following the rules of equity, may give the property to any of the parties to the suit, and then condemn him, if he seems to have an undue advantage, to pay the other a certain sum of money.

D. x. 1. 2. 1; D. x. 1. 3; D. x. 2. 55.

These actions, though entirely personal, as being founded on obligations and brought against particular persons, are here said to seem in one aspect like real actions, because they involved an adjudicatio. Particular things were adjudged and given over to the parties. Even here, however, the analogy to real actions was not very complete, as real actions were always brought for some definite thing, ascertainable before the action was brought; but, then they are compelled to give the thing, or to pay the money left by the deceased, and in addition an equivalent thing or an equal sum, by way of penalty; and thus they are condemned in a double amount.

C. ix. 33. 1; D. ix. 2. 23. 3-6; C. i. 3. 46. pr. and 7.

Interdum et si in simplum. An action could be brought in simplum under the lex Aquilia, if the object of the action was not to determine whether the defendant had done the injury, but to fix the sum which would be the proper compensation for it. It could not be brought in simplum to determine the fact of the defendant having done the injury: for if he denied it, the action was in duplum; if he confessed it, there was no need of an action to prove what he confessed.

Sacrosanctis ecclesiis. The punishment had formerly been enforced in case of all legacies in which specific things had been given per damnationem. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 27. 7.)

Dare distulerint. Formerly the punishment had only been inflicted in case of an absolute refusal of the legacy. (C. i. 3. 46. 7.)

The use in this paragraph of the word mixta in the sense of 'brought at once to recover a thing and to enforce a penalty,' seems to have suggested the reference in the next paragraph to actions which were mixtae in a very different sense, viz., 'both real and personal.'

20. Quædam actiones mixtam causam optinere videntur tam in rem quam in personam. Qualis est familiæ eriscundæ actio, quæ competit coheredibus de dividenda hereditate: item communi dividundo, quæ inter eos redditur, inter quos aliquid commune ex quacumque causa est, ut id dividatur: item finium regundorum, quæ inter eos agitur, qui confines agros habent. In quibus tribus judiciis permittitur judici rem alicui ex litigatoribus ex bono et æquo adjudicare et, si unius pars prægravari videbitur, eum invicem certa pecunia alteri condemnare.

20. Some actions are also mixed, as being both real and personal; as, for instance, the action familiæ eriscunda, brought between co-heirs for the partition of the inheritance; the action de communi dividundo, between partners for the division of things held for any reason in common; also, the action finium regundorum, between owners of contiguous estates. And, in these three actions, the judge, following the rules of equity, may give the property to any of the parties to the suit, and then condemn him, if he seems to have an undue advantage, to pay the other a certain sum of money.

D. x. 1. 2. 1; D. x. 1. 3; D. x. 2. 55.

These actions, though entirely personal, as being founded on obligations and brought against particular persons, are here said to seem in one aspect like real actions, because they involved an adjudicatio. Particular things were adjudged and given over to the parties. Even here, however, the analogy to real actions was not very complete, as real actions were always brought for some definite thing, ascertainable before the action was brought; but, except in the case of an indivisible thing or one which it was not expedient to divide (the case referred to in the last clause of the paragraph), the thing to be adjudged was only ascertained by the action.

As to the formula in these actions, see Introd. sec. 103. In these actions no distinction can properly be made of plaintiff and defendant. Ulpian says, 'Mixtæ sunt actiones, in quibus uterque actor est.' (D. xlv. 7. 37. 1.) The judge discharged the function assigned him equally for the benefit of all persons interested in the subject-matter of the action. (See Tit. 17. 4-7.)

21. Omnes autem actiones vel in simplum conceptæ sunt vel in duplum vel in triplum vel in quadruplum: ulterius autem nulla actio extenditur.

21. All actions are for the single, double, triple, or quadruple value; beyond that no action extends.

D. ii. 8. 3.

We have now the fourth division of actions, that, namely, according to the amount of the condemnation.

In actions which were in duplum, in triplum, or in quadruplum conceptæ, the intentio only contained an estimate of the single value, the amount of actual loss, and then in the condemnatio this was doubled, tripled, or quadrupled, as the case might be; the word conceptæ, therefore, which properly refers to the intentio, is not very strictly used.

22. In simplum agitur veluti ex stipulatione, ex mutui datione, ex empto, vendito, locato, conducto, mandato et denique ex aliis compluribus causis.

22. The simple value is sued for; as, for example, in case of a stipulation, a contract of mutuum, a sale, a letting on hire, a mandate, and in numberless other cases.

If a person stipulated that in a certain case his debtor should give him double or triple of the value of the sum owed, the action brought to enforce the stipulation would still be in simplum concepta. It would be the agreement, and not the action, which would double or triple the sum to be paid.

23. In duplum agimus veluti furti nec manifesti, damni injuriæ ex lege Aquilia, depositi ex quibusdam casibus: item servi corrupti, quæ competit in eum, cujus hortatu consiliove servus alienus fugerit aut contumax adversus dominum factus est aut luxuriose vivere cœperit aut denique quolibet modo deterior factus sit (in qua actione etiam earum rerum, quas fugiendo servus abstulit, æstimatione deducitur): item ex legato, quod venerabilibus locis relictum est, secundum ea, quæ supra diximus.

23. The double value is sued for; as, for example, in an action of theft not manifest, of wrongful injury under the lex Aquilia, and, in certain cases, in an action of deposit. Also in an action on account of the corruption of a slave brought against him by whose advice or instigation the slave has fled from his master, has grown disobedient towards him, become dissolute in his habits, or been made in any manner worse; and, in this action, an estimate is also to be made of whatever things the slave has stolen from his master at his flight. An action also for the detention of a legacy, left to a sacred except in the case of an indivisible thing or one which it was not expedient to divide (the case referred to in the last clause of the paragraph), the thing to be adjudged was only ascertained by the action.

As to the formula in these actions, see Introd. sec. 103. In these actions no distinction can properly be made of plaintiff and defendant. Ulpian says, 'Mixtæ sunt actiones, in quibus uterque actor est.' (D. xlv. 7. 37. 1.) The judge discharged the function assigned him equally for the benefit of all persons interested in the subject-matter of the action. (See Tit. 17. 4-7.)

21. Omnes autem actiones vel in simplum conceptæ sunt vel in duplum vel in triplum vel in quadruplum: ulterius autem nulla actio extenditur.

21. All actions are for the single, double, triple, or quadruple value; beyond that no action extends.

D. ii. 8. 3.

We have now the fourth division of actions, that, namely, according to the amount of the condemnation.

In actions which were in duplum, in triplum, or in quadruplum conceptæ, the intentio only contained an estimate of the single value, the amount of actual loss, and then in the condemnatio this was doubled, tripled, or quadrupled, as the case might be; the word conceptæ, therefore, which properly refers to the intentio, is not very strictly used.

22. In simplum agitur veluti ex stipulatione, ex mutui datione, ex empto, vendito, locato, conducto, mandato et denique ex aliis compluribus causis.

22. The simple value is sued for; as, for example, in case of a stipulation, a contract of mutuum, a sale, a letting on hire, a mandate, and in numberless other cases.

If a person stipulated that in a certain case his debtor should give him double or triple of the value of the sum owed, the action brought to enforce the stipulation would still be in simplum concepta. It would be the agreement, and not the action, which would double or triple the sum to be paid.

23. In duplum agimus veluti furti nec manifesti, damni injuriæ ex lege Aquilia, depositi ex quibusdam casibus: item servi corrupti, quæ competit in eum, cujus hortatu consiliove servus alienus fugerit aut contumax adversus dominum factus est aut luxuriose vivere cœperit aut denique quolibet modo deterior factus sit (in qua actione etiam earum rerum, quas fugiendo servus abstulit, æstimatione deducitur): item ex legato, quod venerabilibus locis relictum est, secundum ea, quæ supra diximus.

23. The double value is sued for; as, for example, in an action of theft not manifest, of wrongful injury under the lex Aquilia, and, in certain cases, in an action of deposit. Also in an action on account of the corruption of a slave brought against him by whose advice or instigation the slave has fled from his master, has grown disobedient towards him, become dissolute in his habits, or been made in any manner worse; and, in this action, an estimate is also to be made of whatever things the slave has stolen from his master at his flight. An action also for the detention of a legacy, left to a sacred place, is brought for double value, as we have before stated.

GAI. iii. 190; GAI. iv. 9, 171; D. xvi. 3. 1. 1; D. xi. 3. 1. pr.; C. i. 3. 46. 7.

Depositi ex quibusdam casibus, i.e. when made under the pressure of a sudden calamity. (See note on par. 17.)

24. Tripli vero, cum quidam majorem vere aestimationis quantitatem in libello conventionis inseruit, ut ex hac causa viatores, id est exsecutores litium, ampliorem summam sportularum nomine exigent: tunc enim quod propter eorum causam damnum passus fuerit reus, id triplum ab actore consequetur, ut in hoc triplo et simplum, in quo damnum passus est, connumeretur. Quod nostra constitutio induxit, quæ in nostro codice fulget, ex qua dubio procul est ex lege condictionem emanare.

24. The triple value is sued for when any person inserts in his statement of demand a greater sum than is due to him, so that the viatores, that is, the officers of suits, exact a larger sum as their fee. In this case the defendant may obtain from the plaintiff the triple value of the loss he has sustained by giving the fee, but the amount which, by being overcharged, he disbursed is counted as one of the three sums in the triple value. This a constitution inserted in our code has established, on which constitution, without doubt, a statutory condition may be grounded.

C. iii. 10. 2.

In the old law there had been other actions in triplum, as those furti concepti and furti oblati. (GAI. iii. 191; see Tit. 1. 4 of this Book.) The action, of which Justinian speaks in this paragraph, had been substituted by him for the penalty of entirely losing all right of action, to which a plaintiff who sued for more than was due to him had been liable. (GAI. iv. 53.)

The libellus conventionis, in the system of civil process obtaining in the Lower Empire, was the notification of an action and its grounds delivered by a bailiff of the court (viator, exsecutor) to a defendant, who, on the receipt of it, had to give security for his appearance before the judex. It thus, in the extraordinaria judicia, replaced the old vocatio in jus. Condictio ex lege is literally a 'condition under a statute.' (See Introd. sec. 111.)

25. Quadrupli veluti furti manifesti, item de eo, quod metus causa factum sit, deque ea pecunia, quæ in hoc data sit, ut is, cui datur, calumnie causa negotium alicui faceret vel non faceret: item ex lege condictionis a nostra constitutione oritur, in quadruplum condemnationem imponens his exsecutoribus litium, qui contra nostræ constitutionis normam a reis quidquam exegerint.

25. The quadruple value is sued for; as, for example, in an action for manifest theft, in an action quod metus causa, and an action relating to money given to any one to set on foot, or to desist from, a vexatious suit. The statutory condition is also for the quadruple value, which is established in our constitution against those officers of suits who demand anything from the defendant, contrary to the regulations of the constitution.

GAI. iii. 189; D. iv. 2. 14. 1; D. iii. 6. 1. pr.; C. iii. 2. 4.

De ea pecunia quæ datur. Titius is bribed by some one to institute a vexatious suit, or he threatens to bring a vexatious suit, place, is brought for double value, as we have before stated.

GAI. iii. 190; GAI. iv. 9, 171; D. xvi. 3. 1. 1; D. xi. 3. 1. pr.; C. i. 3. 46. 7.

Depositi ex quibusdam casibus, i.e. when made under the pressure of a sudden calamity. (See note on par. 17.)

24. Tripli vero, cum quidam majorem vere æstimationis quantitatem in libello conventionis inseruit, ut ex hac causa viatores, id est exsecutores litium, ampliorem summam sportularum nomine exigent: tunc enim quod propter eorum causam damnum passus fuerit reus, id triplum ab actore consequetur, ut in hoc triplo et simplum, in quo damnum passus est, connumeretur. Quod nostra constitutio induxit, quæ in nostro codice fulget, ex qua dubio procul est ex lege condictionem emanare.

24. The triple value is sued for when any person inserts in his statement of demand a greater sum than is due to him, so that the viatores, that is, the officers of suits, exact a larger sum as their fee. In this case the defendant may obtain from the plaintiff the triple value of the loss he has sustained by giving the fee, but the amount which, by being overcharged, he disbursed is counted as one of the three sums in the triple value. This a constitution inserted in our code has established, on which constitution, without doubt, a statutory condiction may be grounded.

C. iii. 10. 2.

In the old law there had been other actions in triplum, as those furti concepti and furti oblati. (GAI. iii. 191; see Tit. 1. 4 of this Book.) The action, of which Justinian speaks in this paragraph, had been substituted by him for the penalty of entirely losing all right of action, to which a plaintiff who sued for more than was due to him had been liable. (GAI. iv. 53.)

The libellus conventionis, in the system of civil process obtaining in the Lower Empire, was the notification of an action and its grounds delivered by a bailiff of the court (viator, exsecutor) to a defendant, who, on the receipt of it, had to give security for his appearance before the judex. It thus, in the extraordinaria judicia, replaced the old vocatio in jus. Condictio ex lege is literally a 'condition under a statute.' (See Introd. sec. 111.)

25. Quadrupli veluti furti manifesti, item de eo, quod metus causa factum sit, deque ea pecunia, quæ in hoc data sit, ut is, cui datur, calumnie causa negotium alicui faceret vel non faceret: item ex lege condictionis a nostra constitutione oritur, in quadruplum condemnationem imponens his exsecutoribus litium, qui contra nostræ constitutionis normam a reis quidquam exegerint.

25. The quadruple value is sued for; as, for example, in an action for manifest theft, in an action quod metus causa, and an action relating to money given to any one to set on foot, or to desist from, a vexatious suit. The statutory condiction is also for the quadruple value, which is established in our constitution against those officers of suits who demand anything from the defendant, contrary to the regulations of the constitution.

GAI. iii. 189; D. iv. 2. 14. 1; D. iii. 6. 1. pr.; C. iii. 2. 4.

De ea pecunia quæ datur. Titius is bribed by some one to institute a vexatious suit, or he threatens to bring a vexatious suit, and the person he threatens pays him not to bring it. In either case an action in quadruplum lies against him.

26. Sed furti quidem nec manifesti actio et servi corrupti a ceteris, de quibus simul locuti sumus, eo differt, quod hæ actiones omnimodo dupli sunt: at illæ, id est damni injuriæ ex lege Aquilia et interdum depositi, infitiatione duplicantur, in confitentem autem in simplum dantur: sed illa, quæ de his competit, quæ relicta venerabilibus locis sunt, non solum infitiatione duplicatur, sed et si distulerit relicti solutionem, usque quo jussu magistratum nostrorum conveniatur; in confitentem vero et antequam jussu magistratum conveniatur solventem simpli redditur.

26. But an action of theft not manifest, and an action on account of a slave corrupted, differ from the others, which we have placed under the same head, in that they are always brought for double the value; but the others, that is, the action given by the lex Aquilia for a wrongful injury, and the action of deposit under pressure, are brought for the double value in case of denial; but if the defendant confesses, the single value only can be recovered. In actions brought for things given to sacred places, double is recovered, not only on the denial of the defendant, but also on payment being delayed until a magistrate orders an action to be brought; but it is the single value only that can be recovered, if the debt is acknowledged, and paid before such an order is given.

GAL. IV. 9, 171, 173; C. I. 3. 46. 7.

27. Item actio de eo, quod metus causa factum sit, a ceteris, de quibus simul locuti sumus, eo differt, quod ejus natura tacite continetur, ut, qui iudicis jussu ipsam rem actori restituat, absolvatur. Quod in ceteris casibus non ita est, sed omnimodo quisque in quadruplum condemnatur, quod est et in furti manifesti actione.

27. The action quod metus causa differs also from the other actions included under the same head, because it is tacitly implied in the nature of this action, that a defendant, who, in obedience to the command of the judge, restores the things taken, ought to be acquitted; in all the other actions, on the contrary, the defendant is always condemned to pay the fourfold value, as, for instance, in the action of manifest theft.

D. IV. 2. 14. 1, 4.

The actio quod metus causa was given to a person who had, while under constraint from the fear of actual or threatened violence, alienated anything, created real rights, or entered into an obligation. It could be brought against any one who profited by what had been done. (D. IV. 2. 14. 3.) The action was, as the text informs us, arbitraria. (See Introd. sec. 106.)

28. Actionum autem quedam bonæ fidei sunt, quædam stricti juris. Bonæ fidei sunt hæ: ex empto, vendito, locato, conducto, negotiorum gestorum, mandati, depositi, pro socio, tutelæ, commodati, pignoratitia, familiæ erciscundæ, communi dividundo, præscriptis verbis, quæ de æstimate proponitur, et ea, quæ ex permutatione competit, et hereditatis petitio. Quamvis enim usque adhuc incertum erat, sive inter

28. Again, some actions are bonæ fidei, some are stricti juris. Of those bonæ fidei there are the following:—the actions empti and venditi, locati and conducti, negotiorum gestorum; those brought on a mandate, deposit, partnership, tutelage, loan, or pledge; the action familiæ erciscundæ; that communi dividundo; the action præscriptis verbis, arising from a commission to sell at a fixed price, or an exchange; and the demand of an inand the person he threatens pays him not to bring it. In either case an action in quadruplum lies against him.

26. Sed furti quidem nec manifesti actio et servi corrupti a ceteris, de quibus simul locuti sumus, eo differt, quod hæ actiones omnimodo dupli sunt: at illæ, id est damni injuriæ ex lege Aquilia et interdum depositi, infitiatione duplicantur, in confitentem autem in simplum dantur: sed illa, quæ de his competit, quæ relicta venerabilibus locis sunt, non solum infitiatione duplicatur, sed et si distulerit relictæ solutionem, usque quo jussu magistratum nostrorum conveniatur; in confitentem vero et antequam jussu magistratum conveniatur solventem simpli redditur.

26. But an action of theft not manifest, and an action on account of a slave corrupted, differ from the others, which we have placed under the same head, in that they are always brought for double the value; but the others, that is, the action given by the lex Aquilia for a wrongful injury, and the action of deposit under pressure, are brought for the double value in case of denial; but if the defendant confesses, the single value only can be recovered. In actions brought for things given to sacred places, double is recovered, not only on the denial of the defendant, but also on payment being delayed until a magistrate orders an action to be brought; but it is the single value only that can be recovered, if the debt is acknowledged, and paid before such an order is given.

GAL. iv. 9, 171, 173; C. i. 3. 46. 7.

27. Item actio de eo, quod metus causa factum sit, a ceteris, de quibus simul locuti sumus, eo differt, quod ejus natura tacite continetur, ut, qui iudicis jussu ipsam rem actori restituat, absolvatur. Quod in ceteris casibus non ita est, sed omnimodo quisque in quadruplum condemnatur, quod est et in furti manifesti actione.

27. The action quod metus causa differs also from the other actions included under the same head, because it is tacitly implied in the nature of this action, that a defendant, who, in obedience to the command of the judge, restores the things taken, ought to be acquitted; in all the other actions, on the contrary, the defendant is always condemned to pay the fourfold value, as, for instance, in the action of manifest theft.

D. iv. 2. 14. 1, 4.

The actio quod metus causa was given to a person who had, while under constraint from the fear of actual or threatened violence, alienated anything, created real rights, or entered into an obligation. It could be brought against any one who profited by what had been done. (D. iv. 2. 14. 3.) The action was, as the text informs us, arbitraria. (See Introd. sec. 106.)

28. Actionum autem quædam bonæ fidei sunt, quædam stricti juris. Bonæ fidei sunt hæ: ex empto, vendito, locato, conducto, negotiorum gestorum, mandati, depositi, pro socio, tutelæ, commodati, pigneraticia, familiæ erciscundæ, communi dividundo, præscriptis verbis, quæ de æstimato proponitur, et ea, quæ ex permutatione competit, et hereditatis petitio. Quamvis enim usque adhuc incertum erat, sive inter

28. Again, some actions are bonæ fidei, some are stricti juris. Of those bonæ fidei there are the following:—the actions empti and venditi, locati and conducti, negotiorum gestorum; those brought on a mandate, deposit, partnership, tutelage, loan, or pledge; the action familiæ erciscundæ; that communi dividundo; the action præscriptis verbis, arising from a commission to sell at a fixed price, or an exchange; and the demand of an in-bonæ fidei judicia connumeranda sit sive non, nostra tamen constitutio

aperte eam esse bonæ fidei disposuit.

heritance, For although it was, till recently, doubtful whether this last action should be included among those bonæ fidei, our constitution has clearly decided that it is to be included among them.

GAL. iv. 62; C. iii. 31. 12. 3.

We here enter on the fifth division of actions, that, namely, according to the powers given to the judge, and according to which they are divided into actiones bonæ fidei, actiones stricti juris, and actiones arbitrarie.

In actions bonæ fidei, the words ex bona fide, or some equivalent expression, were permitted to be added to the formula, so that the intentio, which was always incerta, ran, quicquid dare, or facere, or præstare oportet ex bona fide. The actions in which this was permitted were all prætorian. Justinian here gives a list of them; and probably, though not quite certainly, the list is meant to be a complete one. The principal effects of this addition to the formula were:—(1) That all circumstances tending to show dolus malus were taken into consideration, without an exception doli mali being inserted. (D. xxx. 84. 5.) (2) Every assistance which the consideration of customs and common use could give to the determination of the particular question was permitted to affect the decision of the judge. (D. xxi. 1. 31. 20.) (3) The judge would notice any counter claims which the defendant might have arising out of the same set of circumstances which gave rise to the action of the plaintiff (GAL. iv. 63), and would provide for future contingencies, as, e.g., in an action pro socio, he met the case of one partner having taken on himself liabilities not as yet enforceable. (D. xvii. 2. 38. pr.) (4) And, lastly, interest was due on the thing withheld from the time it ought to have been given. (D. xxii. 1. 32. 2.)

In the actions stricti juris, the judge was obliged to adhere strictly to the principles of the civil law. Dolus malus, or counter claims, could not be taken into consideration unless exceptions were inserted bringing them before the notice of the judge. And interest could not generally be claimed from before the time of the litis contestatio, except by special stipulation. (D. xii. 1. 31.) It was the actions derived from the jus civile, i.e. real actions and conditions, that were stricti juris. That a real action should, as in the case of the petitio hereditatis, be bonæ fidei, was quite an exception. But the petitio hereditatis had characteristics which allied it with personal actions, habet præstationes quasdam personales. (D. v. 3. 25. 18.) It could only be brought against those who possessed an inheritance (1) pro herede, i.e. as heir or bonorum possessor, or (2) pro possessore. Pro possessore possidet prædo qui interrogatus cur possideat, responsurus sit quia possideo, i.e. a possessor who does not pretend to justify his possession by any legal title. (D. v. 3. 11 and 12.) And not only was the

bonæ fidei judicia connumeranda sit
sive non, nostra tamen constitutio
aperte eam esse bonæ fidei disposuit.

heritance. For although it was, till recently, doubtful whether this last action should be included among those bonæ fidei, our constitution has clearly decided that it is to be included
among them.

GAL. iv. 62; C. iii. 31. 12. 3.

We here enter on the fifth division of actions, that, namely, according to the powers given to the judge, and according to which they are divided into actiones bonæ fidei, actiones stricti juris, and actiones arbitrarie.

In actions bonæ fidei, the words ex bona fide, or some equivalent expression, were permitted to be added to the formula, so that the intentio, which was always incerta, ran, quicquid dare, or facere, or præstare oportet ex bona fide. The actions in which this was permitted were all prætorian. Justinian here gives a list of them; and probably, though not quite certainly, the list is meant to be a complete one. The principal effects of this addition to the formula were:—(1) That all circumstances tending to show dolus malus were taken into consideration, without an exception doli mali being inserted. (D. xxx. 84. 5.) (2) Every assistance which the consideration of customs and common use could give to the determination of the particular question was permitted to affect the decision of the judge. (D. xxi. 1. 31. 20.) (3) The judge would notice any counter claims which the defendant might have arising out of the same set of circumstances which gave rise to the action of the plaintiff (GAL. iv. 63), and would provide for future contingencies, as, e.g., in an action pro socio, he met the case of one partner having taken on himself liabilities not as yet enforceable. (D. xvii. 2. 38. pr.) (4) And, lastly, interest was due on the thing withheld from the time it ought to have been given. (D. xxii. 1. 32. 2.)

In the actions stricti juris, the judge was obliged to adhere strictly to the principles of the civil law. Dolus malus, or counter claims, could not be taken into consideration unless exceptions were inserted bringing them before the notice of the judge. And interest could not generally be claimed from before the time of the litis contestatio, except by special stipulation. (D. xii. 1. 31.) It was the actions derived from the jus civile, i.e. real actions and conditions, that were stricti juris. That a real action should, as in the case of the petitio hereditatis, be bonæ fidei, was quite an exception. But the petitio hereditatis had characteristics which allied it with personal actions, habet præstationes quasdam personales. (D. v. 3. 25. 18.) It could only be brought against those who possessed an inheritance (1) pro herede, i.e. as heir or bonorum possessor, or (2) pro possessore. Pro possessore possidet prædo qui interrogatus cur possideat, responsurus sit quia possideo, i.e. a possessor who does not pretend to justify his possession by any legal title. (D. v. 3. 11 and 12.) And not only was the petitio hereditatis thus personal in the sense of being limited to two classes of persons, but it had some of the consequences of a personal action. By it the plaintiff could recover from the possessor moneys he had derived from the inheritance, and it could be brought against debtors of the deceased to make them pay what they owed to the inheritance in case these debtors claimed to retain their debts as being the right heirs. (D. v. 3. 13. 15; D. v. 3. 42.) The jurists had been divided on the point whether in a petitio hereditatis cognisance could be taken of dolus malus without an exceptio. Justinian decided that it could, the action being treated as one bonæ fidei.

Actiones arbitrarie are treated of in paragr. 31.

An action præscriptis verbis, otherwise in factum præscriptis verbis, or civilis in factum, was, as we have elsewhere said, an action in which at the head of the formula were placed words stating the facts giving rise to a contract which did not come under any of the heads of contracts bearing a particular name. Of these actions, which were always bonæ fidei and in jus conceptivæ, the two mentioned in the text are only examples. In the contract permutatio, each party made a contract re, i.e. by depositing the thing bartered with the other; but the thing given was not given as a mutuum, a commodatum, a depositum, or a pignus, and therefore the circumstances had to be stated specially. The action de aestimato was given when a thing was entrusted to another to sell for a certain sum; the agent being permitted to retain all he received above that given, and to give back the thing if he could not obtain the price fixed. This was not precisely a locatio, a societas, or a mandatum, and therefore the action was given in the form of one præscriptis verbis. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 13. 2. note 4.)

29. Fuerat antea et rei uxoriæ actio ex bonæ fidei judiciis: sed cum, plenior esse ex stipulatu actionem invenientes, omne jus, quod res uxoria ante habebat, cum multis divisionibus in ex stipulatu actionem, quæ de dotibus exigendis proponitur, transtulimus, merito rei uxoriæ actione sublata, ex stipulatu, quæ pro ea introducta est, naturam bonæ fidei iudicii tantum in exactione dotis meruit, ut bonæ fidei sit. Sed et tacitam ei dedimus hypothecam: præferri autem aliis creditoribus in hypothecis tunc censuimus, cum ipsa mulier de dote sua experiatur, cujus solius providentia hoc induximus.

29. Formerly, there was the action rei uxoriæ, which was included among the actions bonæ fidei; but finding the action ex stipulatu to be more advantageous, we have transferred, but with many distinctions, to the action ex stipulatu, when given for the recovery of marriage portions, all the effects before attaching to the action rei uxoriæ; the actio rei uxoriæ being then reasonably done away with, the action ex stipulatu, by which it is replaced, naturally assumed the character of an action bonæ fidei, but assumed it only when brought for the recovery of a marriage portion. We have also given the wife an implied mortgage, but when we prefer her to mortgagees, we do so only whenever she herself sues for her marriage portion. For it is to her personally that we grant the privilege.

D. iv. 5. 8; C. v. 13; C. viii. 18. 12. 1.

petitio hereditatis thus personal in the sense of being limited to two classes of persons, but it had some of the consequences of a personal action. By it the plaintiff could recover from the possessor moneys he had derived from the inheritance, and it could be brought against debtors of the deceased to make them pay what they owed to the inheritance in case these debtors claimed to retain their debts as being the right heirs. (D. v. 3. 13. 15; D. v. 3. 42.) The jurists had been divided on the point whether in a petitio hereditatis cognisance could be taken of dolus malus without an exceptio. Justinian decided that it could, the action being treated as one bonæ fidei.

Actiones arbitrarie are treated of in paragr. 31.

An action præscriptis verbis, otherwise in factum præscriptis verbis, or civilis in factum, was, as we have elsewhere said, an action in which at the head of the formula were placed words stating the facts giving rise to a contract which did not come under any of the heads of contracts bearing a particular name. Of these actions, which were always bonæ fidei and in jus conceptivæ, the two mentioned in the text are only examples. In the contract permutatio, each party made a contract re, i.e. by depositing the thing bartered with the other; but the thing given was not given as a mutuum, a commodatum, a depositum, or a pignus, and therefore the circumstances had to be stated specially. The action de aestimato was given when a thing was entrusted to another to sell for a certain sum; the agent being permitted to retain all he received above that given, and to give back the thing if he could not obtain the price fixed. This was not precisely a locatio, a societas, or a mandatum, and therefore the action was given in the form of one præscriptis verbis. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 13. 2. note 4.)

29. Fuerat antea et rei uxoriæ actio ex bonæ fidei judiciis: sed cum, plenior esse ex stipulatu actionem invenientes, omne jus, quod res uxoria ante habebat, cum multis divisionibus in ex stipulatu actionem, quæ de dotibus exigendis proponitur, transtulimus, merito rei uxoriæ actione sublata, ex stipulatu, quæ pro ea introducta est, naturam bonæ fidei iudicii tantum in exactione dotis meruit, ut bonæ fidei sit. Sed et tacitam ei dedimus hypothecam: præferri autem aliis creditoribus in hypothecis tunc censuimus, cum ipsa mulier de dote sua experiatur, cujus solius providentia hoc induximus.

29. Formerly, there was the action rei uxoriæ, which was included among the actions bonæ fidei; but finding the action ex stipulatu to be more advantageous, we have transferred, but with many distinctions, to the action ex stipulatu, when given for the recovery of marriage portions, all the effects before attaching to the action rei uxoriæ; the actio rei uxoriæ being then reasonably done away with, the action ex stipulatu, by which it is replaced, naturally assumed the character of an action bonæ fidei, but assumed it only when brought for the recovery of a marriage portion. We have also given the wife an implied mortgage, but when we prefer her to mortgagees, we do so only whenever she herself sues for her marriage portion. For it is to her personally that we grant the privilege.

D. iv. 5. 8; C. v. 13; C. viii. 18. 12. 1.

In order to enforce the restitution of a marriage portion after the dissolution of the marriage, the actio rei uxorie was given; but sometimes the wife or other person entitled (Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 3. note), not content with the remedy, stipulated with the husband for the restitution, and thus secured the power of bringing an action ex stipulatu.

In the actio rei uxorie, which was an action bonæ fidei, the husband could, for different reasons, make certain deductions in his restitution of the dos. He had three years in which to make restitution by thirds of all things quæ numero, pondere, mensurave constant; he could oppose to the action the beneficium competentie, that is, he was only condemned to pay quantum facere potest; and he could deduct the useful as well as the necessary expenses he had incurred in managing the dotal property. (See paragr. 37.) The wife could not transmit the action to her heirs, and if her husband was deceased, and she had benefited by his testament, she could not both accept the gift under the testament, and also ask for the restitution of her portion, but was obliged to abandon either the one advantage or the other. (ULP. Reg. 6. 6. et seq.)

None of these drawbacks attended the action ex stipulatu. There could be no deductions, no delay in payment, no regard to the husband's power to pay. The action passed to the heirs of the wife, and she could take, in addition, anything given her by her husband's testament.

Justinian united the two actions into one. However the dos might have been given, and whether there had really been any stipulation to restore it, a tacita stipulatio was, in every case, to be supposed. The actio rei uxorie was to be abolished, and all actions for the restitution of a marriage portion to be brought ex stipulatu. But then, this action was treated as one bonæ fidei, and produced most of the advantages which the husband had enjoyed under the actio rei uxorie. He had a year in which to restore all moveables; he could claim the beneficium competentie, and might deduct the necessary expenses he had been put to. (See paragr. 37.) Lastly, in order to make the position of the wife more secure, Justinian gave her an implied mortgage on the effects of her husband, taking priority over all other incumbrances—a privilege, however, personal to herself. (C. v. 13. 1.)

30. In bonæ fidei autem iudiciis libera potestas permitti videtur iudici ex bono et æquo æstimandi, quantum atori restitui debeat. In quo et illud continetur, ut, si quid invicem actorem præstare oporteat, eo compensato, in reliquum is, cum quo actum est, condemnari debeat. Sed et in strictis iudiciis ex rescripto divi Marci opposita doli mali exceptione compensatio inducebatur. Sed nostra constitutio eas compensa-

30. In all actions bonæ fidei full power is given to the judge to determine, according to the rules of equity, how much ought to be restored to the plaintiff; whence it follows that when the plaintiff also is found to be indebted to the defendant, the debtor ought to be allowed to set off the sum due to him, and to be condemned only to pay the difference. Even in actions stricti iuris, a rescript of the Emperor Marcus permitted a set-off to be claimed, by

In order to enforce the restitution of a marriage portion after the dissolution of the marriage, the actio rei uxorie was given; but sometimes the wife or other person entitled (Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 3. note), not content with the remedy, stipulated with the husband for the restitution, and thus secured the power of bringing an action ex stipulatu.

In the actio rei uxorie, which was an action bonæ fidei, the husband could, for different reasons, make certain deductions in his restitution of the dos. He had three years in which to make restitution by thirds of all things quæ numero, pondere, mensurave constant; he could oppose to the action the beneficium competentie, that is, he was only condemned to pay quantum facere potest; and he could deduct the useful as well as the necessary expenses he had incurred in managing the dotal property. (See paragr. 37.) The wife could not transmit the action to her heirs, and if her husband was deceased, and she had benefited by his testament, she could not both accept the gift under the testament, and also ask for the restitution of her portion, but was obliged to abandon either the one advantage or the other. (ULP. Reg. 6. 6. et seq.)

None of these drawbacks attended the action ex stipulatu. There could be no deductions, no delay in payment, no regard to the husband's power to pay. The action passed to the heirs of the wife, and she could take, in addition, anything given her by her husband's testament.

Justinian united the two actions into one. However the dos might have been given, and whether there had really been any stipulation to restore it, a tacita stipulatio was, in every case, to be supposed. The actio rei uxorie was to be abolished, and all actions for the restitution of a marriage portion to be brought ex stipulatu. But then, this action was treated as one bonæ fidei, and produced most of the advantages which the husband had enjoyed under the actio rei uxorie. He had a year in which to restore all moveables; he could claim the beneficium competentie, and might deduct the necessary expenses he had been put to. (See paragr. 37.) Lastly, in order to make the position of the wife more secure, Justinian gave her an implied mortgage on the effects of her husband, taking priority over all other incumbrances—a privilege, however, personal to herself. (C. v. 13. 1.)

30. In bonæ fidei autem iudiciis libera potestas permitti videtur iudici ex bono et æquo æstimandi, quantum atori restitui debeat. In quo et illud continetur, ut, si quid invicem actorem præstare oporteat, eo compensato, in reliquum is, cum quo actum est, condemnari debeat. Sed et in strictis iudiciis ex rescripto divi Marci opposita doli mali exceptione compensatio inducebatur. Sed nostra constitutio eas compensa-

30. In all actions bonæ fidei full power is given to the judge to determine, according to the rules of equity, how much ought to be restored to the plaintiff; whence it follows that when the plaintiff also is found to be indebted to the defendant, the debtor ought to be allowed to set off the sum due to him, and to be condemned only to pay the difference. Even in actions stricti iuris, a rescript of the Emperor Marcus permitted a set-off to be claimed, by opposing the exception of fraud; but our constitution, when the debt due to the defendant is evident, has given a greater latitude to claims of set-off; for now actions, real or personal, or of whatever kind, are ipso jure reduced by the claim, with the exception only of the action of deposit, against which we have judged it highly improper to permit any claim of set-off to be made, lest under this pretence any one should be fraudulently prevented from recovering the thing deposited.

tiones, quæ jure aperto nituntur, latius introduxit, ut actiones ipso jure minuant sive in rem sive personales sive alias quascumque, excepta sola depositi actione, cui aliquid compensationis nomine opponi satis impium esse credidimus, ne sub prætextu compensationis depositarum rerum quis exactione defraudetur.

GAL. iv. 61; C. iv. 31. 14. pr. and 1; C. iv. 34. 11.

The subject of compensatio will be treated of more fully under paragr. 39.

31. Præterea quasdam actiones arbitrarias, id est ex arbitrio judicis pendentes, appellamus, in quibus nisi arbitrio judicis is, cum quo agitur, actori satisfaciatur, veluti rem restituatur vel exhibeat vel solvat vel ex noxali causa servum dedat, condemnari debeat. Sed istæ actiones tam in rem quam in personam inveniuntur. In rem veluti Publiciana, Serviana de rebus coloni, quasi Serviana, quæ etiam hypothecaria vocatur: in personam veluti quibus de eo agitur, quod aut metus causa aut dolo malo factum est, item quæ id, quod certo loco promissum est, petitur. Ad exhibendum quoque actio ex arbitrio judicis pendet. In his enim actionibus et ceteris similibus permittitur judici ex bono et æquo secundum ejusque rei, de qua actum est, naturam æstimare, quemadmodum actori satisfieri oporteat.

31. Some actions, again, are called arbitrary, as depending upon the arbitrium of the judge. In these, if the defendant does not, on the order of the judge, give the satisfaction awarded by the judge, and either restore, exhibit, or pay the thing, or give up a slave that has committed an injury, he ought to be condemned. Of these arbitrary actions some are real and some personal: real, as the actions Publiciana, Serviana as to the property of a farmer, and quasi Serviana, also called hypothecaria; personal, as those by which a suit is commenced on account of something done through fear or fraud, and that by which something is sought which was promised to be paid at a particular place. The action ad exhibendum also depends on the arbitrium of the judge. In these actions, and others of a like nature, the judge may determine, according to the principles of equity and the circumstances of the particular case, the satisfaction which the plaintiff ought to receive.

D. vi. 1. 18; D. iv. 2. 14. 4; D. xiii. 4. 4. 1; D. xx. 1. 16. 3; D. iv. 3. 18.

In the actiones arbitrariæ the judge was instructed only to condemn the defendant in a sum of money, if he did not satisfy the demand of the plaintiff, supposing that demand was well founded. When, therefore, the judge had ascertained the validity of the plaintiff's claim, he issued an order (arbitrium) to the defendant, and at the same time condemned him to pay, in case of his refusal, a sum proportionate to the value of what was claimed, quantum ea res erit. This was fixed, if the defendant, when ordered to restore a thing, had fraudulently put it out of his power to restore it, by the plaintiff himself, who stated on his oath (D. xii. 3. 5) the amount he considered fairly due to him as compen-tiones, quæ jure aperto nituntur, latius introduxit, ut actiones ipso jure minuant sive in rem sive personales sive alias quascumque, excepta sola depositi actione, cui aliquid compensationis nomine opponi satis impium esse credidimus, ne sub prætextu compensationis depositarum rerum quis exactione defraudetur.

opposing the exception of fraud; but our constitution, when the debt due to the defendant is evident, has given a greater latitude to claims of set-off; for now actions, real or personal, or of whatever kind, are ipso jure reduced by the claim, with the exception only of the action of deposit, against which we have judged it highly improper to permit any claim of set-off to be made, lest under this pretence any one should be fraudulently prevented from recovering the thing deposited.

GAL. iv. 61; C. iv. 31. 14. pr. and 1; C. iv. 34. 11.

The subject of compensatio will be treated of more fully under paragr. 39.

31. Præterea quasdam actiones arbitrarias, id est ex arbitrio judicis pendentes, appellamus, in quibus nisi arbitrio judicis is, cum quo agitur, actori satisfaciatur, veluti rem restituatur vel exhibeat vel solvat vel ex noxali causa servum dedat, condemnari debeat. Sed istæ actiones tam in rem quam in personam inveniuntur. In rem veluti Publiciana, Serviana de rebus coloni, quasi Serviana, quæ etiam hypothecaria vocatur: in personam veluti quibus de eo agitur, quod aut metus causa aut dolo malo factum est, item qua id, quod certo loco promissum est, petitur. Ad exhibendum quoque actio ex arbitrio judicis pendet. In his enim actionibus et ceteris similibus permittitur judici ex bono et æquo secundum ejusque rei, de qua actum est, naturam æstimare, quemadmodum actori satisfieri oporteat.

31. Some actions, again, are called arbitrary, as depending upon the arbitrium of the judge. In these, if the defendant does not, on the order of the judge, give the satisfaction awarded by the judge, and either restore, exhibit, or pay the thing, or give up a slave that has committed an injury, he ought to be condemned. Of these arbitrary actions some are real and some personal: real, as the actions Publiciana, Serviana as to the property of a farmer, and quasi Serviana, also called hypothecaria; personal, as those by which a suit is commenced on account of something done through fear or fraud, and that by which something is sought which was promised to be paid at a particular place. The action ad exhibendum also depends on the arbitrium of the judge. In these actions, and others of a like nature, the judge may determine, according to the principles of equity and the circumstances of the particular case, the satisfaction which the plaintiff ought to receive.

D. vi. 1. 18; D. iv. 2. 14. 4; D. xiii. 4. 4. 1; D. xx. 1. 16. 3; D. iv. 3. 18.

In the actiones arbitrariæ the judge was instructed only to condemn the defendant in a sum of money, if he did not satisfy the demand of the plaintiff, supposing that demand was well founded. When, therefore, the judge had ascertained the validity of the plaintiff's claim, he issued an order (arbitrium) to the defendant, and at the same time condemned him to pay, in case of his refusal, a sum proportionate to the value of what was claimed. quanti ea res erit. This was fixed, if the defendant, when ordered to restore a thing, had fraudulently put it out of his power to restore it, by the plaintiff himself, who stated on his oath (D. xii. 3. 5) the amount he considered fairly due to him as compensation; otherwise the judez fixed the amount according to the circumstances of the case; and, at any rate in the time of Ulpian, the manus militaris was employed, by the direction of the judge, to put the plaintiff in possession, when the defendant had the thing in his possession and would not give it up. (D. vi. 1. 68.)

Actions in rem were enforced by being made arbitrarie, and all actions in rem were so enforced. (See Tit. 17. 2.) In real actions the satisfaction ordered by the judge was to restore the thing. In the actio Serviana and the actio quasi-Serviana, the arbitrium was alternative, and the defendant was ordered either to pay the debt or to give up the thing pledged, and in default was condemned to the amount of the value of the thing pledged. (D. xx. 1. 16. 3.) It is to this case that the words 'vel solcat' in the text refer. When the thing claimed was restored, the condemnatio might still be made available for the fructus. (D. vi. 1. 68.) Among personal actions, those quod metus causa, de dolo malo, and ad exhibendum were arbitrarie, because they were brought virtually to have something restored or exhibited. The action de eo quod certo loco promissum est was made arbitraria, for the peculiar reason mentioned below.

With respect to the actio quod metus causa, see paragr. 25 and 27. The actio de dolo malo was given to avoid the consequences of a dolus malus, but only when there was no other means of avoiding them (D. iv. 3. 1. 1); it was in simplex; it subjected the defendant, if condemned, to infamy, and had to be brought within a year. (D. iv. 3. 29.)

As will be found from Tit. 12. 2, in every action the defendant was to be absolved if, before sentence was given, he satisfied the demands of the plaintiff.

Quia id, quod certo loco promissum est, petitur. When a contract was made in which it was agreed that payment should be made at a particular place, the creditor could not demand payment anywhere else. If he did, he asked for more than was his due, and was subject to the consequences of a plus-petitio. (See paragr. 33.) Supposing, indeed, the action brought on the obligation was one bonae fidei, or had an intentio incerta, as being for an undetermined object, then, as the judge would take into account all the circumstances of the case, and allow the defendant the benefit of whatever difference being sued in a wrong place could be supposed to make to him, the consequence of this plus-petitio would be immaterial. But if the action was stricti juris and for a thing certain, the plaintiff could not have brought it elsewhere than in the place named without incurring the consequences of a plus-petitio, had not the prætor come to his relief and given him the actio arbitraria mentioned in the text. By this action the creditor was allowed to sue in a place other than that agreed upon, but the prætor compensated the debtor by giving him an advantage. The action was made arbitraria, and the debtor was ordered to pay what the creditor claimed, or to give security that sation; otherwise the judev fixed the amount according to the circumstances of the case; and, at any rate in the time of Ulpian, the munus militaris was employed, by the direction of the judge, to put the plaintiff in possession, when the defendant had the thing in his possession and would not give it up. (D. vi. 1. 68.)

Actions in rem were enforced by being made arbitrarie, and all actions in rem were so enforced. (See Tit. 17. 2.) In real actions the satisfaction ordered by the judge was to restore the thing. In the actio Serviana and the actio quasi-Serviana, the arbitrium was alternative, and the defendant was ordered either to pay the debt or to give up the thing pledged, and in default was condemned to the amount of the value of the thing pledged. (D. xx. 1. 16. 3.) It is to this case that the words 'vel solcat' in the text refer. When the thing claimed was restored, the condemnatio might still be made available for the fructus. (D. vi. 1. 68.) Among personal actions, those quod metus causa, de dolo malo, and ad exhibendum were arbitrarie, because they were brought virtually to have something restored or exhibited. The action de eo quod certo loco promissum est was made arbitraria, for the peculiar reason mentioned below.

With respect to the actio quod metus causa, see paragr. 25 and 27. The actio de dolo malo was given to avoid the consequences of a dolus malus, but only when there was no other means of avoiding them (D. iv. 3. 1. 1); it was in simplex; it subjected the defendant, if condemned, to infamy, and had to be brought within a year. (D. iv. 3. 29.)

As will be found from Tit. 12. 2, in every action the defendant was to be absolved if, before sentence was given, he satisfied the demands of the plaintiff.

Quia id, quod certo loco promissum est, petitur. When a contract was made in which it was agreed that payment should be made at a particular place, the creditor could not demand payment anywhere else. If he did, he asked for more than was his due, and was subject to the consequences of a plus-petitio. (See paragr. 33.) Supposing, indeed, the action brought on the obligation was one bonae fidei, or had an intentio incerta, as being for an undetermined object, then, as the judge would take into account all the circumstances of the case, and allow the defendant the benefit of whatever difference being sued in a wrong place could be supposed to make to him, the consequence of this plus-petitio would be immaterial. But if the action was stricti juris and for a thing certain, the plaintiff could not have brought it elsewhere than in the place named without incurring the consequences of a plus-petitio, had not the prætor come to his relief and given him the actio arbitraria mentioned in the text. By this action the creditor was allowed to sue in a place other than that agreed upon, but the prætor compensated the debtor by giving him an advantage. The action was made arbitraria, and the debtor was ordered to pay what the creditor claimed, or to give security that it would be paid in the place where due. If he did not do this, then in the condemnatio the iudex fixed an amount in which the advantage it might have been to the debtor to have paid in the particular place was taken into consideration. (See paragr. 33.) The prætor, however, perhaps only allowed the creditor to take advantage of this action if the defendant absented himself from the place where the payment ought to have been made (D. xiii. 4. 1), and then the creditor could bring this action either at Rome or in any place where the defendant had a domicile, or in any place where the defendant consented to appear. (D. v. 1. 19. 4.)

32. Curare autem debet iudex, ut omnimodo, quantum possibile ei sit, certæ pecuniæ vel rei sententiam ferat, etiam si de incerta quantitate apud eum actum est.

32. A judge ought, as much as possible, to take care that his sentence awards a thing or sum certain, even though the claim submitted to him may have been for an uncertain quantity.

GAI. iv. 48. 52; C. vii. 4. 17.

Certæ pecuniæ vel rei. Before the formulary system the judgment might be either to give a thing or to pay a sum of money. Under the formulary system the condemnatio was always to pay a sum of money. (GAI. iv. 48.) Under the system of judicia extraordinaria a return was made to the old law, and the condemnatio might be not only for a certain sum of money, but also for any other definite thing, that thus the object of the demand might be directly obtained.

33. Si quis agens in intentione sua plus complexus fuerit, quam ad eum pertinet, causa cadebat, id est rem amittebat, nec facile in integrum a prætore restituebatur, nisi minor erat viginti quinque annis. Huic enim sicut in aliis causis causa cognita succurrebatur, si lapsus juventute fuerat, ita et in hac causa succurri solitum erat. Sane si tam magna causa iusti erroris interveniebat, ut etiam constantissimus quisque labi posset, etiam majori viginti quinque annis succurrebatur: veluti si quis totum legatum petierit, post deinde prolati fuerint codicilli, quibus aut pars legati adempta sit aut quibusdam aliis legata data sint, quæ efficiebant, ut plus petisse videretur petitor quam dodrantem, ad quem ideo lege Falcidia legata minuebantur. Plus autem quattuor modis petitur: re, tempore, loco, causa. Re: veluti si quis pro decem aureis, qui ei debebantur, viginti petierit, aut si is, cujus ex parte res est, totam eam vel majore ex parte suam esse intenderit. Tempore: veluti si quis ante diem vel ante condicionem pe-

33. Formerly, if a plaintiff claimed in his intentio more than his due, he failed in his action, that is, he lost the thing owing to him, nor was it easy for him to get reinstated by the prætor unless he was under the age of twenty-five years; for in this, as well as in other cases, in which aid was given on good ground for it being proved, it was usual to aid the plaintiff if it appeared that he had made an error owing to his youth. If, however, the reasons which betrayed him into the mistake were such as might have misled the most careful man, relief was given even to persons of full age. For example, if a legatee had demanded his whole legacy, and codicils were afterwards produced by which a part of it was taken away, or new legacies given to other persons, so that the plaintiff appeared to have demanded more than the three-fourths to which the legacies were reduced by the lex Falcidia. A man may demand more than what is due to him in four ways—in respect to the thing, to the time, to the place, and to the circumstances. In respect to the thing, as when the plaintiff, instead of ten aurei, it would be paid in the place where due. If he did not do this, then in the condemnatio the iudex fixed an amount in which the advantage it might have been to the debtor to have paid in the particular place was taken into consideration. (See paragr. 33.) The prætor, however, perhaps only allowed the creditor to take advantage of this action if the defendant absented himself from the place where the payment ought to have been made (D. xiii. 4. 1), and then the creditor could bring this action either at Rome or in any place where the defendant had a domicile, or in any place where the defendant consented to appear. (D. v. 1. 19. 4.)

32. Curare autem debet iudex, ut omnimodo, quantum possibile ei sit, certæ pecuniæ vel rei sententiam ferat, etiam si de incerta quantitate apud eum actum est.

32. A judge ought, as much as possible, to take care that his sentence awards a thing or sum certain, even though the claim submitted to him may have been for an uncertain quantity.

GAI. IV. 48. 52; C. vii. 4. 17.

Certæ pecuniæ vel rei. Before the formulary system the judgment might be either to give a thing or to pay a sum of money. Under the formulary system the condemnatio was always to pay a sum of money. (GAI. IV. 48.) Under the system of judicia extraordinaria a return was made to the old law, and the condemnatio might be not only for a certain sum of money, but also for any other definite thing, that thus the object of the demand might be directly obtained.

33. Si quis agens in intentione sua plus complexus fuerit, quam ad eum pertinet, causa cadebat, id est rem amittebat, nec facile in integrum a prætore restituebatur, nisi minor erat viginti quinque annis. Huic enim sicut in aliis causis causa cognita succurrebatur, si lapsus juventute fuerat, ita et in hac causa succurri solitum erat. Sane si tam magna causa iusti erroris interveniebat, ut etiam constantissimus quisque labi posset, etiam majori viginti quinque annis succurrebatur: veluti si quis totum legatum petierit, post deinde prolati fuerint codicilli, quibus aut pars legati adempta sit aut quibusdam aliis legata data sint, quæ efficiebant, ut plus petisse videretur petitor quam dodrantem, ad quem ideo lege Falcidia legata minuebantur. Plus autem quattuor modis petitur: re, tempore, loco, causa. Re: veluti si quis pro decem aureis, qui ei debebantur, viginti petierit, aut si is, cujus ex parte res est, totam eam vel majore ex parte suam esse intenderit. Tempore: veluti si quis ante diem vel ante condicionem pe-

33. Formerly, if a plaintiff claimed in his intentio more than his due, he failed in his action, that is, he lost the thing owing to him, nor was it easy for him to get reinstated by the prætor unless he was under the age of twenty-five years; for in this, as well as in other cases, in which aid was given on good ground for it being proved, it was usual to aid the plaintiff if it appeared that he had made an error owing to his youth. If, however, the reasons which betrayed him into the mistake were such as might have misled the most careful man, relief was given even to persons of full age. For example, if a legatee had demanded his whole legacy, and codicils were afterwards produced by which a part of it was taken away, or new legacies given to other persons, so that the plaintiff appeared to have demanded more than the three-fourths to which the legacies were reduced by the lex Falcidia. A man may demand more than what is due to him in four ways—in respect to the thing, to the time, to the place, and to the circumstances. In respect to the thing, as when the plaintiff, instead of ten aurei, tierit. Qua ratione enim qui tardius solvit, quam solvere deberet, minus solvere intellegitur, eadem ratione, qui premature petit, plus petere videtur. Loco plus petitur, veluti cum quis id, quod certo loco sibi stipulatus est, alio loco petit sine commemoratione illius loci, in quo sibi dari stipulatus fuerit: verbi gratia si is, qui ita stipulatus fuerit 'Ephesi dare spondes?' Romæ pure intendat dari sibi oportere. Ideo autem plus petere intellegitur, quia utilitatem, quam habuit promissor, si Ephesi solveret, adimit ei pura intentione: propter quam causam alio loco petenti arbitraria actio proponitur, in qua scilicet ratio habetur utilitatis, quæ promissori competitura fuisset, si illo loco solveret. Quæ utilitas plerumque in mercibus maxima invenitur, veluti vino, oleo, frumento, quæ per singulas regiones diversa habent pretia: sed et pecuniæ numeratæ non in omnibus regionibus sub iisdem usuris fene-rantur. Si quis tamen Ephesi petat, id est eo loco petat, quo, ut sibi detur, stipulatus est, pura actione recte agit: idque etiam prætor monstrat, scilicet quia utilitas solvendi salva est promissori. Huic autem, qui loco plus petere intellegitur, proximus est is, qui causa plus petit: ut ecce si quis ita a te stipulatus sit 'hominem Stichum aut decem aureos dare spondes?' deinde alterutrum petat, veluti hominem tantum aut decem aureos tantum. Ideo autem plus petere intellegitur, quia in eo genere stipulationis promissoris est electio, utrum pecuniam an hominem solvere malit: qui igitur pecuniam tantum vel hominem tantum sibi dari oportere intendit, eripit electionem adversario et eo modo suam quidem meliorem conditionem facit, adversarii vero sui deteriore. Qua de causa talis in ea re prodita est actio, ut quis intendat, hominem Stichum aut aureos decem sibi dari oportere, id est ut eodem modo peteret, quo stipulatus est. Præterea si quis generaliter hominem stipulatus sit et specialiter Stichum petat, aut generaliter vinum stipulatus, specialiter Campanum petat, aut generaliter purpuram stipulatus sit, deinde specialiter Tyriam petat: plus petere intellegitur, quia electionem which are due to him, demands twenty; or if, although owner of but part of some particular thing, he claims the whole, or a greater share than he is entitled to. In respect to time, as when the plaintiff makes his demand before the day of payment, or before the performance of a condition; for just as he who does not pay so soon as he ought is held to pay less than he ought, so whoever makes his demand prematurely, demands more than his due. In respect to place, as when any person sues in another place for something stipulated to be delivered at a particular place, without mentioning the place fixed by the stipulation; for example, if, having stipulated in these words, 'Do you promise to give at Ephesus?' any one should afterwards bring an action at Rome, merely stating that the defendant ought to give. In this case the plaintiff would demand more than his due, as he would, by his intentio thus conceived simply, deprive the promisor of the advantage he might have in paying at Ephesus. And it is thus that a plaintiff, suing in a place different from that agreed on, has provided for him an arbitrary action in which allowance is made for the advantage which the debtor might have reaped from paying his debt in the place agreed on. This advantage is generally found to be most considerable in different kinds of merchandise, as in wine, oil, corn, of which the price differs in different places. Money itself, again, is not lent everywhere at the same interest. But if a man brings his action at Ephesus, that is, at the place fixed by the stipulation, he may validly bring an action without mention of the place agreed on for payment: and this the prætor, too, points out, because all the advantage the debtor will have in paying at the particular place is secured to him. In respect to the circumstances, he who demands more than his due in this way approaches very nearly to him who demands more than his due in respect of place; as, for instance, if any one stipulates thus with you, 'Do you promise to give either your slave Stichus or ten aurei?' and then demands either the slave only, or the money only. He would in this case be held to have demanded more than his due, because in such a stipulation the promisor has the right to choose whether he will give the slave or the tierit. Qua ratione enim qui tardius solvit, quam solvere deberet, minus solvere intellegitur, eadem ratione, qui premature petit, plus petere videtur. Loco plus petitur, veluti cum quis id, quod certo loco sibi stipulatus est, alio loco petit sine commemoratione illius loci, in quo sibi dari stipulatus fuerit: verbi gratia si is, qui ita stipulatus fuerit 'Ephesi dare spondes?' Romæ pure intendat dari sibi oportere. Ideo autem plus petere intellegitur, quia utilitatem, quam habuit promissori, si Ephesi solveret, adimit ei pura intentione: propter quam causam alio loco petenti arbitraria actio proponitur, in qua scilicet ratio habetur utilitatis, quæ promissori competitura fuisset, si illo loco solveret. Quæ utilitas plerumque in mercibus maxima invenitur, veluti vino, oleo, frumento, quæ per singulas regiones diversa habent pretia: sed et pecuniæ numeratæ non in omnibus regionibus sub iisdem usuris fene-rantur. Si quis tamen Ephesi petat, id est eo loco petat, quo, ut sibi detur, stipulatus est, pura actione recte agit: idque etiam prætor monstrat, scilicet quia utilitas solvendi salva est promissori. Huic autem, qui loco plus petere intellegitur, proximus est is, qui causa plus petit: ut ecce si quis ita a te stipulatus sit 'hominem Stichum aut decem aureos dare spondes?' deinde alterutrum petat, veluti hominem tantum aut decem aureos tantum. Ideo autem plus petere intellegitur, quia in eo genere stipulationis promissoris est electio, utrum pecuniam an hominem solvere malit: qui igitur pecuniam tantum vel hominem tantum sibi dari oportere intendit, eripit electionem adversario et eo modo suam quidem meliorem conditionem facit, adversarii vero sui deteriore. Qua de causa talis in ea re prodita est actio, ut quis intendat, hominem Stichum aut aureos decem sibi dari oportere, id est ut eodem modo peteret, quo stipulatus est. Præterea si quis generaliter hominem stipulatus sit et specialiter Stichum petat, aut generaliter vinum stipulatus, specialiter Campanum petat, aut generaliter purpuram stipulatus sit, deinde specialiter Tyriam petat: plus petere intellegitur, quia electionem

which are due to him, demands twenty; or if, although owner of but part of some particular thing, he claims the whole, or a greater share than he is entitled to. In respect to time, as when the plaintiff makes his demand before the day of payment, or before the performance of a condition; for just as he who does not pay so soon as he ought is held to pay less than he ought, so whoever makes his demand prematurely, demands more than his due. In respect to place, as when any person sues in another place for something stipulated to be delivered at a particular place, without mentioning the place fixed by the stipulation; for example, if, having stipulated in these words, 'Do you promise to give at Ephesus?' any one should afterwards bring an action at Rome, merely stating that the defendant ought to give. In this case the plaintiff would demand more than his due, as he would, by his intentio thus conceived simply, deprive the promisor of the advantage he might have in paying at Ephesus. And it is thus that a plaintiff, suing in a place different from that agreed on, has provided for him an arbitrary action in which allowance is made for the advantage which the debtor might have reaped from paying his debt in the place agreed on. This advantage is generally found to be most considerable in different kinds of merchandise, as in wine, oil, corn, of which the price differs in different places. Money itself, again, is not lent everywhere at the same interest. But if a man brings his action at Ephesus, that is, at the place fixed by the stipulation, he may validly bring an action without mention of the place agreed on for payment: and this the prætor, too, points out, because all the advantage the debtor will have in paying at the particular place is secured to him. In respect to the circumstances, he who demands more than his due in this way approaches very nearly to him who demands more than his due in respect of place; as, for instance, if any one stipulates thus with you, 'Do you promise to give either your slave Stichus or ten aurei?' and then demands either the slave only, or the money only. He would in this case be held to have demanded more than his due, because in such a stipulation the promisor has the right to choose whether he will give the slave or the money. He, therefore, who claims either the money only, or the slave only, takes away his adversary's power of choice, and thus makes his own condition better, and that of his adversary worse; and accordingly an action has been provided by which in such a case the plaintiff maintains that either the slave Stichus ought to be given him, or the money, and thus makes a demand in conformity with the stipulation. So, too, if a man stipulates generally that a slave, or wine, or purple be given him, and afterwards sues for the slave Stichus, the wine of Campania, the purple of Tyre, he is held to demand more than his due, for he thus takes the power of election from his adversary, to whom it was open by the terms of the stipulation to pay something different from what is demanded. Nay, even if the thing actually sued for is the least valuable of its kind, yet the plaintiff is held to claim more than his due, because it is often easier for the debtor to pay a thing of greater value. Such was the law formerly in use. But considerable limitations have been imposed on its operation by the constitution of the Emperor Zeno, and by our own. If more than is due is demanded in respect of time, the constitution of Zeno of glorious memory decides what must be done; if in respect of quantity, or in any other way, then the plaintiff is to be punished, as we have said above, by having to pay a sum triple the amount of any loss sustained by the defendant, for example, by increased court fees.

adversario tollit, cui stipulationis jure liberum fuit aliud solvere, quam quod peteretur. Quin etiam licet vilissimum sit, quod quis petat, nihilo minus plus petere intellegitur, quia sæpe accidit, ut promissori facilius sit illud solvere, quod majoris pretii est. Sed hæc quidem antea in usu fuerant. Postea autem lex Zenoniana et nostra rem coarctavit, et si quidem tempore plus fuerit petitum, quid statui oportet, Zenonis divæ memoriæ loquitur constitutio: sin autem quantitate vel alio modo plus fuerit petitum, omne, si quid forte damnum ut in sportulis ex hac causa acciderit ei, contra quem plus petitum fuerit, commissæ tripli condemnatione, sicut supra diximus, puniatur.

GAL. iv. 53; D. iv. 4. 1. 1; D. iv. 6. 1. 1; D. xiii. 4; C. iii. 10. 1, 2.

Under the system of formulae, a plus-petitio or pluris-petitio had the effect of making the plaintiff fail entirely in an actio stricti juris, when the error was in the intentio, and the intentio was for a thing certain. Supposing this were the case, as the formula would run si paret decem nummos &c., condemna, si non absolve, then, if the defendant owed only nine nummi, he did not owe ten, and so the judex could not condemn him. The plaintiff failed, and having once come in judicio, the litis contestatio operated as a novation of the cause of action (see Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3 note), and, his original claim being thus cut away, he was left entirely without remedy, and could take no further proceedings to enforce his demand.

Of course, if the demand was for a thing uncertain, there could be no plus-petitio in this sense. If there was an error in

adversario tollit, cui stipulationis jure liberum fuit aliud solvere, quam quod peteretur. Quin etiam licet vilissimum sit, quod quis petat, nihilo minus plus petere intellegitur, quia sæpe accidit, ut promissori facilius sit illud solvere, quod majoris pretii est. Sed hæc quidem antea in usu fuerant. Postea autem lex Zenoniana et nostra rem coartavit, et si quidem tempore plus fuerit petitum, quid statui oportet, Zenonis divæ memoriæ loquitur constitutio: sin autem quantitate vel alio modo plus fuerit petitum, omne, si quid forte damnum ut in sportulis ex hac causa acciderit ei, contra quem plus petitum fuerit, commissæ tripli condemnatione, sicut supra diximus, puniatur.

money. He, therefore, who claims either the money only, or the slave only, takes away his adversary's power of choice, and thus makes his own condition better, and that of his adversary worse; and accordingly an action has been provided by which in such a case the plaintiff maintains that either the slave Stichus ought to be given him, or the money, and thus makes a demand in conformity with the stipulation. So, too, if a man stipulates generally that a slave, or wine, or purple be given him, and afterwards sues for the slave Stichus, the wine of Campania, the purple of Tyre, he is held to demand more than his due, for he thus takes the power of election from his adversary, to whom it was open by the terms of the stipulation to pay something different from what is demanded. Nay, even if the thing actually sued for is the least valuable of its kind, yet the plaintiff is held to claim more than his due, because it is often easier for the debtor to pay a thing of greater value. Such was the law formerly in use. But considerable limitations have been imposed on its operation by the constitution of the Emperor Zeno, and by our own. If more than is due is demanded in respect of time, the constitution of Zeno of glorious memory decides what must be done; if in respect of quantity, or in any other way, then the plaintiff is to be punished, as we have said above, by having to pay a sum triple the amount of any loss sustained by the defendant, for example, by increased court fees.

GAL. iv. 53; D. iv. 4. 1. 1; D. iv. 6. 1. 1; D. xiii. 4; C. iii. 10. 1, 2.

Under the system of formulae, a plus-petitio or pluris-petitio had the effect of making the plaintiff fail entirely in an actio stricti juris, when the error was in the intentio, and the intentio was for a thing certain. Supposing this were the case, as the formula would run si paret decem nummos &c., condemnas, si non absolve, then, if the defendant owed only nine nummi, he did not owe ten, and so the judex could not condemn him. The plaintiff failed, and having once come in judicio, the litis contestatio operated as a novation of the cause of action (see Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3 note), and, his original claim being thus cut away, he was left entirely without remedy, and could take no further proceedings to enforce his demand.

Of course, if the demand was for a thing uncertain, there could be no plus-petitio in this sense. If there was an error in the demonstratio, the plaintiff was not at all prejudiced. If there was a mistake in the condemnatio, making it more unfavourable to the defendant than it ought to have been, it was the defendant who would be prejudiced; but the prætor would grant a new formula, and so rectify the mistake. (See GAI. iv. 53-60, reading in 57, sed (reus cum) iniquam formulam acceperit.)

Under the system of the judicia extraordinaria a plus-petitio would mean any claim in excess contained in the libellus conventionis. The text informs us of the mode in which such a mistake or misstatement was punished when the plus-petitio was not one tempore. If the plus-petitio was tempore, i.e. if the plaintiff sued before the proper time, he was condemned by the constitution of Zeno (C. iii. 10. 1) to wait double the time he ought originally to have waited, and, on renewing the action, to reimburse the defendant all expenses he might have been put to by the action improperly brought.

Sicut supra diximus refers to the case of the damnum being the exaction of a larger fee by the officers of the court, as mentioned in paragr. 24.

34. Si minus in intentione complexus fuerit actor, quam ad eum pertineret, veluti si, cum ei decem deberentur, quinque sibi dari oportere intenderit, aut cum totus fundus ejus esset, partem dimidiam suam esse petierit, sine periculo agit: in reliquum enim nihilo minus judex adversarium in eodem judicio condemnat ex constitutione diæ memoriæ Zenonis.

34. If a plaintiff includes less in his intentio than he has a claim to, demanding, for instance, only five aurei when ten are due, or the half of an estate when the whole belongs to him, he runs no risk; for the judge may, by the constitution of Zeno of glorious memory, condemn in the same action the defendant to pay the remainder of what is due to the plaintiff.

GAI. iv. 56; C. iii. 10. 1. 3.

Under the prætorian system, a plaintiff who claimed a less amount than was really due to him, could bring another action for the surplus if he waited until another prætor came into office. (GAI. iv. 56.) Zeno allowed the judeæ to add the surplus in condemning the defendant.

35. Si quis aliud pro alio intenderit, nihil eum periclitari placet, sed in eodem judicio cognita veritate errorem suum corrigere ei permittimus, veluti si is, qui hominem Stichum petere deberet, Erotem petierit, aut si quis ex testamento sibi dari oportere intenderit, quod ex stipulatu debetur.

35. When a plaintiff demands one thing instead of another, he incurs no risk. For if he discovers the truth, he is allowed to correct his mistake in the same action; as if he should demand the slave Eros instead of Stichus, or should claim as due by virtue of a testament what is really due upon a stipulation.

GAI. iii. 55.

In the time of Gaius, a plaintiff who demanded one thing instead of another, lost the action, but could recover the thing really due in a subsequent action. Justinian permitted the mistake to be retrieved in the same action, as the text informs us.

the demonstratio, the plaintiff was not at all prejudiced. If there was a mistake in the condemnatio, making it more unfavourable to the defendant than it ought to have been, it was the defendant who would be prejudiced; but the prætor would grant a new formula, and so rectify the mistake. (See GAI. iv. 53-60, reading in 57, sed (reus cum) iniquam formulam acceperit.)

Under the system of the judicia extraordinaria a plus-petitio would mean any claim in excess contained in the libellus conventionis. The text informs us of the mode in which such a mistake or misstatement was punished when the plus-petitio was not one tempore. If the plus-petitio was tempore, i.e. if the plaintiff sued before the proper time, he was condemned by the constitution of Zeno (C. iii. 10. 1) to wait double the time he ought originally to have waited, and, on renewing the action, to reimburse the defendant all expenses he might have been put to by the action improperly brought.

Sicut supra diximus refers to the case of the damnum being the exaction of a larger fee by the officers of the court, as mentioned in paragr. 24.

34. Si minus in intentione complexus fuerit actor, quam ad eum pertineret, veluti si, cum ei decem deberentur, quinque sibi dari oportere intenderit, aut cum totus fundus ejus esset, partem dimidiam suam esse petierit, sine periculo agit: in reliquum enim nihilo minus judex adversarium in eodem judicio condemnat ex constitutione diuæ memoriæ Zenonis.

34. If a plaintiff includes less in his intentio than he has a claim to, demanding, for instance, only five aurei when ten are due, or the half of an estate when the whole belongs to him, he runs no risk; for the judge may, by the constitution of Zeno of glorious memory, condemn in the same action the defendant to pay the remainder of what is due to the plaintiff.

GAI. iv. 56; C. iii. 10. 1. 3.

Under the prætorian system, a plaintiff who claimed a less amount than was really due to him, could bring another action for the surplus if he waited until another prætor came into office. (GAI. iv. 56.) Zeno allowed the judex to add the surplus in condemning the defendant.

35. Si quis aliud pro alio intenderit, nihil eum periclitari placet, sed in eodem judicio cognita veritate errorem suum corrigere ei permittimus, veluti si is, qui hominem Stichum petere deberet, Erotem petierit, aut si quis ex testamento sibi dari oportere intenderit, quod ex stipulatu debetur.

35. When a plaintiff demands one thing instead of another, he incurs no risk. For if he discovers the truth, he is allowed to correct his mistake in the same action; as if he should demand the slave Eros instead of Stichus, or should claim as due by virtue of a testament what is really due upon a stipulation.

GAI. iii. 55.

In the time of Gaius, a plaintiff who demanded one thing instead of another, lost the action, but could recover the thing really due in a subsequent action. Justinian permitted the mistake to be retrieved in the same action, as the text informs us.

36. Sunt præterea quædam actiones, quibus non solidum, quod debetur nobis, persequimur, sed modo solidum consequimur, modo minus. Ut ecce si in peculium filii servive agamus: nam si non minus in peculio sit, quam persequimur, in solidum pater dominusve condemnatur: si vero minus inveniatur, eatenus condemnatur iudex, quatenus in peculio sit. Quemadmodum autem peculium intellegi debeat, suo ordine proponemus.

36. There are, again, certain actions by which we do not always sue for the whole of what is due to us, but sometimes for the whole, sometimes for less. For example, when a suit is brought so as to form a claim against the peculium of a son or a slave, then, if the peculium is sufficient to answer the demand, the father or master is condemned to pay the whole debt; but if the peculium is not sufficient, he is condemned to pay only to the extent of the peculium. We will hereafter explain, in its proper place, how the peculium is to be estimated.

C. iv. 26. 12.

We here enter on another division of actions, according to which actions, by which the whole of what was due was obtained, are distinguished from those by which sometimes the whole, sometimes less than the whole, of what was due was obtained.

Suo ordine; see next Title.

37. Item si de dote iudicio mulier agat, placet, eatenus maritum condemnari debere, quatenus facere possit, id est quatenus facultates ejus patiuntur. Itaque si dotis quantitati concurrant facultates ejus, in solidum damnatur: si minus, in tantum, quantum facere potest. Propter retentionem quoque dotis repetitio minuitur: nam ob impensas in res dotales factas marito retentio concessa est, quia ipso jure necessariis sumptibus dos minuitur, sicut ex latioribus digestorum libris cognoscere licet.

37. Thus, too, if a wife brings an action for the restitution of her dos, the husband must be condemned to pay only as far as he is able, i.e. as far as his means permit. Therefore, if his means admit of his paying the whole amount of the dos, he is condemned to pay the whole; if not, he must pay as much as it is in his power to pay. The claim of a wife for the restitution of her dos may also be lessened by the husband having a right to retain something; for the husband is permitted to retain a sum equivalent to the expenses he has incurred upon the things given, since the marriage portion is by law diminished by the amount of all necessary expenses, as may be seen in fuller detail in the Digest.

D. xxiv. 3. 12, 14; D. xxv. 1. 5.

The privilege of having the condemnatio reduced, duntaxat in id quatenus facere potest, i.e. of being condemned only in an amount which he could pay without being reduced to a state of destitution (D. l. 17. 173. pr.), a privilege called by the commentators the beneficium competentie, was accorded to the defendant in several other cases besides those mentioned in the text and in the next paragraph and in paragr. 40. We may instance the case of one brother sued by another, and every case arising between man and wife, except claims grounded on delicts. (D. xlii. 1. 20.) This privilege was always personal, and did not avail either heirs or sureties.

If the debtor subsequently had funds, he had to pay what

36. Sunt præterea quædam actiones, quibus non solidum, quod debetur nobis, persequimur, sed modo solidum consequimur, modo minus. Ut ecce si in peculium filii servive agamus: nam si non minus in peculio sit, quam persequimur, in solidum pater dominusve condemnatur: si vero minus inveniatur, eatenus condemnatur iudex, quatenus in peculio sit. Quemadmodum autem peculium intellegi debeat, suo ordine proponemus.

36. There are, again, certain actions by which we do not always sue for the whole of what is due to us, but sometimes for the whole, sometimes for less. For example, when a suit is brought so as to form a claim against the peculium of a son or a slave, then, if the peculium is sufficient to answer the demand, the father or master is condemned to pay the whole debt; but if the peculium is not sufficient, he is condemned to pay only to the extent of the peculium. We will hereafter explain, in its proper place, how the peculium is to be estimated.

C. iv. 26. 12.

We here enter on another division of actions, according to which actions, by which the whole of what was due was obtained, are distinguished from those by which sometimes the whole, sometimes less than the whole, of what was due was obtained.

Suo ordine; see next Title.

37. Item si de dote iudicio mulier agat, placet, eatenus maritum condemnari debere, quatenus facere possit, id est quatenus facultates ejus patiuntur. Itaque si dotis quantitati concurrant facultates ejus, in solidum damnatur: si minus, in tantum, quantum facere potest. Propter retentionem quoque dotis repetitio minuitur: nam ob impensas in res dotales factas marito retentio concessa est, quia ipso jure necessariis sumptibus dos minuitur, sicut ex latioribus digestorum libris cognoscere licet.

37. Thus, too, if a wife brings an action for the restitution of her dos, the husband must be condemned to pay only as far as he is able, i.e. as far as his means permit. Therefore, if his means admit of his paying the whole amount of the dos, he is condemned to pay the whole; if not, he must pay as much as it is in his power to pay. The claim of a wife for the restitution of her dos may also be lessened by the husband having a right to retain something; for the husband is permitted to retain a sum equivalent to the expenses he has incurred upon the things given, since the marriage portion is by law diminished by the amount of all necessary expenses, as may be seen in fuller detail in the Digest.

D. xxiv. 3. 12, 14; D. xxv. 1. 5.

The privilege of having the condemnatio reduced, duntaxat in id quatenus facere potest, i.e. of being condemned only in an amount which he could pay without being reduced to a state of destitution (D. l. 17. 173. pr.), a privilege called by the commentators the beneficium competentia, was accorded to the defendant in several other cases besides those mentioned in the text and in the next paragraph and in paragr. 40. We may instance the case of one brother sued by another, and every case arising between man and wife, except claims grounded on delicts. (D. xlii. 1. 20.) This privilege was always personal, and did not avail either heirs or sureties.

If the debtor subsequently had funds, he had to pay what under the beneficium competentie he left unpaid. (C. v. 18. 8.) In calculating how much the debtor could pay, account was only taken of what he possessed, without deduction for what he owed, except in the one case of the donor, who might deduct his debts. (D. xlii. 1. 19.)

Propter retentionem dotis. The husband might deduct the amount of all necessary expenses incurred in the management of the property constituting the marriage portion. If the expenses had been only profitably and not necessarily incurred, that is, were utiles, and not necessarie, Justinian only allowed the husband to bring an actio mandati, or an actio negotiorum gestorum, to reimburse himself; whereas, previously, he had been able to deduct such expenses as well as those that were necessarie. (D. l. 16. 79; C. v. 13. 1. 5.)

38. Sed et si quis cum parente suo patronove agat, item si socius cum socio judicio societatis agat, non plus actor consequitur, quam adversarius ejus facere potest. Idem est, si quis ex donatione sua conveniatur.

38. If any person sues his ascendant or patron, or one partner sues another in an action of partnership, he cannot obtain a greater sum than his adversary is able to pay. It is the same when a donor is sued for his gift.

D. xlii. 1. 16, 19.

39. Compensationes quoque oppositæ plerumque efficiunt, ut minus quisque consequatur, quam ei debetur: namque ex bono et æquo, habita ratione ejus, quod invicem actorem ex eadem causa præstare oporteret, in reliquum eum, cum quo actum est, condemnare licet, sicut jam dictum est.

39. Sets-off too, opposed by one party to the claims of the other, often bring about the result that the plaintiff recovers less than is due to him; for the judge, proceeding on equitable principles, may take account of whatever the plaintiff ought to make good in reference to the same set of circumstances, and may condemn the defendant to pay the balance only, as has already been observed.

GAI. iv. 61.

If the defendant was not only a debtor but a creditor of the plaintiff, if he had something owing to him from the plaintiff as well as owed something to him, it was evidently the most convenient way that he should be allowed to balance one debt against the other (compensatio, pendere cum), and only account for the surplus, supposing a surplus was still due from him.

Under the prætorian system, in all actions bonæ fidei, the judge, who could take all the circumstances of the case into his consideration, set off, as a matter of course, any debt due to the defendant from the plaintiff in consequence of the same set of circumstances (ex eadem causa) by which the debt on which the action was brought became due. (GAI. iv. 61.) In one case, however, viz. that of a banker (argentarius), a much stricter system prevailed. The argentarius could only sue a customer for the sum due to him after allowing for what he owed to the customer. If he sued for more, it was a plus-petitio. (GAI. iv. 64.) The bonorum emptor, or purchaser of an insolvent's estate, had also to make a under the beneficium competentie he left unpaid. (C. v. 18. 8.) In calculating how much the debtor could pay, account was only taken of what he possessed, without deduction for what he owed, except in the one case of the donor, who might deduct his debts. (D. xlii. 1. 19.)

Propter retentionem dotis. The husband might deduct the amount of all necessary expenses incurred in the management of the property constituting the marriage portion. If the expenses had been only profitably and not necessarily incurred, that is, were utiles, and not necessariæ, Justinian only allowed the husband to bring an actio mandati, or an actio negotiorum gestorum, to reimburse himself; whereas, previously, he had been able to deduct such expenses as well as those that were necessariæ. (D. l. 16. 79; C. v. 13. 1. 5.)

38. Sed et si quis cum parente suo patronove agat, item si socius cum socio iudicio societatis agat, non plus actor consequitur, quam adversarius ejus facere potest. Idem est, si quis ex donatione sua conveniatur.

38. If any person sues his ascendant or patron, or one partner sues another in an action of partnership, he cannot obtain a greater sum than his adversary is able to pay. It is the same when a donor is sued for his gift.

D. xlii. 1. 16, 19.

39. Compensationes quoque oppositæ plerumque efficiunt, ut minus quisque consequatur, quam ei debetur: namque ex bono et æquo, habita ratione ejus, quod invicem actorem ex eadem causa præstare oporteret, in reliquum eum, cum quo actum est, condemnare licet, sicut jam dictum est.

39. Sets-off too, opposed by one party to the claims of the other, often bring about the result that the plaintiff recovers less than is due to him; for the judge, proceeding on equitable principles, may take account of whatever the plaintiff ought to make good in reference to the same set of circumstances, and may condemn the defendant to pay the balance only, as has already been observed.

GAI. iv. 61.

If the defendant was not only a debtor but a creditor of the plaintiff, if he had something owing to him from the plaintiff as well as owed something to him, it was evidently the most convenient way that he should be allowed to balance one debt against the other (compensatio, pendere cum), and only account for the surplus, supposing a surplus was still due from him.

Under the prætorian system, in all actions bonæ fidei, the judge, who could take all the circumstances of the case into his consideration, set off, as a matter of course, any debt due to the defendant from the plaintiff in consequence of the same set of circumstances (ex eadem causa) by which the debt on which the action was brought became due. (GAI. iv. 61.) In one case, however, viz. that of a banker (argentarius), a much stricter system prevailed. The argentarius could only sue a customer for the sum due to him after allowing for what he owed to the customer. If he sued for more, it was a plus-petitio. (GAI. iv. 64.) The bonorum emptor, or purchaser of an insolvent's estate, had also to make a deduction of what was due to the defendant from the insolvent when he sued a debtor of the insolvent. (GAI. iv. 65.) Between this deductio and the compensatio required from the argentarius there were some differences: compensatio was only of things of the same kind, only of debts due, and had to be inserted in the intentio; whereas the deductio was of things of different kinds, of debts not yet due as well as debts due, and being inserted in the condemnatio did not expose the plaintiff to the risk of plus-petitio. (GAI. iv. 66-68.) In the actions stricti juris, which arose from unilateral, not bilateral contracts, there could be no reciprocal rights, as in a bilateral contract, giving the defendant a claim ex eadem causa. But the rule grew up and was confirmed by a rescript of Marcus Aurelius (see par. 30), dolo facit qui petit quod redditurus est. (D. xlv. 4. 8. pr.) If the plaintiff claimed a sum which directly he had obtained it he would have to pay back to the defendant, he was guilty of a dolus; he had acted as if he had a right to the money, whereas he had not. Accordingly the defendant could avail himself of the exception of dolus. What the effect of this exception was is not certain. Some think that if the plaintiff was found to owe the defendant anything of a similar kind, although ex dispari causa, which he had not allowed for in stating the amount of his claim, he entirely failed in his action. He did not recover any surplus which might be really due to him. The exception stopped the action altogether. The formula ran: Si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit neque fiat . . . condemna; si non paret, absolve. Dolus malus did appear, and all the judex could do was to absolve the defendant. (PAUL. Sent. ii. 5. 3.) Others suppose that the defendant had to pay any balance found to be due by him. (See DEMANGEAT, ii. 629.)

But we must not suppose that compensatio was originally looked on as a means of extinguishing an obligation. In theory of law, each debt subsisted separately. Certainly in the case of the argentarius it is hard to draw a line between an extinction of obligation and the way in which debts due to customers were necessarily deducted; but it was necessary that the debts due to and from the argentarius, although ex dispari causa, should be in eadem re, that is, should both consist, for instance, of money or wine. This was an exceptional case, and, generally speaking, the two debts clearly subsisted together, although, when, by submitting the facts to the knowledge of the judex in the case of actions bonae fidei, and by the exceptio doli in the action of law, the set-off was claimed, its effects were retroactive, and may be said to have commenced from the moment when the two debts first began to exist together. (C. iv. 31. 4.)

Under Justinian the debts were held to operate as mutually extinguishing each other ipso jure. When the parties came before the judex, he ascertained their respective claims on each other, and if there was, on the whole, a balance in favour of the plaintiff, awarded the amount to him. All the old distinctions were done deduction of what was due to the defendant from the insolvent when he sued a debtor of the insolvent. (GAI. iv. 65.) Between this deductio and the compensatio required from the argentarius there were some differences: compensatio was only of things of the same kind, only of debts due, and had to be inserted in the intentio; whereas the deductio was of things of different kinds, of debts not yet due as well as debts due, and being inserted in the condemnatio did not expose the plaintiff to the risk of plus-petitio. (GAI. iv. 66-68.) In the actions stricti juris, which arose from unilateral, not bilateral contracts, there could be no reciprocal rights, as in a bilateral contract, giving the defendant a claim ex eadem causa. But the rule grew up and was confirmed by a rescript of Marcus Aurelius (see par. 30), dolo facit qui petit quod redditurus est. (D. xlv. 4. 8. pr.) If the plaintiff claimed a sum which directly he had obtained it he would have to pay back to the defendant, he was guilty of a dolus; he had acted as if he had a right to the money, whereas he had not. Accordingly the defendant could avail himself of the exception of dolus. What the effect of this exception was is not certain. Some think that if the plaintiff was found to owe the defendant anything of a similar kind, although ex dispari causa, which he had not allowed for in stating the amount of his claim, he entirely failed in his action. He did not recover any surplus which might be really due to him. The exception stopped the action altogether. The formula ran: Si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit neque fiat . . . condemna; si non paret, absolve. Dolus malus did appear, and all the judei could do was to absolve the defendant. (PAUL. Sent. ii. 5. 3.) Others suppose that the defendant had to pay any balance found to be due by him. (See DEMANGEAT, ii. 629.)

But we must not suppose that compensatio was originally looked on as a means of extinguishing an obligation. In theory of law, each debt subsisted separately. Certainly in the case of the argentarius it is hard to draw a line between an extinction of obligation and the way in which debts due to customers were necessarily deducted; but it was necessary that the debts due to and from the argentarius, although ex dispari causa, should be in eadem re, that is, should both consist, for instance, of money or wine. This was an exceptional case, and, generally speaking, the two debts clearly subsisted together, although, when, by submitting the facts to the knowledge of the judei in the case of actions bonae fidei, and by the exceptio doli in the action of law, the set-off was claimed, its effects were retroactive, and may be said to have commenced from the moment when the two debts first began to exist together. (C. iv. 31. 4.)

Under Justinian the debts were held to operate as mutually extinguishing each other ipso jure. When the parties came before the judei, he ascertained their respective claims on each other, and if there was, on the whole, a balance in favour of the plaintiff, awarded the amount to him. All the old distinctions were done away, and it no longer made any difference whether the two debts arose from the same transaction, or whether things of the same kind were payable (the words ex eadem causa in the text are, therefore, under Justinian's legislation, inaccurate). But Justinian made it requisite that the defendant's claim should be clearly well founded, and that the amount should be at once ascertainable, and not need further inquiry to determine it (causa liquida) (see C. iv. 31. 14. 1), and he would not allow any set-off to an actio depositi. (See paragr. 30.)

40. Eum quoque, qui creditoribus suis bonis cessit, si postea aliquid adquisierit, quod idoneum emolumentum habeat, ex integro in id, quod facere potest, creditores cum eo experiuntur: inhumanum enim erat spoliatum fortunis suis in solidum damnari.

40. So, when a debtor who has made a cession of his goods to his creditors subsequently acquires something of an advantageous character, the creditors may compel him by a fresh action to pay as much as he is able, but not more; for it would be inhuman to condemn a man to pay the full amount who has already been deprived of all his property.

D. xlii. 3. 4. 6.

TIT. VII. QUOD CUM EO, QUI IN ALIENA POTESTATE EST, NEGOTIUM GESTUM ESSE DICITUR.

Quia tamen superius mentionem habuimus de actione, quæ in peculium filiorumfamilias servorumque agitur: opus est, ut de hac actione et de ceteris, quæ eorundem nomine in parentes dominosve dari solent, diligentius admoneamus. Et quia, sive cum servis negotium gestum sit sive cum his, qui in potestate parentis sunt, fere eadem jura servantur, ne verbosa fiat disputatio, dirigamus sermonem in personam servi dominique, idem intellecturi de liberis quoque et parentibus, quorum in potestate sunt. Nam si quid in his proprie observetur, separatim ostendemus.

We have already spoken of the action which may be brought relative to the peculium of filiifamilias or of slaves. And we must now speak of it more fully, and also of all other actions which may be brought against ascendants and masters as representing children and slaves. But, as the law is almost the same, whether the dealing is with a slave, or with one under the power of an ascendant, to avoid prolixity, we will treat only of slaves and their masters, leaving what we say of them to be understood as applicable also to children and the ascendants, under whose power they are. For anything which is peculiar to children and ascendants we will point out separately.

GAL. iv. 69.

By the strict rule of the civil law, the parent or master could not be bound or prejudiced by any act of a child or slave. But a sense of equity gradually broke in upon this rule, and, in certain cases, the contracts and delicts of persons alieni juris came to affect those in whose power these persons were.

This Title treats of the contracts of persons alieni juris, which were considered to concern the master or parent (1) whenever they were made by his order, whether expressly or by implication, and (2) whenever he had profited by them.

away, and it no longer made any difference whether the two debts arose from the same transaction, or whether things of the same kind were payable (the words ex eadem causa in the text are, therefore, under Justinian's legislation, inaccurate). But Justinian made it requisite that the defendant's claim should be clearly well founded, and that the amount should be at once ascertainable, and not need further inquiry to determine it (causa liquida) (see C. iv. 31. 14. 1), and he would not allow any set-off to an actio depositi. (See paragr. 30.)

40. Eum quoque, qui creditoribus suis bonis cessit, si postea aliquid adquisierit, quod idoneum emolumentum habeat, ex integro in id, quod facere potest, creditores cum eo experiuntur: inhumanum enim erat spoliatum fortunis suis in solidum damnari.

40. So, when a debtor who has made a cession of his goods to his creditors subsequently acquires something of an advantageous character, the creditors may compel him by a fresh action to pay as much as he is able, but not more; for it would be inhuman to condemn a man to pay the full amount who has already been deprived of all his property.

D. xlii. 3. 4. 6.

TIT. VII. QUOD CUM EO, QUI IN ALIENA POTESTATE EST, NEGOTIUM GESTUM ESSE DICITUR.

Quia tamen superius mentionem habuimus de actione, quæ in peculium filiorumfamilias servorumque agitur: opus est, ut de hac actione et de ceteris, quæ eorundem nomine in parentes dominosve dari solent, diligentius aduoneamus. Et quia, sive cum servis negotium gestum sit sive cum his, qui in potestate parentis sunt, fere eadem jura servantur, ne verbosa fiat disputatio, dirigamus sermonem in personam servi dominique, idem intellecturi de liberis quoque et parentibus, quorum in potestate sunt. Nam si quid in his proprie observetur, separatim ostendemus.

We have already spoken of the action which may be brought relative to the peculium of filiifamilias or of slaves. And we must now speak of it more fully, and also of all other actions which may be brought against ascendants and masters as representing children and slaves. But, as the law is almost the same, whether the dealing is with a slave, or with one under the power of an ascendant, to avoid prolixity, we will treat only of slaves and their masters, leaving what we say of them to be understood as applicable also to children and the ascendants, under whose power they are. For anything which is peculiar to children and ascendants we will point out separately.

GAL. iv. 69.

By the strict rule of the civil law, the parent or master could not be bound or prejudiced by any act of a child or slave. But a sense of equity gradually broke in upon this rule, and, in certain cases, the contracts and delicts of persons alieni juris came to affect those in whose power these persons were.

This Title treats of the contracts of persons alieni juris, which were considered to concern the master or parent (1) whenever they were made by his order, whether expressly or by implication, and (2) whenever he had profited by them.

1. Si igitur jussu domini cum servo negotium gestum erit, in solidum prætor adversus dominum actionem pollicetur, scilicet quia qui ita contrahit, fidem domini sequi videtur.

1. Thus, then, if any one deals with a slave acting under the command of his master, the prætor will give an action against the master for the whole of what is due under the contract; inasmuch as, in this case, the person who contracts does so as relying on the faith of the master.

GAL. iv. 70.

Jussu domini; this extended to cases where the master subsequently ratified the contract, the ratification being equivalent to a mandate. (D. xv. 4. 1. 6.)

If the slave had been merely the instrument of his master, if, for instance, the master arranged that money borrowed for himself should be told out to his slave, the prætor would give a condictio, not an action quod jussu. (D. xv. 4. 5. pr.)

2. Eadem ratione prætor duas alias in solidum actiones pollicetur, quarum altera exercitoria, altera institoria appellatur. Exercitoria tunc locum habet, cum quis servum suum magistrum navis præposuerit et quid cum eo ejus rei gratia, cui præpositus erit, contractum fuerit. Ideo autem exercitoria vocatur, quia exercitor appellatur is, ad quem cotidianus navis questus pertinet. Institoria tunc locum habet, cum quis tabernæ forte aut cuilibet negotiationi servum præposuerit et quid cum eo ejus rei causa, cui præpositus erit, contractum fuerit. Ideo autem institoria appellatur, quia qui negotiationibus præponuntur, institores vocantur. Ista tamen duas actiones prætor reddit et si liberum navi aut tabernæ aut cuilibet negotiationi præposuerit, scilicet quia eadem æquitatis ratio etiam eo casu interveniebat.

2. For the same reason the prætor also gives two other actions for the whole sum due, the one called the actio exercitoria, the other the actio institoria. The action exercitoria may be brought when a master has made his slave commander of a vessel, and a contract has been entered into with the slave relating to the business he has been appointed to manage. This action is named exercitoria, because he, to whom the daily profits of a ship belong, is said to be an exercitor. The action institoria may be brought when a master has entrusted his slave with the management of a shop or any particular business, and a contract has been made with the slave relating to the business he has been appointed to manage. This action is called institoria, because persons to whom the management of a business is entrusted are called institores. The prætor likewise permits these two actions to be brought if any one commits to a free person, or to the slave of another, the management of a ship, a warehouse, or any particular affair, as the principle of equity is the same.

GAL. iv. 71.

Liberum hominem. We have seen at how late a period of Roman law it was that one freeman could act for another. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 26. pr. note.) It was, in fact, by extending these actions institoria and exercitoria, so as to embrace the case of a mandatary, that the prætor made the principal directly responsible, and thus enabled him to be really represented by the agent.

3. Introduxit et aliam actionem

3. The prætor has also introduced

1. Si igitur jussu domini cum servo negotium gestum erit, in solidum prætor adversus dominum actionem pollicetur, scilicet quia qui ita contrahit, fidem domini sequi videtur.

1. Thus, then, if any one deals with a slave acting under the command of his master, the prætor will give an action against the master for the whole of what is due under the contract; inasmuch as, in this case, the person who contracts does so as relying on the faith of the master.

GAI. iv. 70.

Jussu domini; this extended to cases where the master subsequently ratified the contract, the ratification being equivalent to a mandate. (D. xv. 4. 1. 6.)

If the slave had been merely the instrument of his master, if, for instance, the master arranged that money borrowed for himself should be told out to his slave, the prætor would give a condictio, not an action quod jussu. (D. xv. 4. 5. pr.)

2. Eadem ratione prætor duas alias in solidum actiones pollicetur, quarum altera exercitoria, altera institoria appellatur. Exercitoria tunc locum habet, cum quis servum suum magistrum navis præposuerit et quid cum eo ejus rei gratia, cui præpositus erit, contractum fuerit. Ideo autem exercitoria vocatur, quia exercitor appellatur is, ad quem cotidianus navis quæstus pertinet. Institoria tunc locum habet, cum quis tabernæ forte aut cuilibet negotiationi servum præposuerit et quid cum eo ejus rei causa, cui præpositus erit, contractum fuerit. Ideo autem institoria appellatur, quia qui negotiationibus præponuntur, institores vocantur. Iestas tamen duas actiones prætor reddit et si liberum quis hominem aut alienum servum navi aut tabernæ aut cuilibet negotiationi præposuerit, scilicet quia eadem æquitatis ratio etiam eo casu interveniebat.

2. For the same reason the prætor also gives two other actions for the whole sum due, the one called the actio exercitoria, the other the actio institoria. The action exercitoria may be brought when a master has made his slave commander of a vessel, and a contract has been entered into with the slave relating to the business he has been appointed to manage. This action is named exercitoria, because he, to whom the daily profits of a ship belong, is said to be an exercitor. The action institoria may be brought when a master has entrusted his slave with the management of a shop or any particular business, and a contract has been made with the slave relating to the business he has been appointed to manage. This action is called institoria, because persons to whom the management of a business is entrusted are called institores. The prætor likewise permits these two actions to be brought if any one commits to a free person, or to the slave of another, the management of a ship, a warehouse, or any particular affair, as the principle of equity is the same.

GAI. iv. 71.

Liberum hominem. We have seen at how late a period of Roman law it was that one freeman could act for another. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 26. pr. note.) It was, in fact, by extending these actions institoria and exercitoria, so as to embrace the case of a mandatary, that the prætor made the principal directly responsible, and thus enabled him to be really represented by the agent.

3. Introduxit et aliam actionem

3. The prætor has also introduced

prætor, quæ tributoria vocatur. Namque si servus in peculiari merce, sciente domino, negotietur et quid cum eo ejus rei causa contractum erit, ita prætor jus dicit, ut, quidquid in his mercibus erit quodque inde receptum erit, id inter dominum, si quid ei debebitur, et ceteros creditores pro rata portione distribuatur. Et quia ipsi domino distributionem permittit, si quis ex creditoribus queratur, quasi minus ei tributum sit, quam oportuerit, hanc ei actionem accommodat, quæ tributoria appellatur.

another action called tributoria; for, if a slave with the knowledge of his master trades with his peculium, and contracts are made with him in the course of business, the prætor ordains that all the merchandise or money arising from his traffic shall be distributed between the master, if anything is due to him, and the rest of the creditors of the slave in proportion to their claims. And as the master himself is permitted to make the distribution, if any creditor complains that he has received too small a share, the prætor will permit him to bring the actio tributoria.

GAI. iv. 72; D. xiv. 4. 1; D. xiv. 4. 5. 11; D. xiv. 4. 7. 1. 2.

The actio tributoria was only given against the master when there was fraud (dolus) in the distribution; but there would be dolus directly the master had notice that a creditor had received nothing, or less than his share. (D. xiv. 4. 7. 2. 3.)

4. Præterea introducta est actio de peculio deque eo, quod in rem domini versum erit, ut, quamvis sine voluntate domini negotium gestum erit, tamen sive quid in rem ejus versum fuerit, id totum præstare debeat, sive quid non sit in rem ejus versum, id eatenus præstare debeat, quatenus peculium patitur. In rem autem domini versum intellegitur, quidquid necessario in rem ejus impenderit servus, veluti si mutuatus pecuniam creditoribus ejus solverit, aut ædificia ruentia fulserit, aut familiæ frumentum emerit, vel etiam fundum aut quamlibet aliam rem necessariam meratus erit. Itaque si ex decem utputa aureis, quos servus tuus a Titio mutuos accepit, creditori tuo quinque aureos solverit, reliquos vero quinque quolibet modo consumpserit, pro quinque quidem in solidum damnari debes, pro ceteris vero quinque eatenus, quatenus in peculio sit: ex quo scilicet apparet, si toti decem aurei in rem tuam versi fuerint, totos decem aureos Titium consequi posse. Licet enim una est actio, qua de peculio deque eo, quod in rem domini versum sit, agitur, tamen duas habet condemnationes. Itaque judex apud quem ea actione agitur, ante dispicere solet, an in rem domini versum sit, nec aliter ad peculii æstimationem transit, quam si aut nihil in rem domini

4. The prætor has also introduced an action relating at once to a peculium, and to whatever has been applied to the profit of the master, for although the slave contracts without the consent of his master, yet the master ought, if he has profited by anything, to pay all up to the amount of his profit; if he has not received any profit, he ought to pay up to the amount of the slave's peculium. Everything is understood as profiting the master which is laid out in his necessary expenses by the slave; as, for instance, if the slave borrows money with which he pays the debts of his master, repairs his buildings in danger of falling, purchases wheat for the establishment, or land for his master, or any other necessary thing. Thus if your slave borrows ten aurei of Titius, pays five to one of your creditors, and spends five, you ought to be condemned to pay the whole of the first five, and so much of the other five as the slave's peculium would cover: whence it will appear, that if all the ten aurei had been spent to your profit, Titius might have recovered the whole from you; for although it is the same action in which the plaintiff seeks to obtain the peculium, and the amount by which the master has profited, yet this action contains two condemnations. The judge before whom the action is brought, first inquires whether the master has received any profit; and then, when he has ascertained that no

prætor, quæ tributoria vocatur. Namque si servus in peculiari merce. sciente domino, negotietur et quid cum eo ejus rei causa contractum erit, ita prætor jus dicit, ut, quidquid in his mercibus erit quodque inde receptum erit, id inter dominum. si quid ei debebitur, et ceteros creditores pro rata portione distribuatur. Et quia ipsi domino distributionem permittit, si quis ex creditoribus queratur, quasi minus ei tributum sit, quam oportuerit. hanc ei actionem accomodat, quæ tributoria appellatur.

another action called tributoria; for, if a slave with the knowledge of his master trades with his peculium, and contracts are made with him in the course of business, the prætor ordains that all the merchandise or money arising from his traffic shall be distributed between the master, if anything is due to him, and the rest of the creditors of the slave in proportion to their claims. And as the master himself is permitted to make the distribution, if any creditor complains that he has received too small a share, the prætor will permit him to bring the actio tributoria.

GAL. iv. 72; D. xiv. 4. 1; D. xiv. 4. 5. 11; D. xiv. 4. 7. 1. 2.

The actio tributoria was only given against the master when there was fraud (dolus) in the distribution; but there would be dolus directly the master had notice that a creditor had received nothing, or less than his share. (D. xiv. 4. 7. 2. 3.)

4. Præterea introducta est actio de peculio deque eo, quod in rem domini verum erit, ut, quamvis sine voluntate domini negotium gestum erit, tamen sive quid in rem ejus verum fuerit, id totum præstare debeat, sive quid non sit in rem ejus verum, id eatenus præstare debeat, quatenus peculium patitur. In rem autem domini verum intellegitur, quidquid necessario in rem ejus impenderit servus, veluti si mutuatus pecuniam creditoribus ejus solverit, aut ædificia ruentia fulserit, aut familiæ frumentum emerit, vel etiam fundum aut quamlibet aliam rem necessariam mercatus erit. Itaque si ex decem utputa aureis, quos servus tuus a Titio mutuos accepit, creditori tuo quinque aureos solverit, reliquos vero quinque quolibet modo consumpserit, pro quinque quidem in solidum dampnari debes, pro ceteris vero quinque eatenus, quatenus in peculio sit: ex quo scilicet apparet, si toti decem aurei in rem tuam versi fuerint, totos decem aureos Titium consequi posse. Licet enim una est actio, quæ de peculio deque eo, quod in rem domini verum sit, agitur, tamen duas habet condemnationes. Itaque judex apud quem ea actione agitur, ante dispicere solet, an in rem domini verum sit, nec aliter ad peculii æstimationem transit, quam si aut nihil in rem domini

4. The prætor has also introduced an action relating at once to a peculium, and to whatever has been applied to the profit of the master, for although the slave contracts without the consent of his master, yet the master ought, if he has profited by anything, to pay all up to the amount of his profit; if he has not received any profit, he ought to pay up to the amount of the slave's peculium. Everything is understood as profiting the master which is laid out in his necessary expenses by the slave; as, for instance, if the slave borrows money with which he pays the debts of his master, repairs his buildings in danger of falling, purchases wheat for the establishment, or land for his master, or any other necessary thing. Thus if your slave borrows ten aurei of Titius, pays five to one of your creditors, and spends five, you ought to be condemned to pay the whole of the first five, and so much of the other five as the slave's peculium would cover: whence it will appear, that if all the ten aurei had been spent to your profit, Titius might have recovered the whole from you; for although it is the same action in which the plaintiff seeks to obtain the peculium, and the amount by which the master has profited, yet this action contains two condemnations. The judge before whom the action is brought, first inquires whether the master has received any profit; and then, when he has ascertained that no versum intellegatur aut non totum. Cum autem quæritur, quantum in peculio sit, ante deducitur, quidquid servus domino quive in potestate ejus sit, debet, et quod superest, id solum peculium intellegitur. Aliquando tamen id, quod ei debet servus, qui in potestate domini sit, non deducitur ex peculio, veluti si is in hujus ipsius peculio sit. Quod eo pertinet, ut, si quid vicario suo servus debeat, id ex peculio ejus non deducatur.

part or not the whole of the sum due from the slave has been expended to the profit of the master, he proceeds to estimate the value of the peculium, in estimating which a deduction is first made of what the slave owes his master, or any one under the power of his master, and the remainder only is considered as the peculium. But it sometimes happens that what a slave owes to a person in the power of his master is not deducted, as when he owes something to a slave who forms part of his own peculium: that is to say, if a slave is indebted to his vicarius, the sum due cannot be deducted from the peculium.

GAL. iv. 73; D. xiv. 5. 1; D. xv. 3. 3. 1; D. xv. 1. 17.

This action is generally called de peculio et in rem verso, because, in most cases, the judge had to take notice of both the profit derived by the master and of the amount of the slave's peculium. But in some cases, as, for instance, where the slave had no peculium, the action could be brought de in rem verso only, and so it would naturally be if it could be shown that the master had reaped all the benefit of the contract. (See end of next paragraph.)

Si quid vicario. The vicarii formed part of the peculium of the ordinary slave; anything, therefore, deducted from the peculium, as owed to the vicarii, would, if paid, again enter into the peculium as the property of the ordinary slave. It was, therefore, useless to pay it.

5. Ceterum dubium non est, quin is quoque, qui jussu domini contraxerit cuique institoria vel exercitoria actio competit, de peculio deque eo, quod in rem domini versum est, agere possit: sed erit stultissimus, si omissa actione, qua facillime solidum ex contractu consequi possit, se ad difficultatem perducatur probandi, in rem domini versum esse, vel habere servum peculium et tantum habere, ut solidum sibi solvi possit. Is quoque, cui tributoria actio competit, æque de peculio et in rem verso agere potest: sed sane huic modo tributoria expedit agere, modo de peculio et in rem verso. Tributoria ideo expedit agere, quia in ea domini condicio precipua non est, id est, quod domino debetur, non deducitur, sed ejusdem juris est dominus, cujus et ceteri creditores: at in actione de peculio ante deducitur, quod domino

5. It need hardly be said that a person who has contracted with a slave acting by his master's command, and who may bring either the action institoria or exercitoria, may also bring the action de peculio et in rem verso. But it would be the height of folly in any one to give up an action by which he might easily recover his whole demand, and have recourse to another by which he would be reduced to the difficulty of proving that the money he lent to the slave was employed to the profit of the master, or that the slave is possessed of a peculium, and that sufficient to answer the whole debt. Any one, again, in whose power it is to bring the actio tributoria, may equally bring the action de peculio et in rem verso; and it is expedient, in some cases, to employ the former, and in some cases the latter. On the one hand, the actio tributoria is preferable, because in this no privilege is accorded part or not the whole of the sum due from the slave has been expended to the profit of the master, he proceeds to estimate the value of the peculium, in estimating which a deduction is first made of what the slave owes his master, or any one under the power of his master, and the remainder only is considered as the peculium. But it sometimes happens that what a slave owes to a person in the power of his master is not deducted, as when he owes something to a slave who forms part of his own peculium: that is to say, if a slave is indebted to his vicarius, the sum due cannot be deducted from the peculium.

versum intellegatur aut non totum. Cum autem quæritur, quantum in peculio sit, ante deducitur, quidquid servus domino quive in potestate ejus sit, debet, et quod superest, id solum peculium intellegitur. Aliquando tamen id, quod ei debet servus, qui in potestate domini sit, non deducitur ex peculio, veluti si is in hujus ipsius peculio sit. Quod eo pertinet, ut, si quid vicario suo servus debeat, id ex peculio ejus non deducatur.

GAI. iv. 73; D. xiv. 5. 1; D. xv. 3. 3. 1; D. xv. 1. 17.

This action is generally called de peculio et in rem verso, because, in most cases, the judge had to take notice of both the profit derived by the master and of the amount of the slave's peculium. But in some cases, as, for instance, where the slave had no peculium, the action could be brought de in rem verso only, and so it would naturally be if it could be shown that the master had reaped all the benefit of the contract. (See end of next paragraph.)

Si quid vicario. The vicarii formed part of the peculium of the ordinary slave; anything, therefore, deducted from the peculium, as owed to the vicarii, would, if paid, again enter into the peculium as the property of the ordinary slave. It was, therefore, useless to pay it.

5. Ceterum dubium non est, quin is quoque, qui jussu domini contraxerit cuique institoria vel exercitoria actio competit, de peculio deque eo, quod in rem domini versum est, agere possit: sed erit stultissimus, si omissa actione, qua facillime solidum ex contractu consequi possit, se ad difficultatem perducatur probandi, in rem domini versum esse, vel habere servum peculium et tantum habere, ut solidum sibi solvi possit. Is quoque, cui tributoria actio competit, æque de peculio et in rem verso agere potest: sed sane huic modo tributoria expedit agere, modo de peculio et in rem verso. Tributoria ideo expedit agere, quia in ea domini condicio præcipua non est, id est, quod domino debetur, non deducitur, sed ejusdem juris est dominus, cujus et ceteri creditores: at in actione de peculio ante deducitur, quod domino

5. It need hardly be said that a person who has contracted with a slave acting by his master's command, and who may bring either the action institoria or exercitoria, may also bring the action de peculio et in rem verso. But it would be the height of folly in any one to give up an action by which he might easily recover his whole demand, and have recourse to another by which he would be reduced to the difficulty of proving that the money he lent to the slave was employed to the profit of the master, or that the slave is possessed of a peculium, and that sufficient to answer the whole debt. Any one, again, in whose power it is to bring the actio tributoria, may equally bring the action de peculio et in rem verso; and it is expedient, in some cases, to employ the former, and in some cases the latter. On the one hand, the actio tributoria is preferable, because in this no privilege is accorded to the master; i.e. there is no previous deduction made in his favour of what is due to him, but he stands in the same position as the rest of the creditors; whereas in the action de peculio, there is first deducted the debt due to the master, who is only condemned to distribute the remainder among the creditors. On the other hand, in some cases, it may be more convenient to bring the action de peculio, because it affects the whole peculium, whereas the action tributoria affects only so much of it as has been employed in trade; and it is possible that a slave may have traded only with a third, a fourth, or some very small part of it, and that the rest may consist in lands, slaves, or money lent at interest. Every one ought, therefore, to select the one or the other action as may seem most advantageous to him. If, however, a creditor can prove that anything has been employed to the profit of the master, he ought to bring the action de in rem verso.

debetur et in id, quod reliquum est, creditori dominus condemnatur. Rursus de peculio ideo expedit agere, quod in hac actione totius peculii ratio habetur, at in tributoria ejus tantum, quod negotiatur, et potest quisque tertia parte peculii aut quarta vel etiam minima negotiari, majorem autem partem in prædiis et mancipiis aut fenebri pecunia habere. Prout ergo expedit, ita quisque vel hanc actionem vel illam eligere debet: certe qui potest probare, in rem domini versum esse, de in rem verso agere debet.

GAI. iv. 74; D. xiv. 4. 11.

Any one who could bring an actio quod jussu, exercitoria, or institoria, could also, at option, bring an actio de peculio et in rem verso, but not at all necessarily vice versa.

6. Quæ diximus de servo et domino, eadem intellegimus et de filio et filia aut nepote et nepte, et patre avove, cujus in potestate sunt.

6. What we have said in relation to a slave and his master, is equally applicable to children and grandchildren, and to their ascendants, in whose power they are.

D. xiv. 4. 1. 4.

It may be observed, however, that (1) the master was never bound, if the slave engaged himself by mandate, or fidejussio, for a third person, but the father was bound to the extent of a son's peculium by the son's intercessio (D. xv. 1. 3. 9), and (2) the son was bound civilly, the slave only naturally. If the son was sued and condemned to pay, an action judicati de peculio could be brought against the father to the extent of the son's peculium. (D. xv. 1. 3. 11.)

7. Illud proprie servatur in eorum persona, quod senatusconsultum Macedonianum prohibuit, mutuas pecunias dari eis, qui in parentis erunt potestate: et ei, qui crediderit, denegatur actio tam adversus ipsum filium filiamve, nepotem neptemve, sive adhuc in potestate sunt, sive morte parentis vel emancipatione suæ potestatis esse cœperint, quam

7. A peculiar provision has, however, been made in their favour by the senatusconsultum Macedonianum, which prohibits money to be lent to children under power of their parents, and refuses any action to the creditor, either against the descendants, whether still under power, or become sui juris by the death of the parent or by emancipation, or against the parent, whether

debetur et in id, quod reliquum est, creditori dominus condemnatur. Rursus de peculio ideo expedit agere, quod in hac actione totius peculii ratio habetur, at in tributoria ejus tantum, quod negotiatur, et potest quisque tertia forte parte peculii aut quarta vel etiam minima negotiari, majorem autem partem in prædiis et mancipiis aut fenebri pecunia habere. Prout ergo expedit, ita quisque vel hanc actionem vel illam eligere debet: certe qui potest probare, in rem domini versum esse, de in rem verso agere debet.

to the master, i.e. there is no previous deduction made in his favour of what is due to him, but he stands in the same position as the rest of the creditors; whereas in the action de peculio, there is first deducted the debt due to the master, who is only condemned to distribute the remainder among the creditors. On the other hand, in some cases, it may be more convenient to bring the action de peculio, because it affects the whole peculium, whereas the action tributoria affects only so much of it as has been employed in trade; and it is possible that a slave may have traded only with a third, a fourth, or some very small part of it, and that the rest may consist in lands, slaves, or money lent at interest. Every one ought, therefore, to select the one or the other action as may seem most advantageous to him. If, however, a creditor can prove that anything has been employed to the profit of the master, he ought to bring the action de in rem verso.

GAL. iv. 74; D. xiv. 4. 11.

Any one who could bring an actio quod jussu, exercitoria, or institoria, could also, at option, bring an actio de peculio et in rem verso, but not at all necessarily vice versa.

6. Quæ diximus de servo et domino, eadem intellegimus et de filio et filia aut nepote et nepte, et patre avove, cujus in potestate sunt.

6. What we have said in relation to a slave and his master, is equally applicable to children and grandchildren, and to their ascendants, in whose power they are.

D. xiv. 4. 1. 4.

It may be observed, however, that (1) the master was never bound, if the slave engaged himself by mandate, or fidejussio, for a third person, but the father was bound to the extent of a son's peculium by the son's intercessio (D. xv. 1. 3. 9), and (2) the son was bound civilly, the slave only naturally. If the son was sued and condemned to pay, an action judicati de peculio could be brought against the father to the extent of the son's peculium. (D. xv. 1. 3. 11.)

7. Illud proprie servatur in eorum persona, quod senatusconsultum Macedonianum prohibuit, mutuas pecunias dari eis, qui in parentis erunt potestate: et ei, qui crediderit, denegatur actio tam adversus ipsum filium filiamve, nepotem neptemve, sive adhuc in potestate sunt, sive morte parentis vel emancipatione suæ potestatis esse cœperint, quam

7. A peculiar provision has, however, been made in their favour by the senatusconsultum Macedonianum, which prohibits money to be lent to children under power of their parents, and refuses any action to the creditor, either against the descendants, whether still under power, or become sui juris by the death of the parent or by emancipation, or against the parent, whether adversus patrem avumve, sive habeat eos adhuc in potestate sive emancipaverit. Quæ ideo senatus prospexit, quia sæpe onerati ære alieno creditorum pecuniarum, quas in luxuriam consumeabant, vitæ parentium insidiabantur.

he still retains them under his power, or has emancipated them. This provision was adopted by the senate, because they thought that persons under power, when loaded with debts contracted by borrowing sums to be wasted in debauchery, often attempted the lives of their parents.

D. xiv. 6. 1. pr.; D. xiv. 6. 3. 3; D. xiv. 6. 7. 10.

The senatusconsultum Macedonianum was made, according to Tacitus, in the reign of Claudius (Ann. xi. 13); according to Suetonius, in that of Vespasian (Vesp. 11.) Perhaps it was only renewed in the latter reign. Theophilus informs us that it was made to meet the case of a young prodigal named Macedo, who attempted the life of his father. The terms of the senatusconsultum (D. xiv. 6. 1. pr.) would rather lead us to suppose Macedo was the name of a usurer. The text says denegatur actio; but if there was any doubt as to the facts, the action was brought, and the senatusconsultum Macedonianum made the ground of an exception. (D. xiv. 6. 11.)

8. Illud in summa admonendi sumus, id, quod jussu patris dominive contractum fuerit quodque in rem ejus verum fuerit, directo quoque posse a patre dominove condici, tamquam si principaliter cum ipso negotium gestum esset. Ei quoque, qui vel exercitoria vel institoria actione tenetur, directo posse condici placet, quia hujus quoque jussu contractum intellegitur.

8. Lastly, we may observe, that whenever any contract has been made by command of a father or master, or anything employed to their profit, a condictio may be brought directly against the father or master, exactly as if the contract had been originally made with them. So when any one is liable to the action exercitoria or institoria, a condictio may also be brought directly against him, as in this case also it is by his order that the contract is understood to have been made.

D. xvii. 2. 84; D. xiv. 3. 17. 5; D. xii. 1. 29.

Posse condici. If a condiction could be brought, of what use were the peculiar prætorian actions of which, as the text informs us, the plaintiff could avail himself? Probably the institution of these actions was long antecedent to the time when the condiction was admitted as an appropriate form of action in cases where a paterfamilias was to be made responsible for the acts of his son or slave. It was only by a great extension of the scope of the condiction that it was given, first, when one man profited in any way by the property of another (D. xii. 1. 23, 32); and, secondly, against a person by whose order another person had contracted, or whose manager (institor) the person contracting was (D. xii. 1. 9. 2.) After it had received this extension, the condictio would be a concurrent remedy with the prætorian actions. But there would still be cases, namely, bilateral contracts, giving rise to prætorian actions, such as those empti or venditi, pro socio, locati or conducti, or contracts giving rise to actions in factum, in which the condiction would not be given against the paterfamilias, and adversus patrem avumve, sive habeat eos adhuc in potestate sive emancipaverit. Quæ ideo senatus prospexit, quia sæpe onerati ære alieno creditarum pecuniarum, quas in luxuriam consumeabant, vitæ parentium insidiabantur.

he still retains them under his power, or has emancipated them. This provision was adopted by the senate, because they thought that persons under power, when loaded with debts contracted by borrowing sums to be wasted in debauchery, often attempted the lives of their parents.

D. xiv. 6. 1. pr.; D. xiv. 6. 3. 3; D. xiv. 6. 7. 10.

The senatusconsultum Macedonianum was made, according to Tacitus, in the reign of Claudius (Ann. xi. 13); according to Suetonius, in that of Vespasian (Vesp. 11.) Perhaps it was only renewed in the latter reign. Theophilus informs us that it was made to meet the case of a young prodigal named Macedo, who attempted the life of his father. The terms of the senatusconsultum (D. xiv. 6. 1. pr.) would rather lead us to suppose Macedo was the name of a usurer. The text says denegatur actio; but if there was any doubt as to the facts, the action was brought, and the senatusconsultum Macedonianum made the ground of an exception. (D. xiv. 6. 11.)

8. Illud in summa admonendi sumus, id, quod jussu patris dominive contractum fuerit quodque in rem ejus verum fuerit, directo quoque posse a patre dominove condici, tamquam si principaliter cum ipso negotium gestum esset. Ei quoque, qui vel exercitoria vel institoria actione tenetur, directo posse condici placet, quia hujus quoque jussu contractum intellegitur.

8. Lastly, we may observe, that whenever any contract has been made by command of a father or master, or anything employed to their profit, a condictio may be brought directly against the father or master, exactly as if the contract had been originally made with them. So when any one is liable to the action exercitoria or institoria, a condictio may also be brought directly against him, as in this case also it is by his order that the contract is understood to have been made.

D. xvii. 2. 84; D. xiv. 3. 17. 5; D. xii. 1. 29.

Posse condici. If a condiction could be brought, of what use were the peculiar prætorian actions of which, as the text informs us, the plaintiff could avail himself? Probably the institution of these actions was long antecedent to the time when the condiction was admitted as an appropriate form of action in cases where a paterfamilias was to be made responsible for the acts of his son or slave. It was only by a great extension of the scope of the condiction that it was given, first, when one man profited in any way by the property of another (D. xii. 1. 23, 32); and, secondly, against a person by whose order another person had contracted, or whose manager (institor) the person contracting was (D. xii. 1. 9. 2.) After it had received this extension, the condictio would be a concurrent remedy with the prætorian actions. But there would still be cases, namely, bilateral contracts, giving rise to prætorian actions, such as those empti or venditi, pro socio, locati or conducti, or contracts giving rise to actions in factum, in which the condiction would not be given against the paterfamilias, and in which recourse must be had to the prætorian actions proper to the kind of contract. These prætorian actions would, in the particular case of the paterfamilias, receive a slight modification of form and a new name, and be termed quod jussu, de in rem verso, de peculio, &c., though remaining substantially empti, locati, pro socio, &c., according to the character of the transaction. ☉ ✕ ☉

TIT. VIII. DE NOXALIBUS ACTIONIBUS.

Ex maleficiis servorum, veluti si furtum fecerint aut bona rapuerint aut damnum dederint aut injuriam commiserint, noxales actiones proditæ sunt, quibus domino damnato permittitur, aut litis æstimationem sufferre aut hominem noxæ dedere.

The wrongful acts of a slave, whether he commits a theft or robbery, or does any damage or injury, give rise to noxal actions in which the master of the slave, if judgment is against him, may either pay the estimated amount of damage done, or deliver up his slave as a noxæ.

GAL. iv. 75; D. ix. 4. 1.

We now pass to actions given to enforce obligations arising from the delicts of persons alieni juris. These actions, which were given against the master of the slave, and, in ancient times, against the parent of the filiusfamilias, were termed noxales because the master or parent could rid himself of all liability by abandoning the slave or child committing the delict to the person injured. There was, however, no distinct actio noxalis. The action brought on the delict was one furti, vi bonorum raptorum, &c., as the case might be, the difference being that the condemnatio was alternative, either to pay so much or to abandon the slave, instead of simply to pay so much.

If at any time, either before or after the litis contestatio, the master abandoned the slave, all right of action for damages against him became immediately extinct. The actio noxalis had thus a kind of resemblance to the actiones arbitrarie, in which the judex first ordered the defendant to make satisfaction, and then, if he did not comply, proceeded to condemn him. In two cases the master could not escape liability by giving up the slave: (1) if he falsely denied that the slave was in his power (D. ii. 9. 2. 1); (2) if the master could have prevented the delict (D. ix. 4. 2. 1).

1. Noxa autem est corpus, quod nocuit, id est servus: noxia ipsum maleficium, veluti furtum, damnum, rapina, injuria.

1. Noxa is the body that has done the wrongful act, i.e. the slave. Noxia is the wrongful act itself, that is, the theft, the damage, the robbery with violence, or injury.

D. ix. 1. 1. 1.

2. Summa autem ratione permittitur est noxæ deditione defungi: namque erat iniquum, nequitiam

2. It is with great reason that the master is permitted to deliver up the offending slave; for it would be very

in which recourse must be had to the prætorian actions proper to the kind of contract. These prætorian actions would, in the particular case of the paterfamilias, receive a slight modification of form and a new name, and be termed quod jussu, de in rem verso, de peculio, &c., though remaining substantially empti, locati, pro socio, &c., according to the character of the transaction. ☞ ☞

TIT. VIII. DE NOXALIBUS ACTIONIBUS.

Ex maleficiis servorum, veluti si furtum fecerint aut bona rapuerint aut damnum dederint aut injuriam commiserint, noxales actiones proditæ sunt, quibus domino damnato permittitur, aut litis æstimationem sufferre aut hominem noxæ dedere.

The wrongful acts of a slave, whether he commits a theft or robbery, or does any damage or injury, give rise to noxal actions in which the master of the slave, if judgment is against him, may either pay the estimated amount of damage done, or deliver up his slave as a noxæ.

GAL. iv. 75; D. ix. 4. 1.

We now pass to actions given to enforce obligations arising from the delicts of persons alieni juris. These actions, which were given against the master of the slave, and, in ancient times, against the parent of the filiusfamilias, were termed noxales because the master or parent could rid himself of all liability by abandoning the slave or child committing the delict to the person injured. There was, however, no distinct actio noxalis. The action brought on the delict was one furti, vi bonorum raptorum, &c., as the case might be, the difference being that the condemnatio was alternative, either to pay so much or to abandon the slave, instead of simply to pay so much.

If at any time, either before or after the litis contestatio, the master abandoned the slave, all right of action for damages against him became immediately extinct. The actio noxalis had thus a kind of resemblance to the actiones arbitrarie, in which the iudex first ordered the defendant to make satisfaction, and then, if he did not comply, proceeded to condemn him. In two cases the master could not escape liability by giving up the slave: (1) if he falsely denied that the slave was in his power (D. ii. 9. 2. 1); (2) if the master could have prevented the delict (D. ix. 4. 2. 1).

1. Noxa autem est corpus, quod nocuit, id est servus: noxia ipsum maleficio, veluti furtum, damnum, rapina, injuria.

1. Noxa is the body that has done the wrongful act, i.e. the slave. Noxia is the wrongful act itself, that is, the theft, the damage, the robbery with violence, or injury.

D. ix. 1. 1. 1.

2. Summa autem ratione permittitur est noxæ deditio defungi: namque erat iniquum, nequitiam

2. It is with great reason that the master is permitted to deliver up the offending slave; for it would be very eorum ultra ipsorum corpora dominis damnosam esse.

unjust, when a slave does a wrongful act, to subject the master to any further damage beyond that of losing the slave himself.

GAI. iv. 75.

3. Dominus noxali iudicio servi sui nomine conventus, servum actori noxæ dedendo liberatur. Nec minus perpetuum ejus dominium a domino prætoris: si autem damnum ei, cui deditus est, resarciert quæsitæ pecunia, auxilio prætoris, invito domino, manumittitur.

3. A master sued in a noxal action on account of his slave, frees himself if he gives up his slave to the plaintiff, and then the property in the slave is thus transferred for ever; but, if the slave can procure money, and satisfy the master to whom he has been given up for all damage he has sustained, he is manumitted by the intervention of the prætor, though against the wish of his new master.

4. Sunt autem constitutæ noxales actiones aut legibus aut edicto prætoris: legibus veluti furti lege duodecim tabularum, damni injuriæ lege Aquilia: edicto prætoris veluti injuriarum et vi bonorum raptorum.

4. Noxal actions are established either by the laws, or by the edict of the prætor. By the laws, as for theft, by the law of the Twelve Tables; for wrongful damage, by the lex Aquilia; by the prætor's edict, as for injuries and robbery with violence.

GAI. iv. 76.

These are but examples; any delict whatsoever committed by a slave would furnish ground for an actio noxalis.

5. Omnis autem noxalis actio caput sequitur. Nam si servus tuus noxiam commiserit, quamdiu in tua potestate sit, tecum est actio: si in alterius potestatem pervenerit, cum illo incipit actio esse, aut si manumissus fuerit, directo ipse tenetur et extinguitur noxæ deditio. Ex diverso quoque directa actio noxalis esse incipit: nam si liber homo noxiam commiserit et is servus tuus esse cœperit (quod casibus quibusdam effeci primo libro tradidimus), incipit tecum esse noxalis actio, quæ ante directa fuisset.

5. Every noxal action follows the delinquent. The delicts committed by your slave are a ground of action against you, while the slave belongs to you; if the slave becomes subject to another, the action must be brought against the new master; but if the slave is manumitted, the action is brought directly against him, and there cannot then be any giving up of the slave in satisfaction. Conversely, an action, which was at first direct, may afterwards become noxal; for if a free-man commits a wrongful act, and then becomes your slave, which may happen in some cases, of which we have spoken in our First Book, then the direct action against the slave is changed into a noxal action against you.

GAI. iv. 77.

It was the person in possession of the slave, not necessarily his owner, who was liable for his delicts. The references to the First Book are Tit. 3. 4, and Tit. 16. 1.

6. Si servus domino noxiam commiserit, actio nulla nascitur: namque inter dominum et eum, qui in ejus potestate est, nulla obligatio nasci potest. Ideoque et si in alienam

6. If a slave commits a wrongful act against his master, no action can be brought; for no obligation can arise between a master and one in his power; and if the slave passes under the power eorum ultra ipsorum corpora dominis damnosam esse.

unjust, when a slave does a wrongful act, to subject the master to any further damage beyond that of losing the slave himself.

GAI. iv. 75.

3. Dominus noxali iudicio servi sui nomine conventus, servum actori noxæ dedendo liberatur. Nec minus perpetuum ejus dominium a domino transfertur: si autem damnum ei, cui deditus est, resarciert quæsita pecunia, auxilio prætoris, invito domino, manumittitur.

3. A master sued in a noxal action on account of his slave, frees himself if he gives up his slave to the plaintiff, and then the property in the slave is thus transferred for ever; but, if the slave can procure money, and satisfy the master to whom he has been given up for all damage he has sustained, he is manumitted by the intervention of the prætor, though against the wish of his new master.

4. Sunt autem constitutæ noxales actiones aut legibus aut edicto prætoris: legibus veluti furti lege duodecim tabularum, damni injuriæ lege Aquilia: edicto prætoris veluti injuriarum et vi bonorum raptorum.

4. Noxal actions are established either by the laws, or by the edict of the prætor. By the laws, as for theft, by the law of the Twelve Tables; for wrongful damage, by the lex Aquilia; by the prætor's edict, as for injuries and robbery with violence.

GAI. iv. 76.

These are but examples; any delict whatsoever committed by a slave would furnish ground for an actio noxalis.

5. Omnis autem noxalis actio caput sequitur. Nam si servus tuus noxiam commiserit, quamdiu in tua potestate sit, tecum est actio: si in alterius potestatem pervenerit, cum illo incipit actio esse, aut si manumissus fuerit, directo ipse tenetur et extinguitur noxæ deditio. Ex diverso quoque directa actio noxalis esse incipit: nam si liber homo noxiam commiserit et is servus tuus esse coeperit (quod casibus quibusdam effeci primo libro tradidimus), incipit tecum esse noxalis actio, quæ ante directa fuisset.

5. Every noxal action follows the delinquent. The delicts committed by your slave are a ground of action against you, while the slave belongs to you; if the slave becomes subject to another, the action must be brought against the new master; but if the slave is manumitted, the action is brought directly against him, and there cannot then be any giving up of the slave in satisfaction. Conversely, an action, which was at first direct, may afterwards become noxal; for if a free-man commits a wrongful act, and then becomes your slave, which may happen in some cases, of which we have spoken in our First Book, then the direct action against the slave is changed into a noxal action against you.

GAI. iv. 77.

It was the person in possession of the slave, not necessarily his owner, who was liable for his delicts. The references to the First Book are Tit. 3. 4, and Tit. 16. 1.

6. Si servus domino noxiam commiserit, actio nulla nascitur: namque inter dominum et eum, qui in ejus potestate est, nulla obligatio nasci potest. Ideoque et si in alienam

6. If a slave commits a wrongful act against his master, no action can be brought; for no obligation can arise between a master and one in his power; and if the slave passes under the power potestatem servus pervenerit aut manumissus fuerit, neque cum ipso neque cum eo, cujus nunc in potestate sit, agi potest. Unde si alienus servus noxiam tibi commiserit et is postea in potestate tua esse cœperit, interdictit actio, quia in eum casum deducta sit, in quo consistere non potuit: ideoque licet exierit de tua potestate, agere non potes, quemadmodum si dominus in servum suum aliquid commiserit, nec si manumissus vel alienatus fuerit servus, ullam actionem contra dominum habere potest.

GAI. iv. 78.

The Proculians had thought that a master could, after a slave had passed out of his power, bring an action against the slave for anything done by him before he became his slave. (GAI. iv. 78.)

7. Sed veteres quidem hæc et in filiisfamilias masculis et feminis admiserunt. Nova autem hominum conversatio hujusmodi asperitatem recte respuendam esse existimavit et ab usu communi hæc penitus recessit: quis enim patitur filium suum et maxime filiam in noxam alii dare, ut pene per corpus filii pater magis, quam filius periclitetur, cum in filiabus etiam pudicitiae favor hoc bene excludit? Et ideo placuit, in servos tantummodo noxales actiones esse proponendas, cum apud veteres legum commentatores invenimus sæpius dictum, ipsos filiosfamilias pro suis delictis posse conveniri.

7. The ancients, indeed, applied the same rules to children of both sexes in the power of ascendants; but the feeling of later times has rightly rejected such extreme rigour, and it has therefore passed wholly into disuse. For who could bear to deliver up as a noxæ a son, and still more a daughter? for, in the person of his son, the father would almost suffer more than the son himself, and mere regard to decency forbids such treatment of a daughter. Noxal actions have, therefore, been allowed to apply to slaves only; and we find it often laid down in the older jurists, that an action may be brought directly against sons in power for their wrongful acts.

GAI. iv. 75, 77-79; D. ix. 4. 33-35.

A filiusfamilias could be sued for delicts, and then the plaintiff could by an actio judicati recover from the father up to the amount of the peculium. (Tit. 7. 6, note.)

TIT. IX. SI QUADRUPES PAUPERIEM FECISSE DICETUR.

Animalium nomine, quæ ratione carent, si quidem lascivia aut fervore aut feritate pauperiem fecerint, noxalis actio lege duodecim tabularum prodita est (quæ animalia si noxæ dedantur, proficiunt reo ad liberationem, quia ita lex duodecim tabularum scripta est); puta si

A noxal action is given by the law of the Twelve Tables, when irrational animals, through wantonness, rage, or ferocity, have done any damage; as, for example, if a kicking horse should kick, or an ox, apt to gore, should inflict an injury with his horns. If the animals are delivered up in satis-

potestatem servus pervenerit aut manumissus fuerit, neque cum ipso neque cum eo, cujus nunc in potestate sit, agi potest. Unde si alienus servus noxiam tibi commiserit et is postea in potestate tua esse cœperit, interdicti actio, quia in eum casum deducta sit, in quo consistere non potuit: ideoque licet exierit de tua potestate, agere non potes, quemadmodum si dominus in servum suum aliquid commiserit, nec si manumissus vel alienatus fuerit servus, ullam actionem contra dominum habere potest.

GAI. iv. 78.

The Proculians had thought that a master could, after a slave had passed out of his power, bring an action against the slave for anything done by him before he became his slave. (GAI. iv. 78.)

7. Sed veteres quidem hæc et in filiisfamilias masculis et feminis admiserunt. Nova autem hominum conversatio hujusmodi asperitatem recte respuendam esse existimavit et ab usu communi hæc penitus recessit: quis enim patitur filium suum et maxime filiam in noxam alii dare, ut pene per corpus filii pater magis, quam filius periclitetur, cum in filiabus etiam pudicitiae favor hoc bene excludit? Et ideo placuit, in servos tantummodo noxales actiones esse proponendas, cum apud veteres legum commentatores invenimus sæpius dictum, ipsos filiosfamilias pro suis delictis posse conveniri.

7. The ancients, indeed, applied the same rules to children of both sexes in the power of ascendants; but the feeling of later times has rightly rejected such extreme rigour, and it has therefore passed wholly into disuse. For who could bear to deliver up as a noxæ a son, and still more a daughter? for, in the person of his son, the father would almost suffer more than the son himself, and mere regard to decency forbids such treatment of a daughter. Noxal actions have, therefore, been allowed to apply to slaves only; and we find it often laid down in the older jurists, that an action may be brought directly against sons in power for their wrongful acts.

GAI. iv. 75, 77-79; D. ix. 4. 33-35.

A filiusfamilias could be sued for delicts, and then the plaintiff could by an actio judicati recover from the father up to the amount of the peculium. (Tit. 7. 6, note.)

TIT. IX. SI QUADRUPES PAUPERIEM FECISSE DICETUR.

Animalium nomine, quæ ratione carent, si quidem lascivia aut fervore aut feritate pauperiem fecerint, noxalis actio lege duodecim tabularum prodita est (quæ animalia si noxæ dedantur, proficiunt reo ad liberationem, quia ita lex duodecim tabularum scripta est); puta si

A noxal action is given by the law of the Twelve Tables, when irrational animals, through wantonness, rage, or ferocity, have done any damage; as, for example, if a kicking horse should kick, or an ox, apt to gore, should inflict an injury with his horns. If the animals are delivered up in satis-

equus calcitrosus calce percusserit aut bos cornu petere solitus petierit. Hæc autem actio in his, quæ contra naturam moventur, locum habet: ceterum si genitalis sit feritas, cessat. Denique si ursus fugit a domino et sic nocuit, non potest quondam dominus conveniri, quia desiit dominus esse, ubi fera evasit. Pauperies autem est damnum sine injuria facientis datum: nec enim potest animal injuriam fecisse dici, quod sensu caret. Hæc quod ad noxalem actionem pertinet.

faction for the damage done, the owner is secured against any action; such is the law of the Twelve Tables. But this action can only be brought in the case of animals acting contrary to their nature, for, when the ferocity of a beast is innate, no action can be brought, so that, if a bear breaks loose from his master, and has so done mischief, the master cannot be sued; for he ceased to be the master as soon as the wild beast escaped. The word pauperies denotes a damage done without any wrong intent: for an animal void of reason cannot be said to have had a wrong intent. Thus much as to the noxal action.

D. ix. 1. 1. pr., 3, 4, 7, 10.

Although in the Twelve Tables the word quadrupes was used, all animals were held to be included under it.

The distinction noticed in the text is that between an animal with an inborn fierceness (genitalis feritas) and one with a confirmed vicious habit (calcitrosus, petere solitus). The owner of the latter only was liable to the actio noxalis given by the Twelve Tables.

If an animal fierce by nature did any damage while in the keeping of any one, his keeper would be liable to an actio utilis, though not to the direct actio noxalis given by the law of the Twelve Tables. (See next paragraph.)

1. Ceterum sciendum est, ædilitio edicto prohiberi nos canem, verrem, aprum, ursum, leonem ibi habere, qua vulgo iter fit: et si adversus ea factum erit et nocitum homini libero esse dicetur, quod bonum et æquum judici videtur, tanti dominus condemnnetur, ceterarum rerum, quanti damnum datum sit, dupli. Præter has autem ædilitias actiones et de pauperie locum habebit: numquam enim actiones præsertim penales de eadem re concurrentes alia aliam consumit.

1. It must be observed, that the edict of the ædile forbids any man to keep a dog, a boar, a wild boar, a bear, or a lion, where there is a public road: and, if this prohibition is disobeyed, and thus any freeman receives hurt, the master of the beast may be condemned at the discretion of the judge; and, in case of damage to anything else, the condemnation must be in double the amount of damage done. Besides the ædilitian action, the action de pauperie may also be brought against the same person; for when different actions, especially penal actions, may be each brought on account of the same thing, the employment of one does not prevent the employment of another.

D. xxi. 1. 40-42; D. xlv. 7. 60.

The same delict might be resolvable into two distinct offences. A slave is corrupted, and then made to commit a theft. A separate action lay for each offence. Or the same delict, though consisting of one offence, might come under two heads of delict. A slave is injured by being beaten, and an action would lie injuria-

equus calcitrosus calce percusserit aut bos cornu petere solitus petierit. Hæc autem actio in his, quæ contra naturam moventur, locum habet: ceterum si genitalis sit feritas, cessat. Denique si ursus fugit a domino et sic nocuit, non potest quondam dominus conveniri, quia desiit dominus esse, ubi fera evasit. Pauperies autem est damnum sine injuria facientis datum: nec enim potest animal injuriam fecisse dici, quod sensu caret. Hæc quod ad noxalem actionem pertinet.

faction for the damage done, the owner is secured against any action; such is the law of the Twelve Tables. But this action can only be brought in the case of animals acting contrary to their nature, for, when the ferocity of a beast is innate, no action can be brought, so that, if a bear breaks loose from his master, and has so done mischief, the master cannot be sued; for he ceased to be the master as soon as the wild beast escaped. The word pauperies denotes a damage done without any wrong intent: for an animal void of reason cannot be said to have had a wrong intent. Thus much as to the noxal action.

D. ix. 1. 1. pr., 3, 4, 7, 10.

Although in the Twelve Tables the word quadrupes was used, all animals were held to be included under it.

The distinction noticed in the text is that between an animal with an inborn fierceness (genitalis feritas) and one with a confirmed vicious habit (calcitrosus, petere solitus). The owner of the latter only was liable to the actio noxalis given by the Twelve Tables.

If an animal fierce by nature did any damage while in the keeping of any one, his keeper would be liable to an actio utilis, though not to the direct actio noxalis given by the law of the Twelve Tables. (See next paragraph.)

1. Ceterum sciendum est, ædilitio edicto prohiberi nos canem, verrem, aprum, ursum, leonem ibi habere, qua vulgo iter fit: et si adversus ea factum erit et nocitum homini libero esse dicetur, quod bonum et æquum judici videtur, tanti dominus condemnnetur, ceterarum rerum, quanti damnum datum sit, dupli. Præter has autem ædilitias actiones et de pauperie locum habebit: numquam enim actiones præsertim penales de eadem re concurrentes alia aliam consumit.

1. It must be observed, that the edict of the ædile forbids any man to keep a dog, a boar, a wild boar, a bear, or a lion, where there is a public road: and, if this prohibition is disobeyed, and thus any freeman receives hurt, the master of the beast may be condemned at the discretion of the judge; and, in case of damage to anything else, the condemnation must be in double the amount of damage done. Besides the ædilitian action, the action de pauperie may also be brought against the same person; for when different actions, especially penal actions, may be each brought on account of the same thing, the employment of one does not prevent the employment of another.

D. xxi. 1. 40-42; D. xlv. 7. 60.

The same delict might be resolvable into two distinct offences. A slave is corrupted, and then made to commit a theft. A separate action lay for each offence. Or the same delict, though consisting of one offence, might come under two heads of delict. A slave is injured by being beaten, and an action would lie injuria- rum, or under the lex Aquilia. The master might bring both actions in succession, but he would only recover in the second any special advantages which that action might give him beyond what the first had given. (D. xlv. 7. 34. pr.)

TIT. X. DE HIS, PER QUOS AGERE POSSUMUS.

Nunc admonendi sumus, agere posse quemlibet aut suo nomine aut alieno. Alieno veluti procuratorio, tutorio, curatorio, cum olim in usu fuisset, alterius nomine agere non posse nisi pro populo, pro libertate, pro tutela. Præterea lege Hostilia permissum est furti agere eorum nomine, qui apud hostes essent aut rei publicæ causa abessent quive in eorum ejus tutela essent. Et quia hoc non minimam incommoditatem habebat, quod alieno nomine neque agere neque excipere actionem licebat, cœperunt homines per procuratores litigare: nam et morbus et ætas et necessaria peregrinatio itemque aliæ multæ causæ sæpe impedimento sunt, quo minus rem suam ipsi exsequi possint.

We must now remark, that a person may conduct an action either in his own name, or in that of another, as, for instance, if he is a procurator, a tutor, or a curator; but anciently, custom forbade one person conducting an action in the name of another, unless for the people, for freedom, or for a pupil. The lex Hostilia afterwards permitted an actio furti to be brought in the names of those who were prisoners in the hands of an enemy, of persons absent in the service of the state, or of those under the tutorship of such persons. But, as it was found to be exceedingly inconvenient, that one man should be prohibited from bringing or defending an action in the name of another, it by degrees became a practice to sue by procurators. For ill-health, old age, unavoidable journeys, and many other causes, continually prevent men from being able to attend personally to their own affairs.

GAI. iv. 82; D. l. 17. 123. pr.; D. iii. 3. 1. 2.

The old principle of Roman law was, that no one could represent another, and, with the exceptions noticed in the text, this principle was rigorously observed during the period of the actions of law.

By agere pro populo was meant bringing an actio popularis (eam popularem actionem dicimus quæ suum jus populo tuetur, D. xlvii. 23. 1); by agere pro libertate was meant becoming asser-tor libertatis for a slave (see Introd. sec. 96); and by agere pro tutela, bringing an action on behalf of a pupil.

Under the system of formulae, the first step towards breaking through the old rule was the permitting a cognitor to be appointed. A cognitor was a person who was appointed by one of the parties to a suit to conduct it for him. The cognitor himself was not necessarily present when he was appointed, but it was necessary that the appointment should be made before the magistrate, in presence of the adversary, and by a certain form of words. For instance, a plaintiff speaking generally of his action would say, 'Quod ego tecum agere volo, in eam rem Lucium Titium cognitorem do.' Other forms, adapted to other cases, are given in Gaius rum, or under the lex Aquilia. The master might bring both actions in succession, but he would only recover in the second any special advantages which that action might give him beyond what the first had given. (D. xlv. 7. 34. pr.)

TIT. X. DE HIS, PER QUOS AGERE POSSUMUS.

Nunc admonendi sumus, agere posse quemlibet aut suo nomine aut alieno. Alieno veluti procuratorio, tutorio, curatorio, cum olim in usu fuisset, alterius nomine agere non posse nisi pro populo, pro libertate, pro tutela. Præterea lege Hostilia permissum est furti agere eorum nomine, qui apud hostes essent aut rei publicæ causa abessent quive in eorum ejus tutela essent. Et quia hoc non minimam incommoditatem habebat, quod alieno nomine neque agere neque excipere actionem licebat, cœperunt homines per procuratores litigare: nam et morbus et ætas et necessaria peregrinatio itemque aliæ multæ causæ sæpe impedimento sunt, quo minus rem suam ipsi exsequi possint.

We must now remark, that a person may conduct an action either in his own name, or in that of another, as, for instance, if he is a procurator, a tutor, or a curator; but anciently, custom forbade one person conducting an action in the name of another, unless for the people, for freedom, or for a pupil. The lex Hostilia afterwards permitted an actio furti to be brought in the names of those who were prisoners in the hands of an enemy, of persons absent in the service of the state, or of those under the tutorship of such persons. But, as it was found to be exceedingly inconvenient, that one man should be prohibited from bringing or defending an action in the name of another, it by degrees became a practice to sue by procurators. For ill-health, old age, unavoidable journeys, and many other causes, continually prevent men from being able to attend personally to their own affairs.

GAI. iv. 82; D. l. 17. 123. pr.; D. iii. 3. 1. 2.

The old principle of Roman law was, that no one could represent another, and, with the exceptions noticed in the text, this principle was rigorously observed during the period of the actions of law.

By agere pro populo was meant bringing an actio popularis (eam popularem actionem dicimus quæ suum jus populo tuetur, D. xlvii. 23. 1); by agere pro libertate was meant becoming asser-tor libertatis for a slave (see Introd. sec. 96); and by agere pro tutela, bringing an action on behalf of a pupil.

Under the system of formulae, the first step towards breaking through the old rule was the permitting a cognitor to be appointed. A cognitor was a person who was appointed by one of the parties to a suit to conduct it for him. The cognitor himself was not necessarily present when he was appointed, but it was necessary that the appointment should be made before the magistrate, in presence of the adversary, and by a certain form of words. For instance, a plaintiff speaking generally of his action would say, 'Quod ego tecum agere volo, in eam rem Lucium Titium cognitorem do.' Other forms, adapted to other cases, are given in Gaius

(iv. 83). The name of the principal was inserted in the intentio, that of the representative in the condemnatio. (GAI. iv. 86.) In the case of a cognitor, the actio judicati was for or against the party to the suit.

The next step was to permit a procurator appointed by a mandate to conduct a suit, but at first he did so in his own name, for it was not till a later period of Roman law that a procurator could expressly represent his principal. He had accordingly, before Justinian, if plaintiff, to give security ratam rem dominum habiturum, and, if defendant, to give security judicatum solvi, as explained in the next Title. If a person offered to conduct a suit for another as procurator voluntarius, and could not produce an authorisation, he was allowed to act, not as mandatary, but as negotiorum gestor, if he acted in good faith, and gave security for ratification. (GAI. iv. 84.) The actio judicati lay for or against the procurator, and not the party. Subsequently, when the mandate was clear, or if the mandator was present and gave it, the procurator was considered as only representing the party, and the actio judicati was given to or against the party, not the procurator (Vat. Frag. 331), and this was extended to the case of the negotiorum gestor, who, although at first acting without a mandate, afterwards showed that the party approved what he did. (D. v. 1. 56.) Thus the procurator had taken the place of the cognitor, and it is only of the former that Justinian speaks.

1. Procurator neque certis verbis neque præsente adversario, immo plerumque ignorante eo constituitur: cuicumque enim permiseris rem tuam agere aut defendere, is procurator intellegitur.

1. A procurator is appointed without any particular form of words, nor is the presence of the adverse party required; indeed, it is generally done without his knowledge. For any one is considered to be your procurator whom you have allowed to bring or to defend an action for you.

GAI. iv. 84.

2. Tutores et curatores quemadmodum constituuntur, primo libro expositum est.

2. How tutors and curators are appointed has been already explained in the First Book.

GAI. iv. 85.

If the tutor, in appearing for the pupil, had merely discharged a duty forced upon him, the actio judicati (i.e. the action brought to enforce the sentence) was given to or against the pupil. If the tutor chose to appear for the pupil when he need have done nothing more than authorise the pupil to appear himself (si se liti obtulit), the actio judicati was given to or against the tutor. The case was the same as regards the curators of persons under the age of twenty-five. (D. xxvi. 7. 2. pr.; D. xxvi. 9. 5. pr.)

(iv. 83). The name of the principal was inserted in the intentio, that of the representative in the condemnatio. (GAI. iv. 86.) In the case of a cognitor, the actio judicati was for or against the party to the suit.

The next step was to permit a procurator appointed by a mandate to conduct a suit, but at first he did so in his own name, for it was not till a later period of Roman law that a procurator could expressly represent his principal. He had accordingly, before Justinian, if plaintiff, to give security ratam rem dominum habiturum, and, if defendant, to give security judicatum solvi, as explained in the next Title. If a person offered to conduct a suit for another as procurator voluntarius, and could not produce an authorisation, he was allowed to act, not as mandatary, but as negotiorum gestor, if he acted in good faith, and gave security for ratification. (GAI. iv. 84.) The actio judicati lay for or against the procurator, and not the party. Subsequently, when the mandate was clear, or if the mandator was present and gave it, the procurator was considered as only representing the party, and the actio judicati was given to or against the party, not the procurator (Vat. Frag. 331), and this was extended to the case of the negotiorum gestor, who, although at first acting without a mandate, afterwards showed that the party approved what he did. (D. v. 1. 56.) Thus the procurator had taken the place of the cognitor, and it is only of the former that Justinian speaks.

1. Procurator neque certis verbis neque præsente adversario, immo plerumque ignorante eo constituitur: cuicumque enim permiseris rem tuam agere aut defendere, is procurator intellegitur.

1. A procurator is appointed without any particular form of words, nor is the presence of the adverse party required; indeed, it is generally done without his knowledge. For any one is considered to be your procurator whom you have allowed to bring or to defend an action for you.

GAI. iv. 84.

2. Tutores et curatores quemadmodum constituuntur, primo libro expositum est.

2. How tutors and curators are appointed has been already explained in the First Book.

GAI. iv. 85.

If the tutor, in appearing for the pupil, had merely discharged a duty forced upon him, the actio judicati (i.e. the action brought to enforce the sentence) was given to or against the pupil. If the tutor chose to appear for the pupil when he need have done nothing more than authorise the pupil to appear himself (si se liti obtulit), the actio judicati was given to or against the tutor. The case was the same as regards the curators of persons under the age of twenty-five. (D. xxvi. 7. 2. pr.; D. xxvi. 9. 5. pr.)

TIT. XI. DE SATISDATIONIBUS.

Satisfactionum modus alius antiquitati placuit, alium novitas per usum amplexa est. Olim enim si in rem agebatur, satisfacere possessor compellebatur, ut, si victus nec rem ipsam restitueret nec litis aestimationem, potestas esset petitori aut cum eo agendi aut cum fidejussoribus ejus. Quæ satisfactio appellabatur judicatum solvi: unde autem sic appellabatur, facile est intelligere. Namque stipulabatur quis, ut solveretur sibi, quod fuerit judicatum. Multo magis is, qui in rem actione conveniebatur, satisfacere cogebatur, si alieno nomine judicium accipiebat. Ipse autem, qui in rem agebat, si suo nomine petebat, satisfacere non cogebatur. Procurator vero si in rem agebat, satisfacere jubebatur ratam rem dominum habiturum: periculum enim erat, ne iterum dominus de eadem re expeririatur. Tutores et curatores eodem modo, quo et procuratores, satisfacere debere, verba edicti faciebant. Sed aliquando his agentibus satisfactio remittebatur. Hæc ita erant, si in rem agebatur.

One system of taking securities prevailed in ancient times; custom has introduced another in modern times. Formerly, in a real action the possessor was compelled to give security, so that if he lost his cause, and did not either restore the thing itself, or pay the estimated value of it, the plaintiff might either sue him or his sureties: this species of security was termed judicatum solvi, nor is it difficult to understand why it was so called. For the plaintiff used to stipulate that what was adjudged to him should be paid. And with still greater reason was a person sued in a real action obliged to give security if he was defendant in the name of another. A plaintiff in a real action suing in his own name, was not obliged to give security; but a procurator bringing a real action had to give security that his acts would be ratified by the person for whom he acted; for there was a danger lest the person should bring a fresh action for the same thing. By the words of the edict, tutors and curators were bound to give security, as well as procurators, but it was sometimes dispensed with when they were the plaintiffs. Such was the practice with regard to real actions.

GAI. iv. 89, 90, 96, 98-100.

Judicatum solvi stipulatio tres clausulas in unum collatas habet: de re judicata, de re defendenda, de dolo malo. (D. xlv. 7. 6.) There were three objects secured by the cautio judicatum solvi. It was promised (1) that the litis aestimatio, the amount of what was adjudged by the sentence, should be paid if the defendant should be condemned and should not give back the thing; (2) that the defendant should take all the proper steps in defending the action, and appear to receive the sentence of the judge; (3) that the defendant should use no dolus malus, should not, for instance, give back the thing, but give it in a state deteriorated by his fault. The object of the defendant, as well as the sureties, binding himself for the litis aestimatio (aut cum eo agendi, says the text, aut cum fidejussoribus), was to give the plaintiff his choice between an action ex stipulatu, which was often preferred, or one ex judicato, i.e. upon, or to enforce, the sentence. The object of making the defendant directly liable, by a stipulation, if he did not appear to defend the action, was to avoid having recourse to the less direct

TIT. XI. DE SATISDATIONIBUS.

Satisfactionum modus alius antiquitati placuit, alium novitas per usum amplexa est. Olim enim si in rem agebatur, satisfacere possessor compellebatur, ut, si victus nec rem ipsam restitueret nec litis aestimationem, potestas esset petitori aut cum eo agendi aut cum fidejussoribus ejus. Quæ satisfactio appellabatur judicatum solvi: unde autem sic appellabatur, facile est intelligere. Namque stipulabatur quis, ut solveretur sibi, quod fuerit judicatum. Multo magis is, qui in rem actione conveniebatur, satisfacere cogebatur, si alieno nomine judicium accipiebat. Ipse autem, qui in rem agebat, si suo nomine petebat, satisfacere non cogebatur. Procurator vero si in rem agebat, satisfacere jubebatur ratam rem dominum habiturum: periculum enim erat, ne iterum dominus de eadem re expeririatur. Tutores et curatores eodem modo, quo et procuratores, satisfacere debere, verba edicti faciebant. Sed aliquando his agentibus satisfactio remittebatur. Hæc ita erant, si in rem agebatur.

One system of taking securities prevailed in ancient times; custom has introduced another in modern times. Formerly, in a real action the possessor was compelled to give security, so that if he lost his cause, and did not either restore the thing itself, or pay the estimated value of it, the plaintiff might either sue him or his sureties: this species of security was termed judicatum solvi, nor is it difficult to understand why it was so called. For the plaintiff used to stipulate that what was adjudged to him should be paid. And with still greater reason was a person sued in a real action obliged to give security if he was defendant in the name of another. A plaintiff in a real action suing in his own name, was not obliged to give security; but a procurator bringing a real action had to give security that his acts would be ratified by the person for whom he acted; for there was a danger lest the person should bring a fresh action for the same thing. By the words of the edict, tutors and curators were bound to give security, as well as procurators, but it was sometimes dispensed with when they were the plaintiffs. Such was the practice with regard to real actions.

GAI. iv. 89, 90, 96, 98-100.

Judicatum solvi stipulatio tres clausulas in unum collatas habet: de re judicata, de re defendenda, de dolo malo. (D. xlv. 7. 6.)

There were three objects secured by the cautio judicatum solvi. It was promised (1) that the litis aestimatio, the amount of what was adjudged by the sentence, should be paid if the defendant should be condemned and should not give back the thing; (2) that the defendant should take all the proper steps in defending the action, and appear to receive the sentence of the judge; (3) that the defendant should use no dolus malus, should not, for instance, give back the thing, but give it in a state deteriorated by his fault. The object of the defendant, as well as the sureties, binding himself for the litis aestimatio (aut cum eo agendi, says the text, aut cum fidejussoribus), was to give the plaintiff his choice between an action ex stipulatu, which was often preferred, or one ex judicato, i.e. upon, or to enforce, the sentence. The object of making the defendant directly liable, by a stipulation, if he did not appear to defend the action, was to avoid having recourse to the less direct mode in which the disobedience of the defendant to obey the magistrate's summons was made to benefit the plaintiff.

Satisdare possessor compellebatur. If the possessor would not give the cautio judicatum solvi, the possession, by means of an interdiction (see Tit. 15. 3), was transferred to the plaintiff, if he was willing to give the security which his adversary refused to give.

Litis aestimatio. Lis here signifies the subject of the suit.

Multo magis si alieno nomine. This applied to the procurator in the days when he did not really represent the principal. The cognitor never gave security. The person really interested in the action was called dominus litis; when the procurator did not represent him, but came forward as if he was the dominus litis, it was necessary to guard against the real dominus litis bringing another action.

Tutors had probably to give security in all cases where they were the party defendant.

1. Sin vero in personam, ab actoris quidem parte eadem obtinebant, quæ diximus in actione, qua in rem agitur. Ab ejus vero parte, cum quo agitur, si quidem alieno nomine aliquis interveniret, omnimodo satisdabat, quia nemo defensor in aliena re sine satisfactione idoneus esse creditur. Quod si proprio nomine aliquis judicium accipiebat in personam, judicatum solvi satisdare non cogebatur.

1. In personal actions, on the part of the plaintiff, the same rules as to giving security were observed as in real actions. As to the defendant, if he appeared in the name of another, he was obliged to give security, for no one was considered a competent defendant in behalf of another unless he gave security; but any one who defended a personal action in his own name was not compelled to give the security judicatum solvi.

GAI. IV. 100-102.

If the defendant was a cognitor, the dominus litis gave security for him. (Vat. Fragm. 317.)

Gaius notices (iv. 102) that in some few exceptional instances, as if the action was one judicati, or if there was anything to make the credit of the defendant suspected, the defendant was obliged in personal actions to give security judicatum solvi.

2. Sed hæc hodie aliter observantur. Sive enim quis in rem actione convenitur sive personali suo nomine, nullam satisfactionem propter litis aestimationem dare compellitur, sed pro sua tantum persona, quod in judicio permaneat usque ad terminum litis, vel committitur suæ promissioni cum jurejurando, quam juratoriam cautionem vocant, vel nudam promissionem vel satisfactionem pro qualitate personæ suæ dare compellitur.

2. At present a different practice prevails. A defendant who is sued in his own name, either in a real or personal action, is not forced to give security for the payment of the estimated value of the thing sued for, but only for his own person, that is, that he will remain and abide the judgment until the end of the suit. For this security recourse may be had to the promise on oath of the party, when the security is called a cautio juratoria, or to his simple promise without oath, or to a satisfactio, according to the quality of the person.

C. xii. 1. 17.

In judicio permaneat. An earlier writer would probably have mode in which the disobedience of the defendant to obey the magistrate's summons was made to benefit the plaintiff.

Satisdare possessor compellebatur. If the possessor would not give the cautio judicatum solvi, the possession, by means of an interdict (see Tit. 15. 3), was transferred to the plaintiff, if he was willing to give the security which his adversary refused to give.

Litis aestimatio. Lis here signifies the subject of the suit.

Multo magis si alieno nomine. This applied to the procurator in the days when he did not really represent the principal. The cognitor never gave security. The person really interested in the action was called dominus litis; when the procurator did not represent him, but came forward as if he was the dominus litis, it was necessary to guard against the real dominus litis bringing another action.

Tutors had probably to give security in all cases where they were the party defendant.

1. Sin vero in personam, ab actoris quidem parte eadem obtinebant, quæ diximus in actione, qua in rem agitur. Ab ejus vero parte, cum quo agitur, si quidem alieno nomine aliquis interveniret, omnimodo satisdabat, quia nemo defensor in aliena re sine satisfactione idoneus esse creditur. Quod si proprio nomine aliquis judicium accipiebat in personam, judicatum solvi satisdare non cogebatur.

1. In personal actions, on the part of the plaintiff, the same rules as to giving security were observed as in real actions. As to the defendant, if he appeared in the name of another, he was obliged to give security, for no one was considered a competent defendant in behalf of another unless he gave security; but any one who defended a personal action in his own name was not compelled to give the security judicatum solvi.

GAI. iv. 100-102.

If the defendant was a cognitor, the dominus litis gave security for him. (Vat. Fragm. 317.)

Gaius notices (iv. 102) that in some few exceptional instances, as if the action was one judicati, or if there was anything to make the credit of the defendant suspected, the defendant was obliged in personal actions to give security judicatum solvi.

2. Sed hæc hodie aliter observantur. Sive enim quis in rem actione convenitur sive personali suo nomine, nullam satisfactionem propter litis aestimationem dare compellitur, sed pro sua tantum persona, quod in judicio permaneat usque ad terminum litis, vel committitur suæ promissioni cum jurejurando, quam juratoriam cautionem vocant, vel nudam promissionem vel satisfactionem pro qualitate personæ suæ dare compellitur.

2. At present a different practice prevails. A defendant who is sued in his own name, either in a real or personal action, is not forced to give security for the payment of the estimated value of the thing sued for, but only for his own person, that is, that he will remain and abide the judgment until the end of the suit. For this security recourse may be had to the promise on oath of the party, when the security is called a cautio juratoria, or to his simple promise without oath, or to a satisfactio, according to the quality of the person.

C. xii. 1. 17.

In judicio permaneat. An earlier writer would probably have pointed out that the cautio was given, when the parties were before the prætor, that the defendant would go before the judge. But in Justinian's time the distinction of in jure and in judicio was done away.

We gather from the text, that whereas under the old law the defendant would have had to give security both for the payment of the amount at which the subject-matter of the action was valued, and that he would appear to defend himself (pro re defendenda, or, as here, in judicio permaneat), under Justinian's legislation he did not engage at all for the former, and for the latter he did not necessarily give the security of a fidejussor, but, if a vir illustris (see Tit. 4. 10 note), only pledged himself by oath, or even by a simple promise. (C. xii. l. 17.)

3. Sin autem per procuratorem lis vel infertur vel suscipitur, in actoris quidem persona, si non mandatum actis insinuatum est vel præsens dominus litis in judicio procuratoris sui personam confirmaverit, ratam rem dominum habiturum satisfactionem procurator dare compellitur, eodem observando et si tutor vel curator vel aliæ tales personæ, quæ alienarum rerum gubernationem receperunt, litem quibusdam per alium inferunt.

4. Sin vero aliquis convenitur, si quidem præsens procuratorem dare paratus est, potest vel ipse in judicium venire et sui procuratoris personam per judicatum solvi satisfactionis sollemnes stipulationes firmare vel extra judicium satisfactionem exponere, per quam ipse sui procuratoris fidejussor existit pro omnibus judicatum solvi satisfactionis clausulis. Ubi et de hypotheca suarum rerum convenire compellitur, sive in judicio promiserit sive extra judicium caverit, ut tam ipse quam heredes ejus obligentur: alia insuper cautela vel satisfactione propter personam ipsius exponenda, quod tempore sententiæ recitandæ in judicio inveniatur, vel si non venerit, omnia dabit fidejussor, quæ condemnatione continentur, nisi fuerit provocatum.

3. But, where a suit is commenced or taken up by a procurator as plaintiff, if a mandate of appointment is not registered, or if the person who really brings the action does not himself appear before the judge to confirm the appointment of the procurator, then the procurator himself is obliged to give security that the person for whom he acts will ratify his proceedings. The same rule applies also if a tutor, curator, or any other person, who has undertaken to manage the affairs of another, brings an action through a third party.

4. As to the defendant, if he appears and wishes to appoint a procurator, he may either himself come before the judge, and there confirm the authority of the procurator, by giving with a solemn stipulation the caution called judicatum solvi, or he may give such a security elsewhere, and become himself the fidejussor of his own procurator, as to each clause of the caution judicatum solvi; and he is compelled to subject all his property to a hypotheca, whether he promises before the judge or not, and this obligation binds not only himself but his heirs. He must also give further security as to his own person, that he will himself appear at the time when judgment is given, or that, if he fails to do so, his fidejussor will pay all that is fixed to be paid by the sentence, unless the decision is appealed against.

For the clausula of the cautio judicatum solvi, see note on the introductory paragraph of this Title.

Alia insuper cautela. This was to insure that the actio judicati should be given against the real dominus litis.

pointed out that the cautio was given, when the parties were before the prætor, that the defendant would go before the judex. But in Justinian's time the distinction of in jure and in judicio was done away.

We gather from the text, that whereas under the old law the defendant would have had to give security both for the payment of the amount at which the subject-matter of the action was valued, and that he would appear to defend himself (pro re defendenda, or, as here, in judicio permaneat), under Justinian's legislation he did not engage at all for the former, and for the latter he did not necessarily give the security of a fidejussor, but, if a vir illustris (see Tit. 4. 10 note), only pledged himself by oath, or even by a simple promise. (C. xii. l. 17.)

3. Sin autem per procuratorem lis vel infertur vel suscipitur, in actoris quidem persona, si non mandatum actis insinuatum est vel presens dominus litis in judicio procuratoris sui personam confirmaverit, ratam rem dominum habiturum satisfactionem procurator dare compellitur, eodem observando et si tutor vel curator vel alia tales personæ, quæ alienarum rerum gubernationem receperunt, litem quibusdam per alium inferunt.

4. Sin vero aliquis convenitur, si quidem presens procuratorem dare paratus est, potest vel ipse in judicium venire et sui procuratoris personam per judicatum solvi satisfactionis sollemnes stipulationes firmare vel extra judicium satisfactionem exponere, per quam ipse sui procuratoris fidejussor existit pro omnibus judicatum solvi satisfactionis clausulis. Ubi et de hypotheca suarum rerum convenire compellitur, sive in judicio promiserit sive extra judicium caverit, ut tam ipse quam heredes ejus obligentur: alia insuper cautela vel satisfactione propter personam ipsius exponenda, quod tempore sententiæ recitandæ in judicio invenietur, vel si non venerit, omnia dabit fidejussor, quæ condemnatione continentur, nisi fuerit provocatum.

3. But, where a suit is commenced or taken up by a procurator as plaintiff, if a mandate of appointment is not registered, or if the person who really brings the action does not himself appear before the judge to confirm the appointment of the procurator, then the procurator himself is obliged to give security that the person for whom he acts will ratify his proceedings. The same rule applies also if a tutor, curator, or any other person, who has undertaken to manage the affairs of another, brings an action through a third party.

4. As to the defendant, if he appears and wishes to appoint a procurator, he may either himself come before the judge, and there confirm the authority of the procurator, by giving with a solemn stipulation the caution called judicatum solvi, or he may give such a security elsewhere, and become himself the fidejussor of his own procurator, as to each clause of the caution judicatum solvi; and he is compelled to subject all his property to a hypotheca, whether he promises before the judge or not, and this obligation binds not only himself but his heirs. He must also give further security as to his own person, that he will himself appear at the time when judgment is given, or that, if he fails to do so, his fidejussor will pay all that is fixed to be paid by the sentence, unless the decision is appealed against.

For the clausula of the cautio judicatum solvi, see note on the introductory paragraph of this Title.

Alia insuper cautela. This was to insure that the actio judicati should be given against the real dominus litis.

5. Si vero reus præsto ex quacunque causa non fuerit et alius velit defensionem subire, nulla differentia inter actiones in rem vel personales introducenda, potest hoc facere, ita tamen ut satisfactionem iudicatum solvi pro litis præstet æstimatione. Nemo enim secundum veterem regulam, ut jam dictum est, alienæ rei sine satisfactione defensor idoneus intellegitur.

6. Quæ omnia apertius et perfectissime e cottidiano iudiciorum usu in ipsis rerum documentis apparent.

7. Quam formam non solum in hac regia urbe, set et in omnibus nostris provinciis, etsi propter imperitiam aliter forte celebrantur, optinere censemus, cum necesse est omnes provincias caput omnium nostrarum civitatum, id est hanc regiam urbem, ejusque observantiam sequi.

5. But if, from any cause, a defendant does not appear, and another person is willing to defend the action for him, he may do so (nor does it make any difference whether the action is real or personal), but he must give security iudicatum solvi to the amount of what is at stake; for, according to the old rule of law we have just mentioned, no one is held a competent defendant for another without giving security.

6. All this will be learned more clearly and fully by observation of the ordinary judicial proceedings in cases which may serve as examples.

7. We order that these rules shall be observed not only in this our royal city, but also in, all our provinces, although other usages may be now adopted there through ignorance; for it is necessary that all the provinces should conform to the practice of our royal city, which is supreme above all others.

TIT. XII. DE PERPETUIS ET TEMPORALIBUS ACTIONIBUS, ET QUÆ AD HEREDES VEL IN HEREDES TRANSEUNT.

Hoc loco admonendi sumus, eas quidem actiones, quæ ex lege senatusve consulto sive ex sacris constitutionibus proficiuntur, perpetuo solere antiquitus competere, donec sacræ constitutiones tam in rem quam personalibus actionibus certos fines dederunt: eas vero, quæ ex propria prætoris jurisdictione pendent, plerumque intra annum vivere (nam et ipsius prætoris intra annum erat imperium). Aliquando tamen et in perpetuum extenduntur, id est usque ad finem constitutionibus introductum, quales sunt hæ, quas bonorum possessori ceterisque, qui heredis loco sunt, accommodat. Furti quoque manifesti actio, quamvis ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione proficiatur, tamen perpetuo datur: absurdum enim esse existimavit, anno eam terminari.

We ought here to observe that the actions derived from a law, from a senatusconsultum, or from imperial constitutions, could formerly be exercised at any length of time, however great; until imperial constitutions assigned fixed limits both to real and to personal actions. Of the actions derived from the jurisdiction of the prætor, the greater part last only during one year, for this was the limit of the prætor's authority. Sometimes, however, these actions are perpetual, that is, last until the time introduced by the constitutions; such are those given to the bonorum possessor and to others standing in the place of the heir. The action furti manifesti, also, though proceeding from the jurisdiction of the prætor, is yet perpetual, for it seemed absurd to limit its duration to a year.

GAI. IV. 110, 111.

In the introductory note to Title 6, it has been said that we may ask as to actions, within what time they may be brought,

5. Si vero reus præsto ex quacumque causa non fuerit et alius velit defensionem subire, nulla differentia inter actiones in rem vel personales introducenda, potest hoc facere, ita tamen ut satisfactionem iudicatum solvi pro litis præstet æstimatione. Nemo enim secundum veterem regulam, ut jam dictum est, alienæ rei sine satisfactione defensor idoneus intellegitur.

6. Quæ omnia apertius et perfectissime e cottidiano iudiciorum usu in ipsis rerum documentis apparent.

7. Quam formam non solum in hac regia urbe, set et in omnibus nostris provinciis, etsi propter imperitiam aliter forte celebrantur, optinere censemus, cum necesse est omnes provincias caput omnium nostrarum civitatum, id est hanc regiam urbem, ejusque observantiam sequi.

5. But if, from any cause, a defendant does not appear, and another person is willing to defend the action for him, he may do so (nor does it make any difference whether the action is real or personal), but he must give security iudicatum solvi to the amount of what is at stake; for, according to the old rule of law we have just mentioned, no one is held a competent defendant for another without giving security.

6. All this will be learned more clearly and fully by observation of the ordinary judicial proceedings in cases which may serve as examples.

7. We order that these rules shall be observed not only in this our royal city, but also in all our provinces, although other usages may be now adopted there through ignorance; for it is necessary that all the provinces should conform to the practice of our royal city, which is supreme above all others.

TIT. XII. DE PERPETUIS ET TEMPORALIBUS ACTIONIBUS, ET QUÆ AD HEREDES VEL IN HEREDES TRANSEUNT.

Hoc loco admonendi sumus, eas quidem actiones, quæ ex lege senatusve consulto sive ex sacris constitutionibus proficiscuntur, perpetuo solere antiquitus competere, donec sacræ constitutiones tam in rem quam personalibus actionibus certos fines dederunt: eas vero, quæ ex propria prætoris jurisdictione pendent, plerumque intra annum vivere (nam et ipsius prætoris intra annum erat imperium). Aliquando tamen et in perpetuum extenduntur, id est usque ad finem constitutionibus introductum, quales sunt hæ, quas bonorum possessori ceterisque, qui heredis loco sunt, accommodat. Furti quoque manifesti actio, quamvis ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione proficiscatur, tamen perpetuo datur: absurdum enim esse existimavit, anno eam terminari.

We ought here to observe that the actions derived from a law, from a senatusconsultum, or from imperial constitutions, could formerly be exercised at any length of time, however great; until imperial constitutions assigned fixed limits both to real and to personal actions. Of the actions derived from the jurisdiction of the prætor, the greater part last only during one year, for this was the limit of the prætor's authority. Sometimes, however, these actions are perpetual, that is, last until the time introduced by the constitutions; such are those given to the bonorum possessor and to others standing in the place of the heir. The action furti manifesti, also, though proceeding from the jurisdiction of the prætor, is yet perpetual, for it seemed absurd to limit its duration to a year.

GAI. IV. 110, 111.

In the introductory note to Title 6, it has been said that we may ask as to actions, within what time they may be brought, within what delay the proceedings must be finished, and what is the effect of a judgment in case of fresh proceedings being instituted. The second of these points is not noticed in the Institutes, the rules as to the period of finishing the suit having become obsolete. The third is treated of in the next Title, par. 5. We have now to consider the first, namely, how long the right of action lasted from its inception, i.e. from the time when the plaintiff could have brought an action.

Under the formulary system, the general rule was that actions arising from the law, a senatusconsultum, or constitutions, including an action arising out of the old civil law, were perpetual; that is, there was no limit to the time in which they could be brought. On the other hand, prætorian actions were annual, i.e. must be brought within an annus utilis, or year made up of days in which there was no obstacle to the plaintiff appearing in court, so that more than twelve months might be included. This time of a year was probably suggested by the duration of the prætor's office, but it had nothing to do with any one prætor being in office. It was merely a limited time during which the prætor, in creating an action, fixed that it must be brought.

To the rule that prætorian actions were annual, there were, however, exceptions of a very wide kind. The text mentions the actions given to a bonorum possessor, and to every one placed in loco heredis, and also the prætorian action for furtum manifestum, which was perpetual because it was a commutation of capital punishment. (GAI. iv. 111.) Further, all prætorian actions rei persecutoriæ, for the sake of the thing, including all actions on contracts for the simple value, were perpetual, unless the action was one not extending, but directly contradicting, the civil law, when it was annual. An example will show what was meant by this distinction. The actio Publiciana (Tit. 6. 4), given to extend the operation of usucapion, was perpetual, but the actio rescissoria, given to rescind usucapion (Tit. 6. 5), was annual. (D. xlv. 7. 35. pr.) We may, therefore, almost reverse the description of prætorian actions, and say that they were perpetual except when they were (1) penal (the actio furti manifesti being, however, perpetual), or (2) rei persecutoriæ, and in direct opposition to the civil law.

Sacræ constitutiones certos fines dederunt. In A.D. 424, Theodosius II. enacted that, as a general rule, actions, real or personal, should not be brought after a lapse of thirty years. (C. vii. 39. 3.) Subsequently the time was, in the case of some actions, as in that of an actio hypothecaria, when the thing hypothecated remained in the hands of the debtor, extended to forty years. (C. vii. 39. 7. 1.) The term perpetua, however, still continued to be applied to these actions, though, properly speaking, in the time of Justinian it meant nothing more than an action which could be brought within thirty or forty years, as opposed to those which could only be brought within a shorter period.

within what delay the proceedings must be finished, and what is the effect of a judgment in case of fresh proceedings being instituted. The second of these points is not noticed in the Institutes, the rules as to the period of finishing the suit having become obsolete. The third is treated of in the next Title, par. 5. We have now to consider the first, namely, how long the right of action lasted from its inception, i.e. from the time when the plaintiff could have brought an action.

Under the formulary system, the general rule was that actions arising from the law, a senatusconsultum, or constitutions, including an action arising out of the old civil law, were perpetual; that is, there was no limit to the time in which they could be brought. On the other hand, prætorian actions were annual, i.e. must be brought within an annus utilis, or year made up of days in which there was no obstacle to the plaintiff appearing in court, so that more than twelve months might be included. This time of a year was probably suggested by the duration of the prætor's office, but it had nothing to do with any one prætor being in office. It was merely a limited time during which the prætor, in creating an action, fixed that it must be brought.

To the rule that prætorian actions were annual, there were, however, exceptions of a very wide kind. The text mentions the actions given to a bonorum possessor, and to every one placed in loco heredis, and also the prætorian action for furtum manifestum, which was perpetual because it was a commutation of capital punishment. (GAI. iv. 111.) Further, all prætorian actions rei persecutoriæ, for the sake of the thing, including all actions on contracts for the simple value, were perpetual, unless the action was one not extending, but directly contradicting, the civil law, when it was annual. An example will show what was meant by this distinction. The actio Publiciana (Tit. 6. 4), given to extend the operation of usucapion, was perpetual, but the actio rescissoria, given to rescind usucapion (Tit. 6. 5), was annual. (D. xlv. 7. 35. pr.) We may, therefore, almost reverse the description of prætorian actions, and say that they were perpetual except when they were (1) penal (the actio furti manifesti being, however, perpetual), or (2) rei persecutoriæ, and in direct opposition to the civil law.

Sacræ constitutiones certos fines dederunt. In A.D. 424, Theodosius II. enacted that, as a general rule, actions, real or personal, should not be brought after a lapse of thirty years. (C. vii. 39. 3.) Subsequently the time was, in the case of some actions, as in that of an actio hypothecaria, when the thing hypothecated remained in the hands of the debtor, extended to forty years. (C. vii. 39. 7. 1.) The term perpetua, however, still continued to be applied to these actions, though, properly speaking, in the time of Justinian it meant nothing more than an action which could be brought within thirty or forty years, as opposed to those which could only be brought within a shorter period.

1. Non omnes autem actiones, quæ in aliquem aut ipso jure competunt aut a prætore dantur, et in heredem æque competunt aut dari solent. Est enim certissima juris regula, ex maleficiis pœnales actiones in heredem non competere, veluti furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, damni injuriæ. Sed heredibus hujusmodi actiones competunt nec denegantur, excepta injuriarum actione et si qua alia similis inveniatur. Aliquando tamen etiam ex contractu actio contra heredem non competit, cum testator dolose versatus sit et ad heredem ejus nihil ex eo dolo pervenerit. Pœnales autem actiones, quas supra diximus, si ab ipsis principalibus personis fuerint contestatæ, et heredibus dantur et contra heredes transeunt.

1. It is not all the actions allowed against any one by the law, or given by the prætor, that will equally be allowed or given against his heir. For it is a fixed rule of law, that penal actions arising from delicts are not allowed against the heir of the delinquent, as, for instance, the actions furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, damni injuriæ. These actions are, however, given to heirs, and are not denied to them, with the exception of the action injuriarum, and others that may resemble it. Sometimes, however, even an action arising from a contract is not allowed against an heir; as when a testator has acted fraudulently and his heir has derived no advantage from the fraud. But penal actions, of which we have spoken above, if actually begun by the principals themselves, pass both to and against heirs.

Gai. iv. 112, 113; D. iv. 3. 17. 1; D. xlv. 7. 26, 58.

Although penal actions could not be brought against the heir of the wrongdoer in order to enforce the liability to a penalty, as the liability was personal to the wrongdoer, yet they could be brought against the heirs for the purpose of getting back from them anything by which they had received an advantage from the delict. (D. xlv. 7. 35. pr.)

Aliquando ex contractu actio contra heredem non competit. This is taken from Gaius, who means it to apply to the heirs of adstipulatores, sponsores, and fidepromissores, for their heirs were not bound; but it is difficult to say to what it could apply in the time of Justinian. It would also be supposed, from the text, that an action making a testator responsible for dolus malus did not ordinarily pass against his heirs, if his heirs were not benefited by the wrong he had committed; but there was only one case in which the action did not pass against his heirs, whether they had benefited by the dolus malus or not, namely, the action in duplum against a person who had been guilty of dolus malus with regard to a deposit placed in his custody under the pressure of an accidental misfortune (see Tit. 6. 23); and even in this case an actio in simplicium passed against the heirs. (D. xvi. 3. 18.)

2. Superest, ut admoneamus, quod si ante rem judicatam is, cum quo actum est, satisfaciatur actori, officio judicis convenit eum absolvere, licet judicii accipiendi tempore in ea causa fuisset, ut damnari debeat: et hoc est, quod ante vulgo dicebatur, omnia judicia absolutoria esse.

2. It remains that we should remark, that if, before the sentence, the defendant satisfies the plaintiff, the judge ought to absolve the defendant, although, from the time of the action being commenced before the magistrate, it was evident the defendant would be condemned. It is in this sense that in former times it was com-

1. Non omnes autem actiones, quæ in aliquem aut ipso jure competunt aut a prætore dantur, et in heredem æque competunt aut dari solent. Est enim certissima juris regula, ex maleficiis pœnales actiones in heredem non competere, veluti furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, damni injuriæ. Sed heredibus hujusmodi actiones competunt nec denegantur, excepta injuriarum actione et si qua alia similis inveniatur. Aliquando tamen etiam ex contractu actio contra heredem non competit, cum testator dolose versatus sit et ad heredem ejus nihil ex eo dolo pervenerit. Pœnales autem actiones, quas supra diximus, si ab ipsis principalibus personis fuerint contestatæ, et heredibus dantur et contra heredes transeunt.

1. It is not all the actions allowed against any one by the law, or given by the prætor, that will equally be allowed or given against his heir. For it is a fixed rule of law, that penal actions arising from delicts are not allowed against the heir of the delinquent, as, for instance, the actions furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, damni injuriæ. These actions are, however, given to heirs, and are not denied to them, with the exception of the action injuriarum, and others that may resemble it. Sometimes, however, even an action arising from a contract is not allowed against an heir; as when a testator has acted fraudulently and his heir has derived no advantage from the fraud. But penal actions, of which we have spoken above, if actually begun by the principals themselves, pass both to and against heirs.

GAI. iv. 112, 113; D. iv. 3. 17. 1; D. xlv. 7. 26, 58.

Although penal actions could not be brought against the heir of the wrongdoer in order to enforce the liability to a penalty, as the liability was personal to the wrongdoer, yet they could be brought against the heirs for the purpose of getting back from them anything by which they had received an advantage from the delict. (D. xlv. 7. 35. pr.)

Aliquando ex contractu actio contra heredem non competit. This is taken from Gaius, who means it to apply to the heirs of adstipulatores, sponsores, and fidepromissores, for their heirs were not bound; but it is difficult to say to what it could apply in the time of Justinian. It would also be supposed, from the text, that an action making a testator responsible for dolus malus did not ordinarily pass against his heirs, if his heirs were not benefited by the wrong he had committed; but there was only one case in which the action did not pass against his heirs, whether they had benefited by the dolus malus or not, namely, the action in duplum against a person who had been guilty of dolus malus with regard to a deposit placed in his custody under the pressure of an accidental misfortune (see Tit. 6. 23); and even in this case an actio in simplum passed against the heirs. (D. xvi. 3. 18.)

2. Superest, ut admoneamus, quod si ante rem judicatam is, cum quo actum est, satisfaciat actori, officio judicis convenit eum absolvere, licet judicii accipiendi tempore in ea causa fuisset, ut damnari debeat: et hoc est, quod ante vulgo dicebatur, omnia judicia absolutoria esse.

2. It remains that we should remark, that if, before the sentence, the defendant satisfies the plaintiff, the judge ought to absolve the defendant, although, from the time of the action being commenced before the magistrate, it was evident the defendant would be condemned. It is in this sense that in former times it was commonly said that in all actions the defendant might be absolved.

GAI. iv. 114.

If, after the formula was delivered, but before judgment was given, the defendant satisfied the plaintiff, a question had arisen, as we learn from Gaius (iv. 114), whether in all cases the judge was to absolve the defendant, or whether in actions stricti juris the judge was technically bound to go on and pronounce judgment. The Proculians thought that the condemnation was still to be made in actions stricti juris, though not in bonæ fidei actions or actions in rem. The Sabinians held that the defendant should be absolved in all actions, and it is the opinion of the Sabinians that Justinian confirms.

TIT. XIII. DE EXCEPTIONIBUS.

Sequitur, ut de exceptionibus discipiamus. Comparatæ sunt autem exceptiones defendendorum eorum gratia, cum quibus agitur: sæpe enim accidit, ut, licet ipsa actio, qua actor experitur, iusta sit, tamen iniqua sit adversus eum, cum quo agitur.

It now follows that we should speak of exceptions. They have been introduced as a means of defence for those against whom an action is brought. For it often happens that the action of the plaintiff, although in itself well founded, is yet unjust as regards the person against whom it is brought.

GAI. iv. 115, 116.

Exceptions belonged properly to the system of formulæ only. Under that system the prætor or other magistrate who pronounced on the right, qui ius dicebat, decided whether, on the statement of facts, the plaintiff had a right to an action. If he had, the parties were sent to the judge. But though the plaintiff might have a right to an action, the defendant might have some ground to urge why, in the particular instance, the action should be defeated; and if the action in factum was not bonæ fidei, i.e. if it was stricti juris, arbitraria, or penal, it was necessary that this ground should be distinctly stated by the defendant to the prætor. Thus the statement was incorporated in the formula sent to the judge, and was called the exceptio; it excepted, or took away from the power of the action. (See Introd. sec. 104.) The judge was bound by the instructions he received in the intentio. He could take notice of no reason urged by the defendant why the action should fail, if the only question submitted to him by the prætor was whether the plaintiff had a good ground of action. It was necessary that the prætor should also expressly instruct him to inquire whether the action, however well grounded, ought not to be defeated.

For instance, supposing an action was brought on a stipulation, the formula would run Si paret Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio sestertium X millia dare oportere. The only question which the iudex could have to decide would be, was the stipulation made or not? If it was, the right of the plaintiff to have a monly said that in all actions the defendant might be absolved.

GAI. iv. 114.

If, after the formula was delivered, but before judgment was given, the defendant satisfied the plaintiff, a question had arisen, as we learn from Gaius (iv. 114), whether in all cases the judge was to absolve the defendant, or whether in actions stricti juris the judge was technically bound to go on and pronounce judgment. The Proculians thought that the condemnation was still to be made in actions stricti juris, though not in bonæ fidei actions or actions in rem. The Sabinians held that the defendant should be absolved in all actions, and it is the opinion of the Sabinians that Justinian confirms.

TIT. XIII. DE EXCEPTIONIBUS.

Sequitur, ut de exceptionibus dispiciamus. Comparatæ sunt autem exceptiones defendendorum eorum gratia, cum quibus agitur: sæpe enim accidit, ut, licet ipsa actio, qua actor experitur, iusta sit, tamen iniqua sit adversus eum, eum quo agitur.

It now follows that we should speak of exceptions. They have been introduced as a means of defence for those against whom an action is brought. For it often happens that the action of the plaintiff, although in itself well founded, is yet unjust as regards the person against whom it is brought.

GAI. iv. 115, 116.

Exceptions belonged properly to the system of formulæ only. Under that system the prætor or other magistrate who pronounced on the right, qui jus dicebat, decided whether, on the statement of facts, the plaintiff had a right to an action. If he had, the parties were sent to the judge. But though the plaintiff might have a right to an action, the defendant might have some ground to urge why, in the particular instance, the action should be defeated; and if the action in factum was not bonæ fidei, i.e. if it was stricti juris, arbitrariu, or penal, it was necessary that this ground should be distinctly stated by the defendant to the prætor. Thus the statement was incorporated in the formula sent to the judge, and was called the exceptio; it excepted, or took away from the power of the action. (See Introd. sec. 104.) The judge was bound by the instructions he received in the intentio. He could take notice of no reason urged by the defendant why the action should fail, if the only question submitted to him by the prætor was whether the plaintiff had a good ground of action. It was necessary that the prætor should also expressly instruct him to inquire whether the action, however well grounded, ought not to be defeated.

For instance, supposing an action was brought on a stipulation, the formula would run Si paret Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio sestertium X millia dare oportere. The only question which the iudex could have to decide would be, was the stipulation made or not? If it was, the right of the plaintiff to have a sentence in his favour was indisputable. But supposing the prætor went on to add an exception, which was always negative, and say, Si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit neque fiat, then a further inquiry would have to be made: was there any fraud on the part of the creditor which made it unjust that he should recover in the action?

The defendant, in making an exception, was not supposed to admit the truth of the plaintiff's statement. (D. xlv. 1. 9.) The plaintiff had first to prove his intentio, and unless he did so the action failed. Supposing he proved it to the satisfaction of the iudex, it was then for the defendant to prove his exception. He affirmed the facts on which the exception rested, and he must prove them; he was in his turn the attacking party. Reus in exceptione actor est. (D. xlv. 1. 1.)

In actions bonæ fidei, as we have already said (see Tit. 6. 28), exceptions were never used; for here the judge was bound by the character of the action to examine into all the circumstances, and only to condemn the defendant if justice demanded he should do so. The action itself was said to imply any exception that could be set up. (D. xxx. 84. 5.)

In the time of Justinian there were, properly speaking, no such things as exceptions. The word came to mean any defence other than a denial of the subsistence of the right of action, which was urged before the magistrate by the defendant.

1. Verbi gratia si metu coactus aut dolo inductus aut errore lapsus stipulanti Titio promisisti, quod non debueras promittere, palam est, jure civili te obligatum esse, et actio, qua intenditur dare te oportere, efficax est: sed iniquum est, te condemnari, ideoque datur tibi exceptio metus causa aut doli mali aut in factum composita ad impugnandam actionem.

1. For instance, if forced by fear, inveigled by fraud, or fallen into a mistake, you promise Titius in a stipulation that which you did not owe him, it is evident that, according to the civil law, you are bound, and the action, in which it is maintained that you ought to give, is validly brought. Yet it is unjust that you should be condemned; and, therefore, to repel the action, you have given you the exception metus causa, or doli mali, or one made to suit the circumstances.

D. xlv. 4. 4. 16. 33.

Errore lapsus, i.e. not a mistake as to the thing forming the subject of the stipulation, for such a mistake would make the stipulation void; but a mistake in the apprehension of some fact which if the defendant had known rightly, he would not have entered into the stipulation. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 19. 23.)

The exceptio metus causa ran thus: Si in ea re nihil metus causa factum est (D. xlv. 4. 4. 33). The exceptio doli mali thus: Si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit neque fiat (D. xlv. 4. 2. 1; GAI. iv. 119). We may remark that the former is general (fear inspired by any one whomsoever), the latter personal (the fraud of Aulus Agerius), and that the exceptio doli mali relates not only to the character of the action at the particular time when the obligation was formed, but also to its sentence in his favour was indisputable. But supposing the prætor went on to add an exception, which was always negative, and say, Si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit neque fiat, then a further inquiry would have to be made: was there any fraud on the part of the creditor which made it unjust that he should recover in the action?

The defendant, in making an exception, was not supposed to admit the truth of the plaintiff's statement. (D. xlv. 1. 9.) The plaintiff had first to prove his intentio, and unless he did so the action failed. Supposing he proved it to the satisfaction of the judex, it was then for the defendant to prove his exception. He affirmed the facts on which the exception rested, and he must prove them; he was in his turn the attacking party. Reus in exceptione actor est. (D. xlv. 1. 1.)

In actions bonæ fidei, as we have already said (see Tit. 6. 28), exceptions were never used; for here the judge was bound by the character of the action to examine into all the circumstances, and only to condemn the defendant if justice demanded he should do so. The action itself was said to imply any exception that could be set up. (D. xxx. 84. 5.)

In the time of Justinian there were, properly speaking, no such things as exceptions. The word came to mean any defence other than a denial of the subsistence of the right of action, which was urged before the magistrate by the defendant.

1. Verbi gratia si metu coactus aut dolo inductus aut errore lapsus stipulanti Titio promisisti, quod non debueras promittere, palam est, jure civili te obligatum esse, et actio, qua intenditur dare te oportere, efficax est: sed iniquum est, te condemnari, ideoque datur tibi exceptio metus causa aut doli mali aut in factum composita ad impugnandam actionem.

1. For instance, if forced by fear, inveigled by fraud, or fallen into a mistake, you promise Titius in a stipulation that which you did not owe him, it is evident that, according to the civil law, you are bound, and the action, in which it is maintained that you ought to give, is validly brought. Yet it is unjust that you should be condemned; and, therefore, to repel the action, you have given you the exception metus causa, or doli mali, or one made to suit the circumstances.

D. xlv. 4. 4. 16. 33.

Errore lapsus, i.e. not a mistake as to the thing forming the subject of the stipulation, for such a mistake would make the stipulation void; but a mistake in the apprehension of some fact which if the defendant had known rightly, he would not have entered into the stipulation. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 19. 23.)

The exceptio metus causa ran thus: Si in ea re nihil metus causa factum est (D. xlv. 4. 4. 33). The exceptio doli mali thus: Si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit neque fiat (D. xlv. 4. 2. 1; GAI. iv. 119). We may remark that the former is general (fear inspired by any one whomsoever), the latter personal (the fraud of Aulus Agerius), and that the exceptio doli mali relates not only to the character of the action at the particular time when the obligation was formed, but also to its subsequent character, neque factum sit neque fiat. A claim might be perfectly fair in the first instance, and afterwards become only partially so, or even wholly unfair. For instance, the real owner of an estate might claim it, and then find that the possessor, having improved it during the time he held it, is entitled to compensation. If the owner refuses the compensation, his claim, in itself fair, becomes, in the way he urges it, unfair.

In factum composita, i.e. shaped so as to raise the question whether a statement of a particular fact was or was not true. Some particular fact is submitted by the prætor to the judex, instead of such a general inquiry as whether the plaintiff has been guilty of fraud. For instance, to use the example given in the Digest (xlv. 1. 22), the inquiry directed to be made might be whether the plaintiff has not made the defendant believe that the subject of stipulation, which is made of brass, was made of gold.

The exceptio in factum composita was thus, like the actio in factum concepta, opposed to one in jus concepta. For instance, the exceptio doli mali, which was in jus concepta, not only raised a question of fact, but made it requisite that the judex should affix a certain character to the acts of the parties. It may be observed that this general exception doli mali would always answer every purpose which could be gained by using an exception in factum composita; for any particular fact which, if stated as an exception and proved, would furnish a bar to the action, would be taken notice of under the exception doli mali. But the magistrate would not always allow an exception doli mali to be inserted when he would give permission to employ one in factum composita; for infamy was attached to a plaintiff against whom an exception doli mali was proved; and when the plaintiff stood to the defendant in any such near relation as that of patron or ascendant, the magistrate would not allow an exception to be used which would have any further consequence than to protect the defendant. (D. xlv. 4. 4. 16.) The instances of exceptions in the following paragraphs are all instances of exceptions in factum.

2. Idem juris est, si quis quasi credendi causa pecuniam stipulatus fuerit neque numeravit. Nam eam pecuniam a te petere posse eum certum est: dare enim te oportet, cum ex stipulatu tenearis: sed quia iniquum est eo nomine te condemnari, placet, exceptione pecuniæ non numeratæ te defendi debere, cujus tempora nos, secundum quod jam superioribus libris scriptum est, constitutione nostra coartavimus.

2. It is the same, if any one should stipulate with you for the repayment of money he is to lend you, and then does not pay to you the sum borrowed; in such a case he could certainly demand from you the amount you have engaged to repay him, and you are bound to give it, for you are tied by the stipulation. But as it would be unjust that you should be condemned in such an action, it has been thought right you should have the defence of the exception pecuniæ non numerata. The time within which this exception can be used, has, as we have said in a former Book, been shortened by our constitution.

subsequent character, neque factum sit neque fiat. A claim might be perfectly fair in the first instance, and afterwards become only partially so, or even wholly unfair. For instance, the real owner of an estate might claim it, and then find that the possessor, having improved it during the time he held it, is entitled to compensation. If the owner refuses the compensation, his claim, in itself fair, becomes, in the way he urges it, unfair.

In factum composita, i.e. shaped so as to raise the question whether a statement of a particular fact was or was not true. Some particular fact is submitted by the prætor to the judex, instead of such a general inquiry as whether the plaintiff has been guilty of fraud. For instance, to use the example given in the Digest (xlv. 1. 22), the inquiry directed to be made might be whether the plaintiff has not made the defendant believe that the subject of stipulation, which is made of brass, was made of gold.

The exceptio in factum composita was thus, like the actio in factum concepta, opposed to one in jus concepta. For instance, the exceptio doli mali, which was in jus concepta, not only raised a question of fact, but made it requisite that the judex should affix a certain character to the acts of the parties. It may be observed that this general exception doli mali would always answer every purpose which could be gained by using an exception in factum composita; for any particular fact which, if stated as an exception and proved, would furnish a bar to the action, would be taken notice of under the exception doli mali. But the magistrate would not always allow an exception doli mali to be inserted when he would give permission to employ one in factum composita; for infamy was attached to a plaintiff against whom an exception doli mali was proved; and when the plaintiff stood to the defendant in any such near relation as that of patron or ascendant, the magistrate would not allow an exception to be used which would have any further consequence than to protect the defendant. (D. xlv. 4. 4. 16.) The instances of exceptions in the following paragraphs are all instances of exceptions in factum.

2. Idem juris est, si quis quasi credendi causa pecuniam stipulatus fuerit neque numeravit. Nam eam pecuniam a te petere posse eum certum est: dare enim te oportet, cum ex stipulatu tenearis: sed quia iniquum est eo nomine te condemnari, placet, exceptione pecuniæ non numeratæ te defendi debere, cujus tempora nos, secundum quod jam superioribus libris scriptum est, constitutione nostra coartavimus.

2. It is the same, if any one should stipulate with you for the repayment of money he is to lend you, and then does not pay to you the sum borrowed; in such a case he could certainly demand from you the amount you have engaged to repay him, and you are bound to give it, for you are tied by the stipulation. But as it would be unjust that you should be condemned in such an action, it has been thought right you should have the defence of the exception pecuniæ non numerata. The time within which this exception can be used, has, as we have said in a former Book, been shortened by our constitution.

Quasi credendi causa, i.e. had made the defendant promise to pay a sum, as if he, the plaintiff, were going to lend the sum to the defendant.

It will be remembered that, in this exception, the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, instead of, as in other exceptions, on the defendant, and then it must be pleaded within originally one year and then five years, a term reduced by Justinian to two years. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 21.)

3. Præterea debitor si pactus fuerit cum creditore, ne a se peteretur, nihilo minus obligatus manet, quia pacto convento obligationes non omnimodo dissolvuntur: qua de causa efficax est adversus eum actio, qua actor intendit 'si paret eum dare oportere.' Sed quia iniquum est contra pactionem eum damnari, defenditur per exceptionem pacti conventi.

3. Again, the debtor who has agreed with his creditor that payment shall not be demanded from him, still remains bound. For an agreement is not a mode by which obligations are always dissolved. This action, therefore, in which the intentio runs, 'If it appears that he ought to give,' may be validly brought against him; but as it would be unjust that he should be condemned in contravention of the agreement, he may use in his defence the exception pacti conventi.

GAI. iv. 116.

Obligations formed re or verbis could not be dissolved by a simple pact. As the contract was a subsisting one, an exception was necessary. The exception pacti conventi ran thus: Si inter Aulum Agerium et Numerium Negidium non convenit, ne ea pecunia peteretur. (GAI. iv. 119.)

4. Æque si debitor deferente creditore juraverit, nihil se dare oportere, adhuc obligatus permanet; sed quia iniquum est, de perjurio quæri, defenditur per exceptionem jurisjurandi. In his quoque actionibus, quibus in rem agitur, æque necessariae sunt exceptiones: veluti si petitore deferente possessor juraverit, eam rem suam esse, et nihilo minus eandem rem petitor vindicet: licet enim verum sit, quod intendit, id est rem ejus esse, iniquum est tamen, possessorem condemnari.

4. So, too, if the debtor, when the creditor challenges him to swear, affirms on oath that he ought not to give anything, he still remains bound. But as it would be unjust to examine whether he has perjured himself, he is allowed to defend himself with the exception jurisjurandi. In actions in rem, these exceptions are equally necessary: for instance, if the possessor, on being challenged by the claimant, swears that the property is his, and yet the plaintiff still persists in his real action. For the claim of the plaintiff might be well founded, and yet it would be unjust to condemn the possessor.

D. xii. 2. 9. pr. and 1; D. xii. 2. 3. 1; D. xii. 2. 11. 1.

The exceptio jurisjurandi was only necessary when the question whether the defendant had accepted the oath when offered him was disputed. If it was acknowledged, the prætor would not give an action at all. (D. xii. 2. 3. pr.) The oath terminated the right of the plaintiff to an action, being looked on as a sort of compromise by which the action was settled; jusjurandum speciem

Quasi credendi causa, i.e. had made the defendant promise to pay a sum, as if he, the plaintiff, were going to lend the sum to the defendant.

It will be remembered that, in this exception, the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, instead of, as in other exceptions, on the defendant, and then it must be pleaded within originally one year and then five years, a term reduced by Justinian to two years. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 21.)

3. Præterea debitor si pactus fuerit cum creditore, ne a se peteretur, nihilo minus obligatus manet, quia pacto convento obligationes non omnimodo dissolvuntur: qua de causa efficax est adversus eum actio, qua actor intendit 'si paret eum dare oportere.' Sed quia iniquum est contra pactionem eum damnari, defenditur per exceptionem pacti conventi.

3. Again, the debtor who has agreed with his creditor that payment shall not be demanded from him, still remains bound. For an agreement is not a mode by which obligations are always dissolved. This action, therefore, in which the intentio runs, 'If it appears that he ought to give,' may be validly brought against him; but as it would be unjust that he should be condemned in contravention of the agreement, he may use in his defence the exception pacti conventi.

GAI. iv. 116.

Obligations formed re or verbis could not be dissolved by a simple pact. As the contract was a subsisting one, an exception was necessary. The exception pacti conventi ran thus: Si inter Aulum Agerium et Numerium Negidium non convenit, ne ea pecunia peteretur. (GAI. iv. 119.)

4. Æque si debitor deferente creditore juraverit, nihil se dare oportere, adhuc obligatus permanet; sed quia iniquum est, de perjurio quæri, defenditur per exceptionem jurisjurandi. In his quoque actionibus, quibus in rem agitur, æque necessariae sunt exceptiones: veluti si petitore deferente possessor juraverit, eam rem suam esse, et nihilo minus eandem rem petitor vindicet: licet enim verum sit, quod intendit, id est rem ejus esse, iniquum est tamen, possessorem condemnari.

4. So, too, if the debtor, when the creditor challenges him to swear, affirms on oath that he ought not to give anything, he still remains bound. But as it would be unjust to examine whether he has perjured himself, he is allowed to defend himself with the exception jurisjurandi. In actions in rem, these exceptions are equally necessary: for instance, if the possessor, on being challenged by the claimant, swears that the property is his, and yet the plaintiff still persists in his real action. For the claim of the plaintiff might be well founded, and yet it would be unjust to condemn the possessor.

D. xii. 2. 9. pr. and 1; D. xii. 2. 3. 1; D. xii. 2. 11. 1.

The exceptio jurisjurandi was only necessary when the question whether the defendant had accepted the oath when offered him was disputed. If it was acknowledged, the prætor would not give an action at all. (D. xii. 2. 3. pr.) The oath terminated the right of the plaintiff to an action, being looked on as a sort of compromise by which the action was settled; jusjurandum speciem

transactionis continet, majoremque habet auctoritatem quam res judicata. (D. xii. 2. 2.)

5. Item si iudicio tecum actum fuerit sive in rem sive in personam, nihilo minus ob id actio durat et ideo ipso jure postea de eadem re adversus te agi potest: sed debes per exceptionem rei judicatæ adjuvari.

5. Again, if an action real or personal has been brought against you, not the less because it has been so brought does the action endure, and, in strict law, an action might still be brought against you for the same object, but you are to be protected by the exception rei judicatæ.

GAI. iv. 106, 107.

Under the system of the actions of law, if a cause had once been decided, no further action could again be brought on the same grounds (GAI. iv. 108); but this was not the case under the prætorian system. To understand the effect of a previous action having been brought under the prætorian system, we must notice the distinction drawn by Gaius in his Fourth Book between judicia legitima and judicia imperio continentia (iv. 103-109). Judicia legitima, i.e. proceedings founded on the old jus civile, were those in an action given in the city of Rome, or within the first milestone round the city, between Roman citizens, and tried by a single judge. Judicia imperio continentia, i.e. proceedings measured by the authority of the prætor, were those in an action given out of Rome, or tried by recuperatores, or by a single judge, if the judge or one or both parties was a peregrinus, or were peregrini. Judicia imperio continentia were only in full force during the time of office of the magistrate who gave the formula, and therefore the plaintiff who subsequently brought an action for the second time had to be met with an exception. With respect to judicia legitima, a further distinction is to be made. If they were in rem or in factum, the nature of these actions prevented the litis contestatio in their case operating in the way of a novation (see Book iii. Tit. 29. 3, note); and therefore, if a fresh action was brought, the defendant had to repel it by the exception rei judicatæ. Accordingly we may say, in brief, that under the prætorian system none but judicia legitima in personam, having an intentio juris civilis, extinguished the right of action, and therefore in all other cases an exception was necessary.

In the time of Justinian these distinctions had disappeared, and therefore he says generally that the res judicata produces an exception. It was to have the same force as it had formerly had in the case of judicia imperio continentia, and not that it had received in judicia legitima. Whether the action was real or personal, as the text informs us, the action still subsisted, and, no novation having taken place, a second action could only be repelled by an exception. But, practically speaking, under the system of judicia extraordinaria, as the judge did not receive instructions from a magistrate, and was not bound within the limits of a for-

transactionis continet, majoremque habet auctoritatem quam res judicata. (D. xii. 2. 2.)

5. Item si iudicio tecum actum fuerit sive in rem sive in personam, nihilo minus ob id actio durat et ideo ipso jure postea de eadem re adversus te agi potest: sed debes per exceptionem rei judicatæ adjuvari.

5. Again, if an action real or personal has been brought against you, not the less because it has been so brought does the action endure, and, in strict law, an action might still be brought against you for the same object, but you are to be protected by the exception rei judicatæ.

GAI. iv. 106, 107.

Under the system of the actions of law, if a cause had once been decided, no further action could again be brought on the same grounds (GAI. iv. 108); but this was not the case under the prætorian system. To understand the effect of a previous action having been brought under the prætorian system, we must notice the distinction drawn by Gaius in his Fourth Book between judicia legitima and judicia imperio continentia (iv. 103-109). Judicia legitima, i.e. proceedings founded on the old jus civile, were those in an action given in the city of Rome, or within the first milestone round the city, between Roman citizens, and tried by a single judge. Judicia imperio continentia, i.e. proceedings measured by the authority of the prætor, were those in an action given out of Rome, or tried by recuperatores, or by a single judge, if the judge or one or both parties was a peregrinus, or were peregrini. Judicia imperio continentia were only in full force during the time of office of the magistrate who gave the formula, and therefore the plaintiff who subsequently brought an action for the second time had to be met with an exception. With respect to judicia legitima, a further distinction is to be made. If they were in rem or in factum, the nature of these actions prevented the litis contestatio in their case operating in the way of a novation (see Book iii. Tit. 29. 3, note); and therefore, if a fresh action was brought, the defendant had to repel it by the exception rei judicatæ. Accordingly we may say, in brief, that under the prætorian system none but judicia legitima in personam, having an intentio juris civilis, extinguished the right of action, and therefore in all other cases an exception was necessary.

In the time of Justinian these distinctions had disappeared, and therefore he says generally that the res judicata produces an exception. It was to have the same force as it had formerly had in the case of judicia imperio continentia, and not that it had received in judicia legitima. Whether the action was real or personal, as the text informs us, the action still subsisted, and, no novation having taken place, a second action could only be repelled by an exception. But, practically speaking, under the system of judicia extraordinaria, as the judge did not receive instructions from a magistrate, and was not bound within the limits of a formula, the distinction between the res judicata operating as a bar or as an exception was a very immaterial one.

In order that a res judicata should be available either as a bar or an exception, it was necessary that there should have been, in the former action, the same thing as the subject-matter of the litigation, the same quantity, the same right, the same ground of action, the same parties. Cum quaeritur haec exceptio noceat necne, inspiciendum est an idem corpus sit, quantitas eadem, idem jus: et an eadem causa petendi, et eadem conditio personarum—quae nisi omnia concurrunt, alia res est. (D. xlv. 2. 12-14.)

Gaius also mentions the exceptio rei in iudicium deductae, i.e. that the case was already before the tribunal, as where one of two promissors (duo rei promittendi) having been sued, the other if sued could say that the case was already in the way of adjudication, having reached the stage of the litis contestatio, and might be ended within the appointed time, i.e. within eighteen months if it was a iudicium legitimum, or within the duration of the power of the magistrate if it was imperio continens. See introductory note to Tit. 6. (GAI. iv. 106, 107.)

Litis contestatio. It may be convenient here to notice what was meant by the litis contestatio in the time of Justinian. Under the system of extraordinary procedure there was no longer that distinction of the proceedings which had obtained under the formulary system according as they were in jure (before the magistrate) or in iudicio (before the judge). The litis contestatio was, in the formulary system, the last step in the proceedings before the magistrate. When he appointed the judge, the rights of the parties were fixed as they were at that epoch. Under the system of extraordinary procedure the same magistrate heard the case throughout. (See Introd. sec. 105, 111.) The epoch, so precise under the formulary system, for fixing the rights had now no place. For many purposes, however, it was necessary that some epoch should be fixed; and the epoch chosen was when the magistrate began to take cognisance of the cause by having the case for the plaintiff stated before him (C. iii. 9); and the expression litis contestatio was borrowed to denote the consequences of this epoch having arrived. For example, if the action was for a farm, the condition of the farm (causa) was taken to be that in which the farm was at the moment when the judge began to take cognisance of the action. But in many respects the whole effects of the litis contestatio were prevented from operating. We have already had three examples: 1. In Bk. ii. Tit. 6. 13 (note) we have seen that usucapio was interrupted by an action, and that this interruption took place, in the time of Justinian, not when the stage of the judge taking cognisance of the cause was reached, but by the plaintiff commencing proceedings. 2. In Bk. iii. 26. 6 (note) we have seen that Justinian prevented the litis contestatio operating so as to place the fidejussor in a different position from that of the mandator. 3. In Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3 (note) we have seen that the system of extraordinary procedure was not a complete departure from the formulary system, but a modification of it, in which the magistrate was still the judge, and the judge was still the magistrate.

mula, the distinction between the res judicata operating as a bar or as an exception was a very immaterial one.

In order that a res judicata should be available either as a bar or an exception, it was necessary that there should have been, in the former action, the same thing as the subject-matter of the litigation, the same quantity, the same right, the same ground of action, the same parties. Cum quaeritur haec exceptio noceat necne, inspiciendum est an idem corpus sit, quantitas eadem, idem jus: et an eadem causa petendi, et eadem conditio personarum—quae nisi omnia concurrunt, alia res est. (D. xlv. 2. 12-14.)

Gaius also mentions the exceptio rei in iudicium deductae, i.e. that the case was already before the tribunal, as where one of two promissors (duo rei promittendi) having been sued, the other if sued could say that the case was already in the way of adjudication, having reached the stage of the litis contestatio, and might be ended within the appointed time, i.e. within eighteen months if it was a iudicium legitimum, or within the duration of the power of the magistrate if it was imperio continens. See introductory note to Tit. 6. (GAI. iv. 106, 107.)

Litis contestatio. It may be convenient here to notice what was meant by the litis contestatio in the time of Justinian. Under the system of extraordinary procedure there was no longer that distinction of the proceedings which had obtained under the formulary system according as they were in jure (before the magistrate) or in iudicio (before the judge). The litis contestatio was, in the formulary system, the last step in the proceedings before the magistrate. When he appointed the judge, the rights of the parties were fixed as they were at that epoch. Under the system of extraordinary procedure the same magistrate heard the case throughout. (See Introd. sec. 105, 111.) The epoch, so precise under the formulary system, for fixing the rights had now no place. For many purposes, however, it was necessary that some epoch should be fixed; and the epoch chosen was when the magistrate began to take cognisance of the cause by having the case for the plaintiff stated before him (C. iii. 9); and the expression litis contestatio was borrowed to denote the consequences of this epoch having arrived. For example, if the action was for a farm, the condition of the farm (causa) was taken to be that in which the farm was at the moment when the judge began to take cognisance of the action. But in many respects the whole effects of the litis contestatio were prevented from operating. We have already had three examples: 1. In Bk. ii. Tit. 6. 13 (note) we have seen that usucapio was interrupted by an action, and that this interruption took place, in the time of Justinian, not when the stage of the judge taking cognisance of the cause was reached, but by the plaintiff commencing proceedings. 2. In Bk. iii. 26. 6 (note) we have seen that Justinian prevented the litis contestatio operating so as to place the fidejussor in a different position from that of the mandator. 3. In Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3 (note) we have seen that the system of extraordinary procedure, upon a magistrate who appointed a judge, by which the litis contestatio had, under the formulary system, the effect of extinguishing obligations giving rise to judicia legitima in personam; but this was not the case under Justinian, and therefore, in discussing novation (Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3), all reference to the extinction of obligations is omitted, and in the text we have the general rule laid down that the action endures, and must be repelled by an exception if again brought.

6. Hæc exempli causa rettulisse sufficiet. Alioquin quam ex multis variisque causis exceptiones necessariæ sint, ex latioribus digestorum seu pandectarum libris intellegi potest.

7. Quarum quædam ex legibus vel ex his, quæ legis vicem obtinent, vel ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione substantiam capiunt.

6. The above examples of exceptions may suffice. It may be seen in the larger work of the Digest or Pandects how numerous and how different are the causes which make exceptions necessary.

7. Some of these exceptions are derived from laws, and from other enactments having the force of law, or from the jurisdiction of the prætor.

GAI. iv. 118.

Ex legibus; such as the exception nisi bonis cesserit (see Tit. 14. 4), relative to the cession of the debtor's goods, under the lex Julia.

Ex his quæ legis vicem obtinent, i.e. senatusconsulta and constitutions. The exception under the rescript of Hadrian, permitting the employment of an exception doli mali when a plaintiff neglected to notice a counter-claim (see Tit. 6. 39), may serve as an example.

8. Appellantur autem exceptiones aliæ perpetuæ et peremptoriæ, aliæ temporales et dilatoriæ.

8. Exceptions, again, may be classed as either perpetual and peremptory, or temporary and dilatory.

D. xlv. 1. 3; GAI. iv. 120.

The duration according to which exceptions are said to be perpetuæ or temporales, is the length of time in which they can be used by the defendant if he has occasion, not the length of time during which their effect continues if they are employed.

All exceptiones perpetuæ were necessarily peremptoriæ; if found to be justified by the facts, they set the matter in litigation at rest for ever. All exceptiones temporales were necessarily dilatoriæ; they did but defer the decision of the matter in question till the expiration of a certain time.

9. Perpetuæ et peremptoriæ sunt, quæ semper agentibus obstant et semper rem, de qua agitur, peremunt: qualis est exceptio doli mali et quod metus causa factum est et pacti conventi, cum ita convenerit, ne omnino pecunia peteretur.

9. Those are perpetual and peremptory which always present an obstacle to the demand, and cut away for ever the ground on which it is brought; as, for instance, the exception doli mali, that metus causa, and that pacti conventi, when it has been agreed that no demand for the money shall ever be made.

D. xlv. 1. 3; GAI. iv. 121.

litis contestatio had, under the formulary system, the effect of extinguishing obligations giving rise to judicia legitima in personam; but this was not the case under Justinian, and therefore, in discussing novation (Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3), all reference to the extinction of obligations is omitted, and in the text we have the general rule laid down that the action endures, and must be repelled by an exception if again brought.

6. Hæc exempli causa rettulisse sufficiet. Alioquin quam ex multis variisque causis exceptiones necessariae sint, ex latioribus digestorum seu pandectarum libris intellegi potest.

7. Quarum quædam ex legibus vel ex his, quæ legis vicem obtinent, vel ex ipsius prætoris jurisdictione substantiam capiunt.

6. The above examples of exceptions may suffice. It may be seen in the larger work of the Digest or Pandects how numerous and how different are the causes which make exceptions necessary.

7. Some of these exceptions are derived from laws, and from other enactments having the force of law, or from the jurisdiction of the prætor.

GAI. iv. 118.

Ex legibus; such as the exception nisi bonis cesserit (see Tit. 14. 4), relative to the cession of the debtor's goods, under the lex Julia.

Ex his quæ legis vicem obtinent, i.e. senatusconsulta and constitutions. The exception under the rescript of Hadrian, permitting the employment of an exception doli mali when a plaintiff neglected to notice a counter-claim (see Tit. 6. 39), may serve as an example.

8. Appellantur autem exceptiones aliæ perpetuæ et peremptoriæ, aliæ temporales et dilatoriæ.

8. Exceptions, again, may be classed as either perpetual and peremptory, or temporary and dilatory.

D. xlv. 1. 3; GAI. iv. 120.

The duration according to which exceptions are said to be perpetuæ or temporales, is the length of time in which they can be used by the defendant if he has occasion, not the length of time during which their effect continues if they are employed.

All exceptiones perpetuæ were necessarily peremptoriæ; if found to be justified by the facts, they set the matter in litigation at rest for ever. All exceptiones temporales were necessarily dilatoriæ; they did but defer the decision of the matter in question till the expiration of a certain time.

9. Perpetuæ et peremptoriæ sunt, quæ semper agentibus obstant et semper rem, de qua agitur, peremunt: qualis est exceptio doli mali et quod metus causa factum est et pacti conventi, cum ita convenerit, ne omnino pecunia peteretur.

9. Those are perpetual and peremptory which always present an obstacle to the demand, and cut away for ever the ground on which it is brought; as, for instance, the exception doli mali, that metus causa, and that pacti conventi, when it has been agreed that no demand for the money shall ever be made.

D. xlv. 1. 3; GAI. iv. 121.

An act might be used for ever as an exception; and yet if an action was brought grounded on it, that action might possibly have to be brought within a certain time. For instance, if fraud or violence had been used in the making of a contract, the exception would be good whenever an action was brought on the contract; but the person injured could only bring an actio doli or metus causa within a limited time. Hence it came to be said that such things were temporalia ad agendum, perpetua ad excipiendum. (See D. xlv. 4. 5. 6.)

10. Temporalia atque dilatoria sunt, quæ ad tempus nocent et temporis dilationem tribuunt: qualis est pacti conventi, cum convenerit, ne intra certum tempus ageretur, veluti intra quinquennium. Nam finito eo tempore non impeditur actor rem exsequi. Ergo hi, quibus intra tempus agere volentibus objicitur exceptio aut pacti conventi aut alia similis, differre debent actionem et post tempus agere: ideo enim et dilatoriæ istæ exceptiones appellantur. Alioquin, si intra tempus egerint objectaque sit exceptio, neque eo iudicio quidquam consequerentur propter exceptionem nec post tempus olim agere poterant, cum temere rem in iudicium deducebant et consumebant, qua ratione rem amittebant. Hodie autem non ita stricte hæc procedere volumus, sed eum, qui ante tempus pactionis vel obligationis litem inferre ausus est, Zenonianæ constitutioni subiacere censemus, quam sacratissimus legislator de his, qui tempore plus petierunt, protulit, ut et inducias, quas, sive ipse actor sponte indulserit vel natura actionis continet, contempserat, in duplum habeant hi, qui talem injuriam passi sunt, et post eas finitas non aliter litem suscipiant, nisi omnes expensas litis antea acceperint, ut actores, tali poena perterriti, tempora litium doceantur observare.

10. Those are temporary and dilatory which present an obstacle for a certain time and procure delay. Such is the exception pacti conventi, when it has been agreed that no action shall be brought for a certain time, as, for instance, for five years; when once this period has elapsed, the plaintiff is not prevented from demanding the thing. Those, therefore, who seek to bring the action before the expiration of the time, and are repelled by the exception pacti conventi, or any similar one, ought to put it off and to bring it after the time has elapsed; hence these exceptions are termed dilatory. If plaintiffs have brought the action before the expiration of the time, and been repelled by the exception, they will not gain anything by the action they bring, because of the exception; and, formerly, they would not have been able again to bring an action on the expiration of the time, because they had rashly brought their claim before a judge, and so used up their right to bring an action, and lost all they could claim. But at the present day we do not wish to proceed so rigorously; any one who shall venture to bring an action before the time fixed by the agreement or obligation shall be subject to the dispositions of the constitution of Zeno, published by that legislator of most pious memory with respect to those who, in regard to time, ask more than is due to them. Consequently, the delay which the plaintiff has disregarded, whether he himself has voluntarily accorded it, or whether it results from the nature of the action, shall be doubled for the benefit of those who have sustained such a wrong; and, even after the expiration of the time, these persons shall not be obliged to defend the action unless they have been first reimbursed for all the expenses of the former action, that a penalty so heavy may teach plaintiffs

An act might be used for ever as an exception; and yet if an action was brought grounded on it, that action might possibly have to be brought within a certain time. For instance, if fraud or violence had been used in the making of a contract, the exception would be good whenever an action was brought on the contract; but the person injured could only bring an actio doli or metus causa within a limited time. Hence it came to be said that such things were temporalia ad agendum, perpetua ad excipiendum. (See D. xlv. 4. 5. 6.)

10. Temporales atque dilatoriae sunt, quae ad tempus nocent et temporis dilationem tribuunt: qualis est pacti conventi, cum convenerit, ne intra certum tempus ageretur, veluti intra quinquennium. Nam finito eo tempore non impeditur actor rem exsequi. Ergo hi, quibus intra tempus agere volentibus objicitur exceptio aut pacti conventi aut alia similis, differre debent actionem et post tempus agere: ideo enim et dilatoriae istae exceptiones appellantur. Alioquin, si intra tempus egerint objectaque sit exceptio, neque eo iudicio quidquam consequerentur propter exceptionem nec post tempus olim agere poterant, cum temere rem in iudicium deducebant et consumeabant, qua ratione rem amittebant. Hodie autem non ita stricte haec procedere volumus, sed eum, qui ante tempus pactionis vel obligationis litem inferre ausus est, Zenonianae constitutioni subjacere censemus, quam sacratissimus legislator de his, qui tempore plus petierunt, protulit, ut et inducias, quas, sive ipse actor sponte indulerit vel natura actionis continet, contempserat, in duplum habeant hi, qui talem injuriam passi sunt, et post eas finitas non aliter litem suscipiant, nisi omnes expensas litis antea acceperint, ut actores, tali poena perterriti, tempora litium doceantur observare.

10. Those are temporary and dilatory which present an obstacle for a certain time and procure delay. Such is the exception pacti conventi, when it has been agreed that no action shall be brought for a certain time, as, for instance, for five years; when once this period has elapsed, the plaintiff is not prevented from demanding the thing. Those, therefore, who seek to bring the action before the expiration of the time, and are repelled by the exception pacti conventi, or any similar one, ought to put it off and to bring it after the time has elapsed; hence these exceptions are termed dilatory. If plaintiffs have brought the action before the expiration of the time, and been repelled by the exception, they will not gain anything by the action they bring, because of the exception; and, formerly, they would not have been able again to bring an action on the expiration of the time, because they had rashly brought their claim before a judge, and so used up their right to bring an action, and lost all they could claim. But at the present day we do not wish to proceed so rigorously; any one who shall venture to bring an action before the time fixed by the agreement or obligation shall be subject to the dispositions of the constitution of Zeno, published by that legislator of most pious memory with respect to those who, in regard to time, ask more than is due to them. Consequently, the delay which the plaintiff has disregarded, whether he himself has voluntarily accorded it, or whether it results from the nature of the action, shall be doubled for the benefit of those who have sustained such a wrong; and, even after the expiration of the time, these persons shall not be obliged to defend the action unless they have been first reimbursed for all the expenses of the former action, that a penalty so heavy may teach plaintiffs to have due regard to the delays that are to elapse before actions are brought.

GAI. iv. 122, 123; C. iii. 10. 1.

Alia similis. Gaius gives, as an instance, the exceptio litis dividuæ, given to repel a plaintiff who broke up into two actions his remedy for a single thing, and sued within the same prætorship for the part he did not include in his first action. Gaius, in the Digest, defines dilatory exceptions as those quæ non semper locum habent, sed evitari possunt. (D. xlv. 1. 3.)

Zenonianæ constitutioni. See Tit. 6. 33.

11. Præterea etiam ex persona dilatoriæ sunt exceptiones: quales sunt procuratoriæ, veluti si per militem aut mulierem agere quis velit: nam militibus nec pro patre vel matre vel uxore nec ex sacro rescripto procuratorio nomine experiri conceditur: suis vero negotiis superesse sine offensa disciplinæ possunt. Eas vero exceptiones, quæ olim procuratoribus propter infamiam vel dantis vel ipsius procuratoris opponerantur, cum in iudiciis frequentari nullo perspeximus modo, conquiescere sancimus, ne, dum de his altercatur, ipsius negotii disceptatio proteletur.

11. There are also dilatory exceptions by reason of the person; such are those objecting to a procurator; as, for instance, if a plaintiff wishes to have his cause conducted by a soldier or woman, for soldiers cannot be procurators even for their father, or mother, or wife, not even by virtue of an imperial rescript; but they may conduct their own affairs without any breach of discipline. As to the exceptions formerly opposed to procurators on account of the infamy either of the person appointing the procurator, or of the procurator himself, since we found that they were no longer used in practice, we have enacted that they shall be abolished, that no discussion as to their effect may prolong the course of the action itself.

D. xlv. 1. 3; C. ii. 13. 7, 9.

The exception to the procurator as an improper person only produced a delay; directly the plaintiff appointed a proper person as procurator, the action proceeded.

The infamia was that produced by being condemned in certain actions, as in the actio tutelæ, depositi, pro socio, &c.

After noticing exceptions, Gaius notices prescriptions, which originally had been limitations of the action inserted on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant. (Introd. sec. 104.) We have had an instance of the one inserted for the protection of the defendant in the prescriptio longi temporis (Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr. note); but by the time of Gaius all prescriptions on behalf of the defendant were ranked among exceptions. Prescriptions on behalf of the plaintiff still remained where it was to the interest of the plaintiff that not all his right, but only so much of it as had given rise to an existing liability, should be sued on, so that he might not be barred from suing when other liabilities came into existence. (GAI. iv. 130-137).

to have due regard to the delays that are to elapse before actions are brought.

GAI. iv. 122, 123; C. iii. 10. 1.

Alia similis. Gaius gives, as an instance, the exceptio litis dividuæ, given to repel a plaintiff who broke up into two actions his remedy for a single thing, and sued within the same prætorship for the part he did not include in his first action. Gaius, in the Digest, defines dilatory exceptions as those quæ non semper locum habent, sed evitari possunt. (D. xlv. 1. 3.)

Zenonianæ constitutioni. See Tit. 6. 33.

11. Præterea etiam ex persona dilatoriæ sunt exceptiones: quales sunt procuratoriæ, veluti si per militem aut mulierem agere quis velit: nam militibus nec pro patre vel matre vel uxore nec ex sacro rescripto procuratorio nomine experiri conceditur: suis vero negotiis superesse sine offensa disciplinæ possunt. Eas vero exceptiones, quæ olim procuratoribus propter infamiam vel dantis vel ipsius procuratoris opponebantur, cum in iudiciis frequentari nullo perspeximus modo, conquiescere sancimus, ne, dum de his altercatur, ipsius negotii disceptatio proteletur.

11. There are also dilatory exceptions by reason of the person; such are those objecting to a procurator; as, for instance, if a plaintiff wishes to have his cause conducted by a soldier or woman, for soldiers cannot be procurators even for their father, or mother, or wife, not even by virtue of an imperial rescript; but they may conduct their own affairs without any breach of discipline. As to the exceptions formerly opposed to procurators on account of the infamy either of the person appointing the procurator, or of the procurator himself, since we found that they were no longer used in practice, we have enacted that they shall be abolished, that no discussion as to their effect may prolong the course of the action itself.

D. xlv. 1. 3; C. ii. 13. 7, 9.

The exception to the procurator as an improper person only produced a delay; directly the plaintiff appointed a proper person as procurator, the action proceeded.

The infamia was that produced by being condemned in certain actions, as in the actio tutelæ, depositi, pro socio, &c.

After noticing exceptions, Gaius notices prescriptions, which originally had been limitations of the action inserted on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant. (Introd. sec. 104.) We have had an instance of the one inserted for the protection of the defendant in the prescriptio longi temporis (Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr. note); but by the time of Gaius all prescriptions on behalf of the defendant were ranked among exceptions. Prescriptions on behalf of the plaintiff still remained where it was to the interest of the plaintiff that not all his right, but only so much of it as had given rise to an existing liability, should be sued on, so that he might not be barred from suing when other liabilities came into existence. (GAI. iv. 130-137).

TIT. XIV. DE REPLICATIONIBUS.

Interdum evenit, ut exceptio, quæ prima facie justa videatur, inique noceat. Quod cum accidit, alia allegatione opus est adjuvandi actoris gratia, quæ replicatio vocatur, quia per eam replicatur atque resolvitur vis exceptionis. Veluti cum pactus est aliquis cum debitore suo, ne ab eo pecuniam petat, deinde postea in contrarium pacti sunt, id est ut petere creditori liceat: si agat creditor et excipiat debitor, ut ita demum condemnnetur, si non convenierit, ne eam pecuniam creditor petat, nocet ei exceptio; convenit enim ita, etiamque nihilo minus hoc verum manet, licet postea in contrarium pacti sunt. Sed quia iniquum est, creditorem excludi, replicatio ei dabitur ex posteriore pacto convento.

Sometimes an exception which at first sight seems just, is really unjust. In this case, to place the plaintiff in a right position, it is necessary there should be another allegation, termed a replication, because it unfolds and resolves the right given by the exception. For example, supposing a creditor has agreed with a debtor not to demand payment, and then makes an agreement to the contrary; that is, that he may demand payment; if, when the creditor brings his action, the debtor uses the exception, alleging that he ought only to be condemned if his creditor is not under an agreement not to demand payment, this exception presents an obstacle to the creditor. For so it was agreed, and it still remains true that this agreement was made, although a contrary agreement was afterwards made. But as it would be unjust to deprive the creditor of his remedy, he will be permitted to use a replication founded on the subsequent agreement.

GAL. iv. 126.

All that has been said on the use and nature of exceptions is applicable to replications, which are but exceptions to an exception. (D. xlv. 1. 22. 1.)

It is to be remarked that there could not be an exceptio doli mali to an exceptio doli mali. If the plaintiff had been guilty of fraud, it could not strengthen his right of action that the defendant had also been guilty. (D. xlv. 4. 4. 13.)

1. Rursus interdum evenit, ut replicatio, quæ prima facie justa sit, inique noceat. Quod cum accidit, alia allegatione opus est adjuvandi rei gratia, quæ duplicatio vocatur.

1. The replication, in its turn, may, at first sight, seem just, and yet be really unjust. In this case, to aid the defendant, it is necessary there should be a further allegation, termed a duplicatio.

GAL. iv. 127.

2. Et si rursus ea prima facie justa videatur, sed propter aliquam causam inique actori noceat, rursus allegatione alia opus est, qua actor adjuvetur, quæ dicitur triplicatio.

2. And if, again, the duplicatio may seem just, but is for some reason really unjust to the plaintiff, there is wanted, to aid the plaintiff, a still further allegation, termed a triplicatio.

GAL. iv. 128.

3. Quarum omnium exceptionum usum interdum ulterius quam diximus, varietas negotiorum intro-

3. The great diversity of affairs has made it requisite to carry still further than we have mentioned the use of

TIT. XIV. DE REPLICATIONIBUS.

Interdum evenit, ut exceptio, quæ prima facie justa videatur, inique noceat. Quod cum accidit, alia allegatione opus est adjuvandi actoris gratia, quæ replicatio vocatur, quia per eam replicatur atque resolvitur vis exceptionis. Veluti cum pactus est aliquis cum debitore suo, ne ab eo pecuniam petat, deinde postea in contrarium pacti sunt, id est ut petere creditori liceat: si agat creditor et excipiat debitor, ut ita demum condemnnetur, si non convenierit, ne eam pecuniam creditor petat, nocet ei exceptio; convenit enim ita, etiamque nihilo minus hoc verum manet, licet postea in contrarium pacti sunt. Sed quia iniquum est, creditorem excludi, replicatio ei dabitur ex posteriore pacto convento.

Sometimes an exception which at first sight seems just, is really unjust. In this case, to place the plaintiff in a right position, it is necessary there should be another allegation, termed a replication, because it unfolds and resolves the right given by the exception. For example, supposing a creditor has agreed with a debtor not to demand payment, and then makes an agreement to the contrary; that is, that he may demand payment; if, when the creditor brings his action, the debtor uses the exception, alleging that he ought only to be condemned if his creditor is not under an agreement not to demand payment, this exception presents an obstacle to the creditor. For so it was agreed, and it still remains true that this agreement was made, although a contrary agreement was afterwards made. But as it would be unjust to deprive the creditor of his remedy, he will be permitted to use a replication founded on the subsequent agreement.

GAI. iv. 126.

All that has been said on the use and nature of exceptions is applicable to replications, which are but exceptions to an exception. (D. xlv. 1. 22. 1.)

It is to be remarked that there could not be an exceptio doli mali to an exceptio doli mali. If the plaintiff had been guilty of fraud, it could not strengthen his right of action that the defendant had also been guilty. (D. xlv. 4. 4. 13.)

1. Rursus interdum evenit, ut replicatio, quæ prima facie justa sit, inique noceat. Quod cum accidit, alia allegatione opus est adjuvandi rei gratia, quæ duplicatio vocatur.

1. The replication, in its turn, may, at first sight, seem just, and yet be really unjust. In this case, to aid the defendant, it is necessary there should be a further allegation, termed a duplicatio.

GAI. iv. 127.

2. Etsi rursus ea prima facie justa videatur, sed propter aliquam causam inique actori noceat, rursus allegatione alia opus est, qua actor adjuvetur, quæ dicitur triplicatio.

2. And if, again, the duplicatio may seem just, but is for some reason really unjust to the plaintiff, there is wanted, to aid the plaintiff, a still further allegation, termed a triplicatio.

GAI. iv. 128.

3. Quarum omnium exceptionum usum interdum ulterius quam diximus, varietas negotiorum intro-

3. The great diversity of affairs has made it requisite to carry still further than we have mentioned the use of ducit: quas omnes apertius ex latiore digestorum volumine facile est cognoscere.

these exceptions. A clearer knowledge of them all may be obtained by reading the fuller work of the Digest.

GAI. iv. 129.

4. Exceptiones autem, quibus debitor defenditur, plerumque accomodari solent etiam fidejussoribus ejus: et recte, quia, quod ab his petitur, id ab ipso debitore peti videtur, quia mandati judicio redditurus est eis, quod hi pro eo solverint. Qua ratione et si de non petenda pecunia pactus quis cum reo fuerit, placuit, proinde succurrendum esse per exceptionem pacti conventi illis quoque, qui pro eo obligati essent, ac si et cum ipsis pactus esset, ne ab eis ea pecunia peteretur. Sane quedam exceptiones non solent his accomodari. Ecce enim debitor si bonis suis cesserit et cum eo creditor experiatur, defenditur per exceptionem 'nisi bonis cesserit': sed hæc exceptio fidejussoribus non datur, scilicet ideo quia, qui alios pro debitore obligat, hoc maxime prospicit, ut, cum facultatibus lapsus fuerit debitor, possit ab his, quos pro eo obligavit, suum consequi.

4. The exceptions given for the protection of the debtor are also for the most part given in behalf of his fidejussores, and rightly so; for what is demanded from them is really demanded from the debtor, because by the actio mandati he will be forced to repay them what they have paid for him. Hence, if a creditor agrees with his debtor not to demand payment, the exception pacti conventi may be employed by those who are bound for him, exactly as if the agreement not to demand payment had been made with them personally. There are, however, some exceptions not allowed them; for instance, if the debtor has made a cession of his property, and the creditor sues him, he may protect himself by the exception nisi bonis cesserit; but this exception is not allowed to fidejussores. For in taking sureties for the payment of a debt, what the creditor principally looks to is recovering what is owed him from the sureties, in case of the insolvency of the principal.

D. xlv. 1. 19; D. ii. 14. 32.

Exceptions were divided into rei coherentes, which affected the right to claim, and personæ coherentes, which only protected the debtor himself. As an instance of an exceptio coherens rei may be given an exceptio doli mali, or a general pact not to sue. As an instance of an exceptio coherens personæ may be given that mentioned in the text, where the debtor was protected by having given up all his property, or a particular pact not to sue the debtor personally. Generally the fidejussors of the defendant could use the exceptions which he could have used; but this was not always, as the text points out, true of those personæ coherentes, as in the case of the exception nisi bonis cesserit.

TIT. XV. DE INTERDICTIS.

Sequitur, ut dispiciamus de interdictis seu actionibus, quæ pro his exerceantur. Erant autem interdicta formæ atque conceptiones verborum, quibus prætor aut jubebat aliquid fieri aut fieri prohibebat. Quod tum

We have now to treat of interdicts and the actions which supply their place. Interdicts were certain formulæ by which the prætor ordered or forbade something to be done; they were chiefly employed in disputes as ducit: quas omnes apertius ex latiore digestorum volumine facile est cognoscere.

these exceptions. A clearer knowledge of them all may be obtained by reading the fuller work of the Digest.

GAL. iv. 129.

4. Exceptiones autem, quibus debitor defenditur, plerumque accomodari solent etiam fidejussoribus ejus: et recte, quia, quod ab his petitur, id ab ipso debitore peti videtur, quia mandati judicio redditurus est eis, quod hi pro eo solverint. Qua ratione et si de non petenda pecunia pactus quis cum reo fuerit, placuit, proinde succurrendum esse per exceptionem pacti conventi illis quoque, qui pro eo obligati essent, ac si et cum ipsis pactus esset, ne ab eis ea pecunia peteretur. Sane quedam exceptiones non solent his accomodari. Ecce enim debitor si bonis suis cesserit et cum eo creditor experiatur, defenditur per exceptionem 'nisi bonis cesserit': sed hæc exceptio fidejussoribus non datur, scilicet ideo quia, qui alios pro debitore obligat, hoc maxime prospicit, ut, cum facultatibus lapsus fuerit debitor, possit ab his, quos pro eo obligavit, suum consequi.

4. The exceptions given for the protection of the debtor are also for the most part given in behalf of his fidejussores, and rightly so; for what is demanded from them is really demanded from the debtor, because by the actio mandati he will be forced to repay them what they have paid for him. Hence, if a creditor agrees with his debtor not to demand payment, the exception pacti conventi may be employed by those who are bound for him, exactly as if the agreement not to demand payment had been made with them personally. There are, however, some exceptions not allowed them; for instance, if the debtor has made a cession of his property, and the creditor sues him, he may protect himself by the exception nisi bonis cesserit; but this exception is not allowed to fidejussores. For in taking sureties for the payment of a debt, what the creditor principally looks to is recovering what is owed him from the sureties, in case of the insolvency of the principal.

D. xlv. 1. 19; D. ii. 14. 32.

Exceptions were divided into rei coherentes, which affected the right to claim, and personæ coherentes, which only protected the debtor himself. As an instance of an exceptio coherens rei may be given an exceptio doli mali, or a general pact not to sue. As an instance of an exceptio coherens personæ may be given that mentioned in the text, where the debtor was protected by having given up all his property, or a particular pact not to sue the debtor personally. Generally the fidejussors of the defendant could use the exceptions which he could have used; but this was not always, as the text points out, true of those personæ coherentes, as in the case of the exception nisi bonis cesserit.

TIT. XV. DE INTERDICTIS.

Sequitur, ut dispiciamus de interdictis seu actionibus, quæ pro his exercebantur. Erant autem interdicta formæ atque conceptiones verborum, quibus prætor aut jubebat aliquid fieri aut fieri prohibebat. Quod tum

We have now to treat of interdicts and the actions which supply their place. Interdicts were certain formulæ by which the prætor ordered or forbade something to be done; they were chiefly employed in disputes as maxime faciebat, cum de possessione to possession or quasi-possession.

aut quasi possessione inter aliquos
contendebatur.

GAI. iv. 138, 139.

An interdict was a decree or edict of the prætor made in a special case. The prætor published a general edict stating the leading principles on which he would act. But in certain cases he would make an edict applicable only to particular persons and particular things. Instead, for instance, of referring the party applying to him for relief to the general rule of law that one man should not be allowed to interfere with the watercourses of another, he made an edict that A should not interfere with the watercourses of B. According to the circumstances of the case such a command might be either positive or negative; and though, as is remarked in paragr. 1, the word interdictum was considered to apply more properly to a negative command only, it was, as a matter of usage, applied to all such special edicts indifferently; and Justinian seems to suppose that interdicere does not mean, as Gaius assumes, to forbid, but inter duos dicere, to decide between two parties. (See paragr. 1.)

If the person to whom the special edict was addressed obeyed its directions, no further proceedings were necessary; if he asserted that he had not done wrong, the prætor allowed an action to be brought grounded on the interdict. A sketch of the mode in which the proceedings grounded on an interdict were conducted will be found in the notes to paragr. 8.

There was always something of a public character in the reasons which induced the prætor to grant an interdict. He adopted it as a speedy and sure remedy in cases where danger was threatened to objects which public policy is especially interested to preserve uninjured, such as public roads and waters, burial-grounds, or sacred places; and though interdicts were granted where the quarrel was entirely between private parties, it was originally, perhaps, only when the subject of dispute was such as to render a breach of the public peace the probable result, unless the matter was set at rest by the summary interposition of legal authority. If, for instance, it was a possession or quasi-possession that was disputed, it might be feared that the claimant would adopt force to eject the actual occupier, that force would be met by force, and the public peace be broken; and the limitation of the time—one year—within which, as we shall see (paragr. 6, note), interdicts had in many cases to be applied for, seems to connect the acts giving rise to them with delicts. (POSTE, Gai. pp. 650, 651.) This public character attaching to interdicts may suggest that they were originally given to protect public, not private, interests. Niebuhr (Hist. Rom. vol. ii. 149, Eng. Trans.) and Savigny (Possess. Bk. iv. 44) think that in the private occupancy of the ager publicus may be seen an interest so little protected otherwise, and calling so precisely for some such aid as the interdict, that it can hardly be doubted that the early use of maxime faciebat, cum de possessione to possession or quasi-possession.

aut quasi possessione inter aliquos
contendebatur.

GAI. iv. 138, 139.

An interdict was a decree or edict of the prætor made in a special case. The prætor published a general edict stating the leading principles on which he would act. But in certain cases he would make an edict applicable only to particular persons and particular things. Instead, for instance, of referring the party applying to him for relief to the general rule of law that one man should not be allowed to interfere with the watercourses of another, he made an edict that A should not interfere with the watercourses of B. According to the circumstances of the case such a command might be either positive or negative; and though, as is remarked in paragr. 1, the word interdictum was considered to apply more properly to a negative command only, it was, as a matter of usage, applied to all such special edicts indifferently; and Justinian seems to suppose that interdicere does not mean, as Gaius assumes, to forbid, but inter duos dicere, to decide between two parties. (See paragr. 1.)

If the person to whom the special edict was addressed obeyed its directions, no further proceedings were necessary; if he asserted that he had not done wrong, the prætor allowed an action to be brought grounded on the interdict. A sketch of the mode in which the proceedings grounded on an interdict were conducted will be found in the notes to paragr. 8.

There was always something of a public character in the reasons which induced the prætor to grant an interdict. He adopted it as a speedy and sure remedy in cases where danger was threatened to objects which public policy is especially interested to preserve uninjured, such as public roads and waters, burial-grounds, or sacred places; and though interdicts were granted where the quarrel was entirely between private parties, it was originally, perhaps, only when the subject of dispute was such as to render a breach of the public peace the probable result, unless the matter was set at rest by the summary interposition of legal authority. If, for instance, it was a possession or quasi-possession that was disputed, it might be feared that the claimant would adopt force to eject the actual occupier, that force would be met by force, and the public peace be broken; and the limitation of the time—one year—within which, as we shall see (paragr. 6, note), interdicts had in many cases to be applied for, seems to connect the acts giving rise to them with delicts. (POSTE, Gai. pp. 650, 651.) This public character attaching to interdicts may suggest that they were originally given to protect public, not private, interests. Niebuhr (Hist. Rom. vol. ii. 149, Eng. Trans.) and Savigny (Possess. Bk. iv. 44) think that in the private occupancy of the ager publicus may be seen an interest so little protected otherwise, and calling so precisely for some such aid as the interdict, that it can hardly be doubted that the early use of interdicts was directed to meet the exigencies of this particular case. Anyhow, as the civil law did not deal with possession apart from ownership, a remedy became necessary when the prætors recognised possession, and, after the prætorian system was fully established, a character of settled law was imposed upon the mode of giving interdicts by the prætor announcing in his edict that he would grant a particular interdict under particular circumstances. Interdicts were given, as the text informs us, to protect not only the possession of corporeal things, but the quasi-possession of servitudes. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 3. 4 note.)

When the system of granting interdicts was fully formed, an interdict was ordinarily the mere prelude to an action, which was tried like any other action, and the process was not more summary than in other actions (see note on paragr. 8); and even before the introduction of the system of extraordinaria judicia, interdicts had become, probably, less frequently used, there being a tendency to go direct to the action grounded on them, and to do away with the interdict as a preliminary step. In the time of Justinian persons who under the prætorian system would have applied for an interdict, brought an action. (See paragr. 8.) In conducting this action, the magistrate would be greatly guided by the old law relating to interdicts; but otherwise the subject of interdicts was one with which the law of the Lower Empire had very little to do.

1. Summa autem divisio interdictorum hæc est, quod aut prohibitoria sunt aut restitutoria aut exhibitoria. Prohibitoria sunt, quibus vetat aliquid fieri, veluti vim sine vitio possidenti vel mortuum inferenti, quo ei jus erit inferendi, vel in loco sacro ædificari, vel in flumine publico ripave ejus aliquid fieri, quo pejus navigetur. Restitutoria sunt, quibus restitui aliquid jubet, veluti bonorum possessori possessionem eorum, quæ quis pro herede aut pro possessore possidet ex ea hereditate, aut cum jubet ei, qui vi possessione fundi dejectus sit, restitui possessionem. Exhibitoria sunt, per quæ jubet exhiberi, veluti eum, cujus de libertate agitur, aut libertum, cui patronus operas indicere velit, aut parenti liberos, qui in potestate ejus sunt. Sunt tamen qui putant, proprie interdicta ea vocari, quæ prohibitoria sunt, quia interdicere est denuntiare et prohibere: restitutoria autem et exhibitoria proprie decreta vocari: sed tamen optinuit, omnia interdicta appellari, quia inter duos dicuntur.

1. The principal division of interdicts is, that they are prohibitory, restitutory, or exhibitory. Prohibitory interdicts are those by which the prætor forbids something to be done, as, for example, to use force against a person in lawful possession, or against one who carries a dead body to a spot where he has a right to carry it, or to build on a sacred place, or to do anything in a public river, or on its bank, which may impede the navigation. Restitutory interdicts are those by which the prætor orders something to be restored, as, for instance, when he orders to be restored to the bonorum possessor the possession of the goods of an inheritance possessed by another as heir or as possessor, or when he orders the possession of land to be restored to the person who has been violently expelled from the possession of it. Exhibitory interdicts are those by which the prætor orders to exhibit; for instance, to exhibit the person whose freedom is being questioned, or the freedman to whom his patron wishes to notify the services due from him, or to exhibit to the father the children in his power. Some, howinterdicts was directed to meet the exigencies of this particular case. Anyhow, as the civil law did not deal with possession apart from ownership, a remedy became necessary when the prætors recognised possession, and, after the prætorian system was fully established, a character of settled law was imposed upon the mode of giving interdicts by the prætor announcing in his edict that he would grant a particular interdict under particular circumstances. Interdicts were given, as the text informs us, to protect not only the possession of corporeal things, but the quasi-possession of servitudes. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 3. 4 note.)

When the system of granting interdicts was fully formed, an interdict was ordinarily the mere prelude to an action, which was tried like any other action, and the process was not more summary than in other actions (see note on paragr. 8); and even before the introduction of the system of extraordinaria judicia, interdicts had become, probably, less frequently used, there being a tendency to go direct to the action grounded on them, and to do away with the interdict as a preliminary step. In the time of Justinian persons who under the prætorian system would have applied for an interdict, brought an action. (See paragr. 8.) In conducting this action, the magistrate would be greatly guided by the old law relating to interdicts; but otherwise the subject of interdicts was one with which the law of the Lower Empire had very little to do.

1. Summa autem divisio interdictorum hæc est, quod aut prohibitoria sunt aut restitutoria aut exhibitoria. Prohibitoria sunt, quibus vetat aliquid fieri, veluti vim sine vitio possidenti vel mortuum inferenti, quo ei jus erit inferendi, vel in loco sacro ædificari, vel in flumine publico ripave ejus aliquid fieri, quo pejus navigetur. Restitutoria sunt, quibus restitui aliquid jubet, veluti bonorum possessori possessionem eorum, quæ quis pro herede aut pro possessore possidet ex ea hereditate, aut cum jubet ei, qui vi possessione fundi dejectus sit, restitui possessionem. Exhibitoria sunt, per quæ jubet exhiberi, veluti eum, cujus de libertate agitur, aut libertum, cui patronus operas indicere velit, aut parenti liberos, qui in potestate ejus sunt. Sunt tamen qui putant, proprie interdicta ea vocari, quæ prohibitoria sunt, quia interdicere est denunciare et prohibere: restitutoria autem et exhibitoria proprie decreta vocari: sed tamen optinuit, omnia interdicta appellari, quia inter duos dicuntur.

1. The principal division of interdicts is, that they are prohibitory, restitutory, or exhibitory. Prohibitory interdicts are those by which the prætor forbids something to be done, as, for example, to use force against a person in lawful possession, or against one who carries a dead body to a spot where he has a right to carry it, or to build on a sacred place, or to do anything in a public river, or on its bank, which may impede the navigation. Restitutory interdicts are those by which the prætor orders something to be restored, as, for instance, when he orders to be restored to the bonorum possessor the possession of the goods of an inheritance possessed by another as heir or as possessor, or when he orders the possession of land to be restored to the person who has been violently expelled from the possession of it. Exhibitory interdicts are those by which the prætor orders to exhibit; for instance, to exhibit the person whose freedom is being questioned, or the freedman to whom his patron wishes to notify the services due from him, or to exhibit to the father the children in his power. Some, however, think that the term interdict ought, strictly speaking, to be applied to those which are prohibitory, because interdicere means 'to denounce, to prohibit,' while those that are restitutory or exhibitory ought to be called decreta. But usage has applied the word interdict to all alike, as they are all given between two parties.

GAI. iv. 139, 140, 142; D. xliii. 1. 1.

The formula of many of the interdicts most ordinarily in use is preserved to us in the Digest. It would take up too much space to give many of these at length. One or two examples of each kind must suffice.

The formula of the prohibitory interdict generally ended with the words veto or vim fieri veto. That forbidding nuisances in public ways ran thus:—

In via publica itinereve publico facere, immittere quid, quoea via idve iter deterius sit, fiat, veto. (D. xliii. 8. 2. 20.)

That forbidding interruption in the use of a burial-ground ran thus:—

Quo quare illi (the person protected) inferre invito te (the person against whom the interdict was granted) jus est, quominus illi eo eave mortuum inferre et ibi sepelire liceat, vim fieri veto. (D. xi. 8. 1. pr.) Other prohibitory interdicts may be found relating to sacred places (D. xliii. 6. 1. pr.), tombs (D. xi. 8. 1. 5), navigation (D. xliii. 12. 1. pr.).

Restitutory interdicts ran, for example, thus:—

Quod in flumine publico ripave ejus factum, sive quid in flumen ripamve ejus immisum habes, si ob id aliter aqua fluit atque uti priore estate fluxit, restituas. (D. xliii. 13. 11.)

Restituere is used in a very wide sense, as it includes not only, as in this example, putting back things into the state they were before, and giving back possession, but giving possession to a person who had not had possession.

Of exhibitory interdicts, which were ordinarily used as the preliminary of a vindication, we may take as a specimen that de libero homine exhibendo, granted to make any one who had a freeman in his custody produce him, and thus render it impossible that he should be illegally retained in his custody. It ran thus:—

Quem liberum dolo malo retines, exhibeas. (D. xliii. 29. 1. pr.)

2. Sequens divisio interdictorum hæc est, quod quædam adipiscendæ possessionis causa comparata sunt, quædam retinendæ, quædam recipiendæ.

2. The second division of interdicts is, that they are given some to acquire, some to retain, and others to recover possession.

GAI. iv. 143; D. xliii. 1. 2. 3.

As interdicts were mainly applied to questions of the possessory rights of private persons, those interdicts which distinctly ever, think that the term interdict ought, strictly speaking, to be applied to those which are prohibitory, because interdicere means 'to denounce, to prohibit,' while those that are restitutory or exhibitory ought to be called decreta. But usage has applied the word interdict to all alike, as they are all given between two parties.

GAI. iv. 139, 140, 142; D. xliii. 1. 1.

The formula of many of the interdicts most ordinarily in use is preserved to us in the Digest. It would take up too much space to give many of these at length. One or two examples of each kind must suffice.

The formula of the prohibitory interdict generally ended with the words veto or vim fieri veto. That forbidding nuisances in public ways ran thus:—

In via publica itinereve publico facere, immittere quid, quoea via idve iter deterius sit, fiat, veto. (D. xliii. 8. 2. 20.)

That forbidding interruption in the use of a burial-ground ran thus:—

Quo quare illi (the person protected) inferre invito te (the person against whom the interdict was granted) jus est, quominus illi eo eave mortuum inferre et ibi sepelire liceat, vim fieri veto. (D. xi. 8. 1. pr.) Other prohibitory interdicts may be found relating to sacred places (D. xliii. 6. 1. pr.), tombs (D. xi. 8. 1. 5), navigation (D. xliii. 12. 1. pr.).

Restitutory interdicts ran, for example, thus:—

Quod in flumine publico ripave ejus factum, sive quid in flumen ripamve ejus immisum habes, si ob id aliter aqua fluit atque uti priore estate fluxit, restituas. (D. xliii. 13. 11.)

Restituere is used in a very wide sense, as it includes not only, as in this example, putting back things into the state they were before, and giving back possession, but giving possession to a person who had not had possession.

Of exhibitory interdicts, which were ordinarily used as the preliminary of a vindication, we may take as a specimen that de libero homine exhibendo, granted to make any one who had a freeman in his custody produce him, and thus render it impossible that he should be illegally retained in his custody. It ran thus:—

Quem liberum dolo malo retines, exhibeas. (D. xliii. 29. 1. pr.)

2. Sequens divisio interdictorum hæc est, quod quædam adipiscendæ possessionis causa comparata sunt, quædam retinendæ, quædam recipiendæ.

2. The second division of interdicts is, that they are given some to acquire, some to retain, and others to recover possession.

GAI. iv. 143; D. xliii. 1. 2. 3.

As interdicts were mainly applied to questions of the possessory rights of private persons, those interdicts which distinctly referred to such possession are here classed together. But they fall under the heads of the first division. Interdicts retinendæ possessionis were prohibitory; interdicts adipiscendæ or reciperandæ possessionis were restitutory.

3. Adipiscendæ possessionis causa interdictum accommodatur bonorum possessori, quod appellatur 'quorum bonorum,' ejusque vis et potestas hæc est, ut, quod ex his bonis quisque, quorum possessio alicui data est, pro herede aut pro possessore possideat, id ei, cui bonorum possessio data est, restituere debeat. Pro herede autem possidere videtur, qui putat se heredem esse: pro possessore is possidet, qui nullo jure rem hereditariam vel etiam totam hereditatem sciens, ad se non pertinere, possidet. Ideo autem adipiscendæ possessionis vocatur interdictum, quia ei tantum utile est, qui nunc primum conatur adipisci rei possessionem: itaque si quis adeptus possessionem amiserit eam, hoc interdictum ei inutile est. Interdictum quoque, quod appellatur Salvianum, adipiscendæ possessionis causa comparatum est eoque utitur dominus fundi de rebus coloni, quas is pro mercedibus fundi pignori futuras pepigisset.

3. To acquire possession an interdict is given to the bonorum possessor, termed Quorum bonorum, of which the effect is to compel the person possessing, as heir or possessor, any of the goods of which the possession is given to another, to make restitution to that person as the bonorum possessor. A person is said to possess as heir, who thinks himself to be heir, and as possessor, who, without any right, and knowing that it does not belong to him, possesses a part or the whole of an inheritance. It is said of this interdict, that it is given to acquire possession, because it is only available for a person who wishes to gain, for the first time, possession of a thing. If, then, a person who has gained possession loses it, he cannot avail himself of this interdict. There is, too, another interdict given to acquire possession, viz. the interdictum Salvianum, to which an owner of land has recourse to enforce his right over the things belonging to the farmer, which the farmer has pledged as a security for his rent.

GAI. iv. 144, 147.

The interdict Quorum bonorum ran thus:—

Quorum bonorum ex edicto meo illi possessio data est, quod de his bonis pro herede aut pro possessore possides, possideresce si nihil usucaptum esset, quod quidem dolo malo fecisti ut desineres possidere, id illi restituas. (D. xliii. 2. 1. pr.) Although the interdict was only given when the bonorum possessor had never before had possession, yet it was restitutory, a term used very widely, as has been observed in the note to paragr. 1, and the word restituas appears in its terms. Restituas, therefore, must be used as meaning 'to give up,' not 'to give back.'

The use of this interdict, which could be brought only with respect to the inheritance as a universitas, not with respect to the particular things composing it (D. xliii. 2. 1. 1), was to secure the possession to those whom the prætor treated as having a right to the inheritance, but who had not a right recognised by the civil law. Not being heirs, properly so called, they could not bring a real action for the inheritance. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 9. pr.) It will be observed from the formula that the interdict might be used against the person possessing pro herede or pro possessore, although the time of usucapion had run in his favour, and against such referred to such possession are here classed together. But they fall under the heads of the first division. Interdicts retinendæ possessionis were prohibitory; interdicts adipiscendæ or reciperandæ possessionis were restitutory.

3. Adipiscendæ possessionis causa interdictum accommodatur bonorum possessori, quod appellatur 'quorum bonorum,' ejusque vis et potestas hæc est, ut, quod ex his bonis quisque, quorum possessio alicui data est, pro herede aut pro possessore possideat, id ei, cui bonorum possessio data est, restituere debeat. Pro herede autem possidere videtur, qui putat se heredem esse: pro possessore is possidet, qui nullo jure rem hereditariam vel etiam totam hereditatem sciens, ad se non pertinere, possidet. Ideo autem adipiscendæ possessionis vocatur interdictum, quia ei tantum utile est, qui nunc primum conatur adipisci rei possessionem: itaque si quis adeptus possessionem amiserit eam, hoc interdictum ei inutile est. Interdictum quoque, quod appellatur Salvianum, adipiscendæ possessionis causa comparatum est eoque utitur dominus fundi de rebus coloni, quas is pro mercedibus fundi pignori futuras pepigisset.

3. To acquire possession an interdict is given to the bonorum possessor, termed Quorum bonorum, of which the effect is to compel the person possessing, as heir or possessor, any of the goods of which the possession is given to another, to make restitution to that person as the bonorum possessor. A person is said to possess as heir, who thinks himself to be heir, and as possessor, who, without any right, and knowing that it does not belong to him, possesses a part or the whole of an inheritance. It is said of this interdict, that it is given to acquire possession, because it is only available for a person who wishes to gain, for the first time, possession of a thing. If, then, a person who has gained possession loses it, he cannot avail himself of this interdict. There is, too, another interdict given to acquire possession, viz. the interdictum Salvianum, to which an owner of land has recourse to enforce his right over the things belonging to the farmer, which the farmer has pledged as a security for his rent.

GAI. iv. 144, 147.

The interdict Quorum bonorum ran thus:—

Quorum bonorum ex edicto meo illi possessio data est, quod de his bonis pro herede aut pro possessore possides, possideresve si nihil usucaptum esset, quod quidem dolo malo fecisti ut desineres possidere, id illi restituas. (D. xliii. 2. 1. pr.) Although the interdict was only given when the bonorum possessor had never before had possession, yet it was restitutory, a term used very widely, as has been observed in the note to paragr. 1, and the word restituas appears in its terms. Restituas, therefore, must be used as meaning 'to give up,' not 'to give back.'

The use of this interdict, which could be brought only with respect to the inheritance as a universitas, not with respect to the particular things composing it (D. xliii. 2. 1. 1), was to secure the possession to those whom the prætor treated as having a right to the inheritance, but who had not a right recognised by the civil law. Not being heirs, properly so called, they could not bring a real action for the inheritance. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 9. pr.) It will be observed from the formula that the interdict might be used against the person possessing pro herede or pro possessore, although the time of usucapion had run in his favour, and against such a person, if, having possessed, he had, through dolus malus on his part, ceased to possess. The person possessing pro possessore, i.e. without any allegation of title, is sometimes spoken of as prædo. (See Tit. 6. 28, note.)

We must not confound the interdictum Salvianum with the actio Serviana (see Tit. 6. 7), but it was probably only a step to that action, and may have fallen into disuse when the actio Serviana was established as a means of redress for the creditor. The interdictum Salvianum was not given to every mortgage creditor, but only to the owner of a rural estate, as a means of getting possession of the goods of the occupier of the estate which had been pledged for the rent. Probably the interdict was granted even if the goods had passed into the hands of a third party. (D. xliii. 33. 1; but see C. viii. 9. 1.) Gaius mentions two other interdicts coming under this head, one given to bonorum emptores, and one to sectores, or purchasers of public goods (iv. 145, 146).

4. Retinendæ possessionis causa comparata sunt interdicta 'uti possidetis' et 'utrubi,' cum ab utraque parte de proprietate alicujus rei controversia sit et ante quæritur, uter ex litigatoribus possidere et uter petere debeat. Namque nisi ante exploratum fuerit, utrius eorum possessio sit, non potest petitoria actio institui, quia et civilis et naturalis ratio facit, ut alius possideat, alius a possidente petat. Et quia longe commodius est possidere potius quam petere, ideo plerumque et fere semper ingens existit contentio de ipsa possessione. Commodum autem possidendi in eo est, quod, etiamsi ejus res non sit, qui possidet, si modo actor non potuerit suam esse probare, remanet suo loco possessio: propter quam causam, cum obscura sint utriusque jura, contra petito rem judicari solet. Sed interdicto quidem 'uti possidetis' de fundi vel ædium possessione contenditur, 'utrubi' vero interdicto de rerum mobilium possessione. Quorum vis et potestas plurimam inter se differentiam apud veteres habebat: nam 'uti possidetis' interdicto is vincebat, qui interdicti tempore possidebat, si modo nec vi nec clam nec precario nactus fuerat ab adversario possessionem, etiamsi alium vi expulerat aut clam abriperat alienam possessionem aut precario rogaverat aliquem, ut sibi possidere liceret: 'utrubi' vero interdicto is vincebat, qui majore parte ejus anni nec vi nec clam nec precario ab adversario

4. To retain possession there are given the interdicts uti possidetis and utrubi, when in a dispute as to the ownership of a thing, the question first arises, which of the parties ought to be possessor and which plaintiff. For, unless it is first determined to which the possession belongs, it is impossible to shape the real action, as law and reason both require that one party should possess, and the other bring his claim against him. And as it is much more advantageous to possess than to claim the thing, there is generally a keen dispute as to the possession itself. The advantage of possession consists in this, that even if the thing does not really belong to the possessor, yet, if the plaintiff does not prove himself to be the owner, the possessor still remains in possession, and, therefore, when the rights of the parties are doubtful, it is customary to decide against the claimant. The interdict uti possidetis applies to the possession of land and buildings, the interdict utrubi to that of moveables. There were formerly great differences in their effects; for in the interdict uti possidetis he prevailed who was in possession at the time of the interdict, provided that he had not acquired possession from his adversary by force or clandestinely, or as a concession; but it made no difference if he had acquired it from any one else, by forcibly expelling him, secretly depriving him of possession, or obtaining from him possession as a concession. In the interdict utrubi, on the contrary,

a person, if, having possessed, he had, through dolus malus on his part, ceased to possess. The person possessing pro possessore, i.e. without any allegation of title, is sometimes spoken of as prædo. (See Tit. 6. 28, note.)

We must not confound the interdictum Salvianum with the actio Serviana (see Tit. 6. 7), but it was probably only a step to that action, and may have fallen into disuse when the actio Serviana was established as a means of redress for the creditor. The interdictum Salvianum was not given to every mortgage creditor, but only to the owner of a rural estate, as a means of getting possession of the goods of the occupier of the estate which had been pledged for the rent. Probably the interdict was granted even if the goods had passed into the hands of a third party. (D. xliii. 33. 1; but see C. viii. 9. 1.) Gaius mentions two other interdicts coming under this head, one given to bonorum emptores, and one to sectores, or purchasers of public goods (iv. 145, 146).

4. Retinendæ possessionis causa comparata sunt interdicta 'uti possidetis' et 'utrubi,' cum ab utraque parte de proprietate alicujus rei controversia sit et ante quæritur, uter ex litigatoribus possidere et uter petere debeat. Namque nisi ante exploratum fuerit, utrius eorum possessio sit, non potest petitoria actio institui, quia et civilis et naturalis ratio facit, ut alius possideat, alius a possidente petat. Et quia longe commodius est possidere potius quam petere, ideo plerumque et fere semper ingens existit contentio de ipsa possessione. Commodum autem possidendi in eo est, quod, etiamsi ejus res non sit, qui possidet, si modo actor non potuerit suam esse probare, remanet suo loco possessio: propter quam causam, cum obscura sint utriusque jura, contra petito rem judicari solet. Sed interdicto quidem 'uti possidetis' de fundi vel ædium possessione contenditur, 'utrubi' vero interdicto de rerum mobilium possessione. Quorum vis et potestas plurimam inter se differentiam apud veteres habebat: nam 'uti possidetis' interdicto is vincebat, qui interdicti tempore possidebat, si modo nec vi nec clam nec precario nactus fuerat ab adversario possessionem, etiamsi alium vi expulerat aut clam abriperat alienam possessionem aut precario rogaverat aliquem, ut sibi possidere liceret: 'utrubi' vero interdicto is vincebat, qui majore parte ejus anni nec vi nec clam nec precario ab adversario

4. To retain possession there are given the interdicts uti possidetis and utrubi, when in a dispute as to the ownership of a thing, the question first arises, which of the parties ought to be possessor and which plaintiff. For, unless it is first determined to which the possession belongs, it is impossible to shape the real action, as law and reason both require that one party should possess, and the other bring his claim against him. And as it is much more advantageous to possess than to claim the thing, there is generally a keen dispute as to the possession itself. The advantage of possession consists in this, that even if the thing does not really belong to the possessor, yet, if the plaintiff does not prove himself to be the owner, the possessor still remains in possession, and, therefore, when the rights of the parties are doubtful, it is customary to decide against the claimant. The interdict uti possidetis applies to the possession of land and buildings, the interdict utrubi to that of moveables. There were formerly great differences in their effects; for in the interdict uti possidetis he prevailed who was in possession at the time of the interdict, provided that he had not acquired possession from his adversary by force or clandestinely, or as a concession; but it made no difference if he had acquired it from any one else, by forcibly expelling him, secretly depriving him of possession, or obtaining from him possession as a concession. In the interdict utrubi, on the contrary, possidebat. Hodie tamen aliter observatur; nam utriusque interdicti potestas, quantum ad possessionem pertinet, exæquata est, ut ille vincat et in re soli et in re mobili, qui possessionem nec vi nec clam nec precario ab adversario litis contestationis tempore detinet.

he prevailed, who during the greater part of the preceding year had had the possession without having obtained it as against his adversary by force, clandestinely, or as a concession. At the present day, it is different, for the two interdicts have the same effect as regards possession, so that, whether the thing claimed is an immoveable or a moveable, he prevails, who, at the time of the litis contestatio, is in possession, without having obtained it as against his adversary by force, clandestinely, or as a concession.

GAI. iv. 148-152; D. vi. 1. 24; D. xliii. 17. 1; D. xliii. 31; C. iv. 19. 2.

The interdict uti possidetis ran thus:—

Uti eas cedes, quibus de agitur, nec vi, nec clam, nec precario alter ab altero possidetis, quominus ita possideatis, vim fieri veto. (D. xliii. 17. 1. pr.)

It was granted to defend the possession of all immoveables, except clouce, which were expressly excepted by the prætor's edict. The word cedes in the text of the interdict is only an example.

By possessing precario is meant possessing at the will of another, possession having been requested from him. (D. xliii. 26. 1. pr.). When the person from whom the possession had been extorted wished to do so, he could always resume it; and hence the word precarius came to mean uncertain. Perhaps the origin of precaria possessio was the interest that clients had in a portion of the ager publicus, which their patron might permit them to use, and which they were bound to restore immediately if their patron demanded it back.

The words alter ab altero are inserted, because it would be no ground for disturbing the possession that had been obtained vi, clam, or precario, unless it had been so obtained from the other litigant party.

It was necessary that application should be made for this interdict within a year after the security of the possession had been threatened. (D. xliii. 17. 1. pr.) It did not signify how it had been threatened. The text only refers to the case of an action being brought to dispute it, but the interdict would be granted in whatever way the possession had been attacked.

The interdict utrubi ran thus:—

Utrubi hic homo quo de agitur majore parte hujusce anni fuit, quominus is eum ducat, vim fieri veto. (D. xliii. 31. pr.)

The example is taken from the case of the disputed possession of a slave, but the interdict applied to the case of all moveables. This interdict was considered one retinendæ possessionis, although, before Justinian applied the same rule as in uti possidetis, as it was granted to the person who had possessed during the greater part of the preceding year, it might happen that it was granted to a person who had not the possession at the exact time it was possidebat. Hodie tamen aliter observatur; nam utriusque interdicti potestas, quantum ad possessionem pertinet, exæquata est, ut ille vincat et in re soli et in re mobili, qui possessionem nec vi nec clam nec precario ab adversario litis contestationis tempore detinet.

he prevailed, who during the greater part of the preceding year had had the possession without having obtained it as against his adversary by force, clandestinely, or as a concession. At the present day, it is different, for the two interdicts have the same effect as regards possession, so that, whether the thing claimed is an immoveable or a moveable, he prevails, who, at the time of the litis contestatio, is in possession, without having obtained it as against his adversary by force, clandestinely, or as a concession.

GAI. iv. 148-152; D. vi. 1. 24; D. xliii. 17. 1; D. xliii. 31; C. iv. 19. 2.

The interdict uti possidetis ran thus:—

Uti eas aedes, quibus de agitur, nec vi, nec clam, nec precario alter ab altero possidetis, quominus ita possideatis, vim fieri veto. (D. xliii. 17. 1. pr.)

It was granted to defend the possession of all immoveables, except cloacæ, which were expressly excepted by the prætor's edict. The word aedes in the text of the interdict is only an example.

By possessing precario is meant possessing at the will of another, possession having been requested from him (D. xliii. 26. 1. pr.). When the person from whom the possession had been extorted wished to do so, he could always resume it; and hence the word precarius came to mean uncertain. Perhaps the origin of precaria possessio was the interest that clients had in a portion of the ager publicus, which their patron might permit them to use, and which they were bound to restore immediately if their patron demanded it back.

The words alter ab altero are inserted, because it would be no ground for disturbing the possession that had been obtained vi, clam, or precario, unless it had been so obtained from the other litigant party.

It was necessary that application should be made for this interdict within a year after the security of the possession had been threatened. (D. xliii. 17. 1. pr.) It did not signify how it had been threatened. The text only refers to the case of an action being brought to dispute it, but the interdict would be granted in whatever way the possession had been attacked.

The interdict utrubi ran thus:—

Utrubi hic homo quo de agitur majore parte hujusce anni fuit, quominus is eum ducat, vim fieri veto. (D. xliii. 31. pr.)

The example is taken from the case of the disputed possession of a slave, but the interdict applied to the case of all moveables. This interdict was considered one retinendæ possessionis, although, before Justinian applied the same rule as in uti possidetis, as it was granted to the person who had possessed during the greater part of the preceding year, it might happen that it was granted to a person who had not the possession at the exact time it was granted, but who had possessed the thing during more months in the year than the person who happened to be in possession at the end of the year.

5. Possidere autem videtur quisque non solum, si ipse possideat, sed et si ejus nomine aliquis in possessione sit, licet is ejus juri subiectus non sit, qualis est colonus et inquilinus: per eos quoque, apud quos deposuerit quis aut quibus commodaverit, ipse possidere videtur: et hoc est, quod dicitur, retinere possessionem posse aliquem per quemlibet, qui ejus nomine sit in possessione. Quin etiam animo quoque retineri possessionem placet, id est ut, quamvis neque ipse sit in possessione neque ejus nomine alius, tamen si non relinquendæ possessionis animo, sed postea reversurus inde discesserit, retinere possessionem videatur. Adipisci vero possessionem per quos aliquis potest, secundo libro exposuimus. Nec ulla dubitatio est, quin animo solo possessionem adipisci nemo potest.

5. A person is considered to possess not only when he himself possesses, but also if any one is in possession in his name, although not a person in his power, as the tenant of a farm or building. He may also possess through a depositary or a borrower, and this it is that is meant by saying that a person may retain possession by any other who is in possession in his name. Moreover, it is held that possession may be retained by mere intention only, that is, that although a person is not in possession himself, nor is any one else in his name, yet, if it is not with any intention of abandoning the thing, but with the intention of returning again to it, that he has placed himself at a distance from it, he is considered still to retain the possession. Through whom possession may be acquired, we have already explained in the Second Book. But it most certainly can never be acquired by mere intention only.

GAL. IV. 153.

In the introductory note to Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr., the distinction has been pointed out between civilis possessio, that is possession bona fide and ex justa causa, which could be transmuted by usucapion into ownership, and naturalis possessio, which again is divided into possessio, where, although there is not possession such as will ripen by usucapion, there is still possession as a matter of fact, coupled with the intention of treating the thing as if the possessor were the owner, and in possessione esse, where the person has the detentio, but not the animus possidendi. Civilis possessio and naturalis possessio with the intention of ownership were protected by these possessory interdicts, whereas the being merely in possession was not. This paragraph points out (1) that one person may be in possession while another is the possessor, and that the first is not, while the second is, entitled to the interdicts; and (2) that a possessor may sometimes possess only with the animus without being actually on the spot possessing. An instance given by Paulus is that of a man who possesses a mountain pasture, and leaves it when the season for its use is over, with the intention of returning (Sent. v. 2. 1). But the mere intention to possess as owner, without the physical fact of detention having ever taken place, was of no avail.

6. Reciperandæ possessionis causa solet interdici, si quis ex possessione

6. To recover possession an interdict is given in case any one has been granted, but who had possessed the thing during more months in the year than the person who happened to be in possession at the end of the year.

5. Possidere autem videtur quisque non solum, si ipse possideat, sed et si ejus nomine aliquis in possessione sit, licet is ejus juri subiectus non sit, qualis est colonus et inquilinus: per eos quoque, apud quos deposuerit quis aut quibus commodaverit, ipse possidere videtur: et hoc est, quod dicitur, retinere possessionem posse aliquem per quemlibet, qui ejus nomine sit in possessione. Quin etiam animo quoque retineri possessionem placet, id est ut, quamvis neque ipse sit in possessione neque ejus nomine alius, tamen si non relinquendæ possessionis animo, sed postea reversurus inde discesserit, retinere possessionem videatur. Adipisci vero possessionem per quos aliquis potest, secundo libro exposuimus. Nec ulla dubitatio est, quin animo solo possessionem adipisci nemo potest.

5. A person is considered to possess not only when he himself possesses, but also if any one is in possession in his name, although not a person in his power, as the tenant of a farm or building. He may also possess through a depositary or a borrower, and this it is that is meant by saying that a person may retain possession by any other who is in possession in his name. Moreover, it is held that possession may be retained by mere intention only, that is, that although a person is not in possession himself, nor is any one else in his name, yet, if it is not with any intention of abandoning the thing, but with the intention of returning again to it, that he has placed himself at a distance from it, he is considered still to retain the possession. Through whom possession may be acquired, we have already explained in the Second Book. But it most certainly can never be acquired by mere intention only.

GAL. iv. 153.

In the introductory note to Bk. ii. Tit. 6. pr., the distinction has been pointed out between civilis possessio, that is possession bona fide and ex justa causa, which could be transmuted by usucapion into ownership, and naturalis possessio, which again is divided into possessio, where, although there is not possession such as will ripen by usucapion, there is still possession as a matter of fact, coupled with the intention of treating the thing as if the possessor were the owner, and in possessione esse, where the person has the detentio, but not the animus possidendi. Civilis possessio and naturalis possessio with the intention of ownership were protected by these possessory interdicts, whereas the being merely in possession was not. This paragraph points out (1) that one person may be in possession while another is the possessor, and that the first is not, while the second is, entitled to the interdicts; and (2) that a possessor may sometimes possess only with the animus without being actually on the spot possessing. An instance given by Paulus is that of a man who possesses a mountain pasture, and leaves it when the season for its use is over, with the intention of returning (Sent. v. 2. 1). But the mere intention to possess as owner, without the physical fact of detention having ever taken place, was of no avail.

6. Reciperandæ possessionis causa solet interdici, si quis ex possessione

6. To recover possession an interdict is given in case any one has been

fundi vel ædium vi dejectus fuerit: nam ei proponitur interdictum 'unde vi,' per quod is, qui dejecit, cogitur ei restituere possessionem, licet is ab eo, qui vi dejecit, vi vel clam vel precario possidebat. Sed ex sacris constitutionibus, ut supra diximus, si quis rem per vim occupaverit, si quidem in bonis ejus est, dominio ejus privatur, si aliena, post ejus restitutionem etiam æstimationem rei dare vim passo compellitur. Qui autem aliquem de possessione per vim dejecerit, tenetur lege Julia de vi privata aut de vi publica: sed de vi privata, si sine armis vim fecerit, sin autem cum armis eum de possessione expulerit, de vi publica. Armorum autem appellatione non solum scuta et gladios et galeas significari intellegimus, sed et fustes et lapides.

expelled by violence from the possession of land or a building. He has then given him the interdict unde vi, by which he who has expelled him is forced to restore to him the possession, although the person to whom the interdict is given has himself taken by force, clandestinely, or as a concession, the possession from the person who has expelled him. But, as we have said above, the imperial constitutions provide that if any one seizes on a thing by violence, he shall lose the ownership of it, if it is a part of his own goods, and if it belongs to another, he shall not only restore it, but, in addition, pay to the person who has sustained the injury the amount at which the thing is estimated. Moreover, a person who has expelled by violence another from his possession, is liable under the lex Julia de vi publica seu privata: for private violence, if his violence was exercised without the use of arms; for public violence, if the expulsion from possession was made by armed force. Under the term arms are included not only shields, swords, and helmets, but clubs and stones.

GAI. iv. 154, 155; D. xlviii. 7. 7; D. l. 16. 41; C. viii. 4. 7.

The interdict unde vi ran thus:—

Unde tu illum vi dejecisti, aut familia tua dejecit, de eo, quæque ille tunc ibi habuit, tantummodo intra annum, post annum de eo quod ad eum qui vi dejecit pervenerit, judicium dabo. (D. xliii. 16. 1. pr.)

Formerly a distinction was made in granting this interdict, according to the degree of violence used. If it had been ordinary violence (vis quotidiana), the interdict was only granted if the possession had not been obtained vi, clam, or precario, with respect to the adversary (GAI. iv. 154), and could only be obtained within a year; but if vis armata had been employed, the interdict was granted in all cases. (CIC. Epist. xv. 16.) This difference had ceased long before the time of Justinian, and apparently before the time when the interdict assumed the shape in which we now find it in the Digest, by which, as will be seen, possession was given, within a year, of the thing as it then was; after a year, only of the thing as it came into the hands of the dispossessor.

The interdict unde vi only applied to immoveables (D. xliii. 16. 1. 6); but the constitution of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, A.D. 389, referred to in the text (and in Tit. 2. 1), protected moveables as well as immoveables. (C. viii. 4. 7.)

The lex Julia de vi is treated of in Tit. 18. 8.

Possession could be recovered by uti possidetis and utrubi as fundi vel ædium vi dejectus fuerit: nam ei proponitur interdictum 'unde vi,' per quod is, qui dejecit, cogitur ei restituere possessionem, licet is ab eo, qui vi dejecit, vi vel clam vel precario possidebat. Sed ex sacris constitutionibus, ut supra diximus, si quis rem per vim occupaverit, si quidem in bonis ejus est, dominio ejus privatur, si aliena, post ejus restitutionem etiam æstimationem rei dare vim passo compellitur. Qui autem aliquem de possessione per vim dejecerit, tenetur lege Julia de vi privata aut de vi publica: sed de vi privata, si sine armis vim fecerit, sin autem cum armis eum de possessione expulerit, de vi publica. Armorum autem appellatione non solum scuta et gladios et galeas significari intellegimus, sed et fustes et lapides.

expelled by violence from the possession of land or a building. He has then given him the interdict unde vi, by which he who has expelled him is forced to restore to him the possession, although the person to whom the interdict is given has himself taken by force, clandestinely, or as a concession, the possession from the person who has expelled him. But, as we have said above, the imperial constitutions provide that if any one seizes on a thing by violence, he shall lose the ownership of it, if it is a part of his own goods, and if it belongs to another, he shall not only restore it, but, in addition, pay to the person who has sustained the injury the amount at which the thing is estimated. Moreover, a person who has expelled by violence another from his possession, is liable under the lex Julia de vi publica seu privata: for private violence, if his violence was exercised without the use of arms; for public violence, if the expulsion from possession was made by armed force. Under the term arms are included not only shields, swords, and helmets, but clubs and stones.

GAI. iv. 154, 155; D. xlviii. 7. 7; D. l. 16. 41; C. viii. 4. 7.

The interdict unde vi ran thus:—

Unde tu illum vi dejecisti, aut familia tua dejecit, de eo, quæque ille tunc ibi habuit, tantummodo intra annum, post annum de eo quod ad eum qui vi dejecit pervenerit, judicium dabo. (D. xliii. 16. 1. pr.)

Formerly a distinction was made in granting this interdict, according to the degree of violence used. If it had been ordinary violence (vis quotidiana), the interdict was only granted if the possession had not been obtained vi, clam, or precario, with respect to the adversary (GAI. iv. 154), and could only be obtained within a year; but if vis armata had been employed, the interdict was granted in all cases. (CIC. Epist. xv. 16.) This difference had ceased long before the time of Justinian, and apparently before the time when the interdict assumed the shape in which we now find it in the Digest, by which, as will be seen, possession was given, within a year, of the thing as it then was; after a year, only of the thing as it came into the hands of the dispossessor.

The interdict unde vi only applied to immoveables (D. xliii. 16. 1. 6); but the constitution of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, A.D. 389, referred to in the text (and in Tit. 2. 1), protected moveables as well as immoveables. (C. viii. 4. 7.)

The lex Julia de vi is treated of in Tit. 18. 8.

Possession could be recovered by uti possidetis and utrubi as well as by unde vi, and it was by utrubi that, previously to the constitution above mentioned, possession of moveables was recovered. But the interdict unde vi was in some respects more advantageous than uti possidetis. (1) It gave a remedy against the dispossessor, even if he was no longer in possession (D. xliii. 16. 1. 42); (2) it gave, if brought within a year, the fructus from the time of the ejectment, not as uti possidetis merely from the commencement of proceedings (D. xliii. 16. 1. 40); and (3) it was not, if the vis had been armata, or after the distinction between the characters of the violence employed had been done away, barred by the vices of the possession of the applicant for the interdict; (4) it applied not only to immoveables, but to any moveables thereon (D. xliii. 16. 1. 6).

There were other interdicts under the head of reciperanda possessionis—that de precario and that de clandestina possessione (D. xliii. 26. 2. pr.; D. x. 3. 7. 5); but little is known of them.

7. Tertia divisio interdictorum hæc est, quod aut simplicia sunt aut duplicia. Simplicia sunt, in quibus alter actor, alter reus est: qualia sunt omnia restitutoria aut exhibitioria; namque actor est, qui desiderat aut exhiberi aut restitui, reus is, a quo desideratur, ut restituat aut exhibeat. Prohibitoriorum autem interdictorum alia simplicia sunt, alia duplicia. Simplicia sunt, veluti cum prohibet prætor in loco sacro vel in flumine publico ripave ejus aliquid fieri (nam actor est, qui desiderat, ne quid fiat, reus, qui aliquid facere conatur): duplicia sunt veluti 'uti possidetis' interdictum et 'utrubi.' Ideo autem duplicia vocantur, quia par utriusque litigatoris in his condicio est nec quisquam præcipue reus vel actor intellegitur, sed unusquisque tam rei quam actoris partem sustinet.

7. The third division of interdicts is, that they are either simple or double. Those are simple in which one person is plaintiff and the other defendant, as is the case in all that are restitutory or exhibitory. For he is the plaintiff who wishes that a thing shall be exhibited or restored, and he is defendant against whom the claim is made. But of prohibitory interdicts some are simple, some double: simple, as, for instance, when the prætor forbids anything to be done in a sacred place, or in a public river, or on its banks; for he is plaintiff who wishes that the thing should not be done, and he is defendant who wishes to do it: double, as in the case of the interdicts uti possidetis and utrubi; and these interdicts are called double, because in them the possession of each party is equal, for neither can be said to be properly plaintiff or defendant, but each is at once plaintiff and defendant.

GAI. iv. 156-160.

Duplicia sunt, veluti uti possidetis interdictum et utrubi. These interdicts here and in Gaius (GAI. iv. 160) are, seemingly, only adduced as examples, but we know of no others having the same character. Compare the actions familiae erciscundæ, communi dividundo, and finium regundorum (see Introd. sec. 103).

8. De ordine et veteri exitu interdictorum supervacuum est hodie dicere: nam quotiens extra ordinem jus dicitur, qualia sunt hodie omnia judicia, non est necesse reddi interdictum, sed perinde judicatur sine

8. Of the process and effect of interdicts in former times it would be now superfluous to speak. For whenever the jurisdiction is extraordinary, as is the case now in all actions, there is no necessity for an interdict; for well as by unde vi, and it was by utrubi that, previously to the constitution above mentioned, possession of moveables was recovered. But the interdict unde vi was in some respects more advantageous than uti possidetis. (1) It gave a remedy against the dispossessor, even if he was no longer in possession (D. xliii. 16. 1. 42); (2) it gave, if brought within a year, the fructus from the time of the ejectment, not as uti possidetis merely from the commencement of proceedings (D. xliii. 16. 1. 40); and (3) it was not, if the vis had been armata, or after the distinction between the characters of the violence employed had been done away, barred by the vices of the possession of the applicant for the interdict; (4) it applied not only to immoveables, but to any moveables thereon (D. xliii. 16. 1. 6).

There were other interdicts under the head of reciperanda possessionis—that de precario and that de clandestina possessione (D. xliii. 26. 2. pr.; D. x. 3. 7. 5); but little is known of them.

7. Tertia divisio interdictorum hæc est, quod aut simplicia sunt aut duplicia. Simplicia sunt, in quibus alter actor, alter reus est: qualia sunt omnia restitutoria aut exhibitoria: namque actor est, qui desiderat aut exhiberi aut restitui, reus is, a quo desideratur, ut restituat aut exhibeat. Prohibitoriorum autem interdictorum alia simplicia sunt, alia duplicia. Simplicia sunt, veluti cum prohibet prætor in loco sacro vel in flumine publico ripave ejus aliquid fieri (nam actor est, qui desiderat, ne quid fiat, reus, qui aliquid facere conatur): duplicia sunt veluti 'uti possidetis' interdictum et 'utrubi.' Ideo autem duplicia vocantur, quia par utriusque litigatoris in his condicio est nec quisquam præcipue reus vel actor intellegitur, sed unusquisque tam rei quam actoris partem sustinet.

7. The third division of interdicts is, that they are either simple or double. Those are simple in which one person is plaintiff and the other defendant, as is the case in all that are restitutory or exhibitory. For he is the plaintiff who wishes that a thing shall be exhibited or restored, and he is defendant against whom the claim is made. But of prohibitory interdicts some are simple, some double: simple, as, for instance, when the prætor forbids anything to be done in a sacred place, or in a public river, or on its banks; for he is plaintiff who wishes that the thing should not be done, and he is defendant who wishes to do it: double, as in the case of the interdicts uti possidetis and utrubi; and these interdicts are called double, because in them the possession of each party is equal, for neither can be said to be properly plaintiff or defendant, but each is at once plaintiff and defendant.

GAI. iv. 156–160.

Duplicia sunt, veluti uti possidetis interdictum et utrubi. These interdicts here and in Gaius (GAI. iv. 160) are, seemingly, only adduced as examples, but we know of no others having the same character. Compare the actions familiæ erciscundæ, communis dividundo, and finium regundorum (see Introd. sec. 103).

8. De ordine et veteri exitu interdictorum supervacuū est hodie dicere: nam quætiens extra ordinem jus dicitur, qualia sunt hodie omnia judicia, non est necesse reddi interdictum, sed perinde judicatur sine

8. Of the process and effect of interdicts in former times it would be now superfluous to speak. For whenever the jurisdiction is extraordinary, as is the case now in all actions, there is no necessity for an interdict; for interdictis, atque si utilis actio ex causa interdicti reddita fuisset. judgment is given without interdicts, exactly as if a utilis actio had been given in pursuance of an interdict.

C. viii. 1. 3.

From the Institutes of Gaius (iv. 161 et seq.) we gather a general notion of the manner in which the proceedings on an interdict were conducted. But the text of Gaius is, in this part, very imperfect and difficult to understand, and as the whole process was obsolete in the time of Justinian, a very short sketch of the proceedings must suffice here.

The parties were made to appear in jure exactly in the same way when an interdict was to be applied for as when an action was to be brought. The prætor heard the statement of the party who made the application, and if the adversary confessed the truth of the statement, the prætor announced his decree at once, and had it executed, if necessary, by the strong arm of the law (manu militari, D. vi. 1. 68). If the defendant asserted that he had not done wrong, the prætor gave an action based upon the interdict, to ascertain whether the facts were as the plaintiff, in applying for the interdict, alleged; that is, the intentio of the formula was the language of the interdict put as a hypothetical case. The interdict would run,—Hoc vel illud te facere veto: the intentio, Si hoc vel illud A. A. fecerit (condemna, &c.). The parties bound themselves by a sponsio and restipulatio in a penal sum, which the defendant was to pay if he was in the wrong, and to receive if he was not. But this practice, which was always adopted when the interdict was prohibitory, was probably gradually abandoned when the interdict was restitutory or exhibitory; and in these cases, in order to compel the actual performance of the act ordered by the prætor, an action was given with a formula arbitraria, so that the judeæ might issue a preparatory order to the defendant, and, if it was not complied with, might make him pay the amount of all damage sustained (quanti ea res erit), or would compel him, at least at the date when Ulpian wrote (D. vi. 1. 68), to restore the thing if in his possession. As to actiones arbitrarie see note on Tit. G. 31.

TIT. XVI. DE PENA TEMERE LITIGANTIIUM.

Nunc admonendi sumus, magnam curam egisse eos, qui jura sustinebant, ne facile homines ad litigandum procederent: quod et nobis studio est. Idque eo maxime fieri potest, quod temeritas tam agentium quam eorum, cum quibus agitur, modo pecuniaria pœna, modo jurisjurandi religione, modo metu infamiae coercetur.

We may here observe, that the authors and preservers of our law have always sought most anxiously to hinder men from engaging too recklessly in law-suits, and it is what we ourselves desire also. And the best method of succeeding in it is, to repress the rashness alike of plaintiffs and of defendants, sometimes by a pecuniary penalty, sometimes by the sacred tie of an oath, sometimes by the fear of infamy.

GAI. iv. 174.

interdictis, atque si utilis actio ex causa interdicti reddita fuisset. judgment is given without interdicts, exactly as if a utilis actio had been given in pursuance of an interdict.

C. viii. 1. 3.

From the Institutes of Gaius (iv. 161 et seq.) we gather a general notion of the manner in which the proceedings on an interdict were conducted. But the text of Gaius is, in this part, very imperfect and difficult to understand, and as the whole process was obsolete in the time of Justinian, a very short sketch of the proceedings must suffice here.

The parties were made to appear in jure exactly in the same way when an interdict was to be applied for as when an action was to be brought. The prætor heard the statement of the party who made the application, and if the adversary confessed the truth of the statement, the prætor announced his decree at once, and had it executed, if necessary, by the strong arm of the law (manu militari, D. vi. 1. 68). If the defendant asserted that he had not done wrong, the prætor gave an action based upon the interdict, to ascertain whether the facts were as the plaintiff, in applying for the interdict, alleged; that is, the intentio of the formula was the language of the interdict put as a hypothetical case. The interdict would run,—Hoc vel illud te facere veto: the intentio, Si hoc vel illud A. A. fecerit (condemna, &c.). The parties bound themselves by a sponsio and restipulatio in a penal sum, which the defendant was to pay if he was in the wrong, and to receive if he was not. But this practice, which was always adopted when the interdict was prohibitory, was probably gradually abandoned when the interdict was restitutory or exhibitory; and in these cases, in order to compel the actual performance of the act ordered by the prætor, an action was given with a formula arbitraria, so that the judeex might issue a preparatory order to the defendant, and, if it was not complied with, might make him pay the amount of all damage sustained (quantum ea res erit), or would compel him, at least at the date when Ulpian wrote (D. vi. 1. 68), to restore the thing if in his possession. As to actiones arbitrarie see note on Tit. G. 31.

TIT. XVI. DE PENA TEMERE LITIGANTIIUM.

Nunc admonendi sumus, magnam curam egisse eos, qui jura sustinebant, ne facile homines ad litigandum procederent: quod et nobis studio est. Idque eo maxime fieri potest, quod temeritas tam agentium quam eorum, cum quibus agitur, modo pecuniaria pœna, modo jurisjurandi religione, modo metu infamie coercetur.

We may here observe, that the authors and preservers of our law have always sought most anxiously to hinder men from engaging too recklessly in law-suits, and it is what we ourselves desire also. And the best method of succeeding in it is, to repress the rashness alike of plaintiffs and of defendants, sometimes by a pecuniary penalty, sometimes by the sacred tie of an oath, sometimes by the fear of infamy.

GAI. iv. 174.

In the days of Gaius, the means of punishing persons who recklessly brought or defended a suit were more numerous. The plaintiff was restrained from recklessly bringing an action not only by being condemned in damages and costs, but (1) by an action of calumny—that is, the defendant could bring against a plaintiff who had sued him dishonestly an action by which the defendant could recover one-tenth of what the plaintiff had claimed, if by action, and one-fourth of what he had claimed, if by interdict (GAI. iv. 175); (2) by what was termed the ‘contrary action’ the unsuccessful plaintiff, although he had honestly brought his action, was made to pay a tenth or a fifth of what he claimed, but then it was only failing in a few special actions, such as that injuriarum, that exposed him to this risk (GAI. iv. 177); (3) by oath, i.e. by the defendant calling on him to swear to his bona fides, but if the defendant did this, he could not afterwards bring an action of calumny, or the contrary action (GAI. iv. 179); and (4) by restipulatio, i.e. by being called on to wager a sum to be lost if he failed, which was allowed in certain actions; this mode of proceeding excluded the three others previously mentioned. (GAI. iv. 180, 181.)

In the law as described by Gaius, the defendant was restrained from recklessly defending an action (1) by the sponsio, or wager that he had done all he was bound to do, allowed in certain actions (the sponsio and restipulatio made up the wager of the parties) (GAI. iv. 171); (2) in certain actions, as, for instance, for deposit in case of necessity, the penalty was double in case of denial (Tit. 6. 17), and all actions with a penalty are looked on by Gaius as restraining the defendant (iv. 171); (3) if the case was one where no restraint operated under these first two heads, the defendant was obliged to take an oath of bona fides (GAI. iv. 172); (4) certain actions carried infamy with them against the persons condemned (GAI. iv. 182).

1. Ecce enim iusjurandum omnibus, qui conveniuntur, ex nostra constitutione defertur: nam reus non aliter suis allegationibus utitur, nisi prius iuraverit, quod putans, se bona instantia uti, ad contradicendum pervenit. At adversus infitantes ex quibusdam causis dupli actio constituitur, veluti si damni injuriæ aut legatorum locis venerabilibus relictorum nomine agitur. Statim autem ab initio pluris quam simpli est actio veluti furti manifesti quadrupli, nec manifesti dupli: nam ex his causis et aliis quibusdam, sive quis neget sive fateatur, pluris quam simpli est actio. Item actoris quoque calumnia coercetur: nam etiam actor pro calumnia jurare cogitur ex nostra constitutione. Utriusque

1. And first, under our constitution, an oath is administered to all defendants. For, the defendant is not admitted to state his defence until he has sworn that it is from a persuasion of the goodness of his own cause that he resists the demand of the plaintiff. In certain cases where the defendant denies liability an action for double the value is given; for instance, in the case of wrongful damage, or of legacies left to holy places. The action is from the very beginning for more than the single value in such cases as the action furti manifesti, where it is for the quadruple value, and that furti nec manifesti, where it is for the double. In these cases and in some others, whether the defendant denies or confesses, the action

In the days of Gaius, the means of punishing persons who recklessly brought or defended a suit were more numerous. The plaintiff was restrained from recklessly bringing an action not only by being condemned in damages and costs, but (1) by an action of calumny—that is, the defendant could bring against a plaintiff who had sued him dishonestly an action by which the defendant could recover one-tenth of what the plaintiff had claimed, if by action, and one-fourth of what he had claimed, if by interdict (GAI. iv. 175); (2) by what was termed the ‘contrary action’ the unsuccessful plaintiff, although he had honestly brought his action, was made to pay a tenth or a fifth of what he claimed, but then it was only failing in a few special actions, such as that injuriarum, that exposed him to this risk (GAI. iv. 177); (3) by oath, i.e. by the defendant calling on him to swear to his bona fides, but if the defendant did this, he could not afterwards bring an action of calumny, or the contrary action (GAI. iv. 179); and (4) by restipulatio, i.e. by being called on to wager a sum to be lost if he failed, which was allowed in certain actions; this mode of proceeding excluded the three others previously mentioned. (GAI. iv. 180, 181.)

In the law as described by Gaius, the defendant was restrained from recklessly defending an action (1) by the sponsio, or wager that he had done all he was bound to do, allowed in certain actions (the sponsio and restipulatio made up the wager of the parties) (GAI. iv. 171); (2) in certain actions, as, for instance, for deposit in case of necessity, the penalty was double in case of denial (Tit. 6. 17), and all actions with a penalty are looked on by Gaius as restraining the defendant (iv. 171); (3) if the case was one where no restraint operated under these first two heads, the defendant was obliged to take an oath of bona fides (GAI. iv. 172); (4) certain actions carried infamy with them against the persons condemned (GAI. iv. 182).

1. Ecce enim iusjurandum omnibus, qui conveniuntur, ex nostra constitutione deferitur: nam reus non aliter suis allegationibus utitur, nisi prius iuraverit, quod putans, se bona instantia uti, ad contradicendum pervenit. At adversus infitantes ex quibusdam causis dupli actio constituitur, veluti si damni injuriæ aut legatorum locis venerabilibus relictorum nomine agitur. Statim autem ab initio pluris quam simpli est actio veluti furti manifesti quadrupli, nec manifesti dupli: nam ex his causis et aliis quibusdam, sive quis neget sive fateatur, pluris quam simpli est actio. Item actoris quoque calumnia coercetur: nam etiam actor pro calumnia jurare cogitur ex nostra constitutione. Utriusque

1. And first, under our constitution, an oath is administered to all defendants. For, the defendant is not admitted to state his defence until he has sworn that it is from a persuasion of the goodness of his own cause that he resists the demand of the plaintiff. In certain cases where the defendant denies liability an action for double the value is given; for instance, in the case of wrongful damage, or of legacies left to holy places. The action is from the very beginning for more than the single value in such cases as the action furti manifesti, where it is for the quadruple value, and that furti nec manifesti, where it is for the double. In these cases and in some others, whether the defendant denies or confesses, the action etiam partis advocati iusjurandum subeunt, quod alia nostra constitutione comprehensum est. Hæc autem omnia pro veteris calumniæ actione introducta sunt, quæ in destitutionem abiit, quia in partem decimam litis actorem multabat, quod nusquam factum esse invenimus: sed pro his introductum est et præfatum iusjurandum et ut improbus litigator etiam damnum et impensas litis inferre adversario suo cogatur.

is for more than the single value. The litigiousness of the plaintiff is also restrained, for he is obliged by our constitution to take the oath de calumnia. The advocates also of each party take an oath prescribed by another of our constitutions. All these formalities have been introduced to replace the old action calumniæ, which is fallen into disuse, for it subjected the plaintiff to a fine of the tenth of the value of the thing in dispute; but we have never known this penalty enforced. In its stead, there has, in the first place, been introduced the oath we have just mentioned; and, in the next place, a person who brings a groundless action is made to reimburse his adversary for all losses and expenses he has been put to.

GAI. iv. 173; C. ii. 59. 2; C. iii. 1. 13. 6; C. iii. 1. 14. 1.

For the terms of these oaths see C. ii. 59. 2; C. iii. 1. 14. 1.

2. Ex quibusdam judiciis damnati ignominiosi fiunt, veluti furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, de dolo, item tutelæ, mandati, depositi directis, non contrariis, actionibus, item pro socio, quæ ab utraque parte directa est, et ob id quilibet ex sociis eo iudicio damnatus ignominia notatur. Sed furti quidem aut vi bonorum raptorum aut injuriarum aut de dolo non solum damnati notantur ignominia, sed etiam pacti: et recte; plurimum enim interest, utrum ex delicto aliquis an ex contractu debitor sit.

2. In certain actions the person condemned becomes infamous, as in the actions furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, de dolo; as also in the actions tutelæ, mandati, depositi if direct, but not if contrary; and also in the action pro socio, which is direct, by whichever of the contracting parties it may be brought, and in which infamy is attached to whichever of these parties may be condemned. But in the actions furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, and de dolo, it is not only those condemned that are branded with infamy, but also those who have made a compromise with their opponents; and rightly, for there is a great difference between being debtor by a delict, and by a contract.

GAI. iv. 182; D. iii. 2. 7.

Directis non contrariis. The reason is given by Ulpian: In contrariis non de perfidia agitur sed de calculo, qui fere iudicio solet dirimi (D. iii. 2. 6. 7). Contrariæ actiones were such as those brought against the pupil, the mandator, or depositor, by the tutor, mandatary, or depositary. There could be no reason why infamy should attach to a pupil who did not know the amount of the claims of the tutor, or to a depositor who did not know the amount of the expenses to which the depositary had been put.

The consequences of infamy were to prevent the guilty person from being a witness, receiving any public honours, or bringing a public prosecution. We have also seen (Tit. 13. 11) that, previous etiam partis advocati iusjurandum subeunt, quod alia nostra constitutione comprehensum est. Hæc autem omnia pro veteris calumniæ actione introducta sunt, quæ in desuetudinem abiit, quia in partem decimam litis actorem multabat, quod nusquam factum esse invenimus: sed pro his introductum est et præfatum iusjurandum et ut improbus litigator etiam damnum et impensas litis inferre adversario suo cogatur.

is for more than the single value. The litigiousness of the plaintiff is also restrained, for he is obliged by our constitution to take the oath de calumnia. The advocates also of each party take an oath prescribed by another of our constitutions. All these formalities have been introduced to replace the old action calumniæ, which is fallen into disuse, for it subjected the plaintiff to a fine of the tenth of the value of the thing in dispute; but we have never known this penalty enforced. In its stead, there has, in the first place, been introduced the oath we have just mentioned; and, in the next place, a person who brings a groundless action is made to reimburse his adversary for all losses and expenses he has been put to.

GAI. iv. 173; C. ii. 59. 2; C. iii. 1. 13. 6; C. iii. 1. 14. 1.

For the terms of these oaths see C. ii. 59. 2; C. iii. 1. 14. 1.

2. Ex quibusdam judiciis damnati ignominiosi fiunt, veluti furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, de dolo, item tutelæ, mandati, depositi directis, non contrariis, actionibus, item pro socio, quæ ab utraque parte directa est, et ob id quilibet ex sociis eo iudicio damnatus ignominia notatur. Sed furti quidem aut vi bonorum raptorum aut injuriarum aut de dolo non solum damnati notantur ignominia, sed etiam pacti: et recte; plurimum enim interest, utrum ex delicto aliquis an ex contractu debitor sit.

2. In certain actions the person condemned becomes infamous, as in the actions furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, de dolo; as also in the actions tutelæ, mandati, depositi if direct, but not if contrary; and also in the action pro socio, which is direct, by whichever of the contracting parties it may be brought, and in which infamy is attached to whichever of these parties may be condemned. But in the actions furti, vi bonorum raptorum, injuriarum, and de dolo, it is not only those condemned that are branded with infamy, but also those who have made a compromise with their opponents; and rightly, for there is a great difference between being debtor by a delict, and by a contract.

GAI. iv. 182; D. iii. 2. 7.

Directis non contrariis. The reason is given by Ulpian: In contrariis non de perfidia agitur sed de calculo, qui fere iudicio solet dirimi (D. iii. 2. 6. 7). Contrariæ actiones were such as those brought against the pupil, the mandator, or depositor, by the tutor, mandatary, or depositary. There could be no reason why infamy should attach to a pupil who did not know the amount of the claims of the tutor, or to a depositor who did not know the amount of the expenses to which the depositary had been put.

The consequences of infamy were to prevent the guilty person from being a witness, receiving any public honours, or bringing a public prosecution. We have also seen (Tit. 13. 11) that, previous to the legislation of Justinian, a person declared infamous could not appear as procurator in the cause of another.

3. Omnium autem actionum instituendarum principium ab ea parte edicti proficiscitur, qua prætor edicit de in jus vocando: utique enim in primis adversarius in jus vocandus est, id est ad eum vocandus est, qui jus diciturus sit. Qua parte prætor parentibus et patronis, item liberis parentibusque patronorum et patronarum hunc præstat honorem, ut non aliter liceat liberis libertisque eos in jus vocare, quam si id ab ipso prætore postulaverint et impetraverint: et si quis aliter vocaverit, in eum pœnam solidorum quinquaginta constituit.

3. In bringing any action, the first thing is, to comply with that part of the edict in which the prætor treats of the vocatio in jus. For the defendant must always be summoned in jus, i.e. before the magistrate who has to pronounce the law. In this part of the edict the prætor shows such respect towards ascendants, patrons, and even towards the ascendants and children of patrons and patronesses, that children and freedmen cannot summon them in jus, unless they have first obtained permission from the prætor; and he subjects persons who summon them without having obtained the prætor's permission, to a penalty of fifty solidi.

GAI. iv. 183; D. ii. 4. 1; D. ii. 4. 1; D. ii. 4. 24.

The earliest method of vocatio in jus was to seize on the defendant, and drag him before a magistrate. Afterwards the seizing became symbolical, and the plaintiff called some one to witness that the defendant had been seized, but would not come. (See Introd. sec. 93.)

TIT. XVII. DE OFFICIO JUDICIS.

Superest, ut de officio judicis dispiciamus. Et quidem in primis illud observare debet judex, ne aliter judicet, quam legibus aut constitutionibus aut moribus proditum est.

It remains to treat of the office of the judge. His first care ought to be, never to judge otherwise than according to the laws, the constitutions, or customary usage.

D. v. 1. 40. 1; D. xlviii. 10. 1. 3.

Judex qui contra sacras principum constitutiones, contrave jus publicum quod apud se recitatum est, pronunciat, in insulam deportatur. (PAUL. SENT. v. 25. 4.)

If the judge gave a sentence manifestly wrong, or if the sum was fixed in the condemnation by the prætor, and the judge condemned the defendant in a different sum (GAI. iv. 52), the sentence was treated as void without any appeal being necessary. If the judge was mistaken, as, for instance, in the mode in which he regarded some fact, an appeal was allowed, notice of which had to be given within two days (prolonged to ten days by Justinian in Nov. 23. 1) after the sentence, or three days if a procurator, and not the party himself, had conducted the suit. There seems to have been no system of appeals under the Republic, further than that one magistrate of equal or higher standing could veto to the legislation of Justinian, a person declared infamous could not appear as procurator in the cause of another.

3. Omnium autem actionum instituendarum principium ab ea parte edicti proficiscitur, qua prætor edicit de in jus vocando: utique enim in primis adversarius in jus vocandus est, id est ad eum vocandus est, qui jus diciturus sit. Qua parte prætor parentibus et patronis, item liberis parentibusque patronorum et patronarum hunc præstat honorem, ut non aliter liceat liberis libertisque eos in jus vocare, quam si id ab ipso prætore postulaverint et impetnaverint: et si quis aliter vocaverit, in eum pœnam solidorum quinquaginta constituit.

3. In bringing any action, the first thing is, to comply with that part of the edict in which the prætor treats of the vocatio in jus. For the defendant must always be summoned in jus, i.e. before the magistrate who has to pronounce the law. In this part of the edict the prætor shows such respect towards ascendants, patrons, and even towards the ascendants and children of patrons and patronesses, that children and freedmen cannot summon them in jus, unless they have first obtained permission from the prætor; and he subjects persons who summon them without having obtained the prætor's permission, to a penalty of fifty solidi.

GAI. iv. 183; D. ii. 4. 1; D. ii. 4. 4. 1; D. ii. 4. 24.

The earliest method of vocatio in jus was to seize on the defendant, and drag him before a magistrate. Afterwards the seizing became symbolical, and the plaintiff called some one to witness that the defendant had been seized, but would not come. (See Introd. sec. 93.)

TIT. XVII. DE OFFICIO JUDICIS.

Superest, ut de officio judicis dispiciamus. Et quidem in primis illud observare debet iudex, ne aliter judicet, quam legibus aut constitutionibus aut moribus proditum est.

It remains to treat of the office of the judge. His first care ought to be, never to judge otherwise than according to the laws, the constitutions, or customary usage.

D. v. 1. 40. 1; D. xlviii. 10. 1. 3.

Judex qui contra sacras principum constitutiones, contrave jus publicum quod apud se recitatum est, pronunciat, in insulam deportatur. (PAUL. Sent. v. 25. 4.)

If the judge gave a sentence manifestly wrong, or if the sum was fixed in the condemnation by the prætor, and the judge condemned the defendant in a different sum (GAI. iv. 52), the sentence was treated as void without any appeal being necessary. If the judge was mistaken, as, for instance, in the mode in which he regarded some fact, an appeal was allowed, notice of which had to be given within two days (prolonged to ten days by Justinian in Nov. 23. 1) after the sentence, or three days if a procurator, and not the party himself, had conducted the suit. There seems to have been no system of appeals under the Republic, further than that one magistrate of equal or higher standing could veto the acts of another. Under the Empire the emperor was the supreme judge of appeal, the technical term for an appeal to him being relatio. But Hadrian made the decisions on appeal of the Senate final (D. xlix. 2. 1. 2), and Constantine made those of the prætorian præfect (C. vii. 62. 19). The præfect of the city and the præsides of provinces sat as intermediate judges of appeal for Rome and the provinces respectively (C. vii. 62. 17 and 32). (See HUNTER, 885-889.)

1. Ideo si noxali iudicio addictus est, observare debet, ut, si condemnandus videbitur dominus, ita debeat condemnare: 'Publium Mævium Lucio Titio decem aureis condemnno aut noxam dedere.'

1. Consequently, if appointed to try a noxal action, he must observe, if he thinks the master ought to be condemned, that the proper form or condemnation is as follows: 'I condemn Publius Mævius to pay ten aurei to Lucius Titius, or to abandon the cause of the injury.'

D. xlii. 1. 6. 1.

2. Et si in rem actum sit, sive contra petitem judicavit, absolvere debet possessorem, sive contra possessorem, jubere eum debet, ut rem ipsam restituat cum fructibus. Sed si in præsentineget se possessor restituere posse et sine frustratione videbitur tempus restituendi causa petere, indulgendum est ei, ut tamen de litis æstimatione caveat cum fidejussore, si intra tempus, quod ei datum est, non restituisset. Et si hereditas petita sit, eadem circa fructus interveniunt, quæ diximus intervenire in singularum rerum petitione. Illorum autem fructuum, quos culpa sua possessor non percepit, in utraque actione eadem ratio pæne habetur, si prædo fuerit. Si vero bona fide possessor fuerit, non habetur ratio consumptorum neque non perceptorum: post inchoatam autem petitionem etiam illorum ratio habetur qui culpa possessoris percepti non sunt vel percepti consumpti sunt.

2. In a real action, if he determines against the claimant, he ought to absolve the possessor; if against the possessor, he ought to order the possessor to give up the thing itself together with the fruits. But if the possessor states that it is out of his power to give up the thing at once, and his request for delay seems honestly made, some indulgence should be accorded him; but he must first furnish a fidejussor to give security to the amount of the value of the thing in dispute, in case he should not restore it within the time allowed him. If an inheritance is claimed, the rules with regard to the fruits are the same as those we have laid down in the case of particular things. Of the fruits not gathered by the fault of the possessor, account is taken almost in the same way in both actions, when the possession is mala fide. The bona fide possessor has not to account for fruits, whether consumed or not gathered. But from the time when the claim is made, the possessor has to account for all fruits not gathered through his fault, or gathered and consumed.

D. vi. 1. 17. 1; D. vi. 1. 35. 1; D. vi. 1. 62. 1; C. iii. 32. 22.

What the words eadem ratio pæne habetur refer to is not easy to say. There do not seem to be any passages in the Digest which satisfactorily indicate any difference between the responsibilities of the mala fide possessor for fruits, according as the action was in rem, or was a petitio hereditatis.

Justinian here says that the position of a bona fide possessor

the acts of another. Under the Empire the emperor was the supreme judge of appeal, the technical term for an appeal to him being relatio. But Hadrian made the decisions on appeal of the Senate final (D. xlix. 2. 1. 2), and Constantine made those of the prætorian præfect (C. vii. 62. 19). The præfect of the city and the præsides of provinces sat as intermediate judges of appeal for Rome and the provinces respectively (C. vii. 62. 17 and 32). (See HUNTER, 885-889.)

1. Ideo si noxali iudicio addictus est, observare debet, ut, si condemnandus videbitur dominus, ita debeat condemnare: 'Publium Mævium Lucio Titio decem aureis condemnno aut noxam dedere.'

1. Consequently, if appointed to try a noxal action, he must observe, if he thinks the master ought to be condemned, that the proper form or condemnation is as follows: 'I condemn Publius Mævius to pay ten aurei to Lucius Titius, or to abandon the cause of the injury.'

D. xlii. 1. 6. 1.

2. Et si in rem actum sit, sive contra petitem: iudicavit, absolute debet possessorem, sive contra possessorem, jubere eum debet, ut rem ipsam restituat cum fructibus. Sed si in præsentia neget se possessor restituere posse et sine frustratione videbitur tempus restituendi causa petere, indulgendum est ei, ut tamen de litis æstimatione caveat cum fidejussore, si intra tempus, quod ei datum est, non restituerit. Et si hereditas petita sit, eadem circa fructus interveniunt, quæ diximus intervenire in singularum rerum petitione. Illorum autem fructuum, quos culpa sua possessor non percepit, in utraque actione eadem ratio pæne habetur, si prædo fuerit. Si vero bona fide possessor fuerit, non habetur ratio consumptorum neque non perceptorum: post inchoatam autem petitionem etiam illorum ratio habetur qui culpa possessoris percepti non sunt vel percepti consumpti sunt.

2. In a real action, if he determines against the claimant, he ought to absolve the possessor; if against the possessor, he ought to order the possessor to give up the thing itself together with the fruits. But if the possessor states that it is out of his power to give up the thing at once, and his request for delay seems honestly made, some indulgence should be accorded him; but he must first furnish a fidejussor to give security to the amount of the value of the thing in dispute, in case he should not restore it within the time allowed him. If an inheritance is claimed, the rules with regard to the fruits are the same as those we have laid down in the case of particular things. Of the fruits not gathered by the fault of the possessor, account is taken almost in the same way in both actions, when the possession is mala fide. The bona fide possessor has not to account for fruits, whether consumed or not gathered. But from the time when the claim is made, the possessor has to account for all fruits not gathered through his fault, or gathered and consumed.

D. vi. 1. 17. 1; D. vi. 1. 35. 1; D. vi. 1. 62. 1; C. iii. 32. 22.

What the words eadem ratio pæne habetur refer to is not easy to say. There do not seem to be any passages in the Digest which satisfactorily indicate any difference between the responsibilities of the mala fide possessor for fruits, according as the action was in rem, or was a petitio hereditatis.

Justinian here says that the position of a bona fide possessor was the same in the case of an inheritance and of a particular object; for that in neither case was he answerable for fruits gathered and consumed. But this was not the case after a senatusconsultum made in the time of Hadrian (D. v. 3. 20. 6), which made the bona fide possessor of an inheritance answerable for all that he had profited by (D. v. 3. 28); and he was therefore answerable for the fruits he had consumed. Perhaps the text may be based on some passage in the writings of a jurist, who wrote before the senatusconsultum was made.

3. Si ad exhibendum actum fuerit, non sufficit, si exhibeat rem is, cum quo actum est, sed opus est, ut etiam causam rei debeat exhibere, id est ut eam causam habeat actor, quam habiturus esset, si, cum primum ad exhibendum egisset, exhibita res fuisset: ideoque si inter moras usucapta sit res a possessore, nihilo minus condemnabitur. Præterea fructuum medi tempore, id est ejus, quod post acceptum ad exhibendum judicium ante rem judicatam intercessit, rationem habere debet iudex. Quod si neget is, cum quo ad exhibendum actum est, in presenti exhibere se posse et tempus exhibendi causa petat idque sine frustratione postulare videntur, dari ei debet, ut tamen caveat, se restitutum: quod si neque statim jussu iudicis rem exhibeat neque postea exhibiturum se caveat, condemnandus est in id, quod actoris intererat ab initio rem exhibitam esse.

3. In the action ad exhibendum it is not sufficient that the defendant exhibits the thing, but he must also exhibit his title to the thing, that is, he must give the claimant the same title as he would have had, if the thing had been exhibited immediately on the demand being made. If, therefore, during the delay, the possessor completes the usucaption of the thing, he will still be condemned. The judge ought also to make him account for the fruits of the intermediate time, that is, of the time elapsed between the granting the action ad exhibendum and the sentence. If the defendant in this action states that it is out of his power to make the exhibition immediately, and asks for time, and his request for delay seems honestly made, he should have time given him, but he must first give security that he will give the thing up. But if he neither exhibits the thing at once, upon the order of the judge, nor gives security for exhibiting it afterwards, he must be condemned in an amount equivalent to the interest of the claimant in having it exhibited immediately.

D. x. 4. 9. 5, 6; D. x. 4. 12. 4, 5.

4. Si familiæ erciscundæ judicio actum sit, singulas res singulis heredibus adjudicare debet et, si in alterius persona prægravare videatur adjudicatio, debet hunc invicem coheredi certa pecunia, sicut jam dictum est, condemnare. Eo quoque nomine coheredi quisque suo condemnandus est, quod solus fructus hereditarii fundi percepit aut rem hereditariam corripuit aut consumpsit. Quæ quidem similiter inter plures quoque quam duos coheredes subsequuntur.

4. In the action familiæ erciscundæ, he ought to adjudge each object to each heir separately, and if any one heir has more than his share adjudged him, the judge ought, as we have said above, to condemn him to pay his coheir a fixed sum as an equivalent. So, too, an heir ought to be condemned to make compensation to his coheirs, who has alone enjoyed the fruits of the land of the inheritance, or has damaged or consumed anything forming part of the inheritance. And these rules apply, whether the coheirs are two or more.

D. x. 2. 51. 1; D. x. 2. 52. 2.

was the same in the case of an inheritance and of a particular object; for that in neither case was he answerable for fruits gathered and consumed. But this was not the case after a senatusconsultum made in the time of Hadrian (D. v. 3. 20. 6), which made the bona fide possessor of an inheritance answerable for all that he had profited by (D. v. 3. 28); and he was therefore answerable for the fruits he had consumed. Perhaps the text may be based on some passage in the writings of a jurist, who wrote before the senatusconsultum was made.

3. Si ad exhibendum actum fuerit, non sufficit, si exhibeat rem is, cum quo actum est, sed opus est, ut etiam causam rei debeat exhibere, id est ut eam causam habeat actor, quam habiturus esset, si, cum primum ad exhibendum egisset, exhibita res fuisset: ideoque si inter moras usucapta sit res a possessore, nihilo minus condemnabitur. Præterea fructuum medi tempore, id est ejus, quod post acceptum ad exhibendum iudicium ante rem iudicatam intercessit, rationem habere debet iudex. Quod si neget is, cum quo ad exhibendum actum est, in presenti exhibere se posse et tempus exhibendi causam petat idque sine frustratione postulare videatur, dari ei debet, ut tamen caveat, se restitutum: quod si neque statim jussu iudicis rem exhibeat neque postea exhibiturum se caveat, condemnandus est in id, quod actoris intererat ab initio rem exhibitam esse.

3. In the action ad exhibendum it is not sufficient that the defendant exhibits the thing, but he must also exhibit his title to the thing, that is, he must give the claimant the same title as he would have had, if the thing had been exhibited immediately on the demand being made. If, therefore, during the delay, the possessor completes the usucaption of the thing, he will still be condemned. The judge ought also to make him account for the fruits of the intermediate time, that is, of the time elapsed between the granting the action ad exhibendum and the sentence. If the defendant in this action states that it is out of his power to make the exhibition immediately, and asks for time, and his request for delay seems honestly made, he should have time given him, but he must first give security that he will give the thing up. But if he neither exhibits the thing at once, upon the order of the judge, nor gives security for exhibiting it afterwards, he must be condemned in an amount equivalent to the interest of the claimant in having it exhibited immediately.

D. x. 4. 9. 5, 6; D. x. 4. 12. 4, 5.

4. Si familiæ eriscundæ iudicio actum sit, singulas res singulis heredibus adjudicare debet et, si in alterius persona prægravare videatur adjudicatio, debet hunc invicem coheredi certa pecunia, sicut jam dictum est, condemnare. Eo quoque nomine coheredi quisque suo condemnandus est, quod solus fructus hereditarii fundi percepit aut rem hereditariam corripuit aut consumpsit. Quæ quidem similiter inter plures quoque quam duos coheredes subsequuntur.

4. In the action familiæ eriscundæ, he ought to adjudge each object to each heir separately, and if any one heir has more than his share adjudged him, the judge ought, as we have said above, to condemn him to pay his coheir a fixed sum as an equivalent. So, too, an heir ought to be condemned to make compensation to his coheirs, who has alone enjoyed the fruits of the land of the inheritance, or has damaged or consumed anything forming part of the inheritance. And these rules apply, whether the coheirs are two or more.

D. x. 2. 51. 1; D. x. 2. 52. 2.

As to the office of the judge in the three actions noticed in this and the two succeeding paragraphs, see Introd. sec. 103.

5. Eadem interveniunt et si communi dividundo de pluribus rebus actum fuerit. Quod si de una re, veluti de fundo, si quidem iste fundus commode regionibus divisionem recipiat, partes ejus singulis adjudicare debet et, si unius pars pręgravare videbitur, is invicem certa pecunia alteri condemnandus est: quod si commode dividi non possit, vel homo forte aut mulus erit, de quo actum sit, uni totus adjudicandus est et is alteri certa pecunia condemnandus.

5. It is the same in the action communi dividundo for the division of a number of things. If there is only one object to be divided, for instance, a piece of land, the judge ought, if the land easily admits of division, to adjudge their respective shares to the several co-proprietors. And if one of them receives too large a share, the judge ought to order him to pay a sum of money as compensation to the other. If the thing is one that cannot be advantageously divided, as, for instance, a slave or mule, then the whole must be adjudged to one, and he must be condemned to pay a fixed sum as compensation to the other.

D. x. 2. 55; C. iii. 37. 3.

6. Si finium regundorum actum fuerit, dispicere debet iudex, an necessaria sit adjudicatio. Quę sane uno casu necessaria est, si evidentioribus finibus distingui agros commodius sit, quam olim fuissent distincti; nam tunc necesse est ex alterius agro partem aliquam alterius agri domino adjudicari: quo casu conveniens est, ut is alteri certa pecunia debeat condemnari. Eo quoque nomine damnandus est quisque hoc iudicio, quod forte circa fines malitiose aliquid commisit, verbi gratia quia lapides finales furatus est aut arbores finales cecidit. Contumacię quoque nomine quisque eo iudicio condemnatur, veluti si quis jubente iudice metiri agros passus non fuerit.

6. In the action finium regundorum the judge ought to examine if the adjudication is necessary, and it is so only in one case, viz. if it would be advantageous that the boundaries should be more clearly marked than before. In that case it becomes necessary to adjudge to one party a portion of the field of the other, and consequently the person to whom it is adjudged ought to be condemned to pay a fixed sum as compensation to the other. In this action he ought also to be condemned who has fraudulently interfered with the boundaries, as, for instance, by secretly carrying off the boundary stones, or cutting down the trees that mark the limit. A person may be also condemned by this same action for contumacy, who, in defiance of the order of the judge, opposes the measurement of the fields.

D. x. 1, 2. 1; D. x. 1. 3; D. x. 1. 4. 3, 4.

7. Quod autem istis judiciis alieni adjudicatum sit, id statim ejus fit, cui adjudicatum est.

7. In these actions, anything adjudged becomes at once the property of the person to whom it is adjudged.

TIT. XVIII. DE PUBLICIS JUDICIIS.

Publica judicia neque per actiones ordinantur nec omnino quidquam simile habent ceteris judiciis, de quibus locuti sumus, magnęque diversitas est eorum et in instituen-

Public prosecutions are not introduced by actions, and bear no resemblance to the other legal remedies of which we have been speaking. There is a great difference between them

As to the office of the judge in the three actions noticed in this and the two succeeding paragraphs, see Introd. sec. 103.

5. Eadem interveniunt et si communi dividundo de pluribus rebus actum fuerit. Quod si de una re, veluti de fundo, si quidem iste fundus commode regionibus divisionem recipiat, partes ejus singulis adjudicare debet et, si unius pars prægravare videbitur, is invicem certa pecunia alteri condemnandus est: quod si commode dividi non possit, vel homo forte aut mulus erit, de quo actum sit, uni totus adjudicandus est et is alteri certa pecunia condemnandus.

5. It is the same in the action communi dividundo for the division of a number of things. If there is only one object to be divided, for instance, a piece of land, the judge ought, if the land easily admits of division, to adjudge their respective shares to the several co-proprietors. And if one of them receives too large a share, the judge ought to order him to pay a sum of money as compensation to the other. If the thing is one that cannot be advantageously divided, as, for instance, a slave or mule, then the whole must be adjudged to one, and he must be condemned to pay a fixed sum as compensation to the other.

D. x. 2. 55; C. iii. 37. 3.

6. Si finium regundorum actum fuerit, dispicere debet iudex, an necessaria sit adjudicatio. Quæ sane uno casu necessaria est, si evidentioribus finibus distinguere agros commodius sit, quam olim fuissent distincti; nam tunc necesse est ex alterius agro partem aliquam alterius agri domino adjudicari: quo casu conveniens est, ut is alteri certa pecunia debeat condemnari. Eo quoque nomine damnandus est quisque hoc judicio, quod forte circa fines malitiose aliquid commisit, verbi gratia quia lapides finales furatus est aut arbores finales cecidit. Contumaciæ quoque nomine quisque eo judicio condemnatur, veluti si quis jubente iudice metiri agros passus non fuerit.

6. In the action finium regundorum the judge ought to examine if the adjudication is necessary, and it is so only in one case, viz. if it would be advantageous that the boundaries should be more clearly marked than before. In that case it becomes necessary to adjudge to one party a portion of the field of the other, and consequently the person to whom it is adjudged ought to be condemned to pay a fixed sum as compensation to the other. In this action he ought also to be condemned who has fraudulently interfered with the boundaries, as, for instance, by secretly carrying off the boundary stones, or cutting down the trees that mark the limit. A person may be also condemned by this same action for contumacy, who, in defiance of the order of the judge, opposes the measurement of the fields.

D. x. 1. 2. 1; D. x. 1. 3; D. x. 1. 4. 3, 4.

7. Quod autem istis judiciis alieni adjudicatum sit, id statim ejus fit, cui adjudicatum est.

7. In these actions, anything adjudged becomes at once the property of the person to whom it is adjudged.

TIT. XVIII. DE PUBLICIS JUDICIIS.

Publica judicia neque per actiones ordinantur nec omnino quidquam simile habent ceteris judiciis, de quibus locuti sumus, magnaque diversitas est eorum et in instituen-

Public prosecutions are not introduced by actions, and bear no resemblance to the other legal remedies of which we have been speaking. There is a great difference between them dis et in exercendis.

both in the mode in which they are begun and in that in which they are carried on.

The subject of public prosecutions is foreign to a treatise which, like the Institutes, professes to treat only of private law. It is not noticed at all in the Institutes of Gaius, and is treated in a very cursory manner in this Title. For the comprehension of this Title, it will be sufficient to observe that, in the later times of the Republic and in the first years of the Empire, a series of laws was made, fixing the penalty to be attached to particular crimes, and prescribing the procedure to be employed in the trial. Many of these laws are briefly referred to in this Title; and it was the trials conducted under their provisions that alone received the name of publica judicia. Under the Empire, most of the crimes not coming under these special laws, and especially those provided against by a senatusconsultum or constitution, were judged by the prætor or præfectus urbi in a more summary method. The judicium was then said to be not publicum, but extra ordinem; and gradually the method of procedure prescribed by the law for the different publica judicia fell into desuetude, and nothing was retained of the special laws but the penalty they fixed (D. xlviii. 1. 8), the procedure being the same as in the judicia extraordinaria. (See Introduction, sec. 112.)

1. Publica autem dicta sunt, quod cuivis ex populo executio eorum plerumque datur.

1. They are called public, because generally any citizen may institute them.

D. xxiii. 2. 43. 10.

There were certain persons excluded from the right of bringing a criminal accusation; for instance, women, unless the injury complained of was done to themselves or their near relations, persons below the age of puberty, persons made infamous by a judicial sentence, and persons so poor as not to possess fifty aurei. (D. xlviii. 2. 1, 8 and 10.) But, generally speaking, it was the right of any one to make a criminal charge, although he might be totally unconnected by any ties with the person who suffered from the crime.

2. Publicorum judiciorum quædam capitalia sunt, quædam non capitalia. Capitalia dicimus, quæ ultimo supplicio adficiunt vel aquæ et ignis interdictione vel deportatione vel metallo: cetera si qua infamiam irrogant cum damno pecuniario, hæc publica quidem sunt, non tamen capitalia.

2. Some public prosecutions are capital, some are not. We term capital those which involve the extreme punishment of the law, or the interdiction from fire and water, or deportation, or the mines. Those which carry with them infamy and a pecuniary penalty are public, but not capital.

D. xlviii. 1. 2.

3. Publica autem judicia sunt hæc. Lex Julia majestatis, quæ in eos, qui contra imperatorem vel rem publicam aliquid moliti sunt,

3. Public prosecutions are instituted under the following laws. The lex Julia majestatis, which subjects to its severe provisions all who attempt dis et in exercendis.

both in the mode in which they are begun and in that in which they are carried on.

The subject of public prosecutions is foreign to a treatise which, like the Institutes, professes to treat only of private law. It is not noticed at all in the Institutes of Gaius, and is treated in a very cursory manner in this Title. For the comprehension of this Title, it will be sufficient to observe that, in the later times of the Republic and in the first years of the Empire, a series of laws was made, fixing the penalty to be attached to particular crimes, and prescribing the procedure to be employed in the trial. Many of these laws are briefly referred to in this Title; and it was the trials conducted under their provisions that alone received the name of publica judicia. Under the Empire, most of the crimes not coming under these special laws, and especially those provided against by a senatusconsultum or constitution, were judged by the prætor or præfectus urbi in a more summary method. The judicium was then said to be not publicum, but extra ordinem; and gradually the method of procedure prescribed by the law for the different publica judicia fell into desuetude, and nothing was retained of the special laws but the penalty they fixed (D. xlviii. 1. 8), the procedure being the same as in the judicia extraordinaria. (See Introduction, sec. 112.)

1. Publica autem dicta sunt, quod cuivis ex populo executio eorum plerumque datur.

1. They are called public, because generally any citizen may institute them.

D. xxiii. 2. 43. 10.

There were certain persons excluded from the right of bringing a criminal accusation; for instance, women, unless the injury complained of was done to themselves or their near relations, persons below the age of puberty, persons made infamous by a judicial sentence, and persons so poor as not to possess fifty aurei. (D. xlviii. 2. 1, 8 and 10.) But, generally speaking, it was the right of any one to make a criminal charge, although he might be totally unconnected by any ties with the person who suffered from the crime.

2. Publicorum judiciorum quædam capitalia sunt, quædam non capitalia. Capitalia dicimus, quæ ultimo supplicio adficiunt vel aquæ et ignis interdictione vel deportatione vel metallo: cetera si qua infamiam irrogant cum damno pecuniario, hæc publica quidem sunt, non tamen capitalia.

2. Some public prosecutions are capital, some are not. We term capital those which involve the extreme punishment of the law, or the interdiction from fire and water, or deportation, or the mines. Those which carry with them infamy and a pecuniary penalty are public, but not capital.

D. xlviii. 1. 2.

3. Publica autem judicia sunt hæc. Lex Julia majestatis, quæ in eos, qui contra imperatorem vel rem publicam aliquid moliti sunt,

3. Public prosecutions are instituted under the following laws. The lex Julia majestatis, which subjects to its severe provisions all who attempt suum vigorem extendit. Cujus pœna animæ amissionem sustinet et memoria rei et post mortem damnatur.

anything against the emperor or State. The penalty it inflicts is the loss of life, and the memory of the guilty is condemned even after his death.

D. xlviii. 4. 11.

The lex Julia majestatis was passed in the time of Julius Cæsar. (D. xliii. 4.)

Aliquid moliti sunt. The design, without any overt act, was enough to sustain the charge. (C. ix. 8. 5.)

Et post mortem. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 1. 5.)

4. Item lex Julia de adulteriis coercendis, quæ non solum temeratores alienarum nuptiarum gladio punit, sed etiam eos, qui cum masculis infandam libidinem exercere audent. Sed eadem lege Julia etiam stupri flagitium punitur, cum quis sine vi vel virginem vel viduam honeste viventem stupraverit. Pœnam autem eadem lex irrogat peccatoribus, si honesti sunt, publicationem partis dimidiæ bonorum, si humiles, corporis coercionem cum relegatione.

4. Also the lex Julia de adulteriis, which punishes with death not only those who are guilty of adultery, but those also who give themselves up to works of lewdness with their own sex. The same law also punishes the seduction without violence of a virgin, or of a widow of honest character. The penalty upon offenders of honourable condition is the confiscation of half their fortune, upon those of low condition, corporal punishment and relegation.

D. xlviii. 5. 34.

The lex Julia de adulteriis belongs to the time of Augustus, about B.C. 17.

Gladio punit. The lex Julia only punished the guilty with confiscation of a portion of their property and relegation. (PAUL. Sent. ii. 26. 14.) Constantine affixed the graver penalty. (C. ix. 9. 31.)

5. Item lex Cornelia de sicariis, quæ homicidas ultore ferro persequitur vel eos, qui hominis occidendi causa cum telo ambulant. Telum autem, ut Gaius noster in interpretatione legis duodecim tabularum scriptum reliquit, vulgo quidem id appellatur, quod ab arcu mittitur, sed et omne significatur, quod manu cujusdam mittitur: sequitur ergo, ut et lapis et lignum et ferrum hoc nomine contineatur. Dictumque ab eo, quod in longinquum mittitur, a Græca voce figuratum, ἀπὸ τοῦ τηλοῦ: et hanc significationem invenire possumus et in Græco nomine: nam quod nos telum appellamus, illi βέλος appellant ἀπὸ τοῦ βάλλεσθαι. Admonet nos Xenophon; nam ita scripsit: καὶ τὰ βέλη ὁμοῦ ἐφέρετο, λόγῃ καὶ τοξείμῃ, σφενδόναι, πλείστοι δὲ καὶ λίθοι. Sicarii autem appellantur a sica, quod significat ferreum

5. Also the lex Cornelia de sicariis, which strikes with the sword of vengeance murderers and those who for the purpose of killing a man go armed with a telum. By telum, according to the interpretation given by our Gaius in his commentaries on the Twelve Tables, is ordinarily meant anything that is shot from a bow, but it equally signifies anything sent from the hand. Thus, a stone, a piece of wood, or of iron, is included in the meaning of the term, for it merely implies something impelled to a distance, being derived from the Greek word τηλοῦ. And the corresponding word in Greek has the same signification, for what we call telum they call βέλος, from βάλλεσθαι, as we may learn from Xenophon, who says, 'they collected the weapons (βέλη)—spears, arrows, slings, and a great quantity of stones.' Assassins are called sicarii from sica, an iron knife. By the anything against the emperor or State. The penalty it inflicts is the loss of life, and the memory of the guilty is condemned even after his death.

suum vigorem extendit. Cujus pœna animæ amissionem sustinet et memoria rei et post mortem damnatur.

D. xlviii. 4. 11.

The lex Julia majestatis was passed in the time of Julius Cæsar. (D. xliii. 4.)

Aliquid moliti sunt. The design, without any overt act, was enough to sustain the charge. (C. ix. 8. 5.)

Et post mortem. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 1. 5.)

4. Item lex Julia de adulteriis coercendis, quæ non solum temeratores alienarum nuptiarum gladio punit, sed etiam eos, qui cum masculis infandam libidinem exercere audent. Sed eadem lege Julia etiam stupri flagitium punitur, cum quis sine vi vel virginem vel viduam honeste viventem stupraverit. Pœnam autem eadem lex irrogat peccatoribus, si honesti sunt, publicationem partis dimidiæ bonorum, si humiles, corporis coercionem cum relegatione.

4. Also the lex Julia de adulteriis, which punishes with death not only those who are guilty of adultery, but those also who give themselves up to works of lewdness with their own sex. The same law also punishes the seduction without violence of a virgin, or of a widow of honest character. The penalty upon offenders of honourable condition is the confiscation of half their fortune, upon those of low condition, corporal punishment and relegation.

D. xlviii. 5. 34.

The lex Julia de adulteriis belongs to the time of Augustus, about B.C. 17.

Gladio punit. The lex Julia only punished the guilty with confiscation of a portion of their property and relegation. (PAUL. Sent. ii. 26. 14.) Constantine affixed the graver penalty. (C. ix. 9. 31.)

5. Item lex Cornelia de sicariis, quæ homicidas ultore ferro persequitur vel eos, qui hominis occidendi causa cum telo ambulant. Telum autem, ut Gaius noster in interpretatione legis duodecim tabularum scriptum reliquit, vulgo quidem id appellatur, quod ab arcu mittitur, sed et omne significatur, quod manu cujusdam mittitur: sequitur ergo, ut et lapis et lignum et ferrum hoc nomine contineatur. Dictumque ab eo, quod in longinquum mittitur, a Græca voce figuratum, ἀπὸ τοῦ τηλοῦ: et hanc significationem invenire possumus et in Græco nomine: nam quod nos telum appellamus, illi βέλος appellant ἀπὸ τοῦ βάλλεσθαι. Admonet nos Xenophon; nam ita scripsit: καὶ τὰ βέλη μοῦ ἐφέρετο, λόγχοι, τοξεύματα, σφενδόναι, πλείστοι δὲ καὶ λίθοι. Sicarii autem appellantur a sica, quod significat ferreum

5. Also the lex Cornelia de sicariis, which strikes with the sword of vengeance murderers and those who for the purpose of killing a man go armed with a telum. By telum, according to the interpretation given by our Gaius in his commentaries on the Twelve Tables, is ordinarily meant anything that is shot from a bow, but it equally signifies anything sent from the hand. Thus, a stone, a piece of wood, or of iron, is included in the meaning of the term, for it merely implies something impelled to a distance, being derived from the Greek word τηλοῦ. And the corresponding word in Greek has the same signification, for what we call telum they call βέλος, from βάλλεσθαι, as we may learn from Xenophon, who says, 'they collected the weapons (βέλη)—spears, arrows, slings, and a great quantity of stones.' Assassins are called sicarii from sica, an iron knife. By the same law, poisoners are capitally condemned who by hateful arts use poisons or magic charms to kill men, or publicly sell hurtful drugs.

cultrum. Eadem lege et venefici capite damnantur, qui artibus odiosis, tam venenis quam susurris magicis homines occiderunt vel mala medicamenta publice vendiderunt.

D. xlviii. 8. 1. pr. and 1; D. 1. 16. 233. 2.

Lex Cornelia de sicariis, passed during the dictatorship of Sylla, B.C. 81.

6. Alia deinde lex asperissimum crimen nova pœna persequitur, quæ Pompeia de parricidiis vocatur. Qua cavetur, ut, si quis parentis aut filii aut omnino adfectionis ejus, quæ nuncupatione parricidii continetur, fata properaverit, sive clam sive palam id ausus fuerit, nec non is, cujus dolo malo id factum est, vel conscius criminis existit, licet extraneus sit, pœna parricidii puniatur et neque gladio neque ignibus neque ulli alii sollemni pœnæ subjugetur, sed insutus culeo cum cane et gallo gallinaceo et vipera et simia et inter ejus ferales angustias comprehensus, secundum quod regionis qualitas tulerit, vel in vicinum mare vel in antrum projiciatur, ut omni elementorum usu vivus carere incipiat, et ei cælum superstiti, terra mortuo auferatur. Si quis autem alias cognatione vel adfinitate conjunctas personas necaverit, pœnam legis Corneliæ de sicariis sustinebit.

6. Another law, the lex Pompeia de parricidiis, inflicts on the most horrible of crimes a strange punishment. It provides, that any one who has hastened the death of a parent or child, or of any other relation whose murder is legally termed parricide, whether he acts openly or secretly, and whoever instigates or is an accomplice in the commission of the crime, although a stranger, shall undergo the penalty of parricide. He will be punished, not by the sword, nor by fire, nor by any ordinary mode of punishment, but he is to be sewed up in a sack with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and enclosed in this horrible prison he is to be, according to the nature of the place, thrown into the sea, or into a river, that even in his lifetime he may begin to be deprived of the use of the elements, and that the air may be denied to him while he lives, and the earth when he dies. He who kills persons allied to him by cognation or alliance, other than those we have mentioned, shall undergo the penalty of the lex Cornelia de sicariis.

D. xlviii. 9. 1, 9; C. ix. 17.

Lex Pompeia de parricidiis, passed in the consulship of Pompeius, B.C. 52. The punishment mentioned in the text is borrowed from the legislation of the Twelve Tables. The lex Pompeia, under the term parricidium, embraced the murder of any ascendant, of a brother or sister, of a husband or wife, of consobrini, of a step-father, step-mother, father-in-law, mother-in-law, &c., of a patron, and of a child if killed by the mother or grandfather, but not if killed by the father. (D. xlviii. 9. 1.) If there was no river at hand, the offender was torn to pieces by wild beasts. (D. xlviii. 9. 9. pr.)

7. Item lex Cornelia de falsis, quæ etiam testamentaria vocatur, pœnam irrogat ei, qui testamentum vel aliud instrumentum falsum scripserit, signaverit, recitaverit, subjecerit, quive signum adulterinum fecerit, sculpsit, expresserit sciens dolo malo. Ejusque legis pœna in

7. Also the lex Cornelia de falsis, otherwise called testamentaria, punishes any one who shall have written, sealed, read, or substituted a false testament, or any other instrument, or shall have made, cut, or impressed a false seal, knowingly and maliciously. The penalty is, upon a slave, the ex-

cultrum. Eadem lege et venefici capite damnantur, qui artibus odiosis, tam venenis quam susurris magicis homines occiderunt vel mala medicamenta publice vendiderunt.

same law, poisoners are capitally condemned who by hateful arts use poisons or magic charms to kill men, or publicly sell hurtful drugs.

D. xlviii. 8. 1. pr. and 1; D. 1. 16. 233. 2.

Lex Cornelia de sicariis, passed during the dictatorship of Sylla, B.C. 81.

6. Alia deinde lex asperimum crimen nova pœna persequitur, quæ Pompeia de parricidiis vocatur. Qua cavetur, ut, si quis parentis aut filii aut omnino adfectionis ejus, quæ nuncupatione parricidii continetur, fata properaverit, sive clam sive palam id ausus fuerit, nec non is, cujus dolo malo id factum est, vel conscius criminis existit, licet extraneus sit, pœna parricidii puniatur et neque gladio neque ignibus neque ulli alii sollemni pœnæ subjugetur, sed insutus culeo cum cane et gallo gallinaceo et vipera et simia et inter ejus ferales angustias comprehensus, secundum quod regionis qualitas tulerit, vel in vicinum mare vel in amnem projiciatur, ut omni elementorum usu vivus carere incipiat, et ei cælum superstiti, terra mortuo auferatur. Si quis autem alias cognatione vel adfinitate conjunctas personas necaverit, pœnam legis Corneliæ de sicariis sustinebit.

6. Another law, the lex Pompeia de parricidiis, inflicts on the most horrible of crimes a strange punishment. It provides, that any one who has hastened the death of a parent or child, or of any other relation whose murder is legally termed parricide, whether he acts openly or secretly, and whoever instigates or is an accomplice in the commission of the crime, although a stranger, shall undergo the penalty of parricide. He will be punished, not by the sword, nor by fire, nor by any ordinary mode of punishment, but he is to be sewed up in a sack with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and enclosed in this horrible prison he is to be, according to the nature of the place, thrown into the sea, or into a river, that even in his lifetime he may begin to be deprived of the use of the elements, and that the air may be denied to him while he lives, and the earth when he dies. He who kills persons allied to him by cognation or alliance, other than those we have mentioned, shall undergo the penalty of the lex Cornelia de sicariis.

D. xlviii. 9. 1, 9; C. ix. 17.

Lex Pompeia de parricidiis, passed in the consulship of Pompeius, B.C. 52. The punishment mentioned in the text is borrowed from the legislation of the Twelve Tables. The lex Pompeia, under the term parricidium, embraced the murder of any ascendant, of a brother or sister, of a husband or wife, of consobrini, of a step-father, step-mother, father-in-law, mother-in-law, &c., of a patron, and of a child if killed by the mother or grandfather, but not if killed by the father. (D. xlviii. 9. 1.) If there was no river at hand, the offender was torn to pieces by wild beasts. (D. xlviii. 9. 9. pr.)

7. Item lex Cornelia de falsis, quæ etiam testamentaria vocatur, pœnam irrogat ei, qui testamentum vel aliud instrumentum falsum scripserit, signaverit, recitaverit, subjecerit, quive signum adulterinum fecerit, sculperit, expresserit sciens dolo malo. Ejusque legis pœna in

7. Also the lex Cornelia de falsis, otherwise called testamentaria, punishes any one who shall have written, sealed, read, or substituted a false testament, or any other instrument, or shall have made, cut, or impressed a false seal, knowingly and maliciously. The penalty is, upon a slave, the ex-

servos ultimum supplicium est, quod et in lege de sicariis et veneficis servatur, in liberos vero deportatio.

treme punishment of the law, as is pronounced by the lex Cornelia upon assassins and poisoners; that upon freemen is deportation.

D. xlviii. 10. 1. 4, 13; D. xlviii. 10. 16. 1.

Lex Cornelia de falsis, or Cornelia testamentaria, was passed under the dictatorship of Sylla, B.C. 81.

8. Item lex Julia de vi publica seu privata adversus eos exoritur, qui vim vel armatam vel sine armis commiserint. Sed si quidem armata vis arguatur, deportatio ei ex lege Julia de vi publica irrogatur: si vero sine armis, in tertiam partem bonorum publicatio imponitur. Sin autem per vim raptus virginis vel viduæ vel sanctimonialis, velatæ vel aliæ, fuerit perpetratus, tunc et peccatores et ei, qui opem flagitio dederunt, capite puniuntur secundum nostræ constitutionis definitionem, ex qua hæc apertius possibile est scire.

8. Also the lex Julia de vi publica seu privata punishes those who are guilty of violence, whether with armed force or without. For violence with armed force, the penalty inflicted by the lex Julia de vi publica is deportation. For violence without arms, it is the confiscation of a third of the offender's property. But in case of the rape of a virgin, a widow, a person devoted to religion, whether wearing the veil or not, both the ravishers and all who have aided in the commission of the crime are punished capitally, according to the provisions of our constitution, in which may be found fuller information on this head.

D. xlviii. 6. 10. 2; C. ix. 13. 1.

Lex Julia de vi, passed in the time of Julius Cæsar or Augustus, but its exact date is not known.

9. Lex Julia peculatus eos punit, qui pecuniam vel rem publicam vel sacram vel religiosam furati fuerint. Sed si quidem ipsi iudices tempore administrationis publicas pecunias subtraxerunt, capitali animadversione puniuntur, et non solum hi, sed etiam qui ministerium eis ad hoc adhibuerunt vel qui subtracta ab his scientes susceperunt: alii vero, qui in hanc legem inciderint, pœnæ deportationis subjugantur.

9. Also the lex Julia peculatus punishes those who have stolen public money or property, or anything sacred or religious. Magistrates, who, during the time of their administration, have stolen the public money, are punishable capitally, as also are all who aid them in their robbery, or who knowingly receive their plunder from them. Other persons who offend against this law are subject to the penalty of deportation.

D. xlviii. 13. 1, 3; C. ix. 28.

Lex Julia peculatus. The exact date of this law is also unknown. It probably belongs to the same epoch as the lex Julia de vi.

10. Est et inter publica judicia lex Fabia de plagiariis, quæ interdum capitis pœnam ex sacris constitutionibus irrogat, interdum levior.

10. There is also among the laws giving rise to public prosecutions the lex Fabia de plagiariis, which inflicts, in certain cases, capital punishment according to the constitutions, sometimes a lighter punishment.

C. ix. 20. 7.

Cicero refers to this law (pro Rabirio, 3), but nothing more is servos ultimum supplicium est, quod et in lege de sicariis et veneficis servatur, in liberos vero deportatio.

treme punishment of the law, as is pronounced by the lex Cornelia upon assassins and poisoners; that upon freemen is deportation.

D. xlviii. 10. 1. 4, 13; D. xlviii. 10. 16. 1.

Lex Cornelia de falsis, or Cornelia testamentaria, was passed under the dictatorship of Sylla, B.C. 81.

8. Item lex Julia de vi publica seu privata adversus eos exoritur, qui vim vel armatam vel sine armis commiserint. Sed si quidem armata vis arguatur, deportatio ei ex lege Julia de vi publica irrogatur: si vero sine armis, in tertiam partem bonorum publicatio imponitur. Sin autem per vim raptus virginis vel viduæ vel sanctimonialis, velatæ vel aliæ, fuerit perpetratus, tunc et peccatores et ei, qui opem flagitio dederunt, capite puniuntur secundum nostræ constitutionis definitionem, ex qua hæc apertius possibile est scire.

8. Also the lex Julia de vi publica seu privata punishes those who are guilty of violence, whether with armed force or without. For violence with armed force, the penalty inflicted by the lex Julia de vi publica is deportation. For violence without arms, it is the confiscation of a third of the offender's property. But in case of the rape of a virgin, a widow, a person devoted to religion, whether wearing the veil or not, both the ravishers and all who have aided in the commission of the crime are punished capitally, according to the provisions of our constitution, in which may be found fuller information on this head.

D. xlviii. 6. 10. 2; C. ix. 13. 1.

Lex Julia de vi, passed in the time of Julius Cæsar or Augustus, but its exact date is not known.

9. Lex Julia peculatus eos punit, qui pecuniam vel rem publicam vel sacram vel religiosam furati fuerint. Sed si quidem ipsi iudices tempore administrationis publicas pecunias subtraxerunt, capitali animadversione puniuntur, et non solum hi, sed etiam qui ministerium eis ad hoc adhibuerunt vel qui subtracta ab his scientes susceperunt: alii vero, qui in hanc legem inciderint, pœnæ deportationis subjugantur.

9. Also the lex Julia peculatus punishes those who have stolen public money or property, or anything sacred or religious. Magistrates, who, during the time of their administration, have stolen the public money, are punishable capitally, as also are all who aid them in their robbery, or who knowingly receive their plunder from them. Other persons who offend against this law are subject to the penalty of deportation.

D. xlviii. 13. 1, 3; C. ix. 28.

Lex Julia peculatus. The exact date of this law is also unknown. It probably belongs to the same epoch as the lex Julia de vi.

10. Est et inter publica judicia lex Fabia de plagiariis, quæ interdum capitis pœnam ex sacris constitutionibus irrogat, interdum levior.

10. There is also among the laws giving rise to public prosecutions the lex Fabia de plagiariis, which inflicts, in certain cases, capital punishment according to the constitutions, sometimes a lighter punishment.

C. ix. 20. 7.

Cicero refers to this law (pro Rabirio, 3), but nothing more is known of it. A plagiarius was one who knowingly kept in irons, or confined, sold, gave, or bought a citizen (whether freeborn or a freedman) or the slave of another.

11. Sunt præterea publica judicia lex Julia ambitus et lex Julia repetundarum et lex Julia de annona et lex Julia de residuis, quæ de certis capitulis loquuntur et animæ quidem amissionem non irrogant, aliis autem pœnis eos subijciunt, qui præcepta earum neglexerint.

11. The following laws also pertain to public prosecutions: the lex Julia ambitus, the lex Julia repetundarum, the lex Julia de annona, and the lex Julia de residuis. These laws apply to certain special cases, and do not carry with them the punishment of death, but lesser punishments, against offenders.

D. xlviii. 11; D. xlviii. 13. 2. and 4. 3, 4, 5; D. xlviii. 12. 2;
D. xlviii. 14.

Lex Julia ambitus, made in the time of Augustus, to repress illegal methods of seeking offices. (D. xlviii. 14.)

Lex Julia repetundarum, made in the time of Julius Cæsar, to punish magistrates or judges for receiving bribes. (D. xlviii. 11.)

Lex Julia de annona, made to repress combinations for heightening the price of provisions. (D. xlviii. 12.)

Lex Julia de residuis, made to punish those who gave an incomplete account of, or misappropriated, public moneys committed to their charge. (D. xlviii. 13. 2.)

It is uncertain whether these last two laws belong to the time of Julius Cæsar or of Augustus.

12. Sed de publicis judiciis hæc exposuimus, ut vobis possibile sit summo digito et quasi per indicem ea tetigisse. Alioquin diligentior eorum scientia vobis ex latioribus digestorum sive pandectarum libris Deo propitio adventura est.

12. This notice of public prosecutions has only been meant to give you the merest sketch that might serve you as a guide to studying them. You may, with the blessing of God, gain a more complete knowledge of them from the fuller account given in the Digest or Pandects.

known of it. A plagiarius was one who knowingly kept in irons, or confined, sold, gave, or bought a citizen (whether freeborn or a freedman) or the slave of another.

11. Sunt præterea publica judicia lex Julia ambitus et lex Julia repetundarum et lex Julia de annona et lex Julia de residuis, quæ de certis capitulis loquuntur et animæ quidem amissionem non irrogant, aliis autem pœnis eos subijciunt, qui præcepta earum neglexerint.

11. The following laws also pertain to public prosecutions: the lex Julia ambitus, the lex Julia repetundarum, the lex Julia de annona, and the lex Julia de residuis. These laws apply to certain special cases, and do not carry with them the punishment of death, but lesser punishments, against offenders.

D. xlviii. 11; D. xlviii. 13. 2. and 4. 3, 4, 5; D. xlviii. 12. 2;
D. xlviii. 14.

Lex Julia ambitus, made in the time of Augustus, to repress illegal methods of seeking offices. (D. xlviii. 14.)

Lex Julia repetundarum, made in the time of Julius Cæsar, to punish magistrates or judges for receiving bribes. (D. xlviii. 11.)

Lex Julia de annona, made to repress combinations for heightening the price of provisions. (D. xlviii. 12.)

Lex Julia de residuis, made to punish those who gave an incomplete account of, or misappropriated, public moneys committed to their charge. (D. xlviii. 13. 2.)

It is uncertain whether these last two laws belong to the time of Julius Cæsar or of Augustus.

12. Sed de publicis judiciis hæc exposuimus, ut vobis possibile sit summo digito et quasi per indicem ea tetigisse. Alioquin diligentior eorum scientia vobis ex latioribus digestorum sive pandectarum libris Deo propitio adventura est.

12. This notice of public prosecutions has only been meant to give you the merest sketch that might serve you as a guide to studying them. You may, with the blessing of God, gain a more complete knowledge of them from the fuller account given in the Digest or Pandects.

SUMMARY.

BOOK I.

SOURCES OF LAW.

PRIVATE LAW: ITS SOURCES.—The Institutes treat of private law, jus privatum, the law that has to do with individuals, as distinguished from jus publicum, that which regards the Roman Empire and regulates religious worship and civil administration. (Tit. 1. 4, note.) The sources of private law are natural law, the law of nations, and the civil law. (A.) The two first are, in the system of Gaius, identical. That law which right reason commands, jus naturale, is also that law which is found to be common to the legal systems of different nations. Justinian sometimes adopts this method of speaking, and sometimes borrows passages in which the jus naturale has a larger sense, is thus distinguished from the jus gentium, and is extended to the rules which instinct makes animals obey. (Tit. 2. pr. note.) (B.) The civil law is the special law of the Romans, and is derived from the following sources:—

Sources of the Jus Civile.—1. Laws (leges) passed by the comitia curiata or centuriata. 2. Plebiscita, which by the lex Hortensia bound the whole people. (Tit. 2. 4.) 3. Senatusconsulta, which, especially after the beginning of the Empire, had the force of laws. (5.)* 4. The imperial constitutions, which, by virtue of the lex regia or law passed by the comitia curiata conferring the imperium, had the force of law, and which were of three kinds: (a) epistolæ, mandata, rescripta, announcements of the imperial will to different authorities; (b) decreta, judicial decisions of the Emperor; (c) edicta, enactments. (6.) 5. The edicts of the prætors (jus honorarium), who announced at the beginning of their year of office the rules they would follow in what was termed the edictum perpetuum, which ran on from year to year under successive prætors, with such additions and changes as each might think necessary, and which assumed a final shape in the time of Hadrian. The curule ædiles also issued edicts, which were part of the jus honorarium. (7.) 6. The responsa prudentium, who were first called on officially by Augustus to give their opinions, and

* When a number is placed between brackets, as here (5), it shows to which paragraph of the Title last mentioned reference is made.

SUMMARY.

BOOK I.

SOURCES OF LAW.

PRIVATE LAW: ITS SOURCES.—The Institutes treat of private law, jus privatum, the law that has to do with individuals, as distinguished from jus publicum, that which regards the Roman Empire and regulates religious worship and civil administration. (Tit. 1. 4, note.) The sources of private law are natural law, the law of nations, and the civil law. (A.) The two first are, in the system of Gaius, identical. That law which right reason commands, jus naturale, is also that law which is found to be common to the legal systems of different nations. Justinian sometimes adopts this method of speaking, and sometimes borrows passages in which the jus naturale has a larger sense, is thus distinguished from the jus gentium, and is extended to the rules which instinct makes animals obey. (Tit. 2. pr. note.) (B.) The civil law is the special law of the Romans, and is derived from the following sources:—

Sources of the Jus Civile.—1. Laws (leges) passed by the comitia curiata or centuriata. 2. Plebiscita, which by the lex Hortensia bound the whole people. (Tit. 2. 4.) 3. Senatusconsulta, which, especially after the beginning of the Empire, had the force of laws. (5.)* 4. The imperial constitutions, which, by virtue of the lex regia or law passed by the comitia curiata conferring the imperium, had the force of law, and which were of three kinds: (a) epistolæ, mandata, rescripta, announcements of the imperial will to different authorities; (b) decreta, judicial decisions of the Emperor; (c) edicta, enactments. (6.) 5. The edicts of the prætors (jus honorarium), who announced at the beginning of their year of office the rules they would follow in what was termed the edictum perpetuum, which ran on from year to year under successive prætors, with such additions and changes as each might think necessary, and which assumed a final shape in the time of Hadrian. The curule ædiles also issued edicts, which were part of the jus honorarium. (7.) 6. The responsa prudentium, who were first called on officially by Augustus to give their opinions, and

* When a number is placed between brackets, as here (5), it shows to which paragraph of the Title last mentioned reference is made.

whose decisions, when those who gave them agreed, were invested by Hadrian with the force of law. Special authority was given by Theodosius II. to the writings of the five great jurists, and, in case of their disagreement, to the writings of Papinian. (8.) 7. Custom, too, is one of the sources of private law, for customs are like laws, legem imitantur. Laws might be abrogated by desuetude (11), but particular customs could not prevail against general law. (9.)

LAW RELATING TO PERSONS.

Private law relates to persons, to things (including obligations), and actions. The law relating to persons is first treated under the three heads of status, that is, the legal capacity of persons, viz., libertas, civitas, and familia; and as libertas comes first, the first division of persons noticed is that into persons who are not free, i.e. slaves; and those who are freed, libertini, or free by birth, ingenui.

SLAVES.—Slavery, contrary to the law of nature, but recognised by the law of nations, is based on the fact that those who were originally treated as slaves had been preserved from death when defeated and captured in war. But all slaves are not captured in war: how then do these others become slaves? 1. By birth, for the children of a female slave always follow her condition; and, 2, slavery is inflicted as a punishment on persons born free, as upon a free person who, to share the price, colludes with a fictitious vendor who sells him as a slave, and on others guilty of great crimes, servi poene. (Tit. 3.) Opposed to slaves are those who are born free, born in matrimony, or, if not, of a woman who at any time after conception was free. (Tit. 4.) Lastly, there is an intermediate class, those born slaves, but made free (libertini), and their position depended on the mode and circumstances of the manumission.

MANUMISSION.—If manumission was made in any one of the three modes known to the old law, censu, vindicta, or testamento, it was said to be legitima; the slave became by manumission a Roman citizen until the time of Augustus, when, by the lex Ælia Sentia, another condition was imposed, and it was necessary that, unless the manumission was made vindicta, the emancipated slave should be thirty years old and the manumitter twenty (Tit. 6. 4); unless some good cause (5) for dispensing with this rule was shown to the council. The requirement of age in the testator, in the case of manumission by testament, was first reduced by Justinian from twenty years to seventeen, and subsequently done away with. (Tit. 6. 7, note.) It was also necessary that the master should have complete ownership of the slave. (Tit. 5. 3, note.) But if the manumission failed in any of these respects, or if it was made in a private manner, as by letter, or in presence of friends, the emancipated slave was in the position of a Latinus, not in that of a Roman citizen, it being, however, open to him to rise to the position of a citizen by certain modes, and chiefly whose decisions, when those who gave them agreed, were invested by Hadrian with the force of law. Special authority was given by Theodosius II. to the writings of the five great jurists, and, in case of their disagreement, to the writings of Papinian. (8.) 7. Custom, too, is one of the sources of private law, for customs are like laws, legem imitantur. Laws might be abrogated by desuetude (11), but particular customs could not prevail against general law. (9.)

LAW RELATING TO PERSONS.

Private law relates to persons, to things (including obligations), and actions. The law relating to persons is first treated under the three heads of status, that is, the legal capacity of persons, viz., libertas, civitas, and familia; and as libertas comes first, the first division of persons noticed is that into persons who are not free, i.e. slaves, and those who are freed, libertini, or free by birth, ingenui.

SLAVES.—Slavery, contrary to the law of nature, but recognised by the law of nations, is based on the fact that those who were originally treated as slaves had been preserved from death when defeated and captured in war. But all slaves are not captured in war: how then do these others become slaves? 1. By birth, for the children of a female slave always follow her condition; and, 2, slavery is inflicted as a punishment on persons born free, as upon a free person who, to share the price, colludes with a fictitious vendor who sells him as a slave, and on others guilty of great crimes, servi poenæ. (Tit. 3.) Opposed to slaves are those who are born free, born in matrimony, or, if not, of a woman who at any time after conception was free. (Tit. 4.) Lastly, there is an intermediate class, those born slaves, but made free (libertini), and their position depended on the mode and circumstances of the manumission.

MANUMISSION.—If manumission was made in any one of the three modes known to the old law, censu, vindicta, or testamento, it was said to be legitima; the slave became by manumission a Roman citizen until the time of Augustus, when, by the lex Ælia Sentia, another condition was imposed, and it was necessary that, unless the manumission was made vindicta, the emancipated slave should be thirty years old and the manumitter twenty (Tit. 6. 4); unless some good cause (5) for dispensing with this rule was shown to the council. The requirement of age in the testator, in the case of manumission by testament, was first reduced by Justinian from twenty years to seventeen, and subsequently done away with. (Tit. 6. 7, note.) It was also necessary that the master should have complete ownership of the slave. (Tit. 5. 3, note.) But if the manumission failed in any of these respects, or if it was made in a private manner, as by letter, or in presence of friends, the emancipated slave was in the position of a Latinus, not in that of a Roman citizen, it being, however, open to him to rise to the position of a citizen by certain modes, and chiefly by rendering public services. (Tit. 5. 3, note.) If, previously to emancipation, slaves had been guilty of some great crime, then they were only raised by emancipation to the rank of dediticii or surrendered enemies. Justinian abolished these distinctions and made every emancipated slave a Roman citizen. (Tit. 5. 3.) Further, the lex Ælia Sentia nullified manumissions made in prejudice of creditors, except that a slave, for the purpose of administering the inheritance, might be made the sole and necessary heir of the testator (Tit. 6. pr., 1); and the lex Furia Caninia, abolished by Justinian, limited the number of slaves a testator might manumit (Tit. 7). The power of a master over his slave, formerly unlimited, was gradually subjected to many restrictions. The Emperor Antoninus Pius extended the provisions of Sylla's law, the lex Cornelia de sicariis, which punished with death or exile the homicide of the slave of another, to the case of a master killing his own slave; and also protected slaves cruelly treated and fleeing to the statue of the emperor. (Tit. 8. 2.) Gradually, not only the life, but the person, and even the property, in fact though not in law, of the slave were protected. (Tit. 8. 2, note.)

CIVITAS is indirectly treated in the preceding notice of Latini, and in the twelfth and sixteenth Titles, in which the loss of citizenship is noticed. But the subject mainly belongs to the sphere of public law, and the rest of the First Book is occupied with considering the third head of status, FAMILIA.—Here the main division is into persons not sui juris and persons sui juris. The position of persons not sui juris is a consequence of the patria potestas. The subject of the patria potestas, the power of the father over his descendants, originally not much less than that of a master over his slaves, is discussed in the ninth and three following Titles. Justinian inquires, 1, How it arises; 2, How it is ended?

PATRIA POTESTAS: HOW IT ARISES.—It arises in three ways, by, 1, Marriage; 2, Legitimation; 3, Adoption.

I. MARRIAGE.—In order that marriage may give rise to the patria potestas, it must be according to law (justa nuptiæ), and for this there were three requisites: 1, Puberty (fourteen years for husband, twelve for wife); 2, Consent of the parties, the intention to be married manifested by the woman passing into the possession of the man; and 3, Connubium; the parties must be legally capable of being married to each other.

There were three ways in which the parties might fail to have this legal capacity. 1. They, or one of them, might be persons or a person whom the State held to be incapable of forming the nexus termed justa nuptiæ; as, for instance, a citizen and a foreigner could not form the tie of justa nuptiæ, &c. (Tit. 10. pr. and 11, note.) 2. They might be within the prohibited degrees of relationship (Tit. 10. 1-10); and it is to be remarked that relationship by adoption, as well as by blood, constitutes a bar. (Tit. 10. 2.) 3. They might, or one of them might, be in potestate, and then, unless the consent of the person in by rendering public services. (Tit. 5. 3, note.) If, previously to emancipation, slaves had been guilty of some great crime, then they were only raised by emancipation to the rank of dediticii or surrendered enemies. Justinian abolished these distinctions and made every emancipated slave a Roman citizen. (Tit. 5. 3.) Further, the lex Ælia Sentia nullified manumissions made in prejudice of creditors, except that a slave, for the purpose of administering the inheritance, might be made the sole and necessary heir of the testator (Tit. 6. pr., 1); and the lex Furia Caninia, abolished by Justinian, limited the number of slaves a testator might manumit (Tit. 7). The power of a master over his slave, formerly unlimited, was gradually subjected to many restrictions. The Emperor Antoninus Pius extended the provisions of Sylla's law, the lex Cornelia de sicariis, which punished with death or exile the homicide of the slave of another, to the case of a master killing his own slave; and also protected slaves cruelly treated and fleeing to the statue of the emperor. (Tit. 8. 2.) Gradually, not only the life, but the person, and even the property, in fact though not in law, of the slave were protected. (Tit. 8. 2, note.)

CIVITAS is indirectly treated in the preceding notice of Latini, and in the twelfth and sixteenth Titles, in which the loss of citizenship is noticed. But the subject mainly belongs to the sphere of public law, and the rest of the First Book is occupied with considering the third head of status, FAMILIA.—Here the main division is into persons not sui juris and persons sui juris. The position of persons not sui juris is a consequence of the patria potestas. The subject of the patria potestas, the power of the father over his descendants, originally not much less than that of a master over his slaves, is discussed in the ninth and three following Titles. Justinian inquires, 1, How it arises; 2, How it is ended?

PATRIA POTESTAS: HOW IT ARISES.—It arises in three ways, by, 1, Marriage; 2, Legitimation; 3, Adoption.

I. MARRIAGE.—In order that marriage may give rise to the patria potestas, it must be according to law (juxta nuptiæ), and for this there were three requisites: 1, Puberty (fourteen years for husband, twelve for wife); 2, Consent of the parties, the intention to be married manifested by the woman passing into the possession of the man; and 3, Connubium; the parties must be legally capable of being married to each other.

There were three ways in which the parties might fail to have this legal capacity. 1. They, or one of them, might be persons or a person whom the State held to be incapable of forming the nexus termed juxta nuptiæ; as, for instance, a citizen and a foreigner could not form the tie of juxta nuptiæ, &c. (Tit. 10. pr. and 11, note.) 2. They might be within the prohibited degrees of relationship (Tit. 10. 1-10); and it is to be remarked that relationship by adoption, as well as by blood, constitutes a bar. (Tit. 10. 2.) 3. They might, or one of them might, be in potestate, and then, unless the consent of the person in whose potestas they were was obtained, the marriage was invalid. (Tit. 10. pr.) Divorce was always permitted by mutual consent, but repudiation by one party only under penalties, except in case of misconduct, and with certain solemn forms.

II. LEGITIMATION, by which the offspring of concubinage were placed in the position of liberi legitimi, and this could be effected in three ways. 1. Oblation to the curia, i.e. enrolling the child in the number of those on whom the chief burdens of provincial towns fell. 2. The subsequent marriage of the parents; an act attesting the marriage and the ratification by the children being necessary. 3. The rescript of the emperor, granted in case one of the parents was dead. (Tit. 10. 13.)

A

III. ADOPTION.—A general term, under which is included adoptio properly so called, when a person in potestate was given in adoption, and arrogatio when the person adopted was sui juris. (Tit. 11.) Adoption in the old law was effected by three sales to destroy the patria potestas of the person given in adoption, and a fictitious process, in jure cessio, by which the person adopted was given over to the adopter; for which process Justinian substituted the execution of a deed before a magistrate. Arrogatio had a more public character, and was made originally before the curia, then before lictors representing the curia, and subsequently by imperial rescript. (1.) Originally a person adopted or arrogated was in the potestas of the person adopting or arrogating, exactly as if he had been so by birth, and was not in any way protected against him; but Justinian entirely altered the law as to adoptio, and under his legislation (unless the adopter was an ascendant paternal or maternal of the adopted, in which case the rules of the old law operated), the person adopted did not pass at all into the family of the adopter, but remained in his natural family; and the only effect of adoption was to give the adopted a right of succession to the adopter if intestate. Provisions were also made to protect the arrogated if he was not of the age of puberty. Such an arrogation was not permitted unless after inquiry it had been found to be beneficial to the arrogated, and if he was emancipated under the age of puberty, although for a good reason, he got all his own property back, while, if he was disinherited or emancipated without good reason before that age, he not only got his own property back, but got a fourth of the arrogator's property (quarta Antonina); and lastly, when he attained puberty, he could have the arrogation rescinded if prejudicial to him, (3, note.) Women, who had lost their own children, were permitted by the emperors to adopt. (10.) The chief rule as to the capacity of adopting is that adoption is said to imitate nature, and therefore the adopter must be eighteen years at least older than the adopted, so as to permit physically of his having been the natural father. (4.)

PATRIA POTESTAS : HOW ENDED.—The patria potestas might be dissolved in four ways. 1. Death of the parent; the grandson, however, whose father was living, passing into the power of the father on the grandfather's death. (Tit. 12. pr.) 2. Deminutio capitis;

whose potestas they were was obtained, the marriage was invalid. (Tit. 10. pr.) Divorce was always permitted by mutual consent, but repudiation by one party only under penalties, except in case of misconduct, and with certain solemn forms.

II. LEGITIMATION, by which the offspring of concubinage were placed in the position of liberi legitimi, and this could be effected in three ways.

1. Oblation to the curia, i.e. enrolling the child in the number of those on whom the chief burdens of provincial towns fell. 2. The subsequent marriage of the parents; an act attesting the marriage and the ratification by the children being necessary. 3. The rescript of the emperor, granted in case one of the parents was dead. (Tit. 10. 13.)

A

III. ADOPTION.—A general term, under which is included adoptio properly so called, when a person in potestate was given in adoption, and arrogatio when the person adopted was sui juris. (Tit. 11.) Adoption in the old law was effected by three sales to destroy the patria potestas of the person given in adoption, and a fictitious process, in jure cessio, by which the person adopted was given over to the adopter; for which process Justinian substituted the execution of a deed before a magistrate. Arrogatio had a more public character, and was made originally before the curia, then before lictors representing the curia, and subsequently by imperial rescript. (1.) Originally a person adopted or arrogated was in the potestas of the person adopting or arrogating, exactly as if he had been so by birth, and was not in any way protected against him; but Justinian entirely altered the law as to adoptio, and under his legislation (unless the adopter was an ascendant paternal or maternal of the adopted, in which case the rules of the old law operated), the person adopted did not pass at all into the family of the adopter, but remained in his natural family; and the only effect of adoption was to give the adopted a right of succession to the adopter if intestate. Provisions were also made to protect the arrogated if he was not of the age of puberty. Such an arrogation was not permitted unless after inquiry it had been found to be beneficial to the arrogated, and if he was emancipated under the age of puberty, although for a good reason, he got all his own property back, while, if he was disinherited or emancipated without good reason before that age, he not only got his own property back, but got a fourth of the arrogator's property (quarta Antonina); and lastly, when he attained puberty, he could have the arrogation rescinded if prejudicial to him, (3, note.) Women, who had lost their own children, were permitted by the emperors to adopt. (10.) The chief rule as to the capacity of adopting is that adoption is said to imitate nature, and therefore the adopter must be eighteen years at least older than the adopted, so as to permit physically of his having been the natural father. (4.)

PATRIA POTESTAS: HOW ENDED.—The patria potestas might be dissolved in four ways. 1. Death of the parent; the grandson, however, whose father was living, passing into the power of the father on the grandfather's death. (Tit. 12. pr.) 2. Deminutio capitis;

the father or son losing that civic position which was necessary for the exercise of patria potestas; and this might happen by (a) deportatio in insulam (1); (b) condemnatio to be a servus pœnæ (3); and (c) captivitas. But if the capite minutus was restored by the emperor to his former rights (1), or if the prisoner became free, then (by what in the second of these cases was termed jus postliminiû) the father was placed in exactly the same position as if the deportatio or captivitas had not taken place. (5.) 3. Attainment of dignities, by the son attaining the patriciate (4) or, subsequently to the date of the Institutes, other dignities. (4, note.) 4. Emancipation, which, under the old law, was effected by three fictitious sales made by the father, and then the purchaser reselling the son to the father, who then manumitted him; the object of this being that the father, being the manumittor, might have the rights of patronage, the chief of which was the same right of succession to the son as the manumittor of a slave had, in case of his enfranchisement. (Tit. 12. 6, note, and Tit. 5. 3, note.) Under the legislation of Justinian, emancipation was effected by a declaration before a judge or magistrate. (Tit. 12. 6.)

OTHER FORMS OF POTESTAS.—In order to make the subject of Potestas complete, we ought to notice not only, 1, the power of the master over the slave, and 2, the power of the father over his descendants, but 3, the power of the husband over the wife who passed in manum, as she did when married, by (a) confarreatio; (b) coemptio, or fictitious sale; and (c) usus, the parties living together for a year without the wife breaking the use by three nights' absence (Tit. 10. pr., note); and 4, the power, in the old law, of the purchaser over a person in mancipio, that is, sold to him by the father of the person sold, the person in mancipio being, as regards the purchaser, almost in the position of a slave, although, as regards others, he was still ingenuus. (Tit. 8. pr., note.)

PERSONS SUI JURIS: THEIR INCAPACITIES. TUTORS AND CURATORS.

—From the beginning of the 8th Title we have been considering persons in potestate. We now turn to persons sui juris; but it is only of certain incapacities of persons sui juris that the Institutes treat: incapacities arising from, 1, age; 2, physical or mental infirmity; or (so far as reference is made to an earlier period of law), 3, sex. Tutors were appointed to protect the interests and authorise the acts of pupils under the age of puberty; and curators might be appointed to watch over, 1, prodigals; 2, persons afflicted with mental or great physical infirmity; 3, persons above the age of puberty, but under the age of twenty-five years. The rest of this book is taken up with the subject of tutors and curators.

TUTORS: HOW APPOINTED.—Tutors are first divided, according to the mode of their appointment, into, 1, Testamentary, 2, Legitimate, 3, Fiduciary, and 4, Given by the magistrate.

I. Testamentary Tutors: who may appoint.—The paterfamilias may appoint testamentary tutors to all descendants under his power

the father or son losing that civic position which was necessary for the exercise of patria potestas; and this might happen by (a) deportatio in insulam (1); (b) condemnatio to be a servus pœnæ (3); and (c) captivitas. But if the capite minutus was restored by the emperor to his former rights (1), or if the prisoner became free, then (by what in the second of these cases was termed jus postliminiû) the father was placed in exactly the same position as if the deportatio or captivitas had not taken place. (5.) 3. Attainment of dignities, by the son attaining the patriciate (4) or, subsequently to the date of the Institutes, other dignities. (4, note.) 4. Emancipation, which, under the old law, was effected by three fictitious sales made by the father, and then the purchaser reselling the son to the father, who then manumitted him; the object of this being that the father, being the manumittor, might have the rights of patronage, the chief of which was the same right of succession to the son as the manumittor of a slave had, in case of his enfranchisement. (Tit. 12. 6, note, and Tit. 5. 3, note.) Under the legislation of Justinian, emancipation was effected by a declaration before a judge or magistrate. (Tit. 12. 6.)

OTHER FORMS OF POTESTAS.—In order to make the subject of Potestas complete, we ought to notice not only, 1, the power of the master over the slave, and 2, the power of the father over his descendants, but 3, the power of the husband over the wife who passed in manum, as she did when married, by (a) confarreatio; (b) coemptio, or fictitious sale; and (c) usus, the parties living together for a year without the wife breaking the use by three nights' absence (Tit. 10. pr., note); and 4, the power, in the old law, of the purchaser over a person in mancipio, that is, sold to him by the father of the person sold, the person in mancipio being, as regards the purchaser, almost in the position of a slave, although, as regards others, he was still ingenuus. (Tit. 8. pr., note.)

PERSONS SUI JURIS : THEIR INCAPACITIES. TUTORS AND CURATORS.

—From the beginning of the 8th Title we have been considering persons in potestate. We now turn to persons sui juris; but it is only of certain incapacities of persons sui juris that the Institutes treat: incapacities arising from, 1, age; 2, physical or mental infirmity; or (so far as reference is made to an earlier period of law), 3, sex. Tutors were appointed to protect the interests and authorise the acts of pupils under the age of puberty; and curators might be appointed to watch over, 1, prodigals; 2, persons afflicted with mental or great physical infirmity; 3, persons above the age of puberty, but under the age of twenty-five years. The rest of this book is taken up with the subject of tutors and curators.

TUTORS : HOW APPOINTED.—Tutors are first divided, according to the mode of their appointment, into, 1, Testamentary, 2, Legitimate, 3, Fiduciary, and 4, Given by the magistrate.

I. Testamentary Tutors : who may appoint.—The paterfamilias may appoint testamentary tutors to all descendants under his power who become sui juris on his death. (Tit. 13. 3.) This excludes grandchildren having a father living, who, by the death of the paterfamilias, come under the power of their own father (3), and includes posthumous children of the paterfamilias, who become sui juris at his death. (4.) The wishes of the father were also carried out by the magistrate (usually as a matter of course), if he appointed a testator by his testament to an emancipated child; and the magistrate generally ratified, after he had inquired into the circumstances, the appointment of a testamentary tutor by a father in case of his natural children, or such an appointment by others who had a strong interest in, or had left property to, any child under the age of puberty. (5, note.)

Testamentary Tutors: who may be appointed.—A filiusfamilias could be appointed to the office, as it was of a public character. (Tit. 14. pr.) Women could not, although the emperor would sometimes interfere to confirm their appointment. (Tit. 14. pr., note.) Slaves could not; and, if a slave of the testator was appointed tutor, the appointment was held to carry the freedom of the slave with it, and if the testator appointed the slave of another, this imposed on the testamentary heir the duty of purchasing, if possible, the freedom of the slave. If a madman, or a person under the age of twenty-five years, was appointed a testamentary tutor, he could only act if he became sane, or after he was twenty-five, and, meantime, the magistrate appointed another tutor. (2.) A tutor could be appointed to hold his office after or up to a certain time (3), but he could not be appointed to discharge one portion only of the functions of a tutor, as he was given to the person, not to the property. (4.)

3 II. Legitimate Tutors (i.e. called to their office by the statute law).—

1. In case no testamentary tutor had been appointed, the agnati had a claim, under the law of the Twelve Tables, to be tutors, and hence were called legitimi tutores (Tit. 15. pr.), and this includes the case of the testamentary tutor dying in the lifetime of the testator. (2.) Under the later emperors the mother, and even the grandmother, might be appointed tutors, where none was appointed by testament. (3, note.)
2 The right to be tutor did not belong to all the agnati, but only to those nearest in degree, all those in the same degree sharing the office. 3
(Tit. 16. 7.)

CAPITIS DEMINUTIO.—The tie of agnation being severed by capitis deminutio, the Institutes digress to explain, in the 16th Title, what capitis deminutio means. It means a change in the caput, or legal existence, of a person, so that his status undergoes change in one or more, or all, of its elements, viz. liberty, citizenship, and family. (Tit. 16. pr.) The deminutio is termed maxima when all three elements are lost, when the capite minutus ceases to be free and to be a citizen, and loses his family position, as would happen in the case of servi pœnæ, freedmen condemned to be again slaves for ingratitude, and freemen joining in a fraudulent sale of themselves. (1.) The capitis deminutio was called media when liberty was not touched, but citizenship was lost, and with who become sui juris on his death. (Tit. 13. 3.) This excludes grandchildren having a father living, who, by the death of the paterfamilias, come under the power of their own father (3), and includes posthumous children of the paterfamilias, who become sui juris at his death. (4.) The wishes of the father were also carried out by the magistrate (usually as a matter of course), if he appointed a testator by his testament to an emancipated child; and the magistrate generally ratified, after he had inquired into the circumstances, the appointment of a testamentary tutor by a father in case of his natural children, or such an appointment by others who had a strong interest in, or had left property to, any child under the age of puberty. (5, note.)

Testamentary Tutors : who may be appointed.—A filiusfamilias could be appointed to the office, as it was of a public character. (Tit. 14. pr.) Women could not, although the emperor would sometimes interfere to confirm their appointment. (Tit. 14. pr., note.) Slaves could not; and, if a slave of the testator was appointed tutor, the appointment was held to carry the freedom of the slave with it, and if the testator appointed the slave of another, this imposed on the testamentary heir the duty of purchasing, if possible, the freedom of the slave. If a madman, or a person under the age of twenty-five years, was appointed a testamentary tutor, he could only act if he became sane, or after he was twenty-five, and, meantime, the magistrate appointed another tutor. (2.) A tutor could be appointed to hold his office after or up to a certain time (3), but he could not be appointed to discharge one portion only of the functions of a tutor, as he was given to the person, not to the property. (4.)

II. Legitimate Tutors (i.e. called to their office by the statute law).—

1. In case no testamentary tutor had been appointed, the agnati had a claim, under the law of the Twelve Tables, to be tutors, and hence were called legitimi tutores (Tit. 15. pr.), and this includes the case of the testamentary tutor dying in the lifetime of the testator. (2.) Under the later emperors the mother, and even the grandmother, might be appointed tutors, where none was appointed by testament. (3, note.) The right to be tutor did not belong to all the agnati, but only to those nearest in degree, all those in the same degree sharing the office. (Tit. 16. 7.)

CAPITIS DEMINUTIO.—The tie of agnation being severed by capitis deminutio, the Institutes digress to explain, in the 16th Title, what capitis deminutio means. It means a change in the caput, or legal existence, of a person, so that his status undergoes change in one or more, or all, of its elements, viz. liberty, citizenship, and family. (Tit. 16. pr.) The deminutio is termed maxima when all three elements are lost, when the capite minutus ceases to be free and to be a citizen, and loses his family position, as would happen in the case of servi pœnæ, freedmen condemned to be again slaves for ingratitude, and freemen joining in a fraudulent sale of themselves. (1.) The capitis deminutio was called media when liberty was not touched, but citizenship was lost, and with it family position, as would happen in the case of any one interdicted fire and water, or deported to an island. (2.) The capitis deminutio was said to be minima when liberty and citizenship were not touched, but the family position was altered, as in the case of adoption, arrogation, emancipation, or, in the old law, a wife's passing in manum. (3.) The rights of agnation are affected by all the three kinds, but those of cognation only by the maxima and media. (6.) The minima capitis deminutio, or change of family, so far changed the legal existence of the person undergoing it that, under the old law, he not only lost his place in the intestate succession of the family he quitted, but he could not be sued for his antecedent debts, and any usufructs he held came to an end. (3, note.) Mere loss of dignity, and even infamy, produced no change of status. (5.)

2. To return to the subject of legitimate tutors. Patrons are the legitimate tutors of their freedmen and freedwomen. In case the manumissors are dead, their children are the legitimate tutors of the freedmen and freedwomen. (Tit. 17.)

3. Parents are the legitimate tutors of their children or other descendants whom they have emancipated below the age of puberty. (Tit. 18.)

III. Fiduciary Tutors.—In case the master emancipated his slave, and died before the freedman attained the age of puberty, the tutelage of this slave passed by law, or rather by an extension of the law of the Twelve Tables (Tit. 17), to the children of the emancipator. But if an ascendant emancipated his descendant, and died before the person emancipated attained the age of puberty, the tutelage also passed to the children of the emancipator, but it was not supposed to do so by any express law, and the tutors in this case were called, not legitimi, but fiduciarii, a term properly applied to the nominal tutor, who, in case of emancipation, did not resell to the father, but himself emancipated the son, and had thus, as emancipator, the tutelage, which he held in trust (whence he was called fiduciarius) for the father. (Tit. 19.)

IV. Tutors appointed by the magistrate.—Tutors were appointed by the magistrate under the lex Atilia and the lex Julia et Titia. Under the first of these laws a tutor was appointed at Rome by the prætor and a majority of the tribunes; and under the second, in the provinces, by the præses (Tit. 20. pr.), if there was no tutor on whom the office devolved under the heads of appointment already noticed, or if from any cause there was a vacancy in the office. (1, 2.) Subsequently, under the empire, the tutor was in such cases appointed at Rome by the præfectus urbis, if the position of the pupil was a high one, and by the prætor urbanus if it was not. The præses appointed in the provinces, and, in cases of small importance, the local magistrates; but these magistrates needed the preliminary authority of the præses. In all cases, inquiry was made into the circumstances before the appointment was made. (Tit. 20. 4.) Justinian, in cases where the fortune of the pupil or adult (for here we have a provision extending to curators)

it family position, as would happen in the case of any one interdicted fire and water, or deported to an island. (2.) The capitis deminutio was said to be minima when liberty and citizenship were not touched, but the family position was altered, as in the case of adoption, arrogation, emancipation, or, in the old law, a wife's passing in manum. (3.) The rights of agnation are affected by all the three kinds, but those of cognation only by the maxima and media. (6.) The minima capitis deminutio, or change of family, so far changed the legal existence of the person undergoing it that, under the old law, he not only lost his place in the intestate succession of the family he quitted, but he could not be sued for his antecedent debts, and any usufructs he held came to an end. (3, note.) Mere loss of dignity, and even infamy, produced no change of status. (5.)

2. To return to the subject of legitimate tutors. Patrons are the legitimate tutors of their freedmen and freedwomen. In case the manumittors are dead, their children are the legitimate tutors of the freedmen and freedwomen. (Tit. 17.)

3. Parents are the legitimate tutors of their children or other descendants whom they have emancipated below the age of puberty. (Tit. 18.)

III. Fiduciary Tutors.—In case the master emancipated his slave, and died before the freedman attained the age of puberty, the tutelage of this slave passed by law, or rather by an extension of the law of the Twelve Tables (Tit. 17), to the children of the emancipator. But if an ascendant emancipated his descendant, and died before the person emancipated attained the age of puberty, the tutelage also passed to the children of the emancipator, but it was not supposed to do so by any express law, and the tutors in this case were called, not legitimi, but fiduciarii, a term properly applied to the nominal tutor, who, in case of emancipation, did not resell to the father, but himself emancipated the son, and had thus, as emancipator, the tutelage, which he held in trust (whence he was called fiduciarius) for the father. (Tit. 19.)

IV. Tutors appointed by the magistrate.—Tutors were appointed by the magistrate under the lex Atilia and the lex Julia et Titia. Under the first of these laws a tutor was appointed at Rome by the prætor and a majority of the tribunes; and under the second, in the provinces, by the præses (Tit. 20. pr.), if there was no tutor on whom the office devolved under the heads of appointment already noticed, or if from any cause there was a vacancy in the office. (1, 2.) Subsequently, under the empire, the tutor was in such cases appointed at Rome by the præfectus urbis, if the position of the pupil was a high one, and by the prætor urbanus if it was not. The præses appointed in the provinces, and, in cases of small importance, the local magistrates; but these magistrates needed the preliminary authority of the præses. In all cases, inquiry was made into the circumstances before the appointment was made. (Tit. 20. 4.) Justinian, in cases where the fortune of the pupil or adult (for here we have a provision extending to curators) did not exceed 500 solidi, allowed the local magistrate to appoint without any authorisation, merely taking security from the person appointed, without inquiring into the circumstances of the case. (5.)

TUTELAGE OF WOMEN.—Under the old law women were in tutelage all their lives, even after they had become sui juris, the tutor being appointed by the testament of the husband, if she was in manu, and the husband could not only appoint a tutor, but give the wife the option of choosing one. If no testamentary tutor was appointed, the nearest agnatus was the tutor; and the tutor might be changed, either by his act, or on the woman's application. After she had attained the age of puberty, the woman under tutelage managed her own affairs, but the tutor had to intervene in order to sanction solemn acts. All this tutelage of women above the age of puberty had become obsolete before the time of Justinian. (6, note.)

AUTHORITY OF THE TUTOR.—The tutor had, in the first place, to manage the affairs of the pupil; and, in the second place, to add his uctoritas, i.e. the supplement of what was wanted to make the pupil legally competent to act. If the pupil was under seven years old, the tutor could only in very rare cases, where the benefit was clearly great for the pupil, go through any acts on behalf of the infant beyond such as were necessary for the ordinary management of his affairs. It was only, for example, at a late period of the empire, that the tutor was allowed to enter on an inheritance on behalf of the infans. Between the ages of seven and fourteen, the pupil could contract without the authorisation of the tutor, so far as the contract was beneficial to him; but every unauthorised contract was inoperative to his prejudice. (Tit. 21. pr., note.) The pupil could not take any very serious step involving possible risk, such as entering on an inheritance, demanding possession of goods, or taking an inheritance under a fideicommissum, without the authorisation of the tutor. (1.) The tutor was obliged to give this authorisation personally, not by writing, and could not give it by ratification. (2.) If there was a suit between the tutor and pupil, a curator was appointed to intervene in this suit on behalf of the pupil. (3.)

TERMINATION OF TUTOR'S OFFICE.—The office of a tutor came to an end—

(a) By the pupil reaching the age of puberty, which had previously been regarded as a time varying according to the facts of each case, eighteen years being the maximum, but which Justinian fixed at fourteen for males, and twelve for females. (Tit. 22. pr.)

(b) By the pupil being arrogated, deported, reduced to slavery, or made a captive, or dying. (1.)

(c) By the condition being fulfilled on which the testamentary tutor was to cease to be tutor, or the time having expired during which the testamentary tutor was to act. (3, 5.)

(d) By the tutor dying (3); or—

(e) Undergoing, however appointed, the maxima or media capitis deminutio (4); and did not exceed 500 solidi, allowed the local magistrate to appoint without any authorisation, merely taking security from the person appointed, without inquiring into the circumstances of the case. (5.)

TUTELAGE OF WOMEN.—Under the old law women were in tutelage all their lives, even after they had become sui juris, the tutor being appointed by the testament of the husband, if she was in manu, and the husband could not only appoint a tutor, but give the wife the option of choosing one. If no testamentary tutor was appointed, the nearest agnatus was the tutor; and the tutor might be changed, either by his act, or on the woman's application. After she had attained the age of puberty, the woman under tutelage managed her own affairs, but the tutor had to intervene in order to sanction solemn acts. All this tutelage of women above the age of puberty had become obsolete before the time of Justinian. (6, note.)

AUTHORITY OF THE TUTOR.—The tutor had, in the first place, to manage the affairs of the pupil; and, in the second place, to add his autoritas, i.e. the supplement of what was wanted to make the pupil legally competent to act. If the pupil was under seven years old, the tutor could only in very rare cases, where the benefit was clearly great for the pupil, go through any acts on behalf of the infant beyond such as were necessary for the ordinary management of his affairs. It was only, for example, at a late period of the empire, that the tutor was allowed to enter on an inheritance on behalf of the infans. Between the ages of seven and fourteen, the pupil could contract without the authorisation of the tutor, so far as the contract was beneficial to him; but every unauthorised contract was inoperative to his prejudice. (Tit. 21. pr., note.) The pupil could not take any very serious step involving possible risk, such as entering on an inheritance, demanding possession of goods, or taking an inheritance under a fideicommissum, without the authorisation of the tutor. (1.) The tutor was obliged to give this authorisation personally, not by writing, and could not give it by ratification. (2.) If there was a suit between the tutor and pupil, a curator was appointed to intervene in this suit on behalf of the pupil. (3.)

TERMINATION OF TUTOR'S OFFICE.—The office of a tutor came to an end—

(a) By the pupil reaching the age of puberty, which had previously been regarded as a time varying according to the facts of each case, eighteen years being the maximum, but which Justinian fixed at fourteen for males, and twelve for females. (Tit. 22. pr.)

(b) By the pupil being arrogated, deported, reduced to slavery, or made a captive, or dying. (1.)

(c) By the condition being fulfilled on which the testamentary tutor was to cease to be tutor, or the time having expired during which the testamentary tutor was to act. (3, 5.)

(d) By the tutor dying (3); or—

(e) Undergoing, however appointed, the maxima or media capitis deminutio (4); and

(f) In the case of a tutor legitimus, his undergoing the minima capitis deminutio. (4.) And

(g) By the tutor being removed as suspected, or being relieved from his office on good grounds of excuse. (6.)

CURATORS: WHOM THEY WERE TO PROTECT.—Curators were appointed to protect the property and interests of four classes of persons:—

1. Madmen (furiosi).—This was by the law of the Twelve Tables, and was extended by the prætors so as to include all forms of mental alienation (Tit. 23. 3, note), and the deaf, mute, and permanently infirm. (4.)

2. Prodigals (i.e. persons wasting recklessly their property).—This was also by the law of the Twelve Tables, but that law only applied to the case of a prodigal wasting goods received under an intestate succession, while the prætor extended it to all cases of prodigality. The fact of the madness or prodigality was first ascertained by the prætor, and then the prodigus was absolutely interdicted from managing his own affairs, but the furiosus was not so interdicted, and was only placed under the care of the curator. When the case came within the law of the Twelve Tables, the curatorship of the furiosus and prodigus belonged to the nearest agnate. The magistrate appointed in cases of the prætorian extensions of the terms, and in the time of Justinian in all cases. (Tit. 23. 3.)

3. Adolescentes.—Persons of either sex, above the age of puberty, and under the age of twenty-five years.

The lex Platoria subjected to prosecution and infamy persons overreaching adolescents under twenty-five years, and possibly allowed cheat curators to be appointed to protect them. Subsequently prætors protected such persons by ordering, in case they had been prejudiced, a restitutio in integrum, that is, that they should be put in the same position which they would have occupied if not prejudiced. Lastly, Marcus Antoninus ordered that curators should be appointed in all cases on the application of the minor. (Tit. 23. pr., note.) The adolescent was not obliged to have a curator for general purposes unless he wished, but a curator could be forced on him in case of a lawsuit, or his debtor wishing to pay him, or his late tutor wishing to settle accounts with him; and if he had a curator he could not alienate any part of his property without the sanction of the curator. (Tit. 23. 2, note.) The curator to an adolescent could only be appointed by the magistrate, the same magistrates appointing who appointed tutors; but a magistrate would generally have regard to the wishes, as to curatorship, expressed in the testament of a person who could have appointed a tutor. (1.)

4. Pupils.—Pupils sometimes received curators, as, for example, if the tutor legitimus was unfit, a curator was appointed to protect the pupil and act, to a great extent, instead of the tutor; or, if the testamentary tutor, or the tutor appointed by the magistrate, was unfit, a curator

(f) In the case of a tutor legitimus, his undergoing the minima capitis deminutio. (4.) And

(g) By the tutor being removed as suspected, or being relieved from his office on good grounds of excuse. (6.)

CURATORS: WHOM THEY WERE TO PROTECT.—Curators were appointed to protect the property and interests of four classes of persons:—

1. Madmen (furiosi).—This was by the law of the Twelve Tables, and was extended by the prætors so as to include all forms of mental alienation (Tit. 23. 3, note), and the deaf, mute, and permanently infirm. (4.)

2. Prodigals (i.e. persons wasting recklessly their property).—This was also by the law of the Twelve Tables, but that law only applied to the case of a prodigal wasting goods received under an intestate succession, while the prætor extended it to all cases of prodigality. The fact of the madness or prodigality was first ascertained by the prætor, and then the prodigus was absolutely interdicted from managing his own affairs, but the furiosus was not so interdicted, and was only placed under the care of the curator. When the case came within the law of the Twelve Tables, the curatorship of the furiosus and prodigus belonged to the nearest agnate. The magistrate appointed in cases of the prætorian extensions of the terms, and in the time of Justinian in all cases. (Tit. 23. 3.)

3. Adolescentes.—Persons of either sex, above the age of puberty, and under the age of twenty-five years.

The lex Platoria subjected to prosecution and infamy persons overreaching adolescents under twenty-five years, and possibly allowed cheat curators to be appointed to protect them. Subsequently prætors protected such persons by ordering, in case they had been prejudiced, a restitutio in integrum, that is, that they should be put in the same position which they would have occupied if not prejudiced. Lastly, Marcus Antoninus ordered that curators should be appointed in all cases on the application of the minor. (Tit. 23. pr., note.) The adolescent was not obliged to have a curator for general purposes unless he wished, but a curator could be forced on him in case of a lawsuit, or his debtor wishing to pay him, or his late tutor wishing to settle accounts with him; and if he had a curator he could not alienate any part of his property without the sanction of the curator. (Tit. 23. 2, note.) The curator to an adolescent could only be appointed by the magistrate. the same magistrates appointing who appointed tutors; but a magistrate would generally have regard to the wishes, as to curatorship, expressed in the testament of a person who could have appointed a tutor. (1.)

4. Pupils.—Pupils sometimes received curators, as, for example, if the tutor legitimus was unfit, a curator was appointed to protect the pupil and act, to a great extent, instead of the tutor; or, if the testamentary tutor, or the tutor appointed by the magistrate, was unfit, a curator was appointed to act conjointly with him, and curators were assigned in place of tutors excused for a time only. (5.)

If a tutor was prevented by illness or other causes from administering the affairs of his pupil, a person might be appointed to act for him, but this person was not a curator, but a delegate of the tutor. (6.)

MODES OF PROTECTION AGAINST TUTORS AND CURATORS.—Persons having tutors and curators were protected against the misconduct of these in the following ways:—

1. Security was required and enforced by the exaction of pledges from tutores and curatores legitimi, and from those appointed by inferior magistrates. (Tit. 24. pr.) 2. If such security was not taken, or was taken to an insufficient degree, the magistrate was himself liable in an action, which extended to his heirs. (2.) 3. Every tutor or curator was bound to make an inventory of the property of the pupil or person under care. (Tit. 24. pr., note.) 4. Every tutor or curator was, after the publication of the 78th Novel, obliged to pledge himself by oath that he would act as a bonus paterfamilias. (Tit. 24. pr., note.) 5. The property of tutors and curators was subjected to a tacit hypothec to make good losses sustained through their neglect. (Tit. 24. pr., note.) 6. An action might be brought against tutors or curators when their office was ended, to make them account. (Tit. 22. 6, note.) 7. Tutors and curators might be removed by the actio suspecti. (Tit. 26.)

Removal on Suspicion.—All tutors, including the patron (though in his case the grounds of a decision against him were not to be disclosed, in order to save his reputation—Tit. 26. 2), and all curators, might be removed, after or even before entering on office, on a charge of suspicion, suspecti crimen—a charge permitted by the Twelve Tables (Tit. 26. pr.)—being successfully brought before the prætor at Rome, the præses, or proconsular legate, in the provinces, by any one, even a woman (3), except that the pupil could not bring this charge against his tutor, while the minor could bring it against his curator. (4.) Infamy attached, if fraud, but not if neglect, was proved. (6.) The tutor or curator might be removed although solvent (5), and although he offered to give security. (12.) While the action was pending, the accused was suspended from his administration (7), but if he died the action was at an end. (8.) It was the duty of the tutor to see that the amount of the pupil's maintenance was fixed by a magistrate. If he failed to do so, this was a ground for his being removed on a charge of suspicion. (9.) If he falsely asserted that the pupil's means did not suffice to allow maintenance, he was to be handed over to the præfectus urbis, or præses, to be punished, as also was a tutor who had obtained his office by bribery, and a freedman proved to be guilty of fraud while acting as tutor to the son or grandson of the patron. (10, 11.)

Where there were more than one tutor or curator, one might offer was appointed to act conjointly with him, and curators were assigned in place of tutors excused for a time only. (5.)

If a tutor was prevented by illness or other causes from administering the affairs of his pupil, a person might be appointed to act for him, but this person was not a curator, but a delegate of the tutor. (6.)

MODES OF PROTECTION AGAINST TUTORS AND CURATORS.—Persons having tutors and curators were protected against the misconduct of these in the following ways:—

1. Security was required and enforced by the exaction of pledges from tutores and curatores legitimi, and from those appointed by inferior magistrates. (Tit. 24. pr.) 2. If such security was not taken, or was taken to an insufficient degree, the magistrate was himself liable in an action, which extended to his heirs. (2.) 3. Every tutor or curator was bound to make an inventory of the property of the pupil or person under care. (Tit. 24. pr., note.) 4. Every tutor or curator was, after the publication of the 78th Novel, obliged to pledge himself by oath that he would act as a bonus paterfamilias. (Tit. 24. pr., note.) 5. The property of tutors and curators was subjected to a tacit hypothec to make good losses sustained through their neglect. (Tit. 24. pr., note.) 6. An action might be brought against tutors or curators when their office was ended, to make them account. (Tit. 22. 6, note.) 7. Tutors and curators might be removed by the actio suspecti. (Tit. 26.)

Removal on Suspicion.—All tutors, including the patron (though in his case the grounds of a decision against him were not to be disclosed, in order to save his reputation—Tit. 26. 2), and all curators, might be removed, after or even before entering on office, on a charge of suspicion, suspecti crimen—a charge permitted by the Twelve Tables (Tit. 26. pr.)—being successfully brought before the prætor at Rome, the præses, or proconsular legate, in the provinces, by any one, even a woman (3), except that the pupil could not bring this charge against his tutor, while the minor could bring it against his curator. (4.) Infamy attached, if fraud, but not if neglect, was proved. (6.) The tutor or curator might be removed although solvent (5), and although he offered to give security. (12.) While the action was pending, the accused was suspended from his administration (7), but if he died the action was at an end. (8.) It was the duty of the tutor to see that the amount of the pupil's maintenance was fixed by a magistrate. If he failed to do so, this was a ground for his being removed on a charge of suspicion. (9.) If he falsely asserted that the pupil's means did not suffice to allow maintenance, he was to be handed over to the præfectus urbis, or præses, to be punished, as also was a tutor who had obtained his office by bribery, and a freedman proved to be guilty of fraud while acting as tutor to the son or grandson of the patron. (10, 11.)

Where there were more than one tutor or curator, one might offer to his co-tutor or co-curator to give security, and alone act as administrator, the other co-tutor or co-curator having, however, the preference if he, when thus challenged, was willing to give security. If no tutor or curator came forward in this way, the person, if any, appointed by the testament to administer was allowed to act; and, if there was no such person, the majority of the tutors or curators was to decide who should act, and, if an agreement could not be come to in this way, the magistrate would decide. (Tit. 24. 1.)

TUTORS AND CURATORS WHEN EXCUSED.—Tutors and curators might be excused from holding their offices on grounds which may be classed under four heads:—

1. Having rendered a service to the public, or being engaged in the discharge of some public duty.—(a) Having a certain number of children living (three at Rome, four in Italy, five in the provinces), children slain in battle, and grandchildren, in lieu of their parent, being reckoned in the number (Tit. 25. pr.); (b) being engaged in the administration of the fiscus (1); (c) being absent on the service of the State (2); (d) being magistrates (3), military persons (14), or members of learned professions (15).

2. Being in a position adverse to the pupil or adult.—(a) Being engaged in a law-suit with the pupil or adult, if the suit embraced the whole of the latter's property, or was for an inheritance (4); (b) being a creditor or debtor (4, note); (c) being appointed by a father through enmity (9); (d) having been in deadly enmity with the father (11); (e) having had their status questioned by the father (12); (f) being the husband of the woman under care (19).

3. Being incompetent to sustain the burden of the office.—(a) Through being in extreme poverty (6); (b) being in bad health (7); (c) not being able to read (8); (d) being over seventy years of age (13).

4. Filling, or having filled, similar offices.—(a) Holding already three offices of the kind in question (5); (b) having already been the tutor of the person to whom a curator was to be appointed (18).

to his co-tutor or co-curator to give security, and alone act as administrator, the other co-tutor or co-curator having, however, the preference if he, when thus challenged, was willing to give security. If no tutor or curator came forward in this way, the person, if any, appointed by the testament to administer was allowed to act; and, if there was no such person, the majority of the tutors or curators was to decide who should act, and, if an agreement could not be come to in this way, the magistrate would decide. (Tit. 24. 1.)

TUTORS AND CURATORS WHEN EXCUSED.—Tutors and curators might be excused from holding their offices on grounds which may be classed under four heads:—

1. Having rendered a service to the public, or being engaged in the discharge of some public duty.—(a) Having a certain number of children living (three at Rome, four in Italy, five in the provinces), children slain in battle, and grandchildren, in lieu of their parent, being reckoned in the number (Tit. 25. pr.); (b) being engaged in the administration of the fiscus (1); (c) being absent on the service of the State (2); (d) being magistrates (3), military persons (14), or members of learned professions (15).

2. Being in a position adverse to the pupil or adult.—(a) Being engaged in a law-suit with the pupil or adult, if the suit embraced the whole of the latter's property, or was for an inheritance (4); (b) being a creditor or debtor (4, note); (c) being appointed by a father through enmity (9); (d) having been in deadly enmity with the father (11); (e) having had their status questioned by the father (12); (f) being the husband of the woman under care (19).

3. Being incompetent to sustain the burden of the office.—(a) Through being in extreme poverty (6); (b) being in bad health (7); (c) not being able to read (8); (d) being over seventy years of age (13).

4. Filling, or having filled, similar offices.—(a) Holding already three offices of the kind in question (5); (b) having already been the tutor of the person to whom a curator was to be appointed (18).

BOOK II.

LAW RELATING TO THINGS.

In nostro Patrimonio

Corporeal

Incorporeal

Institutes deal only with private things hence things in nostro patrimonio

DISTINCTIONS OF THINGS.—We now come to the law relating to things, but the Institutes only deal with private law. The first step is, therefore, to notice the distinction of things according as they are extra nostrum patrimonium or in nostro patrimonio, that is, according as they are or are not capable of being the property of private persons. It is only of things in nostro patrimonio that the Institutes treat. Of things within the compass of private law the principal division is that into things corporeal and incorporeal; into things like a field, que tangi possunt, and things like a right of way over a field, an inheritance, or an obligation, que tangi non possunt. (Tit. 2.)

MODES OF ACQUISITION.—How do we acquire things in nostro patrimonio, whether corporeal or incorporeal? The answer to this question takes up the Second Book of the Institutes, and the Third Book down to the end of the Twelfth Title. First the inquiry is made how we acquire particular things, res singulae, and then how we acquire groups of things, universitates rerum, like an inheritance.

We acquire particular things by, 1, Occupatio; 2, Accessio; 3, Traditio; 4, Usucapio; 5, Donatio; the first three being modes of acquiring jure naturali; the last two, jure civili. We acquire groups of things by, 1, Testamentary succession; 2, Intestate succession; 3, Arrogation; 4, Bonorum addictio; 5, Bonorum venditio; 6, Forfeiture under the senatusconsultum Claudianum.

The First Title of the Second Book treats of the distinction of things according as they are extra nostrum patrimonium or in nostro patrimonio, and then of the acquisition of particular things by occupatio, accessio, and traditio.

RES EXTRA NOSTRUM PATRIMONIUM are, 1, Communes, common to all men, such as the air, the sea, and the sea-shore as far as the limit of the highest winter flood (Tit. 1. 1, 3); every one being allowed to use the sea-shore, as for drying nets (5); avoiding, however, injury to existing buildings thereon (1); and each State having the sea-shore adjacent to its territory under its supervision. (2, note.) 2. Publicae, belonging to the State, as rivers and ports, and the right of fishing therein, and the use for purposes of navigation of the banks thereof, although these banks might belong to private proprietors. (2, 4.) 3. Universitatis, belonging to a corporate body, as, e.g., a racecourse belonging to a city. (6.) 4. Nullius, in the sense of being so devoted

BOOK II.

LAW RELATING TO THINGS.

In nostro Patrimonio

Corporeal

Incorporeal

Institutes deal only with private things in nostro patrimonio.

DISTINCTIONS OF THINGS.—We now come to the law relating to things, but the Institutes only deal with private law. The first step is, therefore, to notice the distinction of things according as they are extra nostrum patrimonium or in nostro patrimonio, that is, according as they are or are not capable of being the property of private persons. It is only of things in nostro patrimonio that the Institutes treat. Of things within the compass of private law the principal division is that into things corporeal and incorporeal; into things like a field, quæ tangi possunt, and things like a right of way over a field, an inheritance, or an obligation, quæ tangi non possunt. (Tit. 2.)

MODES OF ACQUISITION.—How do we acquire things in nostro patrimonio, whether corporeal or incorporeal? The answer to this question takes up the Second Book of the Institutes, and the Third Book down to the end of the Twelfth Title. First the inquiry is made how we acquire particular things, res singulæ, and then how we acquire groups of things, universitates rerum, like an inheritance.

We acquire particular things by, 1, Occupatio; 2, Accessio; 3, Traditio; 4, Usucapio; 5, Donatio; the first three being modes of acquiring jure naturalis; the last two, jure civili. We acquire groups of things by, 1, Testamentary succession; 2, Intestate succession; 3, Arrogation; 4, Bonorum addictio; 5, Bonorum venditio; 6, Forfeiture under the senatusconsultum Claudianum.

The First Title of the Second Book treats of the distinction of things according as they are extra nostrum patrimonium or in nostro patrimonio, and then of the acquisition of particular things by occupatio, accessio, and traditio.

RES EXTRA NOSTRUM PATRIMONIUM are, 1, Communes, common to all men, such as the air, the sea, and the sea-shore as far as the limit of the highest winter flood (Tit. 1. 1, 3); every one being allowed to use the sea-shore, as for drying nets (5); avoiding, however, injury to existing buildings thereon (1); and each State having the sea-shore adjacent to its territory under its supervision. (2, note.) 2. Publicæ, belonging to the State, as rivers and ports, and the right of fishing therein, and the use for purposes of navigation of the banks thereof, although these banks might belong to private proprietors. (2, 4.) 3. Universitatis, belonging to a corporate body, as, e.g., a racecourse belonging to a city. (6.) 4. Nullius, in the sense of being so devoted to the gods that they cannot belong to men; and such res nullius may be (a) sacræ, consecrated, as temples, by the pontiffs, with the sanction of the State (8); (b) religiosæ, invested with a religious character by interment, private proprietors being at liberty to impress this character on their ground by simply burying a dead body there (9); and (c) sanctæ, hallowed, or protected against violation, like the gates or walls of a city (10).

MODES OF ACQUIRING PARTICULAR THINGS JURE NATURALI.—
Particular things in nostro patrimonio are acquired by—

I. OCCUPATIO, i.e. the taking or holding, as the holder's own, of res nullius, in the sense of things which previously belonged to no one, such as:—(a) Wild animals wherever found, which you have actually captured, not merely wounded (Tit. 1. 13), and not let go again. (12.) Bees you have hived. (14.) (But swarms issuing from your hive and staying in your sight and power (14); wild animals, such as pigeons and deer, that have acquired the habit of returning to your keeping, and fowls, not wild, but that stray from your keeping (16), are considered as your property and not res nullius, and to take them is theft.) (16.) (b) Things taken from the enemy; if the things taken from the enemy by a Roman army have been previously taken by him from a citizen, they will, as a general rule, form part of the præda or booty of the Roman army; but special things, such as land and slaves, are, by a kind of postliminy applied to them, allowed to revert to the owner. (17, note.) (c) Anything found on the sea-shore. (18.) (d) Islands formed in the sea. (22.) (e) Things found which have been intentionally abandoned by their owner (17), as distinguished from things which the owner has not wished to cease to own, as things thrown overboard in a storm or dropped out of a carriage. (48.)

II. ACCESSIO.—There is no notice in the Institutes of accessio as a distinct mode of acquisition. The subject is treated as growing out of occupatio.

Acquisition by accession may be regarded as arising in two classes of cases. 1. In cases of natural increment. 2. In cases where, the things of two owners being mixed, the law decides which owner shall have the thing resulting from the mixture.

1. Accession by natural increment.—1. An owner gains something new by natural increment in the following instances:—(a) The young of his animals. (19.) (b) New soil added imperceptibly to his soil by alluvion. (20.) (c) A portion of his neighbour's soil borne by a river to his soil and remaining there till the roots of trees thereon become attached to his soil. (21.) (d) An island being formed in a river; the owner of the bank has the ownership in this island up to the line of the mid channel. (22.) (e) The bed of a river left dry, up to the same line. (23.)

Accessions by natural increment might occur when a possessor or a usufructuary, and not the owner, held the land. To whom did the fruits belong? It is only of gathered fruits we can speak, for if the

to the gods that they cannot belong to men; and such res nullius may be (a) sacræ, consecrated, as temples, by the pontiffs, with the sanction of the State (8); (b) religiosæ, invested with a religious character by interment, private proprietors being at liberty to impress this character on their ground by simply burying a dead body there (9); and (c) sanctæ, hallowed, or protected against violation, like the gates or walls of a city (10).

MODES OF ACQUIRING PARTICULAR THINGS JURE NATURALI.—

Particular things in nostro patrimonio are acquired by—

I. OCCUPATIO, i.e. the taking or holding, as the holder's own, of res nullius, in the sense of things which previously belonged to no one, such as:—(a) Wild animals wherever found, which you have actually captured, not merely wounded (Tit. 1. 13), and not let go again. (12.) Bees you have hived. (14.) (But swarms issuing from your hive and staying in your sight and power (14); wild animals, such as pigeons and deer, that have acquired the habit of returning to your keeping, and fowls, not wild, but that stray from your keeping (16), are considered as your property and not res nullius, and to take them is theft.) (16.) (b) Things taken from the enemy; if the things taken from the enemy by a Roman army have been previously taken by him from a citizen, they will, as a general rule, form part of the præda or booty of the Roman army; but special things, such as land and slaves, are, by a kind of postliminy applied to them, allowed to revert to the owner. (17, note.) (c) Anything found on the sea-shore. (18.) (d) Islands formed in the sea. (22.) (e) Things found which have been intentionally abandoned by their owner (17), as distinguished from things which the owner has not wished to cease to own, as things thrown overboard in a storm or dropped out of a carriage. (48.)

II. ACCESSIO.—There is no notice in the Institutes of accessio as a distinct mode of acquisition. The subject is treated as growing out of occupatio.

Acquisition by accession may be regarded as arising in two classes of cases. 1. In cases of natural increment. 2. In cases where, the things of two owners being mixed, the law decides which owner shall have the thing resulting from the mixture.

1. Accessio by natural increment.—1. An owner gains something new by natural increment in the following instances:—(a) The young of his animals. (19.) (b) New soil added imperceptibly to his soil by alluvion. (20.) (c) A portion of his neighbour's soil borne by a river to his soil and remaining there till the roots of trees thereon become attached to his soil. (21.) (d) An island being formed in a river; the owner of the bank has the ownership in this island up to the line of the mid channel. (22.) (e) The bed of a river left dry, up to the same line. (23.)

Accessions by natural increment might occur when a possessor or a usufructuary, and not the owner, held the land. To whom did the fruits belong? It is only of gathered fruits we can speak, for if the owner dispossessed the possessor, the owner immediately took all the fruits ungathered, and if the usufructuary died the same thing happened. With regard to the possessor, the bona fide possessor was not responsible for the fruits he had consumed, while the mala fide possessor was responsible. (35, note.) The usufructuary had a right to take all the fruits, including the young of animals; but the children of female slaves belonged to the owner, not to the usufructuary. (36, 37.)

2. Accession in favour of one of two owners.—The following instances are given in the Institutes of cases where, the things of two owners being mixed, the law decides which owner shall have the thing resulting from the mixture.

1. A makes a thing with the materials of B. Here, if the thing can be reduced to its rude materials, like a vessel of silver, the thing made belongs to B; if not, it belongs to A, as the maker of a nova species. (25.)

A makes a thing partly with his own materials and partly with the materials of B. The thing made belongs to A. (25.)

2. A weaves in his garment the purple of B. If the purple is still separable, the purple belongs to B; if not, to A, the garment being considered the principal, the purple the accessory thing. (26.)

3. Two owners consent to mix their materials. The product belongs to them in common. (27.)

4. The materials of two owners are mixed by accident.

If the mixed particles are physically inseparable, as when two metals are fused together, the product belongs to them in common. (27.)

If the mixed particles are physically separable, as when two qualities of wheat are mixed, each remains the owner of his share of the mixed wheat. (28.)

5. The owner of the soil builds with the materials of another.

The owner of the materials remains the owner, but he cannot have the house pulled down. He may wait, if he pleases, till the building is destroyed, and then reclaim his materials, or he may bring an action de tigno juncto and get double the value of the materials, and then his claim for the materials is at an end if the owner of the soil did not know that the materials were not his; but if he did this, the owner of the materials may bring the action de tigno juncto, and also make the wrongdoer pay a further penalty by bringing an action ad exhibendum, and may, if the building is pulled down, reclaim the materials. (29.)

6. The owner of materials builds on the soil of another.

(a) Let us suppose the owner of the materials is still in possession of the soil. The owner of the soil seeks to recover it. He is obliged to compensate the owner of the materials for the additional value given by the building to the soil, if the builder did not know that he was building on another's soil. If he did know this, the owner is obliged to let him take away such of the materials as can be removed without damage. (30, note.)

owner dispossessed the possessor, the owner immediately took all the fruits ungathered, and if the usufructuary died the same thing happened. With regard to the possessor, the bona fide possessor was not responsible for the fruits he had consumed, while the malu fide possessor was responsible. (35, note.) The usufructuary had a right to take all the fruits, including the young of animals; but the children of female slaves belonged to the owner, not to the usufructuary. (36, 37.)

2. Accession in favour of one of two owners.—The following instances are given in the Institutes of cases where, the things of two owners being mixed, the law decides which owner shall have the thing resulting from the mixture.

1. A makes a thing with the materials of B. Here, if the thing can be reduced to its rude materials, like a vessel of silver, the thing made belongs to B; if not, it belongs to A, as the maker of a nova species. (25.)

A makes a thing partly with his own materials and partly with the materials of B. The thing made belongs to A. (25.)

2. A weaves in his garment the purple of B. If the purple is still separable, the purple belongs to B; if not, to A, the garment being considered the principal, the purple the accessory thing. (26.)

3. Two owners consent to mix their materials. The product belongs to them in common. (27.)

4. The materials of two owners are mixed by accident.

If the mixed particles are physically inseparable, as when two metals are fused together, the product belongs to them in common. (27.)

If the mixed particles are physically separable, as when two qualities of wheat are mixed, each remains the owner of his share of the mixed wheat. (28.)

5. The owner of the soil builds with the materials of another.

The owner of the materials remains the owner, but he cannot have the house pulled down. He may wait, if he pleases, till the building is destroyed, and then reclaim his materials, or he may bring an action de tigno juncto and get double the value of the materials, and then his claim for the materials is at an end if the owner of the soil did not know that the materials were not his; but if he did this, the owner of the materials may bring the action de tigno juncto, and also make the wrongdoer pay a further penalty by bringing an action ad exhibendum, and may, if the building is pulled down, reclaim the materials. (29.)

6. The owner of materials builds on the soil of another.

(a) Let us suppose the owner of the materials is still in possession of the soil. The owner of the soil seeks to recover it. He is obliged to compensate the owner of the materials for the additional value given by the building to the soil, if the builder did not know that he was building on another's soil. If he did know this, the owner is obliged to let him take away such of the materials as can be removed without damage. (30, note.)

(b) Let us suppose the owner of the materials is not still in possession of the soil. Then, whether he knew or did not know that he was building on another's soil, he may, if the building is destroyed, reclaim the materials, but can get no compensation for the additional value he has given to the soil. (30, note.)

7. A tree belonging to A is planted in the soil of B.

Until it takes root in the new soil, the tree continues the property of A; but a rooted tree is always the property of the owner of the soil. (31.)

8. The wheat of A is sown in the land of B.

Sown wheat is on the footing of rooted trees. The wheat belongs to B; but the sower, if in bona fide possession, is protected against B turning him out without compensation for the value of the wheat sown. (32.)

9. A writes a poem or history on the parchment or paper of B.

B, the owner of the parchment, still remains owner, after the parchment has been written on. But if A is in bona fide possession of the parchment, B cannot get it from him without offering to pay him the cost of writing. (33.)

10. A paints a picture on the tablet of B.

Here, in consequence of the possible value of pictures, the decision is the other way. The painted tablet belongs to A. If B, the owner of the tablet, is in possession of it after it has been painted on, A cannot get it from him without offering to pay the cost of the tablet. If, however, A is in possession of the tablet, B may claim the tablet by an action in which he is supposed still to be the owner, offering to pay the cost of the painting; but the painter could stop the action by paying the cost of the tablet. (34.)

11. A, without express search, finds treasure in the land of B. Half goes to A, half to B. (39.)

III. TRADITIO: or delivery. Its constituent elements are three.

1. The owner of a thing means by the transfer to pass the property he transfers. 2. He, or any one entitled to act for him (42, 43), transfers by actually passing the thing, or by giving the transferee command over it, as when he gives the keys of a granary. (45.) 3. The transferee, meaning thereby to become owner, receives it. Traditio was necessary to pass property of all kinds; and in Justinian's time, land, wherever situated, passed by tradition. (40, note.)

The handing over and the meaning to pass the property are both necessary. The seller may hand over a thing, but he generally does not mean to pass the property till he is actually paid; and then not till the seller is paid, does the thing handed over become the property of the buyer. (41.) The lender, again, hands over a thing, not meaning to cease to be owner of it. If he changes his mind and wishes to give it, his purpose of giving unites with the previous act of handing over, and the legal traditio is accomplished. (41.) Things on board ship may be thrown overboard to lighten the ship, but their owners do not

(b) Let us suppose the owner of the materials is not still in possession of the soil. Then, whether he knew or did not know that he was building on another's soil, he may, if the building is destroyed, reclaim the materials, but can get no compensation for the additional value he has given to the soil. (30, note.)

7. A tree belonging to A is planted in the soil of B.

Until it takes root in the new soil, the tree continues the property of A; but a rooted tree is always the property of the owner of the soil. (31.)

8. The wheat of A is sown in the land of B.

Sown wheat is on the footing of rooted trees. The wheat belongs to B; but the sower, if in bona fide possession, is protected against B turning him out without compensation for the value of the wheat sown. (32.)

9. A writes a poem or history on the parchment or paper of B.

B, the owner of the parchment, still remains owner, after the parchment has been written on. But if A is in bona fide possession of the parchment, B cannot get it from him without offering to pay him the cost of writing. (33.)

10. A paints a picture on the tablet of B.

Here, in consequence of the possible value of pictures, the decision is the other way. The painted tablet belongs to A. If B, the owner of the tablet, is in possession of it after it has been painted on, A cannot get it from him without offering to pay the cost of the tablet. If, however, A is in possession of the tablet, B may claim the tablet by an action in which he is supposed still to be the owner, offering to pay the cost of the painting; but the painter could stop the action by paying the cost of the tablet. (34.)

11. A, without express search, finds treasure in the land of B. Half goes to A, half to B. (39.)

III. TRADITIO: or delivery. Its constituent elements are three.

1. The owner of a thing means by the transfer to pass the property he transfers. 2. He, or any one entitled to act for him (42, 43), transfers by actually passing the thing, or by giving the transferee command over it, as when he gives the keys of a granary. (45.) 3. The transferee, meaning thereby to become owner, receives it. Traditio was necessary to pass property of all kinds; and in Justinian's time, land, wherever situated, passed by tradition. (40, note.)

The handing over and the meaning to pass the property are both necessary. The seller may hand over a thing, but he generally does not mean to pass the property till he is actually paid; and then not till the seller is paid, does the thing handed over become the property of the buyer. (41.) The lender, again, hands over a thing, not meaning to cease to be owner of it. If he changes his mind and wishes to give it, his purpose of giving unites with the previous act of handing over, and the legal traditio is accomplished. (41.) Things on board ship may be thrown overboard to lighten the ship, but their owners do not mean to cease to be owners, and therefore the property in them does not pass to those who may pick them up. (48.) It is not, however, necessary that the transferee should be a person definitely ascertained, for if money is thrown to a mob, the incerta persone who pick it up become the owners by traditio. (46.)

SERVITUDES.—The Institutes, at the end of this explanation of the modes of acquiring particular things jure naturali, pause, before speaking of the modes of acquiring such things jure civili, to treat of servitudes, which are introduced by noticing at the beginning of the Second Title the division of things into corporeal and incorporeal, and saying that among incorporeal things are servitudes, or portions of the right of ownership enjoyed by persons other than the owners of the thing itself. Servitudes are (a) prædial when enjoyed over one thing in virtue of the ownership of another thing; (prædial servitudes being of two kinds: rural and urban), and (b) personal when attached to the person of the owner of the servitude.

Prædial Servitudes.—Rural prædial servitudes (affecting the soil) were so called because they were of kinds most frequently met with in the country; while urban prædial servitudes (affecting something built on the soil) were so called because they were of kinds most frequently met with in the city. The four kinds of rural prædial servitudes noticed in the Institutes, with an intimation that there are others (Tit. 3. 2), are, 1, iter, the right of passing; 2, actus, the right of driving cattle; 3, via, the right of driving a vehicle over another man's land; the more extensive always involving the less extensive right; and, 4, aqueductus, the right of conducting water through another man's land. (Tit. 3. pr.) Of urban servitudes the instances given in the Institutes are the right, 1, to make a neighbour's house sustain the weight of that of the owner of the servitude; 2, to insert a beam in another man's house; 3, to make another man receive the overflow of water from the roof or gutters (or to allow him not to be subject any more to the servitude of receiving such an overflow, if this, which does not seem a servitude, is the meaning of stillicidium non recipiendi); 4, to prevent another man raising his house higher than that of the owner of the servitude; 5, to prevent another man blocking up the lights of the owner of the servitude. (1.)

Personal Servitudes are the following: 1, Ususfructus; 2, Usus; 3, Habitatio.

Ususfructus is the right of using and taking the fruits of anything, the fruits including the fructus civiles, i.e. the profits derived from selling or letting the right of taking the fruits. The usufructuary or owner of this servitude had to act as a good paterfamilias, taking and giving security that he would take good care of the thing, and making losses good. If the substance of the thing ceased to exist, his servitude was at an end, and it was personal to himself and did not pass to his heirs, and only the fruits actually gathered by him belonged to him. (Tit. 4. pr.) In the old law only things not consumed in the mean to cease to be owners, and therefore the property in them does not pass to those who may pick them up. (48.) It is not, however, necessary that the transferee should be a person definitely ascertained, for if money is thrown to a mob, the incerta persone who pick it up become the owners by traditio. (46.)

SERVITUDES.—The Institutes, at the end of this explanation of the modes of acquiring particular things jure naturali, pause, before speaking of the modes of acquiring such things jure civili, to treat of servitudes, which are introduced by noticing at the beginning of the Second Title the division of things into corporeal and incorporeal, and saying that among incorporeal things are servitudes, or portions of the right of ownership enjoyed by persons other than the owners of the thing itself. Servitudes are (a) prædial when enjoyed over one thing in virtue of the ownership of another thing; (prædial servitudes being of two kinds: rural and urban), and (b) personal when attached to the person of the owner of the servitude.

Prædial Servitudes.—Rural prædial servitudes (affecting the soil) were so called because they were of kinds most frequently met with in the country; while urban prædial servitudes (affecting something built on the soil) were so called because they were of kinds most frequently met with in the city. The four kinds of rural prædial servitudes noticed in the Institutes, with an intimation that there are others (Tit. 3. 2), are, 1, iter, the right of passing; 2, actus, the right of driving cattle; 3, via, the right of driving a vehicle over another man's land; the more extensive always involving the less extensive right; and, 4, aqueductus, the right of conducting water through another man's land. (Tit. 3. pr.) Of urban servitudes the instances given in the Institutes are the right, 1, to make a neighbour's house sustain the weight of that of the owner of the servitude; 2, to insert a beam in another man's house; 3, to make another man receive the overflow of water from the roof or gutters (or to allow him not to be subject any more to the servitude of receiving such an overflow, if this, which does not seem a servitude, is the meaning of stillicidium non recipiendi); 4, to prevent another man raising his house higher than that of the owner of the servitude; 5, to prevent another man blocking up the lights of the owner of the servitude. (1.)

Personal Servitudes are the following: 1, Ususfructus; 2, Usus; 3, Habitatio.

Ususfructus is the right of using and taking the fruits of anything, the fruits including the fructus civiles, i.e. the profits derived from selling or letting the right of taking the fruits. The usufructuary or owner of this servitude had to act as a good paterfamilias, taking and giving security that he would take good care of the thing, and making losses good. If the substance of the thing ceased to exist, his servitude was at an end, and it was personal to himself and did not pass to his heirs, and only the fruits actually gathered by him belonged to him. (Tit. 4. pr.) In the old law only things not consumed in the use could be the subjects of usufruct; but things consumed in the use, such as garments or wine, might, under a senatusconsultum of the time of Augustus, be made subject to a usufruct in favour of a legatee, the usufructuary having to give security that at the termination of the usufruct he would pay their value as estimated at the commencement of the usufruct. (2.)

Usus, or the naked use, is the right of using the thing, not of taking the fruits of it except for his daily wants. (Tit. 5. 1.) In the case of a house, it is the use for the purpose of living in it with his family only, and at the most receiving a guest in it. (2.) Habitatio is the use of a house for the purpose of living therein, with something more added in the right of letting it. (5.)

Creation of Servitudes.—Servitudes were created in the following ways:—1. Mancipatio.—This only applied to prædial rural servitudes.

2. In jure cessio.—(Both these were obsolete in the time of Justinian.)

3. Pacts and stipulations, followed by quasi-tradition, i.e. affording the means of actual exercise of the rights. 4. Testament. 5. Adjudicatio.

6. Deductio.—A thing is transferred, minus the servitude, which is reserved by the transferer. 7. Usucapion.—The acquisition of servitudes by usucapion was forbidden by the lex Scribonia; but long possession of them, or at least of some of them, was protected by the prætor after a time, the length of which is uncertain, but which was probably ten years for those present, and twenty years for those not present, in the same province. If land was acquired by usucapion, so were the servitudes that existed with it, and a servitude lost by disuse might be regained by usucapion. Usucapion applied principally to prædial urban servitudes. (It also applied to at least some prædial rural servitudes, and probably to usufructs. (Tit. 3. 4, note; Tit. 4. 1, note.) 8. Lege, or express enactment.—This only applied, perhaps, to usufructs, an instance being the acquisition by the father of the usufruct of the son's peculium under Justinian's legislation. (Tit. 4. 1, note.)

Extinction of Servitudes.—Servitudes were extinguished in the following ways (Tit. 4. 3, note):—1. In jure cessio, the owner of the servitude denying that he owns it (obsolete in time of Justinian):

2. Confusio or consolidatio; the right to the res serviens and the res dominans, or to the dominium and the usufruct, vesting in the same person. 3. The termination (a) of the rights under which the servitude is enjoyed by the surrender of the servitude to the owner of the res dominans, either by agreement or by permitting something that destroyed the servitude; or (b) the termination of the duration of the servitude, i.e. the period for which it has been fixed by the creator.

4. Non-usage; not using it for a period which, previously to Justinian, was two years, and, after Justinian's legislation, was fixed at ten or twenty, according as the parties were present or absent. If the servitude was a prædial urban one, it was necessary that, to free the res serviens by usucapio, the person affected by the servitude should do some distinct act inconsistent with submission to the servitude

8

Mancipat
In jure ces.
Deductio
Adjudicatio
Pact & Stip
Usucapio Testament
Lex

6

In jure
cessio
Termination
- done
Non-usage
Death Captivity
Disuse

use could be the subjects of usufruct; but things consumed in the use, such as garments or wine, might, under a senatusconsultum of the time of Augustus, be made subject to a usufruct in favour of a legatee, the usufructuary having to give security that at the termination of the usufruct he would pay their value as estimated at the commencement of the usufruct. (2.)

Usus, or the naked use, is the right of using the thing, not of taking the fruits of it except for his daily wants. (Tit. 5. 1.) In the case of a house, it is the use for the purpose of living in it with his family only, and at the most receiving a guest in it. (2.) Habitatio is the use of a house for the purpose of living therein, with something more added in the right of letting it. (5.)

Creation of Servitudes.—Servitudes were created in the following ways:—1. Mancipatio.—This only applied to prædial rural servitudes. 2. In jure cessio.—(Both these were obsolete in the time of Justinian.) 3. Pacts and stipulations, followed by quasi-tradition, i.e. affording the means of actual exercise of the rights. 4. Testament. 5. Adjudicatio. 6. Deductio.—A thing is transferred, minus the servitude, which is reserved by the transferer. 7. Usucapion.—The acquisition of servitudes by usucapion was forbidden by the lex Scribonia; but long possession of them, or at least of some of them, was protected by the prætor after a time, the length of which is uncertain, but which was probably ten years for those present, and twenty years for those not present, in the same province. If land was acquired by usucapion, so were the servitudes that existed with it, and a servitude lost by disuse might be regained by usucapion. Usucapion applied principally to prædial urban servitudes. (It also applied to at least some prædial rural servitudes, and probably to usufructs. (Tit. 3. 4, note; Tit. 4. 1, note.) 8. Lege, or express enactment.—This only applied, perhaps, to usufructs, an instance being the acquisition by the father of the usufruct of the son's peculium under Justinian's legislation. (Tit. 4. 1, note.)

Extinction of Servitudes.—Servitudes were extinguished in the following ways (Tit. 4. 3, note):—1. In jure cessio, the owner of the servitude denying that he owns it (obsolete in time of Justinian): 2. Confusio or consolidatio; the right to the res serviens and the res dominans, or to the dominium and the usufruct, vesting in the same person. 3. The termination (a) of the rights under which the servitude is enjoyed by the surrender of the servitude to the owner of the res dominans, either by agreement or by permitting something that destroyed the servitude; or (b) the termination of the duration of the servitude, i.e. the period for which it has been fixed by the creator. 4. Non-usage; not using it for a period which, previously to Justinian, was two years, and, after Justinian's legislation, was fixed at ten or twenty, according as the parties were present or absent. If the servitude was a prædial urban one, it was necessary that, to free the res serviens by usucapio, the person affected by the servitude should do some distinct act inconsistent with submission to the servitude

8
Mancipat
In jure ces.
Deductio
Adjudicatio
Pact & Stip
Usucapio Testament
Lege

6
In jure
cessio
Confusio
Termination — done
Non-usage
Death Captivity
Disuse

(usucapio libertatis). (Tit. 4. 3, note.) In usufructs, if the usufructuary did not use the thing according to the terms of the usufruct, it came to an end. (Tit. 4. 3, note.) Habitatio did not cease by non-usage. (Tit. 5. 5, note.) 5. Perishing of the thing in virtue of which, or over which, the servitude was exercised. 6. In the case of usufruct and use, the death or capitis deminutio (including, before Justinian, the minima capitis deminutio) of the owner of the servitude.

EMPHYTEUSIS, SUPERFICIES, PIGNUS.—Before returning to the modes of acquisition of particular things, we have to notice three other incorporeal rights, which naturally connect themselves with personal servitudes :—1. Jus emphyteuticarium. 2. Jus superficiarium. 3. Jus pignoris. (A summary of the law relating to them is given in Tit. 5. 6, note.)*

IV. USUCAPION.—The Institutes, as we have said, notice five modes of acquiring res singule, three being modes of acquiring jure naturali, and two being modes of acquiring jure civili. We now come to the first of these two latter, viz., usucapion, or the process by which possession ripens into ownership by lapse of time.

It is only civil possession that is capable of so ripening. Civil is opposed to natural possession. If a man has physical control over a thing, detains it, as the jurists say, he is in possession of it; but, to possess it, he must mean to hold it as his own. If he not only is in possession of it, and means to hold it as his own, but if also his possession is bona fide and ex justa causa, then such possession is civil possession, the possession that in Roman law (civilis) gave rise to usucapio. If he is merely in possession, or if he has also the animus possidendi, but his possession is not bona fide and ex justa causa, then his possession in either case is only natural, and does not give rise to usucapio. The civil possessor and the natural possessor, who had the animus possidendi, were protected in their possession by prætorian interdicts, but the person merely in possession was not. (Tit. 6. pr., note.)

With regard to usucapio, we have to ask three questions. 1. What things can be acquired by usucapio? 2. What is meant by the terms bona fide and ex justa causa, as applied to possession? 3. What time was requisite to run before usucapio ripened the possession into ownership?

1. What things can be acquired by usucapio?—At the outset we have to notice a point of great importance. Lands in the solum provinciale never could become the property of an individual. The possessor could not, therefore, become the owner of such land by usucapio. But after a certain length of possession the prætor protected his possession by allowing a plea, præscriptio, of long possession to be effectual in an action brought against him for the recovery of the possession of the land he

* Where a summary of any distinct portion of law is given in the body of the work, it is not repeated in this general Summary.

(usucapio libertatis). (Tit. 4. 3, note.) In usufructs, if the usufructuary did not use the thing according to the terms of the usufruct, it came to an end. (Tit. 4. 3, note.) Habitatio did not cease by non-usage. (Tit. 5. 5, note.) 5. Perishing of the thing in virtue of which, or over which, the servitude was exercised. 6. In the case of usufruct and use, the death or capitis deminutio (including, before Justinian, the minima capitis deminutio) of the owner of the servitude.

EMPHYTEUSIS, SUPERFICIES, PIGNUS.—Before returning to the modes of acquisition of particular things, we have to notice three other incorporeal rights, which naturally connect themselves with personal servitudes :—1. Jus emphyteuticarium. 2. Jus superficiarium. 3. Jus pignoris. (A summary of the law relating to them is given in Tit. 5. 6, note.)*

IV. USUCAPION.—The Institutes, as we have said, notice five modes of acquiring res singule, three being modes of acquiring jure naturali, and two being modes of acquiring jure civili. We now come to the first of these two latter, viz., usucapion, or the process by which possession ripens into ownership by lapse of time.

It is only civil possession that is capable of so ripening. Civil is opposed to natural possession. If a man has physical control over a thing, detains it, as the jurists say, he is in possession of it; but, to possess it, he must mean to hold it as his own. If he not only is in possession of it, and means to hold it as his own, but if also his possession is bona fide and ex justa causa, then such possession is civil possession, the possession that in Roman law (civilis) gave rise to usucapio. If he is merely in possession, or if he has also the animus possidendi, but his possession is not bona fide and ex justa causa, then his possession in either case is only natural, and does not give rise to usucapio. The civil possessor and the natural possessor, who had the animus possidendi, were protected in their possession by prætorian interdicts, but the person merely in possession was not. (Tit. 6. pr., note.)

With regard to usucapio, we have to ask three questions. 1. What things can be acquired by usucapio? 2. What is meant by the terms bona fide and ex justa causa, as applied to possession? 3. What time was requisite to run before usucapio ripened the possession into ownership?

1. What things can be acquired by usucapio?—At the outset we have to notice a point of great importance. Lands in the solum provinciale never could become the property of an individual. The possessor could not, therefore, become the owner of such land by usucapio. But after a certain length of possession the prætor protected his possession by allowing a plea, præscriptio, of long possession to be effectual in an action brought against him for the recovery of the possession of the land he held. But as the time was much longer than was required to run for the protection in this way than the time required for usucapio, the term prescriptio, or possessio longi temporis, was used to describe, with regard to the solum provinciale, the equivalent of usucapio with regard to moveables and solum Italicum. There were some differences in their operation; the chief of which were, 1, that possessio longi temporis did not give ownership; 2, that usucapio was only interrupted by a judgment, longi temporis possessio by a litis contestatio; and 3, under usucapio the thing was acquired subject to its liabilities, i.e. servitudes or mortgages; and under longi temporis possessio, it was held free from them. Yet as they were nearly of the same effect, and as the requisites of possession in each case were the same, they are generally spoken of together. (Tit. 6. pr., note.) Under Justinian's legislation (Tit. 6. pr.) the possessio longi temporis gave the dominium. Moveables, it may be added, could, in all parts of the Roman Empire, be acquired by usucapio, and the possessio longi temporis did not apply to them. (Tit. 6. pr., note.) We may, therefore, break the first question into two heads. 1. What moveables could be acquired by usucapio? 2. What immoveables could be acquired by usucapio or possessio longi temporis?

* Where a summary of any distinct portion of law is given in the body of the work, it is not repeated in this general Summary.

Generally speaking, all things in nostro patrimonio could be so acquired, but things such as res sacre, or a free man, could not. Nor, as a general rule, could things incorporeal. (1, note.) Things stolen could not be acquired, and a fugitive slave was reckoned among such things. (1.) The thief, of course, could not acquire by usucapio what he had stolen; but neither could an innocent holder, and, as theft included every handing over by a person of a thing he knew not to be his, it was rare that moveables could be acquired by usucapio (3); but it might happen, as if an heir bona fide deals with a thing merely deposited with the testator as if it had belonged to the testator (4), or a usufructuary so deals with the child of a female slave, believing bona fide that it is his property. There is no taint of theft, and the thing, when alienated by the heir or usufructuary, may be acquired by usucapio. Theft only applied to moveables. (7.) As to immoveables, they could not be acquired by usucapio or longi temporis possessio, if they were res vi possessae, forcibly seized on (2); but if the possession was originally sine vi, but still mala fide, e.g. if a person took possession of land left unguarded, knowing it not to be his, and then alienated it to a bona fide possessor, this possessor could gain the ownership by usucapio, and therefore usucapio applied much more frequently to immoveables than to moveables. (7.) Bona vacantia (the property of a person dying without successors) belonged to the fiscus, and, before being reported on as such, could, but afterwards could not, be acquired by usucapio. (9.) Nor could things belonging to pupils or minors or things forming part of a dowry. (10, note.)

2. What were the requisites of civil possession? What were the conditions possession must fulfil in order for usucapio to operate?

Diff. bet
Possessio
3 L. Text
+
usucapio

held. But as the time was much longer than was required to run for the protection in this way than the time required for usucapio, the term præscriptio, or possessio longi temporis, was used to describe, with regard to the solum provinciale, the equivalent of usucapio with regard to moveables and solum Italicum. There were some differences in their operation; the chief of which were, 1, that possessio longi temporis did not give ownership; 2, that usucapio was only interrupted by a judgment, longi temporis possessio by a litis contestatio; and 3, under usucapio the thing was acquired subject to its liabilities, i.e. servitudes or mortgages; and under longi temporis possessio, it was held free from them. Yet as they were nearly of the same effect, and as the requisites of possession in each case were the same, they are generally spoken of together. (Tit. 6. pr., note.) Under Justinian's legislation (Tit. 6. pr.) the possessio longi temporis gave the dominium. Moveables, it may be added, could, in all parts of the Roman Empire, be acquired by usucapio, and the possessio longi temporis did not apply to them. (Tit. 6. pr., note.) We may, therefore, break the first question into two heads. 1. What moveables could be acquired by usucapio? 2. What immoveables could be acquired by usucapio or possessio longi temporis?

Generally speaking, all things in nostro patrimonio could be so acquired, but things such as res sacræ, or a free man, could not. Nor, as a general rule, could things incorporeal. (1, note.) Things stolen could not be acquired, and a fugitive slave was reckoned among such things. (1.) The thief, of course, could not acquire by usucapio what he had stolen; but neither could an innocent holder, and, as theft included every handing over by a person of a thing he knew not to be his, it was rare that moveables could be acquired by usucapio (3); but it might happen, as if an heir bona fide deals with a thing merely deposited with the testator as if it had belonged to the testator (4), or a usufructuary so deals with the child of a female slave, believing bona fide that it is his property. There is no taint of theft, and the thing, when alienated by the heir or usufructuary, may be acquired by usucapio. Theft only applied to moveables. (7.) As to immoveables, they could not be acquired by usucapio or longi temporis possessio, if they were res vi possessæ, forcibly seized on (2); but if the possession was originally sine vi, but still mala fide, e.g. if a person took possession of land left unguarded, knowing it not to be his, and then alienated it to a bona fide possessor, this possessor could gain the ownership by usucapio, and therefore usucapio applied much more frequently to immoveables than to moveables. (7.) Bona vacantia (the property of a person dying without successors) belonged to the fiscus, and, before being reported on as such, could, but afterwards could not, be acquired by usucapio. (9.) Nor could things belonging to pupils or minors or things forming part of a dowry. (10, note.)

2. What were the requisites of civil possession? What were the conditions possession must fulfil in order for usucapio to operate?

Diff. bet
Possessio
3 L-Temp
+
usucapio

(1) The thing possessed must not have any vitium in it, i.e. must not be of any of those kinds of things which we have just described as incapable of being acquired by usucapio. (10.)

(2) The thing must be possessed ex justa causa, that is, must have come into the power of the possessor by some recognised legal mode of acquisition, such as sale or gift (10, note); and, if there had been a mistake about this, and the causa, or title, was not just, the error, under Justinian's legislation, prevented usucapio. (11.)

(3) The possession must be bona fide; the possessor must not know that he was possessing what did not belong to him, and, although reasonable ignorance of facts could be permitted, ignorance of leading principles of law could not. In the case of a sale it was necessary that the bona fides should exist at the making and also at the performance of the bargain. The general rule was that the possession must be bona fide at its commencement. Subsequent discovery of the real facts did not stop the process of usucapio. (10, note.) This was equally true, if it was not the same person, but two persons that possessed, one taking from the other, the thing during the time requisite for usucapio. If, at its commencement, the possession of the testator was bona fide, that of the heir was available for usucapio, although the heir knew that the testator had been mistaken. (12.) The times during which two persons held the thing, the one from the other, as in the case of a seller and a buyer, counted together for the purposes of usucapio. (13.)

USURPATIO.—The interruption of usucapio, the breaking the use, was termed usurpation, as if the possessor lost possession or fell into the power of the enemy, or an action was brought to contest the right, the use being, under Justinian, broken from the time of the first moving of the controversy (nota controversia), instead of from the litis contestatio, which had no longer the important place it had under the formulary system. (13, note.)

In three exceptional cases the mala fide possessor might acquire by usucapio:—1, under the old law (altered by Hadrian), if the thing possessed was an inheritance, or part of one, the mala fide possessor could in a year acquire the thing, whether moveable or immoveable; 2, so could the original owner of a thing given over in trust as against the fiduciary; and 3, the original owner of a thing sold by the State for non-payment of a mortgage debt could again acquire it, as against the prediator, or purchaser from the State, but in this case two years' possession was necessary for immoveables. (10, note.)

3. What time was required for the possession to run on in order that usucapio might take effect?

By the Twelve Tables it was provided that usucapio should be completed in two years in the case of immoveables, and in one year in the case of moveables. (Tit. 6. pr.)

The longi temporis possessio, introduced by the praetors chiefly for the protection of possessors of provincial lands, required ten years if

(1) The thing possessed must not have any vitium in it, i.e. must not be of any of those kinds of things which we have just described as incapable of being acquired by usucapio. (10.)

(2) The thing must be possessed ex justa causa, that is, must have come into the power of the possessor by some recognised legal mode of acquisition, such as sale or gift (10, note); and, if there had been a mistake about this, and the causa, or title, was not just, the error, under Justinian's legislation, prevented usucapio. (11.)

(3) The possession must be bona fide; the possessor must not know that he was possessing what did not belong to him, and, although reasonable ignorance of facts could be permitted, ignorance of leading principles of law could not. In the case of a sale it was necessary that the bona fides should exist at the making and also at the performance of the bargain. The general rule was that the possession must be bona fide at its commencement. Subsequent discovery of the real facts did not stop the process of usucapio. (10, note.) This was equally true, if it was not the same person, but two persons that possessed, one taking from the other, the thing during the time requisite for usucapio. If, at its commencement, the possession of the testator was bona fide, that of the heir was available for usucapio, although the heir knew that the testator had been mistaken. (12.) The times during which two persons held the thing, the one from the other, as in the case of a seller and a buyer, counted together for the purposes of usucapio. (13.)

USURPATIO.—The interruption of usucapio, the breaking the use, was termed usurpatio, as if the possessor lost possession or fell into the power of the enemy, or an action was brought to contest the right, the use being, under Justinian, broken from the time of the first moving of the controversy (motu controversia), instead of from the litis contestatio, which had no longer the important place it had under the formulary system. (13, note.)

In three exceptional cases the mala fide possessor might acquire by usucapio:—1, under the old law (altered by Hadrian), if the thing possessed was an inheritance, or part of one, the mala fide possessor could in a year, acquire the thing, whether moveable or immoveable; 2, so could the original owner of a thing given over in trust as against the fiduciary; and 3, the original owner of a thing sold by the State for non-payment of a mortgage debt could again acquire it, as against the prediator, or purchaser from the State, but in this case two years' possession was necessary for immoveables. (10, note.)

3. What time was required for the possession to run on in order that usucapio might take effect?

By the Twelve Tables it was provided that usucapio should be completed in two years in the case of immoveables, and in one year in the case of moveables. (Tit. 6. pr.)

The longi temporis possessio, introduced by the prætors chiefly for the protection of possessors of provincial lands, required ten years if the parties were domiciled in the same province, inter presentes; and twenty years if they were not, inter absentes. (Tit. 6. pr., note.)

Justinian changed the system generally. He lengthened the time for the acquisition of moveables from one year to three years, and gave the name of usucapio to the acquisition of moveables by possession during three years. He made the longi temporis possessio apply to lands everywhere (abolishing the distinction between solum Italicum and solum provinciale), and he made the longi temporis possessio give the ownership and not merely bar actions. (Tit. 6. pr., note.)

POSSESSIO LONGISSIMI TEMPORIS.—There was also possessio longissimi temporis, which possession, lasting in the case of ecclesiastical property and mortgaged property in possession of the debtor for forty years, and in other cases for thirty years, enabled the possessor to repel all actions, whatever the defect in the possession might be. (13, note.)

Possession for five years of things purchased from the fiscus gave, under an edict of Marcus Aurelius, complete ownership to the purchasers, whatever might be the defects of the possession, as if, for example, there were rights of an owner or mortgagee which the fiscus ought to have respected. Those damnified by the action of the fiscus were during four years at liberty, under a constitution of Zeno, to seek compensation from the fiscus, while the purchasers had under this constitution an incontestable title at once. (14.)

V. GIFT.—The second mode of acquisition jure civili noticed in the Institutes is gift, but, unless on account of the ceremonies accompanying gifts under Justinian's legislation, it is not properly a mode of acquisition separate from tradition. It is a delivery of a thing from a particular motive. (Tit. 7. pr.) The subject of gifts is treated of under three heads: gifts mortis causa, gifts inter vivos, and gifts propter nuptias.

i. Donationes mortis causa.—Gifts on account of death (donationes mortis causa) were gifts made in contemplation of death, revocable before the death of the donor, and failing if the donee died first. They might be made in either of two ways. The donor might hand over the thing to the donee, but the gift was not to be completed until the donor was dead; or the donor might hand over the thing, giving it there and then, but bargaining that it was to be restored to him if he did not die on the occasion contemplated. In either case, although he had certainly in the second case lost the dominium, the donee was allowed to get back the thing by a real action. (Tit. 7. 1, note.)

Justinian required that a donatio mortis causa should be made in the presence of five witnesses. (1, note.)

Donationes mortis causa very closely resembled legacies. They were subjected to the deduction of the Falcidian fourth, and were not valid if the giver was insolvent: but they differed from legacies in the following particulars. 1. They took effect on the death of the donor without its being necessary that the heir should enter. 2. The same

Compare
Contrast
D.M.ca and Legacies

the parties were domiciled in the same province, inter presentes; and twenty years if they were not, inter absentes. (Tit. 6. pr., note.)

Justinian changed the system generally. He lengthened the time for the acquisition of moveables from one year to three years, and gave the name of usucapio to the acquisition of moveables by possession during three years. He made the longi temporis possessio apply to lands everywhere (abolishing the distinction between solum Italicum and solum provinciale), and he made the longi temporis possessio give the ownership and not merely bar actions. (Tit. 6. pr., note.)

POSSESSIO LONGISSIMI TEMPORIS.—There was also possessio longissimi temporis, which possession, lasting in the case of ecclesiastical property and mortgaged property in possession of the debtor for forty years, and in other cases for thirty years, enabled the possessor to repel all actions, whatever the defect in the possession might be. (13, note.)

Possession for five years of things purchased from the fiscus gave, under an edict of Marcus Aurelius, complete ownership to the purchasers, whatever might be the defects of the possession, as if, for example, there were rights of an owner or mortgagee which the fiscus ought to have respected. Those damnified by the action of the fiscus were during four years at liberty, under a constitution of Zeno, to seek compensation from the fiscus, while the purchasers had under this constitution an incontestable title at once. (14.)

V. GIFT.—The second mode of acquisition jure civili noticed in the Institutes is gift, but, unless on account of the ceremonies accompanying gifts under Justinian's legislation, it is not properly a mode of acquisition separate from tradition. It is a delivery of a thing from a particular motive. (Tit. 7. pr.) The subject of gifts is treated of under three heads: gifts mortis causa, gifts inter vivos, and gifts propter nuptias.

i. Donationes mortis causa.—Gifts on account of death (donationes mortis causa) were gifts made in contemplation of death, revocable before the death of the donor, and failing if the donee died first. They might be made in either of two ways. The donor might hand over the thing to the donee, but the gift was not to be completed until the donor was dead; or the donor might hand over the thing, giving it there and then, but bargaining that it was to be restored to him if he did not die on the occasion contemplated. In either case, although he had certainly in the second case lost the dominium, the donee was allowed to get back the thing by a real action. (Tit. 7. 1, note.)

Justinian required that a donatio mortis causa should be made in the presence of five witnesses. (1, note.)

Donationes mortis causa very closely resembled legacies. They were subjected to the deduction of the Falcidian fourth, and were not valid if the giver was insolvent: but they differed from legacies in the following particulars. 1. They took effect on the death of the donor without its being necessary that the heir should enter. 2. The same

Compare
Contrast
D.M.ca
and Legacies

R

person who could take or could not take the one, could or could not take the other; but capacity was regarded, in the case of donationes mortis causa, at the time of the death only, not, as in the case of legacies, also at the time of the disposition. 3. A filiusfamilias could, with his father's permission, make donationes mortis causa, but could not give legacies of other things than his peculium castrense. 4. A peregrinus could make donationes mortis causa, but could not give legacies. (1, note.)

ii. Gifts inter vivos require tradition, but if the intentions of the donor have been manifested he is bound to deliver. A mere agreement to give was not originally binding, but Constantine enacted that such an agreement should be binding if in writing, and Justinian made the agreement binding in every case. Some donations looked on with peculiar favour, such as gifts to or from the emperor, were valid, without anything more than the intention to give being manifested; but other gifts, if exceeding 200 solidi previously to Justinian, and 500 solidi under his legislation, needed to be registered by public deeds. Gifts requiring to be registered were, however, valid up to the limit below which registration was not necessary. Gifts, as a rule, were not revocable; but Justinian made them revocable in case of the ingratitude of the donee. (2.)

iii. Gifts propter nuptias.—Gifts between husband and wife were prohibited by law. But as an equivalent to the dos contributed by the wife, the husband frequently made a gift before marriage, donatio ante nuptias, which was the inalienable property of the wife managed by the husband; and this donation might, like the dos, be increased after marriage. Justinian enacted that such gifts, like dotes, might be not only increased, but made after marriage, and should receive the more appropriate name of donationes propter, instead of ante, nuptias. The wife, if survivor, received a portion of the donatio, equal in quantity before Justinian, and in value under Justinian, to that which the husband, if survivor, would have received out of the dos. (3, note.)

Justinian, in closing the subject of the mode of acquiring particular things by the civil law, notices that there had been at one time a mode of acquiring per jus accrescendi, which took effect when one joint owner of a slave enfranchised him in such a way that, if the enfranchisement had been effectual, the slave would have become a citizen; the share of the enfranchising owner passed by accrual to the other owner, and this other owner became the sole owner of the slave. Justinian did away with this by enacting that in such a case the slave should be free, and the other part-owner should receive a pecuniary compensation from the enfranchising part-owner. (4.)

Before passing to consider the modes of acquiring groups of things, the Institutes deal with two subsidiary subjects, viz. 1, Separation from ownership of the power of alienation, and 2, Acquisition through others.

i. SEPARATION FROM OWNERSHIP OF THE POWER OF ALIENATION.

1. A person who is owner cannot always alienate. Two instances husband-

A pupil.

R

person who could take or could not take the one, could or could not take the other; but capacity was regarded, in the case of donationes mortis causa, at the time of the death only, not, as in the case of legacies, also at the time of the disposition. 3. A filiusfamilias could, with his father's permission, make donationes mortis causa, but could not give legacies of other things than his peculium castrense. 4. A peregrinus could make donationes mortis causa, but could not give legacies. (1, note.)

ii. Gifts inter vivos require tradition, but if the intentions of the donor have been manifested he is bound to deliver. A mere agreement to give was not originally binding, but Constantine enacted that such an agreement should be binding if in writing, and Justinian made the agreement binding in every case. Some donations looked on with peculiar favour, such as gifts to or from the emperor, were valid, without anything more than the intention to give being manifested; but other gifts, if exceeding 200 solidi previously to Justinian, and 500 solidi under his legislation, needed to be registered by public deeds. Gifts requiring to be registered were, however, valid up to the limit below which registration was not necessary. Gifts, as a rule, were not revocable; but Justinian made them revocable in case of the ingratitude of the donee. (2.)

iii. Gifts propter nuptias.—Gifts between husband and wife were prohibited by law. But as an equivalent to the dos contributed by the wife, the husband frequently made a gift before marriage, donatio ante nuptias, which was the inalienable property of the wife managed by the husband; and this donation might, like the dos, be increased after marriage. Justinian enacted that such gifts, like dotes, might be not only increased, but made after marriage, and should receive the more appropriate name of donationes propter, instead of ante, nuptias. The wife, if survivor, received a portion of the donatio, equal in quantity before Justinian, and in value under Justinian, to that which the husband, if survivor, would have received out of the dos. (3, note.)

Justinian, in closing the subject of the mode of acquiring particular things by the civil law, notices that there had been at one time a mode of acquiring per ius accrescendi, which took effect when one joint owner of a slave enfranchised him in such a way that, if the enfranchisement had been effectual, the slave would have become a citizen; the share of the enfranchising owner passed by accrual to the other owner, and this other owner became the sole owner of the slave. Justinian did away with this by enacting that in such a case the slave should be free, and the other part-owner should receive a pecuniary compensation from the enfranchising part-owner. (4.)

Before passing to consider the modes of acquiring groups of things, the Institutes deal with two subsidiary subjects, viz. 1, Separation from ownership of the power of alienation, and 2, Acquisition through others.

i. SEPARATION FROM OWNERSHIP OF THE POWER OF ALIENATION.

1. A person who is owner cannot always alienate. Two instances husband's

A pupil.

are given. (a) A husband cannot alienate immoveables forming part of the dos of his wife, although the ownership is in him. The lex Julia prevented a husband selling such immoveables, when in Italico solo, without his wife's consent, or mortgaging them with her consent. Justinian enacted that immoveables, forming part of the dos, wherever situated, could not be sold or mortgaged by the husband, even with the consent of the wife. (Tit. 8. pr.)

(b) A pupil cannot, without the authorisation of the tutor, alienate.

The pupil could not transfer the property in anything belonging to him, but he could acquire the property in anything transferred to him. Three illustrations of this doctrine are given.

(a) A pupil unauthorised could not enter into the contract of mutuum, i.e. could not lend a thing so that the thing lent became the property of the person to whom it was lent, he in his turn having to give as much back. If the pupil made such a contract, he could by a real action get the thing back, if not consumed; if consumed bona fide, he could recover the value of it by a condictio; if consumed mala fide, he could get not only the value, but damages by an actio ad exhibendum.

(b) If the pupil unauthorised paid a debt, he could not make the money paid belong to the creditor. It was still his, and if not spent might be got back by a real action from the creditor; if spent bona fide, the debt due by the pupil was considered as liquidated; if spent mala fide, the pupil would have an actio ad exhibendum.

(c) If a debtor made a payment to a pupil without the tutor authorising the payment, the money paid became the property of the pupil, and the debt still remained unextinguished. If the pupil sued for the sum owing, the debtor could only repel the action to the extent to which the pupil then had the money in hand, and if the pupil had spent it all, the debtor had to pay over again. Even if the tutor authorised the payment, the debtor was not quite safe, for the tutor might not hand over to the pupil the money paid; and then the prætor might give a restitutio in integrum, placing the pupil in the position in which he would have been if the debt had not been paid, and so the creditor might have to pay over again. To obviate this risk, Justinian enacted that if the debtor paid under the authority of a judicial order, which was to be given gratis, he was to be absolutely secure, and under no circumstances could he have to pay again. (Tit. 8. 2.)

2. A person not owner can sometimes alienate. The instance given is that of a creditor who has a power (of which he cannot be deprived even by agreement) of selling the thing pledged or mortgaged (pignus, hypotheca). Justinian enacted, that unless the parties otherwise agreed, the sale should take place two years after notice to pay; and in two years more, if no purchaser could be found, the creditor should be considered the owner. (Tit. 8. 1, note.)

ii. ACQUISITION THROUGH OTHERS.—We may acquire through, 1, filifamiliarum; 2, slaves belonging to us, and, to a certain extent, slaves of whom we have the usufruct; 3, procurators.

are given. (a) A husband cannot alienate immoveables forming part of the dos of his wife, although the ownership is in him. The lex Julia prevented a husband selling such immoveables, when in Italico solo, without his wife's consent, or mortgaging them with her consent. Justinian enacted that immoveables, forming part of the dos, wherever situated, could not be sold or mortgaged by the husband, even with the consent of the wife. (Tit. 8. pr.)

(b) A pupil cannot, without the authorisation of the tutor, alienate.

The pupil could not transfer the property in anything belonging to him, but he could acquire the property in anything transferred to him. Three illustrations of this doctrine are given.

(a) A pupil unauthorised could not enter into the contract of mutuum, i.e. could not lend a thing so that the thing lent became the property of the person to whom it was lent, he in his turn having to give as much back. If the pupil made such a contract, he could by a real action get the thing back, if not consumed; if consumed bona fide, he could recover the value of it by a condictio; if consumed mala fide, he could get not only the value, but damages by an actio ad exhibendum.

(b) If the pupil unauthorised paid a debt, he could not make the money paid belong to the creditor. It was still his, and if not spent might be got back by a real action from the creditor; if spent bona fide, the debt due by the pupil was considered as liquidated; if spent mala fide, the pupil would have an actio ad exhibendum.

(c) If a debtor made a payment to a pupil without the tutor authorising the payment, the money paid became the property of the pupil, and the debt still remained unextinguished. If the pupil sued for the sum owing, the debtor could only repel the action to the extent to which the pupil then had the money in hand, and if the pupil had spent it all, the debtor had to pay over again. Even if the tutor authorised the payment, the debtor was not quite safe, for the tutor might not hand over to the pupil the money paid; and then the prætor might give a restitutio in integrum, placing the pupil in the position in which he would have been if the debt had not been paid, and so the creditor might have to pay over again. To obviate this risk, Justinian enacted that if the debtor paid under the authority of a judicial order, which was to be given gratis, he was to be absolutely secure, and under no circumstances could he have to pay again. (Tit. 8. 2.)

2. A person not owner can sometimes alienate. The instance given is that of a creditor who has a power (of which he cannot be deprived even by agreement) of selling the thing pledged or mortgaged (pignus, hypotheca). Justinian enacted, that unless the parties otherwise agreed, the sale should take place two years after notice to pay; and in two years more, if no purchaser could be found, the creditor should be considered the owner. (Tit. 8. 1, note.)

ii. ACQUISITION THROUGH OTHERS.—We may acquire through, 1, filifamiliarum; 2, slaves belonging to us, and, to a certain extent, slaves of whom we have the usufruct; 3, procurators.

1. Acquisition through filiifamiliarum.—The old rule of law was that everything acquired by a filiusfamilias was acquired for and belonged to the paterfamilias. The son might have a peculium or property under his control, which, so far as third persons went, who could sue and recover to the extent of the peculium, was like the son's property; but the father remained the legal owner of it, and it was only under the son's control because the father permitted this. The first change was the introduction of the PECULIUM CASTRENSE, dating from the beginning of the empire, consisting of everything given to a son on setting out for military service, or acquired while that service lasted. This peculium was the son's; he could dispose of it as he pleased in his lifetime or by testament, but if he did not dispose of it by testament, then his father took it not as the heir of the son, but as the claimant of a peculium. Justinian, however, allowed the children or brother of the filiusfamilias to take the peculium before the father. The next change was the introduction by Constantine, or perhaps previously, of the PECULIUM QUASI-CASTRENSE, i.e. property acquired by the son in personal attendance on the emperor; and this peculium too could, under Justinian, be, like the castrense, given by testament. (Tit. 9. 1, note.)

Lastly, Constantine introduced the PECULIUM ADVENTITIUM, which, having been previously confined to property coming from a mother or maternal ancestor, or husband or wife, was made by Justinian to include all property coming to the filiusfamilias, except the peculium profectitium, i.e. the property coming to him from the father himself. Of this peculium adventitium the son had the ownership, the father the usufruct. (Tit. 9. 1.) From the peculium falling under the three above heads as not belonging to the father, a third used to be deducted by the father when he emancipated the son. Justinian gave the father the usufruct of half, instead of the ownership of a third, of such peculium, in case of emancipation. (2.)

2. Acquisition through slaves.—(a) The slave stipulates for the master's benefit, but cannot make his master's position worse. The slave enters on an inheritance only if the master directs him, for the inheritance may be such as to cause loss. The slave takes a legacy for the benefit of the master whose slave he was at the date of the decease of the testator. The slave possesses for the master, who must have knowledge of the possession and supply the animus, the slave only being capable of physical detention—except when the slave possessed a thing as part of his peculium; for the master, in allowing him to create this peculium (which always belonged to the master), has exercised the animus necessary for possession. And what is here said of the slave may, with the necessary exceptions as to the peculia castrensia, quasi-castrensia, and adventitia, be said of the filiusfamilias, who equally stipulated for his father's benefit, could not make his father's position worse, took inheritances only under his father's direction, received legacies for his father's benefit, and possessed

1. Acquisition through filiifamiliarum.—The old rule of law was that everything acquired by a filiusfamilias was acquired for and belonged to the paterfamilias. The son might have a peculium or property under his control, which, so far as third persons went, who could sue and recover to the extent of the peculium, was like the son's property; but the father remained the legal owner of it, and it was only under the son's control because the father permitted this. The first change was the introduction of the PECULIUM CASTRENSE, dating from the beginning of the empire, consisting of everything given to a son on setting out for military service, or acquired while that service lasted. This peculium was the son's; he could dispose of it as he pleased in his lifetime or by testament, but if he did not dispose of it by testament, then his father took it not as the heir of the son, but as the claimant of a peculium. Justinian, however, allowed the children or brother of the filiusfamilias to take the peculium before the father. The next change was the introduction by Constantine, or perhaps previously, of the PECULIUM QUASI-CASTRENSE, i.e. property acquired by the son in personal attendance on the emperor; and this peculium too could, under Justinian, be, like the castrense, given by testament. (Tit. 9. 1, note.)

Lastly, Constantine introduced the PECULIUM ADVENTITIUM, which, having been previously confined to property coming from a mother or maternal ancestor, or husband or wife, was made by Justinian to include all property coming to the filiusfamilias, except the peculium profectitium, i.e. the property coming to him from the father himself. Of this peculium adventitium the son had the ownership, the father the usufruct. (Tit. 9. 1.) From the peculium falling under the three above heads as not belonging to the father, a third used to be deducted by the father when he emancipated the son. Justinian gave the father the usufruct of half, instead of the ownership of a third, of such peculium, in case of emancipation. (2.)

2. Acquisition through slaves.—(a) The slave stipulates for the master's benefit, but cannot make his master's position worse. The slave enters on an inheritance only if the master directs him, for the inheritance may be such as to cause loss. The slave takes a legacy for the benefit of the master whose slave he was at the date of the decease of the testator. The slave possesses for the master, who must have knowledge of the possession and supply the animus, the slave only being capable of physical detention—except when the slave possessed a thing as part of his peculium; for the master, in allowing him to create this peculium (which always belonged to the master), has exercised the animus necessary for possession. And what is here said of the slave may, with the necessary exceptions as to the peculia castrensia, quasi-castrensia, and adventitia, be said of the filiusfamilias, who equally stipulated for his father's benefit, could not make his father's position worse, took inheritances only under his father's direction, received legacies for his father's benefit, and possessed physically for his father, but needed his father's animus possidendi. (3, note.)

(b) Through slaves of whom any one has the usufruct, he acquires whatever they acquire (including possession as well as ownership) by means of anything belonging to the usufructuary or by their own labour. Everything else which they acquire, as for example an inheritance or a legacy, is acquired for their owner. The same may be said of a slave possessed bona fide, but who is really not the slave of the possessor, either as being free or belonging to another. If the slave possessed bona fide becomes in time the property of the possessor by usucapio (which cannot happen in case of a slave of whom there is a usufruct), he acquires thenceforth everything for the owner by usucapio. (4.)

3. Acquisition through procurators.—On the other hand, a man could not acquire by means of free persons not in his power or possessed by him bona fide, nor by slaves belonging to another, of whom he had neither the usufruct nor the bona fide possession. He could acquire nothing 'per extraneam personam,' except that a procurator could acquire possession for his principal, even when his principal did not know of the acquisition, and then if the thing possessed was handed over by the owner, the ownership was acquired by the principal in any case, but if it was not handed over, then the usucapio began to run on behalf of the principal only from the time when he knew of and adopted the possession. (5.)

TESTAMENTS.

We now come to the first mode of acquiring universitates rerum, viz. by testament, and this subject occupies the rest of the Second Book.

We have to consider (1) the legal position of the maker of the testament: (a) how he must make it, which will vary according as he is or is not a soldier; (b) who are legally incapable of making wills; (c) the duties and powers of the testator as to the disinherison, institution, and substitution of heirs; (d) the causes that make a testament invalid; and (2) the legal position of those who take under a testament, that is, of (a) heirs, (b) legatees, and (c) those who receive or benefit by a trust.

I. LEGAL POSITION OF THE MAKER OF THE TESTAMENT.

1. FORM OF THE TESTAMENT.—In the earliest period of Roman law, a testament might be made (a) in the calata comitia, called twice a year for this purpose, where the gentes watched over the transfer of the hereditas, or (b) in procinctu, in time of war, when an army was setting out to fight. Then a new form of will was introduced in the shape of a fictitious sale, by which originally the heir figuring as the familia emptor bought the inheritance from the testator in the presence of the holder of the scales and five witnesses. Afterwards the familia emptor became merely an outsider, going through the ceremony for the physically for his father, but needed his father's animus possidendi. (3, note.)

(b) Through slaves of whom any one has the usufruct, he acquires whatever they acquire (including possession as well as ownership) by means of anything belonging to the usufructuary or by their own labour. Everything else which they acquire, as for example an inheritance or a legacy, is acquired for their owner. The same may be said of a slave possessed bona fide, but who is really not the slave of the possessor, either as being free or belonging to another. If the slave possessed bona fide becomes in time the property of the possessor by usucapio (which cannot happen in case of a slave of whom there is a usufruct), he acquires thenceforth everything for the owner by usucapio. (4.)

3. Acquisition through procurators.—On the other hand, a man could not acquire by means of free persons not in his power or possessed by him bona fide, nor by slaves belonging to another, of whom he had neither the usufruct nor the bona fide possession. He could acquire nothing 'per extraneam personam,' except that a procurator could acquire possession for his principal, even when his principal did not know of the acquisition, and then if the thing possessed was handed over by the owner, the ownership was acquired by the principal in any case, but if it was not handed over, then the usucapio began to run on behalf of the principal only from the time when he knew of and adopted the possession. (5.)

TESTAMENTS.

We now come to the first mode of acquiring universitates rerum, viz. by testament, and this subject occupies the rest of the Second Book.

We have to consider (1) the legal position of the maker of the testament: (a) how he must make it, which will vary according as he is or is not a soldier; (b) who are legally incapable of making wills; (c) the duties and powers of the testator as to the disinherison, institution, and substitution of heirs; (d) the causes that make a testament invalid; and (2) the legal position of those who take under a testament, that is, of (a) heirs, (b) legatees, and (c) those who receive or benefit by a trust.

I. LEGAL POSITION OF THE MAKER OF THE TESTAMENT.

1. FORM OF THE TESTAMENT.—In the earliest period of Roman law, a testament might be made (a) in the calata comitia, called twice a year for this purpose, where the gentes watched over the transfer of the hereditas, or (b) in procinctu, in time of war, when an army was setting out to fight. Then a new form of will was introduced in the shape of a fictitious sale, by which originally the heir figuring as the familia emptor bought the inheritance from the testator in the presence of the holder of the scales and five witnesses. Afterwards the familia emptor became merely an outsider, going through the ceremony for the benefit of the heir, whose name was concealed during the lifetime of the testator. (Tit. 10. 1.)

Then came the prætorian testament. The form of sale was no longer required. The libripens and the familia emptor became two additional witnesses, making seven in all, but the seven witnesses had to go through a new formality. They had to seal the testament with their seals. (2.)

Lastly came the imperial form of will introduced in the fifth century by Theodosius the Second. Here a new precaution was introduced: the seven witnesses had not only to seal, but to subscribe the testament, and so had the testator, or, if he could not write, an eighth witness had to subscribe for him. This testament was said to be tripartitum, that is, taking its origin from three sources. The necessity for the testament being made at one single time, and the necessity of the presence of seven witnesses, came from the old civil law; the sealing of the testament by the witnesses came from prætorian law; the subscription of the witnesses and the testator came from imperial law. (3.) Justinian added, and subsequently abolished, another requirement, that the name of the heir should be in the handwriting of the testator or of one of the witnesses. (4.)

It made no difference what seal the witnesses used, and before the time of Theodosius and Valentinian they used, and after that time they were obliged, to write by the side of the mark of their seal their names and the name of the testator. (5, and 2, note.)

Any one, as a general rule, could be a witness with whom the testator had testamenti factio, i.e. to whom he could leave his inheritance. But there were exceptions: such as women, children below the age of puberty, slaves, the mad, the deaf, the dumb, and persons considered as intestabiles on account of having committed certain offences, such as writing libels or denying their signature to a former testament which they had witnessed. (6.) A testament would, however, be valid, although witnessed by a slave, if, at the time of witnessing it, he was reputed to be free. (7.) Members of the same family might be witnesses of the same testament (8); but the filiusfamilias could not be a witness of the father's testament, nor could the father be a witness of the son's testament affecting his peculium castrense. (9.) Neither the heir nor any one in the same family with him could be a witness—but legatees and fideicommissarii, and those connected with them, might. (10, 11.)

The testament might be written on any material, wax, parchment, &c. (12); and any number of copies of a testament might be made. (13.) A testament need not be made in writing at all. It might be merely nuncupative, that is, the testator might orally declare his wishes in the presence of seven witnesses. (14.)

Military Testaments.—Special privileges, however, as to making testaments were accorded to soldiers by Julius Cæsar, and confirmed by other emperors. A soldier, while serving in a campaign, was not re-

benefit of the heir, whose name was concealed during the lifetime of the testator. (Tit. 10. 1.)

Then came the prætorian testament. The form of sale was no longer required. The libripens and the familie emptor became two additional witnesses, making seven in all, but the seven witnesses had to go through a new formality. They had to seal the testament with their seals. (2.)

Lastly came the imperial form of will introduced in the fifth century by Theodosius the Second. Here a new precaution was introduced: the seven witnesses had not only to seal, but to subscribe the testament, and so had the testator, or, if he could not write, an eighth witness had to subscribe for him. This testament was said to be tripartitum, that is, taking its origin from three sources. The necessity for the testament being made at one single time, and the necessity of the presence of seven witnesses, came from the old civil law; the sealing of the testament by the witnesses came from prætorian law; the subscription of the witnesses and the testator came from imperial law. (3.) Justinian added, and subsequently abolished, another requirement, that the name of the heir should be in the handwriting of the testator or of one of the witnesses. (4.)

It made no difference what seal the witnesses used, and before the time of Theodosius and Valentinian they used, and after that time they were obliged, to write by the side of the mark of their seal their names and the name of the testator. (5, and 2, note.)

Any one, as a general rule, could be a witness with whom the testator had testamenti factio, i.e. to whom he could leave his inheritance. But there were exceptions: such as women, children below the age of puberty, slaves, the mad, the deaf, the dumb, and persons considered as intestabiles on account of having committed certain offences, such as writing libels or denying their signature to a former testament which they had witnessed. (6.) A testament would, however, be valid, although witnessed by a slave, if, at the time of witnessing it, he was reputed to be free. (7.) Members of the same family might be witnesses of the same testament (8); but the filiusfamilias could not be a witness of the father's testament, nor could the father be a witness of the son's testament affecting his peculium castrense. (9.) Neither the heir nor any one in the same family with him could be a witness but legatees and fideicommissarii, and those connected with them, might. (10, 11.)

The testament might be written on any material, wax, parchment, &c. (12); and any number of copies of a testament might be made. (13.) A testament need not be made in writing at all. It might be merely nuncupative, that is, the testator might orally declare his wishes in the presence of seven witnesses. (14.)

Military Testaments.—Special privileges, however, as to making testaments were accorded to soldiers by Julius Cæsar, and confirmed by other emperors. A soldier, while serving in a campaign, was not required to observe the formalities incumbent on civilians; and this applied to a soldier filiusfamilias making a testament as to his peculium castrense. But if he was not in a campaign, the filiusfamilias had to observe the usual formalities. Under Justinian it was undoubtedly necessary that the soldier's testament should be made during a campaign, but whether this had previously been the law is doubtful. (Tit. 11. pr.)

The following were the ¹³chief privileges of soldiers with regard to military testaments: (a) All that was necessary for the validity of a soldier's testament was that he should have meant in some way to express his testamentary intentions; if orally, in the presence of a witness. (b.) Any words would suffice to institute his heir. (Tit. 11. 1.) (c) The soldier might die partly testate and partly intestate. (6, note.) (d) He need not disinherit his children by name. (Tit. 13. 6.) (e) His testament would not be rendered invalid by those causes which would render invalid the testament of a civilian (paganus), and his testament, however informally made, would suffice for revocation of a previous testament. (Tit. 17. 2, note.) (f) He could institute as heirs persons generally incapacitated, such as deportati and peregrini. (Tit. 11. 6, note.) (g) He could give more than three-fourths of his property in legacies. (Tit. 22. 3, note.) (h) He could dispose of the inheritance by codicils. (Tit. 11. 6, note.) (i) He might make a testament although deaf or dumb. (2.) (j) A testament made irregularly before he acquired the power of making a military testament became valid as the expression of his wishes after he had acquired that power. (4.) (k) Nor did a minima capitis deminutio affect the validity of a military testament, nor the two greater kinds, if inflicted for merely military offences. (5, note.) (l) The rule treating institutions ex certo tempore or ad certum tempus as a superfluity did not extend to military testaments. (Tit. 14. 9.) (m) Soldiers could make a testament for their children without having made their own, and could substitute to emancipated children and to strangers. (Tit. 16. 9, note.)

The testament of a soldier made without the forms required from civilians remained in force for a year after his discharge (post missionem); and if he inserted a condition that could not be fulfilled within a year, yet his testament was valid, supposing he died while he could make a military testament. After a year from his discharge had elapsed, he was obliged, to die testate, to make a testament with the ordinary forms. (Tit. 11. 3.)

2. PERSONS INCAPABLE OF TESTATION.—All persons, however, could not make testaments. This power was confined to Roman citizens sui juris. The filiusfamilias could, however, dispose by testament of his peculium castrense, and this privilege was first in some, and then in all, cases extended to the peculium quasi-castrense (Tit. 12. pr.; Tit. 11. 6); the father taking these peculia, however, by the patria potestas, if the son died intestate leaving no child or brother. (Tit. 12. pr.) Children under age, mad persons, except in lucid intervals (1); inter-

quired to observe the formalities incumbent on civilians; and this applied to a soldier filiusfamilias making a testament as to his peculium castrense. But if he was not in a campaign, the filiusfamilias had to observe the usual formalities. Under Justinian it was undoubtedly necessary that the soldier's testament should be made during a campaign, but whether this had previously been the law is doubtful. (Tit. 11. pr.)

The following were the ¹³chief privileges of soldiers with regard to military testaments: (a) All that was necessary for the validity of a soldier's testament was that he should have meant in some way to express his testamentary intentions; if orally, in the presence of a witness. (b.) Any words would suffice to institute his heir. (Tit. 11. 1.) (c) The soldier might die partly testate and partly intestate. (6, note.) (d) He need not disinherit his children by name. (Tit. 13. 6.) (e) His testament would not be rendered invalid by those causes which would render invalid the testament of a civilian (paganus), and his testament, however informally made, would suffice for revocation of a previous testament. (Tit. 17. 2, note.) (f) He could institute as heirs persons generally incapacitated, such as deportati and peregrini. (Tit. 11. 6, note.) (g) He could give more than three-fourths of his property in legacies. (Tit. 22. 3, note.) (h) He could dispose of the inheritance by codicils. (Tit. 11. 6, note.) (i) He might make a testament although deaf or dumb. (2.) (j) A testament made irregularly before he acquired the power of making a military testament became valid as the expression of his wishes after he had acquired that power. (4.) (k) Nor did a minima capitis deminutio affect the validity of a military testament, nor the two greater kinds, if inflicted for merely military offences. (5, note.) (l) The rule treating institutions ex certo tempore or ad certum tempus as a superfluity did not extend to military testaments. (Tit. 14. 9.) (m) Soldiers could make a testament for their children without having made their own, and could substitute to emancipated children and to strangers. (Tit. 16. 9, note.)

The testament of a soldier made without the forms required from civilians remained in force for a year after his discharge (post missionem); and if he inserted a condition that could not be fulfilled within a year, yet his testament was valid, supposing he died while he could make a military testament. After a year from his discharge had elapsed, he was obliged, to die testate, to make a testament with the ordinary forms. (Tit. 11. 3.)

2. PERSONS INCAPABLE OF TESTATION.—All persons, however, could not make testaments. This power was confined to Roman citizens sui juris. The filiusfamilias could, however, dispose by testament of his peculium castrense, and this privilege was first in some, and then in all, cases extended to the peculium quasi-castrense (Tit. 12. pr.; Tit. 11. 6); the father taking these pecunia, however, by the patria potestas, if the son died intestate leaving no child or brother. (Tit. 12. pr.) Children under age, mad persons, except in lucid intervals (1); interdicted prodigals (2); deaf and dumb and blind people, except under special precautions provided by the emperors (3, 4), could not make testaments.

Captivity.—A testament made by a man during captivity was invalid, but a testament made before he became captive was valid, by the jus postliminii, if he returned; or if he died, by a deduction from the terms of the lex Cornelia, punishing the forgery of the testament of a person dying in captivity. It was argued that a testament made by a person who subsequently died in captivity must be valid, or the law would not punish a forgery of such a testament. (5, note.)

3. We now come to the rules as to the (a) disinherison, (b) institution, and (c) substitution of heirs.

(a) DISINHERISON.—The sui heredes of the testator, i.e. those persons who were made sui juris by his death, had such an interest in the inheritance that if he wished to exclude them he must do so expressly. He had to exclude his sons by name, and if he did not, the testament was wholly invalid. Other sui heredes, such as daughters, he might exclude by the general term ceteri exheredes sunt; but if he did not do this, then the testament was not invalid, but these excluded sui heredes took by a kind of accrual their proper share, if the instituted heirs were sui heredes, and half the inheritance if the instituted heirs were strangers. (Tit. 13. pr. note.)

The birth of a new suus heres after the testament had been made introduced a new participator in the inheritance, and unless this person was expressly disinherited by anticipation, the testament was made invalid. The term posthumous was in strictness applied to any person born after the death of the testator. In the theory of law, postumi were incerta persona, and could not be instituted or disinherited; but the civil law permitted the institution of postumi sui heredes, born after the death of the testator (1, note); and the lex Junia Velleia permitted the institution of postumi sui heredes, conceived before and born after the date of the testament, but born before the testator's death (postumi Velleiani). (2, note.) And postumi who could be instituted must be disinherited. The jurist Gallus Aquilius invented a form of institution by which the case was met of a son dying in the testator's lifetime, and then the testator dying, and then there being a posthumous son of the son, who would be a suus heres of the testator. (1, note.)

There was also another way in which new sui heredes might come into existence after the date of the testament. A son might die in the lifetime of the testator, and then the children of that son would pass into the rank of sui heredes. The lex Junia Velleia, by a further provision, permitted the disinherison of all such children, who were said to be postumorum loco (postumi quasi Velleiani). (2, note.)

The disinherison of postumi had to be made nominatim: Quicumque mihi filius genitus fuerit exheres esto. (1.) Postuma might be disinherited by the general ceteri clause. It was, however, necessary that the postuma, if disinherited by the general clause, should have some-dicted prodigals (2); deaf and dumb and blind people, except under special precautions provided by the emperors (3, 4), could not make testaments.

Captivity.—A testament made by a man during captivity was invalid, but a testament made before he became captive was valid, by the jus postliminii, if he returned; or if he died, by a deduction from the terms of the lex Cornelia, punishing the forgery of the testament of a person dying in captivity. It was argued that a testament made by a person who subsequently died in captivity must be valid, or the law would not punish a forgery of such a testament. (5, note.)

3. We now come to the rules as to the (a) disinherison, (b) institution, and (c) substitution of heirs.

(a) DISINHERISON.—The sui heredes of the testator, i.e. those persons who were made sui juris by his death, had such an interest in the inheritance that if he wished to exclude them he must do so expressly. He had to exclude his sons by name, and if he did not, the testament was wholly invalid. Other sui heredes, such as daughters, he might exclude by the general term ceteri exheredes sunt; but if he did not do this, then the testament was not invalid, but these excluded sui heredes took by a kind of accrual their proper share, if the instituted heirs were sui heredes, and half the inheritance if the instituted heirs were strangers. (Tit. 18. pr. note.)

The birth of a new suus heres after the testament had been made introduced a new participator in the inheritance, and unless this person was expressly disinherited by anticipation, the testament was made invalid. The term posthumous was in strictness applied to any person born after the death of the testator. In the theory of law, postumi were incerta persona, and could not be instituted or disinherited; but the civil law permitted the institution of postumi sui heredes, born after the death of the testator (1, note); and the lex Junia Velleia permitted the institution of postumi sui heredes, conceived before and born after the date of the testament, but born before the testator's death (postumi Velleiani). (2, note.) And postumi who could be instituted must be disinherited. The jurist Gallus Aquilius invented a form of institution by which the case was met of a son dying in the testator's lifetime, and then the testator dying, and then there being a posthumous son of the son, who would be a suus heres of the testator. (1, note.)

There was also another way in which new sui heredes might come into existence after the date of the testament. A son might die in the lifetime of the testator, and then the children of that son would pass into the rank of sui heredes. The lex Junia Velleia, by a further provision, permitted the disinherison of all such children, who were said to be postumorum loco (postumi quasi Velleiani). (2, note.)

The disinherison of postumi had to be made nominatim: Quicumque mihi filius genitus fuerit exheres esto. (1.) Postumæ might be disinherited by the general ceteri clause. It was, however, necessary that the postumæ, if disinherited by the general clause, should have something left them, to show they were not passed over through forgetfulness. (1.) Other persons, who came into the family after the date of the testament, such as children subsequently adopted, and children both conceived and born after the date of the testament, in the lifetime of the testator, necessarily invalidated the testament. (2, note.)

Prætoria

So far we have been considering the provisions of the civil law. The prætor also came to the aid of those who were not, in his opinion, properly disinherited, by giving them bonorum possessio contra tabulas. (3.)

If a daughter or a grandchild was omitted, the prætor permitted the testament to be set altogether aside, but the Emperor Antoninus made a distinction, and allowed the daughter to have only what she would take by the jus accrescendi, that is, her share, which, if the instituted heir was a stranger, would be one-half, whereas the grandson, if omitted, could get the testament set aside, and would take all the inheritance, as against an instituted stranger. (3, note.)

Under the prætorian law grandsons as well as sons must be disinherited nominatim. (3, note.) Perhaps also the prætor did not permit the testament to be set aside because a son had not been properly disinherited who died in the lifetime of the testator, although the law is laid down by Justinian positively to this effect, that the testament was ipso facto invalid in such a case. (Tit. 13. pr. and 3, note.)

The prætor required all sons and grandsons to be disinherited, whether they were or were not in the power of the testator, provided they were not in another family. This included those emancipated (3), and those given in adoption and subsequently emancipated by the adoptive father. (4.) The emancipated son, however, had to bring into account the property he had acquired since emancipation, if the effect of his getting the testament set aside was injurious to a properly instituted suius heres. (3, note.)

Justinian made some further changes. 1. He required the child and the grandchild, male or female, whom it was necessary to disinherit at all, to be disinherited nominatim. (5.) 2. In case this was not done, the testament was absolutely invalid. There was no longer any jus accrescendi for daughters and grandchildren. (5.) 3. The testator was obliged to disinherit nominatim his child given in adoption to any one but an ascendant. (5, note.)

Soldiers in expeditione were not obliged to disinherit expressly any one. (6.) Mothers and maternal ancestors, also, were not obliged to disinherit expressly those who would have taken their inheritance ab intestato. Their silence was sufficient; but then these persons, if unjustly passed over, might present a querela inofficiosi testamenti, just as those might who, although disinherited in due form, complained that their disinherison was unjust. (7.)

(b) INSTITUTION.—The institution of the heir was the basis of the whole testament. In the old law some such formal phrase as Titius heres esto was considered necessary; but, under the empire, any form of institution would suffice. (Tit. 14. pr., note.)

thing left them, to show they were not passed over through forgetfulness. (1.) Other persons, who came into the family after the date of the testament, such as children subsequently adopted, and children both conceived and born after the date of the testament, in the lifetime of the testator, necessarily invalidated the testament. (2, note.)

So far we have been considering the provisions of the civil law. The prætor also came to the aid of those who were not, in his opinion, properly disinherited, by giving them bonorum possessio contra tabulas. (3.)

If a daughter or a grandchild was omitted, the prætor permitted the testament to be set altogether aside, but the Emperor Antoninus made a distinction, and allowed the daughter to have only what she would take by the jus accrescendi, that is, her share, which, if the instituted heir was a stranger, would be one-half, whereas the grandson, if omitted, could get the testament set aside, and would take all the inheritance, as against an instituted stranger. (3, note.)

Under the prætorian law grandsons as well as sons must be disinherited nominatim. (3, note.) Perhaps also the prætor did not permit the testament to be set aside because a son had not been properly disinherited who died in the lifetime of the testator, although the law is laid down by Justinian positively to this effect, that the testament was ipso facto invalid in such a case. (Tit. 13. pr. and 3, note.)

The prætor required all sons and grandsons to be disinherited, whether they were or were not in the power of the testator, provided they were not in another family. This included those emancipated (3), and those given in adoption and subsequently emancipated by the adoptive father. (4.) The emancipated son, however, had to bring into account the property he had acquired since emancipation, if the effect of his getting the testament set aside was injurious to a properly instituted suius heres. (3, note.)

Justinian made some further changes. 1. He required the child and the grandchild, male or female, whom it was necessary to disinherit at all, to be disinherited nominatim. (5.) 2. In case this was not done, the testament was absolutely invalid. There was no longer any jus accrescendi for daughters and grandchildren. (5.) 3. The testator was obliged to disinherit nominatim his child given in adoption to any one but an ascendant. (5, note.)

Soldiers in expeditione were not obliged to disinherit expressly any one. (6.) Mothers and maternal ancestors, also, were not obliged to disinherit expressly those who would have taken their inheritance ab intestato. Their silence was sufficient; but then these persons, if unjustly passed over, might present a querela inofficiosi testamenti, just as those might who, although disinherited in due form, complained that their disinherison was unjust. (7.)

(b) INSTITUTION.—The institution of the heir was the basis of the whole testament. In the old law some such formal phrase as Titius heres esto was considered necessary; but, under the empire, any form of institution would suffice. (Tit. 14. pr., note.)

Prætor

Who could be instituted.—Those only could be instituted heirs who had the testamenti factio with the testator, who had, in the old language of the law, the commercium with him. Many persons, however, who had not the testamenti factio in the sense of being able to make a testament, had the testamenti factio in the sense of being capable of being instituted as heirs, as, for instance, persons below the age of puberty. Among those who could not be instituted were peregrini, deportati, and uncertain persons; an example of an uncertain person being ‘whoever shall marry my daughter,’ but a person whom the testator had not seen was not an uncertain person. (12.) The institution of uncertain persons was permitted by Justinian. Further, it was not permitted to institute municipalities; the gods, with certain exceptions, and so forth; and, under the law of Justinian, certain others, as apostates, heretics, or persons whose institution seemed contrary to the rules of law or of justice as to marriage; and, though caelibes and orbi could be instituted as heirs, the former took (unless of an age too young for marriage, or in case of near relationship to the testator) nothing, and the latter only half of what was given them by the testament, so long as the lex Papia Poppaea, abolished by Constantine, was in force. (Tit. 10. 6, note.)

Institution of Slaves.—The master might institute his slave, and, under Justinian, without expressly enfranchising him, and Justinian permitted the institution of a slave in whom the testator had only a bare ownership, the slave having, however, still to serve the usufructuary; but a mistress could not institute, and so enfranchise, a slave accused of adultery with her. (Tit. 14. pr.) The slave of the testator, if instituted, was obliged to take the inheritance, if not emancipated before the testator’s death.

If the testator instituted the slave of another, the master of the slave decided whether the slave should accept the inheritance, and the slave took it for his master, or masters, if there were several, rateably (3); and if the master of the slave was dead, the slave could take the inheritance of the testator for the benefit of his dead master’s inheritance. (2.) In order to decide, in cases of the slave being alienated, for what master the inheritance was taken, it was necessary to look to the time when the inheritance was actually accepted, as the slave took the inheritance for the master to whom he then belonged. (1.)

A testator might appoint one heir, or as many as he pleased. (4.)

Calculation of the parts of an inheritance.—The calculation of the parts into which the testator divided the inheritance was made in the terms of the as, its multiples and its fractions. The real as contained twelve ounces, but the testamentary as, or unit of the inheritance, was held to contain as many ounces as the testator pleased. A person could not die partly testate and partly intestate, and so, if a testator instituted only one heir and gave him six ounces, it was held that the as in this case only contained six ounces, and he took the whole. (5.) If he instituted several heirs, and the number of parts, or ounces, he gave

Who could be instituted.—Those only could be instituted heirs who had the testamenti factio with the testator, who had, in the old language of the law, the commercium with him. Many persons, however, who had not the testamenti factio in the sense of being able to make a testament, had the testamenti factio in the sense of being capable of being instituted as heirs, as, for instance, persons below the age of puberty. Among those who could not be instituted were peregrini, deportati, and uncertain persons; an example of an uncertain person being ‘whoever shall marry my daughter,’ but a person whom the testator had not seen was not an uncertain person. (12.) The institution of uncertain persons was permitted by Justinian. Further, it was not permitted to institute municipalities; the gods, with certain exceptions, and so forth; and, under the law of Justinian, certain others, as apostates, heretics, or persons whose institution seemed contrary to the rules of law or of justice as to marriage; and, though celibes and orbi could be instituted as heirs, the former took (unless of an age too young for marriage, or in case of near relationship to the testator) nothing, and the latter only half of what was given them by the testament, so long as the lex Papia Poppaea, abolished by Constantine, was in force. (Tit. 10. 6, note.)

Institution of Slaves.—The master might institute his slave, and, under Justinian, without expressly enfranchising him, and Justinian permitted the institution of a slave in whom the testator had only a bare ownership, the slave having, however, still to serve the usufructuary; but a mistress could not institute, and so enfranchise, a slave accused of adultery with her. (Tit. 14. pr.) The slave of the testator, if instituted, was obliged to take the inheritance, if not emancipated before the testator’s death.

If the testator instituted the slave of another, the master of the slave decided whether the slave should accept the inheritance, and the slave took it for his master, or masters, if there were several, rateably (3); and if the master of the slave was dead, the slave could take the inheritance of the testator for the benefit of his dead master’s inheritance. (2.) In order to decide, in cases of the slave being alienated, for what master the inheritance was taken, it was necessary to look to the time when the inheritance was actually accepted, as the slave took the inheritance for the master to whom he then belonged. (1.)

A testator might appoint one heir, or as many as he pleased. (4.)

Calculation of the parts of an inheritance.—The calculation of the parts into which the testator divided the inheritance was made in the terms of the as, its multiples and its fractions. The real as contained twelve ounces, but the testamentary as, or unit of the inheritance, was held to contain as many ounces as the testator pleased. A person could not die partly testate and partly intestate, and so, if a testator instituted only one heir and gave him six ounces, it was held that the as in this case only contained six ounces, and he took the whole. (5.) If he instituted several heirs, and the number of parts, or ounces, he gave to each came, in the whole, to 11 or 13, this was taken to be the number included in the as. But if he gave two parts to one, and two to another, and instituted a third heir, without expressing how many parts were given him, then recourse was had to the normal as, and this third heir had the number of parts (eight) necessary to make up the twelve ounces of the as; or if the parts given reached, or exceeded, twelve, then the testator was supposed to have had the double as, or dupondius, in mind, and the instituted heir, to whom no express number of parts was given, took the number of parts necessary to make up the dupondius, i.e., if twelve were given, he took twelve, or one half of the inheritance, and, if more than twelve, as thirteen or twenty-five, were given, then he took enough parts to make up the dupondius, or, if necessary, the tripondius. The fractions of the dupondius or tripondius could, of course, be brought back to fractions of the as. (6, 7, 8.)

Conditional Institution.—Sui heredes could not be instituted conditionally unless the condition was one in their own power to fulfil, and was one lawful to carry out, but other heirs might be instituted conditionally. (9.) An impossible condition—and conditions of a kind contrary to law or boni mores were reckoned among impossible conditions—was treated simply as if it had not been inserted at all, and the institution was valid. (10.) So too, if an heir was instituted from, or to, a certain time, this was treated as something altogether superfluous, for to say that a man, after a date, or up to a date, should be heir, offended the rule that a testator could not die partly testate, and also the rule semel heres semper heres. But if the time was uncertain, in the sense that the heir was to be heir when a thing did happen that must happen some time, as when A died, this uncertain time was looked on merely as a condition, and the inheritance was in abeyance until it was seen whether the instituted heir survived A. If he did, he entered on the inheritance, and, in all cases, when an heir entered on a condition being fulfilled, his rights were made, by his entering, to date back to the time of the death of the testator.

(c) SUBSTITUTION, which was either ordinary, or to a pupil. Substitutio vulgaris, as opposed to pupillaris, was the institution of another heir in case the heir first named did not take; and the law allowed any number of such substitutions, to which resort was had, partly from the prevailing wish not to die intestate, and partly because, while the lex Julia et Papia Poppæa was in operation, the testator, by substituting an heir, could give to a person he wished to benefit, the share of an instituted heir disqualified from taking under this law. (Tit. 15. pr. and 1, notes.)

One important use of the power of substitution was that which regarded co-heirs. Three instances are given which show the benefits of substitution to co-heirs. i. Their position, if substituted to each other, was better than their position under the law of accrual, jus accrescendi. For though the share of an instituted heir who did not take it passed to co-heirs by the right of accrual, the effect was not the same as in

to each came, in the whole, to 11 or 13, this was taken to be the number included in the as. But if he gave two parts to one, and two to another, and instituted a third heir, without expressing how many parts were given him, then recourse was had to the normal as, and this third heir had the number of parts (eight) necessary to make up the twelve ounces of the as; or if the parts given reached, or exceeded, twelve, then the testator was supposed to have had the double as, or dupondius, in mind, and the instituted heir, to whom no express number of parts was given, took the number of parts necessary to make up the dupondius, i.e., if twelve were given, he took twelve, or one half of the inheritance, and, if more than twelve, as thirteen or twenty-five, were given, then he took enough parts to make up the dupondius, or, if necessary, the tripondius. The fractions of the dupondius or tripondius could, of course, be brought back to fractions of the as. (6, 7, 8.)

Conditional Institution.—Sui heredes could not be instituted conditionally unless the condition was one in their own power to fulfil, and was one lawful to carry out, but other heirs might be instituted conditionally. (9.) An impossible condition—and conditions of a kind contrary to law or boni mores were reckoned among impossible conditions—was treated simply as if it had not been inserted at all, and the institution was valid. (10.) So too, if an heir was instituted from, or to, a certain time, this was treated as something altogether superfluous, for to say that a man, after a date, or up to a date, should be heir, offended the rule that a testator could not die partly testate, and also the rule semel heres semper heres. But if the time was uncertain, in the sense that the heir was to be heir when a thing did happen that must happen some time, as when A died, this uncertain time was looked on merely as a condition, and the inheritance was in abeyance until it was seen whether the instituted heir survived A. If he did, he entered on the inheritance, and, in all cases, when an heir entered on a condition being fulfilled, his rights were made, by his entering, to date back to the time of the death of the testator.

(c) SUBSTITUTION, which was either ordinary, or to a pupil. Substitutio vulgaris, as opposed to pupillaris, was the institution of another heir in case the heir first named did not take; and the law allowed any number of such substitutions, to which resort was had, partly from the prevailing wish not to die intestate, and partly because, while the lex Julia et Papia Poppaea was in operation, the testator, by substituting an heir, could give to a person he wished to benefit, the share of an instituted heir disqualified from taking under this law. (Tit. 15. pr. and 1, notes.)

One important use of the power of substitution was that which regarded co-heirs. Three instances are given which show the benefits of substitution to co-heirs. i. Their position, if substituted to each other, was better than their position under the law of accrual, jus accrescendi. For though the share of an instituted heir who did not take it passed to co-heirs by the right of accrual, the effect was not the same as in case of substitution, for those substituted had a liberty of choice as to taking this vacant share, whereas they must take what accrued to them.

ii. The surviving substituted co-heirs might possibly get more in the case of one of their number dying, for one co-heir might die after entering on his own share of the inheritance, but before the share of a co-heir subsequently renouncing was offered him. If there was no substitution, the heirs of this co-heir would take by accrual the vacant share; but the benefit of substitution was personal. If the co-heir did not live to take the vacant share, it did not go to his heirs, but went to the surviving co-heirs, who thus had the advantage of excluding his heirs.

iii. Under the lex Julia et Papia some persons might take what was given them as co-heirs, who could not take caduca. Substitution might be beneficial to them, and they took as substituted heirs what they were disqualified from claiming as caduca. (1, note.)

Unless the testator otherwise provided, substituted co-heirs, if instituted with unequal shares, took the same unequal shares of what they got by substitution. (2.) If one of two co-heirs is substituted to the other, and a third person is substituted to the substituted co-heir, the third person is taken to be substituted also to the other co-heir, and, if both co-heirs die, takes the shares of both, although the co-heir to whom he was expressly substituted, died first. (3.) If a testator substituted an heir to an instituted heir, who, really a slave, was thought by the testator to be free, the master of the instituted slave and the substituted heir were permitted, by a kind of rough equity, each to take half. (4.)

Substitutio pupillaris.—Custom had also sanctioned what was termed pupillaris substitutio. A testator might, but only as a part of his own testament (Tit. 16. 5), substitute to each or to any of his children in his power at the time of making the testament and at his death (including posthumous children) (4), if they became heirs, but died under the legal age of puberty, or any previous date fixed by the testator (8); and a person substituted (whether specially named, or generally, as whoever might be the heir of the testator) (7) to such a child, was considered to be substituted both by vulgaris substitutio, so that he took if the child never lived to take the inheritance, and by pupillaris substitutio, so that he took if the child lived to take the inheritance but died under puberty. (Tit. 16. pr.) A substitution (quasi-pupillaris), framed on the model of the pupillaris, permitted any ascendant to substitute to persons of puberty deprived of reason any one of the descendants, or, if there were none, one of the brothers of the insane, (1.) By pupillaris substitutio the one testament of the father operated on two inheritances, and the substituted heir took all the inheritance of the son, and not only that which came from the father. (2.) The father might, if he thought proper, substitute, without letting the name of the substituted heir be known, unless the son died within the age of puberty, so as to guard against the substituted heir knowing that he had an interest in the death of the child. (3.) Fathers case of substitution, for those substituted had a liberty of choice as to taking this vacant share, whereas they must take what accrued to them.

ii. The surviving substituted co-heirs might possibly get more in the case of one of their number dying, for one co-heir might die after entering on his own share of the inheritance, but before the share of a co-heir subsequently renouncing was offered him. If there was no substitution, the heirs of this co-heir would take by accrual the vacant share; but the benefit of substitution was personal. If the co-heir did not live to take the vacant share, it did not go to his heirs, but went to the surviving co-heirs, who thus had the advantage of excluding his heirs.

iii. Under the lex Julia et Papia some persons might take what was given them as co-heirs, who could not take caduca. Substitution might be beneficial to them, and they took as substituted heirs what they were disqualified from claiming as caduca. (1, note.)

Unless the testator otherwise provided, substituted co-heirs, if instituted with unequal shares, took the same unequal shares of what they got by substitution. (2.) If one of two co-heirs is substituted to the other, and a third person is substituted to the substituted co-heir, the third person is taken to be substituted also to the other co-heir, and, if both co-heirs die, takes the shares of both, although the co-heir to whom he was expressly substituted, died first. (3.) If a testator substituted an heir to an instituted heir, who, really a slave, was thought by the testator to be free, the master of the instituted slave and the substituted heir were permitted, by a kind of rough equity, each to take half. (4.)

Substitutio pupillaris.—Custom had also sanctioned what was termed pupillaris substitutio. A testator might, but only as a part of his own testament (Tit. 16. 5), substitute to each or to any of his children in his power at the time of making the testament and at his death (including posthumous children) (4), if they became heirs, but died under the legal age of puberty, or any previous date fixed by the testator (8); and a person substituted (whether specially named, or generally, as whoever might be the heir of the testator) (7) to such a child, was considered to be substituted both by vulgaris substitutio, so that he took if the child never lived to take the inheritance, and by pupillaris substitutio, so that he took if the child lived to take the inheritance but died under puberty. (Tit. 16. pr.) A substitution (quasi-pupillaris), framed on the model of the pupillaris, permitted any ascendant to substitute to persons of puberty deprived of reason any one of the descendants, or, if there were none, one of the brothers of the insane, (1.) By pupillaris substitutio the one testament of the father operated on two inheritances, and the substituted heir took all the inheritance of the son, and not only that which came from the father. (2.) The father might, if he thought proper, substitute, without letting the name of the substituted heir be known, unless the son died within the age of puberty, so as to guard against the substituted heir knowing that he had an interest in the death of the child. (3.) Fathers might substitute to disinherited children, but not to emancipated, as they were no longer in the testator's power, and the patria potestas was the basis of the custom. (4, note.) If the impubes was arrogated, the substitution was at an end, but the arrogator was obliged to undertake, in case the child died impubes, to give up to the substituted heir all he would have taken if the substitution had remained in force. (4.)

As the basis of the custom was the patria potestas, a father could not substitute to a stranger or to a son above the age of puberty. All he could do was to impose a fideicommissum on the person instituted, binding him, if he died within a certain time, to give back that which came to him from the testator to the person whom the testator wished in that case to benefit. (9.)

4. CAUSES THAT MADE A TESTAMENT INVALID.—A testament legally made remained valid until revoked (ruptum) or rendered ineffectual (irritum). (Tit. 17. pr.)

(a) Testamentum ruptum.—A testament was revoked (ruptum), 1, by the subsequent arrogation or (if the testator was an ascendant) adoption of a suus heres, unless the new suus heres had been instituted by anticipation. (1.) 2. By the testator subsequently making another testament validly made or made in any way under which there could have been an heir. (2.) If the heir under the second testament could take ab intestato, the second testament, although not made with sufficient formalities, revoked the first, and was treated as an expression of the testator's wishes binding on the heres ab intestato. (2, note.) 3. The testament was also revoked by the testator tearing or defacing it, or, if it had been made ten years when the testator died, by the testator having before witnesses, or by a deed, signified his wish that it should not remain in force. (2, note.) If the heir in the second testament was instituted for certain things only, and it was declared that the first testament should be valid, the first testament was revoked, but the heir in the second had to content himself with the things so given him, or with a fourth of the inheritance, as would be most favourable, and had to restore the rest of the inheritance to the heirs instituted in the first testament. (3.)

Testamentum irritum.—A testament was rendered ineffectual (irritum) by the testator subsequently undergoing a capitis deminutio. But if the testator had reverted to his former position, and had been a citizen and sui juris at the time of his death, then the prætor would give the heir instituted in his testament bonorum possessio secundum tabulas, a distinct expression of the testator's wish to that effect being, however, required in case a testator who was arrogated after making the testament had been subsequently emancipated. (6, note.) The emperors, after Pertinax, would not accept an inheritance when they were instituted on account of a suit, or to cure the informality of an informal testament, or if instituted by word of mouth. (8.)

(b) QUERELA INOFFICIOSI TESTAMENTI.—Under the general head of the invalidity of testaments we have to notice the special cases when

might substitute to disinherited children, but not to emancipated, as they were no longer in the testator's power, and the patria potestas was the basis of the custom. (4, note.) If the impubes was arrogated, the substitution was at an end, but the arrogator was obliged to undertake, in case the child died impubes, to give up to the substituted heir all he would have taken if the substitution had remained in force. (4.)

As the basis of the custom was the patria potestas, a father could not substitute to a stranger or to a son above the age of puberty. All he could do was to impose a fideicommissum on the person instituted, binding him, if he died within a certain time, to give back that which came to him from the testator to the person whom the testator wished in that case to benefit. (9.)

4. CAUSES THAT MADE A TESTAMENT INVALID.—A testament legally made remained valid until revoked (ruptum) or rendered ineffectual (irritum). (Tit. 17. pr.)

(a) Testamentum ruptum.—A testament was revoked (ruptum), 1, by the subsequent arrogation or (if the testator was an ascendant) adoption of a suus heres, unless the new suus heres had been instituted by anticipation. (1.) 2. By the testator subsequently making another testament validly made or made in any way under which there could have been an heir. (2.) If the heir under the second testament could take ab intestato, the second testament, although not made with sufficient formalities, revoked the first, and was treated as an expression of the testator's wishes binding on the heres ab intestato. (2, note.) 3. The testament was also revoked by the testator tearing or defacing it, or, if it had been made ten years when the testator died, by the testator having before witnesses, or by a deed, signified his wish that it should not remain in force. (2, note.) If the heir in the second testament was instituted for certain things only, and it was declared that the first testament should be valid, the first testament was revoked, but the heir in the second had to content himself with the things so given him, or with a fourth of the inheritance, as would be most favourable, and had to restore the rest of the inheritance to the heirs instituted in the first testament. (3.)

Testamentum irritum.—A testament was rendered ineffectual (irritum) by the testator subsequently undergoing a capitis deminutio. But if the testator had reverted to his former position, and had been a citizen and sui juris at the time of his death, then the prætor would give the heir instituted in his testament bonorum possessio secundum tabulas, a distinct expression of the testator's wish to that effect being, however, required in case a testator who was arrogated after making the testament had been subsequently emancipated. (6, note.) The emperors, after Pertinax, would not accept an inheritance when they were instituted on account of a suit, or to cure the informality of an informal testament, or if instituted by word of mouth. (8.)

(b) QUERELA INOFFICIOSI TESTAMENTI.—Under the general head of the invalidity of testaments we have to notice the special cases when a testament would be attacked as inofficiosum. There were certain persons who might bring an action called the querela inofficiosi testamenti before the centumviri, to have the testament set aside, although it was formally perfect. The ground of the action was that the testator had not done his duty by them in his testament, and that he had cast a slur on their good fame by unjustly excluding them from sharing the inheritance, and, if this was made out, the testament was set aside under the fiction that the testator could not have been of sound mind when he made his testament. (Tit. 18. pr.)

On the ground of being unjustly disinherited or omitted, children, including posthumous children and children adopted by an ascendant (2), might attack the testaments of fathers or grandfathers in whose power they were. (Tit. 18. pr.)

On the ground of being unjustly omitted, children might attack the testament of their mother, and grandchildren those of their maternal grandfather. (Tit. 18. pr., note.)

Parents might, if omitted, attack the testaments of their children; and if infamous persons were preferred to them, brothers and sisters of the testator might attack the testament, and this liberty, which originally was given only if the tie of agnation continued, was extended by Justinian to brothers and sisters, if the tie of agnation had ceased, and even to brothers and sisters of the half blood on either side. (1, note.) No more distant relation could bring the action, nor could any one bring it, unless as a last resource, and if he could not get anything any other way. An arrogated pupil, for example, disinherited by the arrogator, had the quarta Antonina, and so could not bring the querela de inofficioso. (2, note.)

Portio legitima.—No one, if anything whatever was left to him by the testament, could attack it as inofficiosum. But he had a right to bring the actio in supplementum legitimæ, to have that which was left to him made up, if below, to the fourth part of that which he would have taken ab intestato. Before Justinian, if the gift to him had not reached the amount of this fourth, he could attack the testament, unless the testator had directed that the deficiency should be made up to him. Justinian directed the fourth to be made up without the direction on the part of the testator. (3. and note.)

If a person received the fourth part in any way under the testament, as heir, legatee, or fideicommissarius, or by a donatio mortis causa, or had received it by a donatio inter vivos, expressly as this fourth, or for the purchase of military rank, or had received it from a parent, as part of a dos or donatio ante nuptias, this person could not attack as inofficiosum the testament of the person from whom the part was thus received. (6, and 7, note.)

If there were several persons entitled to bring the action, each was to have the fourth of what he would have taken ab intestato. (7.)

Extinction of the action.—The right to bring the actio de inofficioso was extinguished, 1. By the person entitled to the quarta legitima

a testament would be attacked as inofficiosum. There were certain persons who might bring an action called the querela inofficiosi testamenti before the centumviri, to have the testament set aside, although it was formally perfect. The ground of the action was that the testator had not done his duty by them in his testament, and that he had cast a slur on their good fame by unjustly excluding them from sharing the inheritance, and, if this was made out, the testament was set aside under the fiction that the testator could not have been of sound mind when he made his testament. (Tit. 18. pr.)

On the ground of being unjustly disinherited or omitted, children, including posthumous children and children adopted by an ascendant (2), might attack the testaments of fathers or grandfathers in whose power they were. (Tit. 18. pr.)

On the ground of being unjustly omitted, children might attack the testament of their mother, and grandchildren those of their maternal grandfather. (Tit. 18. pr., note.)

Parents might, if omitted, attack the testaments of their children; and if infamous persons were preferred to them, brothers and sisters of the testator might attack the testament, and this liberty, which originally was given only if the tie of agnation continued, was extended by Justinian to brothers and sisters, if the tie of agnation had ceased, and even to brothers and sisters of the half blood on either side. (1, note.) No more distant relation could bring the action, nor could any one bring it, unless as a last resource, and if he could not get anything any other way. An arrogated pupil, for example, disinherited by the arrogator, had the quarta Antonina, and so could not bring the querela de inofficioso. (2, note.)

Portio legitima.—No one, if anything whatever was left to him by the testament, could attack it as inofficiosum. But he had a right to bring the actio in supplementum legitimæ, to have that which was left to him made up, if below, to the fourth part of that which he would have taken ab intestato. Before Justinian, if the gift to him had not reached the amount of this fourth, he could attack the testament, unless the testator had directed that the deficiency should be made up to him. Justinian directed the fourth to be made up without the direction on the part of the testator. (3. and note.)

If a person received the fourth part in any way under the testament, as heir, legatee, or fideicommissarius, or by a donatio mortis causa, or had received it by a donatio inter vivos, expressly as this fourth, or for the purchase of military rank, or had received it from a parent, as part of a dos or donatio ante nuptias, this person could not attack as inofficiosum the testament of the person from whom the part was thus received. (6, and 7, note.)

If there were several persons entitled to bring the action, each was to have the fourth of what he would have taken ab intestato. (7.)

Extinction of the action.—The right to bring the actio de inofficioso was extinguished, 1. By the person entitled to the quarta legitima

having died without having manifested an intention to dispute the testament; if he had done so, the action passed to his heirs. 2. If he had allowed a certain time, at first fixed at two years, and afterwards at five years, to elapse without bringing the action. 3. By acquiescing directly or indirectly in the testament (7, note); but a tutor who had acquiesced in the testament on behalf of his pupil might still attack the testament on his own account (4), just as, if he had attacked the testament on behalf of the pupil unsuccessfully, he did not lose to the fiscus what was given to himself, this being the usual penalty of unsuccessful attack. (5.)

System of the Novels.—Justinian in the Novels introduced a new system. (7, note.)

1. The portio legitima was fixed in a new way. If the number of those who could claim it was four or a less number, then they were all together entitled to one-third of the testator's whole inheritance, which third they shared between them; if more than four, to one-half.

2. Those entitled to receive a portio legitima must be instituted as heirs, and it was not enough to prevent the testament being attacked as inofficiosum, that they got their portions in some other way than as heirs.

3. If the testament was set aside as to the heirs, it still remained in force for all else, for trusts, legacies, and so forth.

4. The causes of just disinherison were enumerated, and on a specified one of these the testator must express himself to be acting.

II. LEGAL POSITION OF THOSE TAKING UNDER A TESTAMENT.

This is the second head of testamentary law, the legal position of the testator having been the first. Those taking under a testament were, 1, Heirs; 2, Legatees; 3, Fideicommissarii.

I. HEIRS.—Heirs are of three kinds: (1) Necessarii; (2) Sui et necessarii; and (3) Extranei. (Tit. 19. pr.)

Heredes Necessarii.—The heres necessarius was a slave instituted by his master. He became at once free on the death of the testator, and he had no option as to taking the inheritance. He was obliged to take it (necessarius), and the object of the institution was that the testator might be sure of having a testamentary heir, so that if the testator was insolvent, his goods might be sold, not as his, but as those of the heir, and thus the testator's memory be saved the disgrace of such a sale. (Tit. 19. 1.)

The heres necessarius might claim the beneficium separationis, that is, to have his property acquired after the death of the testator, or anything due to him from the testator, kept distinct from the property of the testator, and free from claims against the testator's inheritance. (1, note.)

Sui Heredes.—Sui et necessarii heredes are the descendants of the testator, in his power at the time of his death, and not having any one preceding them in whose power they became by the death of the testator, as would be the case with the testator's grandson who had a living father. (2.)

having died without having manifested an intention to dispute the testament; if he had done so, the action passed to his heirs. 2. If he had allowed a certain time, at first fixed at two years, and afterwards at five years, to elapse without bringing the action. 3. By acquiescing directly or indirectly in the testament (7, note); but a tutor who had acquiesced in the testament on behalf of his pupil might still attack the testament on his own account (4), just as, if he had attacked the testament on behalf of the pupil unsuccessfully, he did not lose to the fiscus what was given to himself, this being the usual penalty of unsuccessful attack. (5.)

System of the Novels.—Justinian in the Novels introduced a new system. (7, note.)

1. The portio legitima was fixed in a new way. If the number of those who could claim it was four or a less number, then they were all together entitled to one-third of the testator's whole inheritance, which third they shared between them; if more than four, to one-half.

2. Those entitled to receive a portio legitima must be instituted as heirs, and it was not enough to prevent the testament being attacked as inofficiosum, that they got their portions in some other way than as heirs.

3. If the testament was set aside as to the heirs, it still remained in force for all else, for trusts, legacies, and so forth.

4. The causes of just disinherison were enumerated, and on a specified one of these the testator must express himself to be acting.

II. LEGAL POSITION OF THOSE TAKING UNDER A TESTAMENT.

This is the second head of testamentary law, the legal position of the testator having been the first. Those taking under a testament were, 1, Heirs; 2, Legatees; 3, Fideicommissarii.

I. HEIRS.—Heirs are of three kinds: (1) Necessarii; (2) Sui et necessarii; and (3) Extranei. (Tit. 19. pr.)

Heredes Necessarii.—The heres necessarius was a slave instituted by his master. He became at once free on the death of the testator, and he had no option as to taking the inheritance. He was obliged to take it (necessarius), and the object of the institution was that the testator might be sure of having a testamentary heir, so that if the testator was insolvent, his goods might be sold, not as his, but as those of the heir, and thus the testator's memory be saved the disgrace of such a sale. (Tit. 19. 1.)

The heres necessarius might claim the beneficium separationis, that is, to have his property acquired after the death of the testator, or anything due to him from the testator, kept distinct from the property of the testator, and free from claims against the testator's inheritance. (1, note.)

Sui Heredes.—Sui et necessarii heredes are the descendants of the testator, in his power at the time of his death, and not having any one preceding them in whose power they became by the death of the testator, as would be the case with the testator's grandson who had a living father. (2.)

Sui heredes were so called because they were, even in the lifetime of the paterfamilias, looked on as in a manner partners in the inheritance. They were, so to speak, heirs to their own inheritance; and the inheritance came to them without their entering on it, or wishing to have it, or proving that it came to them. They were, in the old civil law, obliged to take the inheritance, but the prætor gave them the beneficium abstinendi—that is, allowed them to abstain if they pleased—and unless they mixed themselves up with the inheritance, the prætor inferred from their holding aloof that they wished to abstain, and then, if the goods were sold, they were sold in the name of the testator, and no actions could be brought against the sui heres as heir, although, if he pleased, he might afterwards alter his mind and accept the inheritance. (2, note.)

Extranei Heredes.—Heirs not subject to the power of the testator, are termed stranger heirs, extranei heredes. Children not within his power if instituted, children instituted by the mother, slaves instituted and subsequently manumitted, are extranei. (3.) These heirs were required to have the testamenti factio (in the sense, not of being able to make a testament, but of being able to take under a testament) at three epochs, (a) the making of the testament ; (b) the death of the testator ; (c) the entering of the heir on the inheritance. (4.) If his capacity was lost and regained between the first two of these epochs, the heir could enter on the inheritance, but not so if the loss and regaining took place between the second and third epochs. (4, note.) The extraneus heres was at liberty to accept or renounce the inheritance.

Entering on the Inheritance. Cretio.—How did the heir accept it? First, there was a method of instituting, obsolete by the time of Justinian, in which there was a cretio, or direction to the heir, to make up his mind within a given time, either from the date at which he knew of his rights and could exercise them, cretio vulgaris, or from the date at which his rights accrued to him, cretio continua. The heir, within the time fixed, could alter his mind. If he accepted, he announced his acceptance in a solemn form. (7, note.)

Ordinarily the heir entered on the inheritance either by doing some act as heir (pro herede gerere) or by the mere expression of his willingness to be heir. (7.) The heir, in acting as heir, must know that he is heir, and that the testator is dead. (7.)

There was no fixed time in which the heir must make his decision ; but the prætor would, on application, fix the time, allowing not less than one hundred days, and Justinian enacted that it should not exceed nine months, or, by imperial favour, a year. If the heir did not decide within the time, he was, in an action on the part of the heredes ab intestato, taken to have rejected, and, in an action on the part of creditors, to have accepted, the inheritance. (5, note.)

A person could not enter for another, nor on part of an inheritance, nor conditionally ; if he entered he succeeded to the persona of the deceased. (7, note.)

Sui heredes were so called because they were, even in the lifetime of the paterfamilias, looked on as in a manner partners in the inheritance. They were, so to speak, heirs to their own inheritance; and the inheritance came to them without their entering on it, or wishing to have it, or proving that it came to them. They were, in the old civil law, obliged to take the inheritance, but the prætor gave them the beneficium abstinendi—that is, allowed them to abstain if they pleased—and unless they mixed themselves up with the inheritance, the prætor inferred from their holding aloof that they wished to abstain, and then, if the goods were sold, they were sold in the name of the testator, and no actions could be brought against the sui heres as heir, although, if he pleased, he might afterwards alter his mind and accept the inheritance. (2, note.)

Extranei Heredes.—Heirs not subject to the power of the testator, are termed stranger heirs, extranei heredes. Children not within his power if instituted, children instituted by the mother, slaves instituted and subsequently manumitted, are extranei. (3.) These heirs were required to have the testamenti factio (in the sense, not of being able to make a testament, but of being able to take under a testament) at three epochs, (a) the making of the testament; (b) the death of the testator; (c) the entering of the heir on the inheritance. (4.) If his capacity was lost and regained between the first two of these epochs, the heir could enter on the inheritance, but not so if the loss and regaining took place between the second and third epochs. (4, note.) The extraneus heres was at liberty to accept or renounce the inheritance.

Entering on the Inheritance. Cretio.—How did the heir accept it? First, there was a method of instituting, obsolete by the time of Justinian, in which there was a cretio, or direction to the heir, to make up his mind within a given time, either from the date at which he knew of his rights and could exercise them, cretio vulgaris, or from the date at which his rights accrued to him, cretio continua. The heir, within the time fixed, could alter his mind. If he accepted, he announced his acceptance in a solemn form. (7, note.)

Ordinarily the heir entered on the inheritance either by doing some act as heir (pro herede gerere) or by the mere expression of his willingness to be heir. (7.) The heir, in acting as heir, must know that he is heir, and that the testator is dead. (7.)

There was no fixed time in which the heir must make his decision; but the prætor would, on application, fix the time, allowing not less than one hundred days, and Justinian enacted that it should not exceed nine months, or, by imperial favour, a year. If the heir did not decide within the time, he was, in an action on the part of the heredes ab intestato, taken to have rejected, and, in an action on the part of creditors, to have accepted, the inheritance. (5, note.)

A person could not enter for another, nor on part of an inheritance, nor conditionally; if he entered he succeeded to the persona of the deceased. (7, note.)

If the extraneus heres accepted, he could, if under twenty-five years, be relieved from his position, if a disadvantageous one, by the prætor giving a restitutio in integrum. (5.) If he was over twenty-five, he could not be relieved, and must abide by all the consequences of accepting the inheritance, including the liability to pay the debts of the testator; but on a very special occasion, Hadrian relaxed this rule, and Gordian ordered that it should never be enforced against soldiers. (6.) Justinian introduced a new system by which the heirs might enter on the inheritance of even an insolvent testator without risk. The heir might claim to have an inventory made (beneficium inventarii) of the inheritance, this inventory to be begun within thirty, and finished within ninety, days of the time when he became acquainted with his rights and could exercise them, and made in the presence of a notary or three witnesses. Out of the property specified in the inventory he had to pay the creditors, paying himself anything that might be due to him. If the property was more than sufficient, he took the surplus. If insufficient, his own estate was in no way liable. (6, note.)

II. LEGATEES.—Although legacies constitute a title to particular things, not to groups of things, it is convenient to treat of legacies while treating of testaments. (Tit. 20. pr.) A legacy is a gift left by a deceased person (1), and the subject of legacies may be treated under six heads.

1. General Notions as to Legacies and their Forms. (4) Forms.—In the old law there were four modes of giving legacies: (a) per vindicationem, when the testator gave (Stichum do, lego) the Quiritary ownership of the thing given; (b) per damnationem, when the testator bound the heir (heres meus damnas esto dare) to give a thing to the legatee, who could compel him by a personal action to give it; (c) sinendi modo, when the testator ordered the heir to allow the legatee to take the thing given, the legatee having a personal action to make the heir give the opportunity of taking it; and (d) per præceptionem, a form strictly applicable to the heir, who was thus allowed to take something as a legacy before receiving his share of the inheritance. The senatusconsultum Neronianum provided that every form of legacy should be treated as equal to that per damnationem, which was the most favourable to the legatee, as anything could be given by it. Justinian enacted that all legacies should be of the same nature, and might be enforced by every kind of appropriate action. (2, note.)

Justinian assimilated fideicommissa to legacies, except that a slave was the libertus of the testator or of the fideicommissarius, according as he received his liberty by a legacy or a fideicommissum. (3.)

(B) Co-legatees.—The same thing might be left to more than one legatee. It might be left conjunctim, or, in other language, re et verbis, as, I give my slave to A and B; or disjunctim, or, in other language, re, as, I give my slave to A, I give the same slave to B; or verbis, when the co-legacy was only nominal, as, I give my slave to A and B in equal shares. Under the old law the effect of co-legacies differed according to the formula employed. Each under per vindicationem or per præcep-

If the extraneus heres accepted, he could, if under twenty-five years, be relieved from his position, if a disadvantageous one, by the prætor giving a restitutio in integrum. (5.) If he was over twenty-five, he could not be relieved, and must abide by all the consequences of accepting the inheritance, including the liability to pay the debts of the testator; but on a very special occasion, Hadrian relaxed this rule, and Gordian ordered that it should never be enforced against soldiers. (6.) Justinian introduced a new system by which the heirs might enter on the inheritance of even an insolvent testator without risk. The heir might claim to have an inventory made (beneficium inventarii) of the inheritance, this inventory to be begun within thirty, and finished within ninety, days of the time when he became acquainted with his rights and could exercise them, and made in the presence of a notary or three witnesses. Out of the property specified in the inventory he had to pay the creditors, paying himself anything that might be due to him. If the property was more than sufficient, he took the surplus. If insufficient, his own estate was in no way liable. (6, note.)

II. LEGATEES.—Although legacies constitute a title to particular things, to groups of things, it is convenient to treat of legacies while treating of testaments. (Tit. 20. pr.) A legacy is a gift left by a deceased person (1), and the subject of legacies may be treated under six heads.

1. General Notions as to Legacies and their Forms. (A) Forms.—In the old law there were four modes of giving legacies: (a) per vindicationem, when the testator gave (Stichum do, lego) the Quiritary ownership of the thing given; (b) per damnationem, when the testator bound the heir (heres meus damnas esto dare) to give a thing to the legatee, who could compel him by a personal action to give it; (c) sinendi modo, when the testator ordered the heir to allow the legatee to take the thing given, the legatee having a personal action to make the heir give the opportunity of taking it; and (d) per præceptionem, a form strictly applicable to the heir, who was thus allowed to take something as a legacy before receiving his share of the inheritance. The senatusconsultum Neronianum provided that every form of legacy should be treated as equal to that per damnationem, which was the most favourable to the legatee, as anything could be given by it. Justinian enacted that all legacies should be of the same nature, and might be enforced by every kind of appropriate action. (2, note.)

Justinian assimilated fideicommissa to legacies, except that a slave was the libertus of the testator or of the fideicommissarius, according as he received his liberty by a legacy or a fideicommissum. (3.)

(B) Co-legatees.—The same thing might be left to more than one legatee. It might be left conjunctim, or, in other language, re et verbis, as, I give my slave to A and B; or disjunctim, or, in other language, re, as, I give my slave to A, I give the same slave to B; or verbis, when the co-legacy was only nominal, as, I give my slave to A and B in equal shares. Under the old law the effect of co-legacies differed according to the formula employed. Each under per vindicationem or per præcep-

tionem could demand the whole thing, and then had to divide it, but under per damnationem (if the legacy was given disjunctim) the heir had to give the thing to one, and also its value to another; under sinendi modo (if the legacy was given disjunctim) it is doubtful whether the rule of per damnationem applied, or whether, having given the thing to one, he was free as to the other. The lex Papia Poppæa introduced a new system, disqualifying cælibes from taking at all, and orbi from taking more than half, and giving the legacies thus lapsed (caduca), and also all other legacies lapsed under the general law (in causa caduci), to those mentioned in the testament in the following order, if they were patres:— (a) co-legatees, (b) heirs, (c) substituted heirs, and in default to the public treasury (ærarium). Ascendants or descendants to the third degree were exempted from the effect of the lex Papia, except that they could take caduca under it. Caracalla gave all caduca to the fiscus; Constantine abolished the law of incapacity arising from celibacy; and Justinian did away with the lex Papia altogether. Any legacies passing carried with them burdens, and it was optional to accept them. Justinian gave rights of taking by accrual to every co-legatee, excluding those joined verbis, who were really not co-legatees, with this difference, that if the co-legacies were given re, the accrual was obligatory, but the burdens of the legacy did not pass. If re et verbis, the accrual was voluntary, but the burdens did pass. (8, note.)

(C) Time of Vesting.—The rights of a legatee were vested (dies cedit) at the date of the testator's death, or, under the lex Papia, at the day of the opening of the testament. The time when the thing was to be demanded (dies veniens) was the time of the heir's entering on the inheritance. The legatee took the thing, and his heirs, if he subsequently died, represented him in taking the thing as it was at the time of the dies cedens, excepting in the case of a gift of liberty to a slave or a gift of a personal servitude, when the dies cedens dated from the entering on the inheritance. (20, note.)

2. What could be given by way of Legacy.—The testator might give not only his property, or that of his heir, but a thing belonging to another, provided it was not a thing extra commercium, and provided that the legatee, on whom the burden of proof lay, could show that the testator knew that this thing belonged to another. The heir, if he could not purchase the thing, had to give the legatee its value. (4.) So the heir was obliged to redeem, unless the testator expressly said the legatee was to redeem, a thing which the testator gave as a legacy knowing it to be pledged. (5.) If the legatee had, in the lifetime of the testator, already got the thing given him as a legacy, he could claim the value if he had bought it, but not if he had taken it by a causa lucrativa, e.g. gift, unless he had taken it through a slave or descendant in his power. If he had received only the value of the thing, not the thing, under one testament by a causa lucrativa, he still could claim the thing under the testament of a different person. (6.) Future things might be given by way of legacy. (7.) A legatee might tionem could demand the whole thing, and then had to divide it, but under per damnationem (if the legacy was given disjunctim) the heir had to give the thing to one, and also its value to another; under sinendi modo (if the legacy was given disjunctim) it is doubtful whether the rule of per damnationem applied, or whether, having given the thing to one, he was free as to the other. The lex Papia Poppæa introduced a new system, disqualifying cælibes from taking at all, and orbi from taking more than half, and giving the legacies thus lapsed (caduca), and also all other legacies lapsed under the general law (in causa caduci), to those mentioned in the testament in the following order, if they were patres:— (a) co-legatees, (b) heirs, (c) substituted heirs, and in default to the public treasury (ærarium). Ascendants or descendants to the third degree were exempted from the effect of the lex Papia, except that they could take caduca under it. Caracalla gave all caduca to the fiscus; Constantine abolished the law of incapacity arising from celibacy; and Justinian did away with the lex Papia altogether. Any legacies passing carried with them burdens, and it was optional to accept them. Justinian gave rights of taking by accrual to every co-legatee, excluding those joined verbis, who were really not co-legatees, with this difference, that if the co-legacies were given re, the accrual was obligatory, but the burdens of the legacy did not pass. If re et verbis, the accrual was voluntary, but the burdens did pass. (8, note.)

(C) Time of Vesting.—The rights of a legatee were vested (dies cedit) at the date of the testator's death, or, under the lex Papia, at the day of the opening of the testament. The time when the thing was to be demanded (dies veniens) was the time of the heir's entering on the inheritance. The legatee took the thing, and his heirs, if he subsequently died, represented him in taking the thing as it was at the time of the dies cedens, excepting in the case of a gift of liberty to a slave or a gift of a personal servitude, when the dies cedens dated from the entering on the inheritance. (20, note.)

2. What could be given by way of Legacy.—The testator might give not only his property, or that of his heir, but a thing belonging to another, provided it was not a thing extra commercium, and provided that the legatee, on whom the burden of proof lay, could show that the testator knew that this thing belonged to another. The heir, if he could not purchase the thing, had to give the legatee its value. (4.) So the heir was obliged to redeem, unless the testator expressly said the legatee was to redeem, a thing which the testator gave as a legacy knowing it to be pledged. (5.) If the legatee had, in the lifetime of the testator, already got the thing given him as a legacy, he could claim the value if he had bought it, but not if he had taken it by a causa lucrativa, e.g. gift, unless he had taken it through a slave or descendant in his power. If he had received only the value of the thing, not the thing, under one testament by a causa lucrativa, he still could claim the thing under the testament of a different person. (6.) Future things might be given by way of legacy. (7.) A legatee might claim land given him by legacy, although the usufruct had already come to him ex causa lucrativa, for the usufruct was treated as a servitude only. (9.) A thing belonging to the legatee when the testament was made could not be given to him as a legacy, even if he had afterwards parted with it; such a case fell under what was termed the regula Catoniana, the rule that a legacy invalid when the testament was made remained always invalid. (10.) If the testator gave what he thought belonged to himself, although it belonged to another, the gift was valid, and so it was if he gave what he thought belonged, but did not really belong, to the legatee. (11.) The legatee was entitled to a thing alienated by the testator, and to have redeemed a thing pledged by the testator, after the testament was made, provided that the thing had not been alienated or pledged with the intention of revoking the legacy. (12.)

A legacy to a debtor of what was due to the testator was valid, and the heir could not recover from the legatee, and might be made to release him, and the debtor might also, by a legacy, have the time of payment deferred. (13.) But a legacy to a creditor of what the testator owed him was invalid, as it gave the creditor nothing unless the testator gave absolutely, or at once, what was previously due conditionally, or after a time. (14.) A husband might give to his wife her dos as a legacy, for the legacy gave her a more speedy way of recovering the dos; if he gave her her dos, and he had not received it, the legacy was void; but if he gave her, by legacy, a definite sum or thing, describing it wrongly as having been brought by her as part of the dos, or as mentioned in the instrumentum dotis, this description was taken as surplusage, and she could take the legacy. (15.)

Things incorporeal as well as corporeal might be given by way of legacy. Thus the testator might give a debt due to him, unless he had exacted payment in his lifetime, and the heir would have to sue for the benefit of the legatee; or he might order the heir to rebuild a house for the legatee, or release him from debt. (21.) If he gave a slave or anything else generally (legatum generis), the legatee had the choice among the things of this description belonging to the testator. (22.) Under Justinian, this right of choice, which had previously been personal to the legatee, went to his heirs, if the legatee died after his rights had accrued; and if there were more than one legatee to whom the right of choice belonged, they must decide by lot which was to make the choice if they could not otherwise agree. (23.) Unless a distinct legacy of choice was given (legatum optionis), the legatee could not choose the best of the kind. (22, note.) A legatee might have a share of the inheritance given him (legatarius partitarius), and not a specific thing, but still he remained in the position of a legatee as towards the heir. (23, note.)

3. To whom might legacies be given?—To those with whom the testator had testamenti factio. (24.) There were excluded (a) before Justinian: deportati, peregrini, Latini Juniani, unless they became citizens within a fixed time, women under the lex Voconia, the unmarried

claim land given him by legacy, although the usufruct had already come to him ex causa lucrativa, for the usufruct was treated as a servitude only. (9.) A thing belonging to the legatee when the testament was made could not be given to him as a legacy, even if he had afterwards parted with it; such a case fell under what was termed the regula Catoniana, the rule that a legacy invalid when the testament was made remained always invalid. (10.) If the testator gave what he thought belonged to himself, although it belonged to another, the gift was valid, and so it was if he gave what he thought belonged, but did not really belong, to the legatee. (11.) The legatee was entitled to a thing alienated by the testator, and to have redeemed a thing pledged by the testator, after the testament was made, provided that the thing had not been alienated or pledged with the intention of revoking the legacy. (12.)

A legacy to a debtor of what was due to the testator was valid, and the heir could not recover from the legatee, and might be made to release him, and the debtor might also, by a legacy, have the time of payment deferred. (13.) But a legacy to a creditor of what the testator owed him was invalid, as it gave the creditor nothing unless the testator gave absolutely, or at once, what was previously due conditionally, or after a time. (14.) A husband might give to his wife her dos as a legacy, for the legacy gave her a more speedy way of recovering the dos; if he gave her her dos, and he had not received it, the legacy was void; but if he gave her, by legacy, a definite sum or thing, describing it wrongly as having been brought by her as part of the dos, or as mentioned in the instrumentum dotis, this description was taken as surplusage, and she could take the legacy. (15.)

Things incorporeal as well as corporeal might be given by way of legacy. Thus the testator might give a debt due to him, unless he had exacted payment in his lifetime, and the heir would have to sue for the benefit of the legatee; or he might order the heir to rebuild a house for the legatee, or release him from debt. (21.) If he gave a slave or anything else generally (legatum generis), the legatee had the choice among the things of this description belonging to the testator. (22.) Under Justinian, this right of choice, which had previously been personal to the legatee, went to his heirs, if the legatee died after his rights had accrued; and if there were more than one legatee to whom the right of choice belonged, they must decide by lot which was to make the choice if they could not otherwise agree. (23.) Unless a distinct legacy of choice was given (legatum optionis), the legatee could not choose the best of the kind. (22, note.) A legatee might have a share of the inheritance given him (legatarius partitarius), and not a specific thing, but still he remained in the position of a legatee as towards the heir. (23, note.)

3. To whom might legacies be given?—To those with whom the testator had testamenti factio. (24.) There were excluded (a) before Justinian: deportati, peregrini, Latini Juniani, unless they became citizens within a fixed time, women under the lex Voconia, the unmarried

under Justinian retics associates children of persons born with freedom of uncertain persons or childless (to the extent above mentioned, p. 546) under the lex Papia; (b) in the time of Justinian: heretics, apostates, the children of persons convicted of treason, and the children of, and the parties to, prohibited marriages. A legacy under the old law could not be given to an uncertain person, as e.g. to the man who might marry the testator's daughter, unless it was to an uncertain member of a certain class, as that one of the testator's cognati who might marry the testator's daughter; nor, as being an uncertain person, to a posthumous stranger. Justinian made all the legacies to uncertain persons valid (25), and permitted a posthumous stranger to be instituted heir (26); and even previously to Justinian a legacy paid to an uncertain person was not to be refunded. (25.) A legacy to the slave of an heir, unless given conditionally, was invalid; but not so a legacy to the master of a slave instituted heir, for he might not be the master at the time when the slave entered on the inheritance. (32, 33.)

4. Rules as to the position, terms, and construction of legacies.—A mistake in the name of the person benefited, or in the institution of an heir, does not invalidate a legacy, provided it is certain who is meant; nor is a legacy rendered invalid by either a falsa demonstratio, as if the testator gives 'Stichus my born slave' (Stichus passes though he is not the born slave of the testator), or by a falsa causa or reason assigned wrongly, as 'I give to Titius, because he took care of my affairs.' The legacy is valid whether or not, in fact, Titius did take such care; but if the legacy was conditional, as 'I give to Titius, if he has taken care,' then, of course, the condition must have been fulfilled for the legacy to be valid. (29, 30, 31.)

Justinian made it immaterial where in the testament a legacy was placed. Previously, if it was placed before the institution of the heir, it was invalid (34), and he made legacies valid which were to take effect after the death of the heir or legatee; whereas such gifts, except as fideicommissa, had previously been invalid, as even had legacies given to take effect the day before the death of the heir or legatee. (35.) Justinian also made valid gifts by way of legacy, or institution of heirs (and revocation and transfers of such legacies) made pene nomine, that is, when something given to one of the persons benefited was to be given to another if the person originally benefited did or did not do something, such dealings with heirships or legacies having been previously considered invalid, even though the penalty was given to the emperor or a soldier, as intended to punish one man rather than to benefit another. (36.)

5. Loss, diminution, or increase of things given by way of legacies.

—The loss of a thing given as a legacy falls on the legatee, unless the loss has been caused, however innocently, by the heir, on whom the loss then falls. (16.) If a female slave is given with her offspring, the legatee takes the offspring though the mother may be dead, and so he takes the vicarial slaves under a legacy of ordinary and vicarial slaves, though the ordinary slaves may have all died. But under a legacy of per Justinian or childless (to the extent above mentioned, p. 546) under the lex Papia; (b) in the time of Justinian: heretics, apostates, the children of persons convicted of treason, and the children of, and the parties to, prohibited marriages. A legacy under the old law could not be given to an uncertain person, as e.g. to the man who might marry the testator's daughter, unless it was to an uncertain member of a certain class, as that one of the testator's cognati who might marry the testator's daughter; nor, as being an uncertain person, to a posthumous stranger. Justinian made all the legacies to uncertain persons valid (25), and permitted a posthumous stranger to be instituted heir (26); and even previously to Justinian a legacy paid to an uncertain person was not to be refunded. (25.) A legacy to the slave of an heir, unless given conditionally, was invalid; but not so a legacy to the master of a slave instituted heir, for he might not be the master at the time when the slave entered on the inheritance. (32, 33.)

4. Rules as to the position, terms, and construction of legacies.—A mistake in the name of the person benefited, or in the institution of an heir, does not invalidate a legacy, provided it is certain who is meant; nor is a legacy rendered invalid by either a falsa demonstratio, as if the testator gives 'Stichus my born slave' (Stichus passes though he is not the born slave of the testator), or by a falsa causa or reason assigned wrongly, as 'I give to Titius, because he took care of my affairs.' The legacy is valid whether or not, in fact, Titius did take such care; but if the legacy was conditional, as 'I give to Titius, if he has taken care,' then, of course, the condition must have been fulfilled for the legacy to be valid. (29, 30, 31.)

Justinian made it immaterial where in the testament a legacy was placed. Previously, if it was placed before the institution of the heir, it was invalid (34), and he made legacies valid which were to take effect after the death of the heir or legatee; whereas such gifts, except as fideicommissa, had previously been invalid, as even had legacies given to take effect the day before the death of the heir or legatee. (35.) Justinian also made valid gifts by way of legacy, or institution of heirs (and revocation and transfers of such legacies) made perne nomine, that is, when something given to one of the persons benefited was to be given to another if the person originally benefited did or did not do something, such dealings with heirships or legacies having been previously considered invalid, even though the penalty was given to the emperor or a soldier, as intended to punish one man rather than to benefit another. (36.)

5. Loss, diminution, or increase of things given by way of legacies.

—The loss of a thing given as a legacy falls on the legatee, unless the loss has been caused, however innocently, by the heir, on whom the loss then falls. (16.) If a female slave is given with her offspring, the legatee takes the offspring though the mother may be dead, and so he takes the vicarial slaves under a legacy of ordinary and vicarial slaves, though the ordinary slaves may have all died. But under a legacy of a slave with his peculium, or of land with its instruments of use or ornament, the legatee, if he cannot take the slave or the land, cannot take the peculium or the instruments. (17.) Under a legacy of a flock of sheep the flock will pass, though reduced to one sheep or increased by young. Under a legacy of a house, marble or pillars subsequently added by the testator will pass. (18, 19.) But as to the gift of a peculium, there is this distinction to be made:—If the gift was to a stranger, the amount of the peculium that passed was the amount at the death of the testator, with any increase arising out of the things contained in the peculium; but if the gift was to the slave himself, the slave had no right until the heir entered and was able to free him; and so for him the amount of the peculium was the amount when the heir entered. A gift by legacy to a slave of his peculium must be express, although if a man in his lifetime freed a slave the slave kept his peculium, unless the emancipator demanded it. (20.)

6. Ademption and transfer of legacies.—Legacies may be revoked by using directly contrary words, 'Whereas I gave I do not give,' or by any other words, or even by the naked wish of the testator becoming in any way declared, the legatee being then repelled by an exception of dolus malus if he sued for the legacy, or by some cause having arisen, e.g. an enmity having sprung up between him and the testator, which made it clear the testator could not, at the time of his death, have wished to benefit him. (Tit. 21. pr., note.) A legacy may also be transferred, as by saying what I gave to A I give to B, and then B would take even if A had died, and A would not take if B had died. (1.)

Lex Falcidia.—The wide testamentary power given by the Twelve Tables (uti legassit suæ rei, ita jus esto) and practically used, so that, the inheritance being exhausted by legacies, there was no inducement to the heir to enter, was restrained (a) by the lex Furia, forbidding more than 1,000 asses to be given as a legacy, but ineffectually, because any number of legacies to that amount might be given; (b) by the lex Voconia, providing that no legatee was to have more than each heir had, but also ineffectually, as the number of legatees was not limited; and, lastly (c), by the lex Falcidia, by which a testator was restrained from giving away in legacies more than three-fourths of the inheritance. A fourth, the quarta Falcidia, must always remain to the heirs. (Tit. 22. pr., note.)

If the testator gave distinct shares in his inheritance to different heirs, each heir had a right to one-fourth of his share, even though the total thus deducted on the different shares exceeded one-fourth of the whole inheritance. (1.)

In the application of the lex Falcidia regard was had to the value of the estate at the time of the testator's death. A subsequent increase did not augment, nor did a subsequent decrease diminish, the amount the legatees received. But if the estate subsequently fell in value, so that the heir would get nothing by entering, the legatees would have to come to terms with him, to induce him to enter. (2.)

a slave with his peculium, or of land with its instruments of use or ornament, the legatee, if he cannot take the slave or the land, cannot take the peculium or the instruments. (17.) Under a legacy of a flock of sheep the flock will pass, though reduced to one sheep or increased by young. Under a legacy of a house, marble or pillars subsequently added by the testator will pass. (18, 19.) But as to the gift of a peculium, there is this distinction to be made:—If the gift was to a stranger, the amount of the peculium that passed was the amount at the death of the testator, with any increase arising out of the things contained in the peculium; but if the gift was to the slave himself, the slave had no right until the heir entered and was able to free him; and so for him the amount of the peculium was the amount when the heir entered. A gift by legacy to a slave of his peculium must be express, although if a man in his lifetime freed a slave the slave kept his peculium, unless the emancipator demanded it. (20.)

6. Ademption and transfer of legacies.—Legacies may be revoked by using directly contrary words, 'Whereas I gave I do not give,' or by any other words, or even by the naked wish of the testator becoming in any way declared, the legatee being then repelled by an exception of dolus malus if he sued for the legacy, or by some cause having arisen, e.g. an enmity having sprung up between him and the testator, which made it clear the testator could not, at the time of his death, have wished to benefit him. (Tit. 21. pr., note.) A legacy may also be transferred, as by saying what I gave to A I give to B, and then B would take even if A had died, and A would not take if B had died. (1.)

LEX FALCIDIA.—The wide testamentary power given by the Twelve Tables (uti legassit suæ rei, ita jus esto) and practically used, so that, the inheritance being exhausted by legacies, there was no inducement to the heir to enter, was restrained (a) by the lex Furia, forbidding more than 1,000 asses to be given as a legacy, but ineffectually, because any number of legacies to that amount might be given; (b) by the lex 2 Voconia, providing that no legatee was to have more than each heir had, but also ineffectually, as the number of legatees was not limited; and, lastly (c), by the lex Falcidia, by which a testator was restrained from giving away in legacies more than three-fourths of the inheritance. A fourth, the quarta Falcidia, must always remain to the heirs. (Tit. 22. pr., note.)

If the testator gave distinct shares in his inheritance to different heirs, each heir had a right to one-fourth of his share, even though the total thus deducted on the different shares exceeded one-fourth of the whole inheritance. (1.)

In the application of the lex Falcidia regard was had to the value of the estate at the time of the testator's death. A subsequent increase did not augment, nor did a subsequent decrease diminish, the amount the legatees received. But if the estate subsequently fell in value, so that the heir would get nothing by entering, the legatees would have to come to terms with him, to induce him to enter. (2.)

(2)

In order to apply the lex Falcidia, the testator's debts, his funeral expenses, and the price of the manumission of slaves were first deducted, and then the heir took a fourth of what remained, each legatee having a proportionate amount deducted from his legacy if the testator had given more than three-fourths in legacies. If he had given more than the value of the whole inheritance, no account was taken of the excess, and the heir received a fourth of the actual value. (3.)

The lex Falcidia did not apply to military testaments. (3, note.) The Novels introduced a new system. The heir could not claim a fourth unless he first had an inventory made, and he could not retain it at all if the testator forbade its retention, the legatees and other persons interested being then permitted to take under the testament, although the heir refused to enter. (3, note.)

III. FIDEICOMMISSARI.—Fideicommissa, or requests to the heir to do something in favour of some one else, and any words of request sufficed (Tit. 24. 3), were expressions of the last wishes of the person who made them, and were dispositions of the inheritance, or of parts of it, the position of the person profiting by them being in the former case analogous to that of an heir, in the latter to that of a legatee.

Either testamentary heirs or heirs ab intestato might have fideicommissa imposed on them, and fideicommissa could be made by testament or by codicils, or orally. (Tit. 23. 1, note.)

The person making the fideicommissum was termed the fideicommittens, the person requested to perform it fiduciarius, and the person to be benefited by it fideicommissarius. (2, note.)

The object of fideicommissa, when originally introduced, was to benefit persons legally incapable of taking as heirs or legatees. Augustus first gave them legal validity, by desiring the consuls to interfere to see them carried out. By degrees a permanent jurisdiction was established to maintain them, under a special magistrate, the prætor fideicommissarius. The proceeding was always extra ordinem. No action lay to enforce fideicommissa, but the magistrate interposed if he thought it equitable to enforce them. (Tit. 23. pr. and note.)

When first introduced, fideicommissa gave the maker of them a very wide range. He could by them give to peregrini, to a posthumous stranger, to an uncertain person, to Latini Juniani, and the whole inheritance to a woman prevented by the lex Voconia from being instituted as heir; and the leges caducaræ did not apply. But subsequently this latitude was restricted: fideicommissa in favour of peregrini, posthumous strangers, and uncertain persons were declared invalid, and the rules of the lex Papia Poppæa were made to apply to them. A tutor could not at any time be given by a fideicommissum. (Tit. 23. pr., note.)

If a fideicommissum was made by testament, the testament must duly institute an heir, or there would be no one to carry out the fideicommissum. Originally the heir sold the inheritance to the fideicommissarius, the former binding the latter, by stipulation, to indemnify

(2)

In order to apply the lex Falcidia, the testator's debts, his funeral expenses, and the price of the manumission of slaves were first deducted, and then the heir took a fourth of what remained, each legatee having a proportionate amount deducted from his legacy if the testator had given more than three-fourths in legacies. If he had given more than the value of the whole inheritance, no account was taken of the excess, and the heir received a fourth of the actual value. (3.)

The lex Falcidia did not apply to military testaments. (3, note.) The Novels introduced a new system. The heir could not claim a fourth unless he first had an inventory made, and he could not retain it at all if the testator forbade its retention, the legatees and other persons interested being then permitted to take under the testament, although the heir refused to enter. (3, note.)

III. FIDEICOMMISSARI.—Fideicommissa, or requests to the heir to do something in favour of some one else, and any words of request sufficed (Tit. 24. 3), were expressions of the last wishes of the person who made them, and were dispositions of the inheritance, or of parts of it, the position of the person profiting by them being in the former case analogous to that of an heir, in the latter to that of a legatee.

Either testamentary heirs or heirs ab intestato might have fideicommissa imposed on them, and fideicommissa could be made by testament or by codicils, or orally. (Tit. 23. 1, note.)

The person making the fideicommissum was termed the fideicommittens, the person requested to perform it fiduciarius, and the person to be benefited by it fideicommissarius. (2, note.)

The object of fideicommissa, when originally introduced, was to benefit persons legally incapable of taking as heirs or legatees. Augustus first gave them legal validity, by desiring the consuls to interfere to see them carried out. By degrees a permanent jurisdiction was established to maintain them, under a special magistrate, the prætor fideicommissarius. The proceeding was always extra ordinem. No action lay to enforce fideicommissa, but the magistrate interposed if he thought it equitable to enforce them. (Tit. 23. pr. and note.)

When first introduced, fideicommissa gave the maker of them a very wide range. He could by them give to peregrini, to a posthumous stranger, to an uncertain person, to Latini Juniani, and the whole inheritance to a woman prevented by the lex Voconia from being instituted as heir; and the leges caducariæ did not apply. But subsequently this latitude was restricted: fideicommissa in favour of peregrini, posthumous strangers, and uncertain persons were declared invalid, and the rules of the lex Papia Poppæa were made to apply to them. A tutor could not at any time be given by a fideicommissum. (Tit. 23. pr., note.)

If a fideicommissum was made by testament, the testament must duly institute an heir, or there would be no one to carry out the fideicommissum. Originally the heir sold the inheritance to the fideicommissarius, the former binding the latter, by stipulation, to indemnify him against all claims in regard to the inheritance, and the latter binding the former to hand everything over (emptæ et venditæ hereditatis stipulationes). (3, note.)

The SENATUSCONSULTUM TREBELLIANUM protected the heir, by enacting that, directly the heir gave up the inheritance, all the actions for and against the inheritance should at once pass to the fideicommissarius in the shape of actiones utiles, and the heir be allowed to protect himself against all actions by an exception restitutæ hereditatis. (4.)

SENATUSCONSULTUM PEGASIANUM.—But, though the heir was thus protected, there was no inducement to him to enter on the inheritance. Accordingly the senatusconsultum Pegasianum was passed, which permitted the heir to retain a fourth of the inheritance against fideicommissarii as against legatees. The fideicommissarius, who had been placed by the senatusconsultum Trebellianum in the position of an heir, was now placed in the position of a legatee, or, to speak more strictly, of a legatarius partiaris, that is, of a legatee who had a legacy, not of a thing, but of a share in the inheritance. When legacies of a share were given, actions belonging to the inheritance were brought by, and against, the heir, but the heir stipulated that the legatee should contribute to all outgoings in proportion to his share, and bound himself to pay what was due to the legatee for his share. Similar stipulations were, subsequently to the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, made between the heir and the fideicommissarius (stipulationes partis et pro parte). (5.)

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum was, however, still in force, for it operated (a) if the fideicommissa did not exceed three-fourths of the inheritance, and (b) if the heir refused to enter in spite of being sure of his fourth under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, the prætor made him enter, and then all the actions were transferred to, or against, the fideicommissarius, and he was in the position in which he would have been if the heir had entered under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. (6.)

Justinian united the two senatusconsulta, retaining the name of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. The heir was to retain his fourth, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum; but actions were to be brought by or against the heir, or the fideicommissarius, according to their shares, as under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, so that the fideicommissarius was, as to his share, in loco heredis. If the heir would not enter, he was compelled to do so, being protected against all loss, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum. The heir could, under Justinian, but could not previously, redemand the fourth if he had paid it over. (7.)

If the heir had a specific thing given him to retain, equal in value to, or greater in value than, a fourth of the inheritance, he retained it as if he had had a specific legacy of the thing, and all actions as to the whole inheritance passed to, or against, the fideicommissarius. If the specific thing to be retained by the heir was less in value than a fourth, then the heir retained also enough to make up the fourth, him against all claims in regard to the inheritance, and the latter binding the former to hand everything over (emptæ et venditæ hereditatis stipulationes). (3, note.)

The SENATUSCONSULTUM TREBELLIANUM protected the heir, by enacting that, directly the heir gave up the inheritance, all the actions for and against the inheritance should at once pass to the fideicommissarius in the shape of actiones utiles, and the heir be allowed to protect himself against all actions by an exception restituta hereditatis. (4.)

SENATUSCONSULTUM PEGASIANUM.—But, though the heir was thus protected, there was no inducement to him to enter on the inheritance. Accordingly the senatusconsultum Pegasianum was passed, which permitted the heir to retain a fourth of the inheritance against fideicommissarii, as against legatees. The fideicommissarius, who had been placed by the senatusconsultum Trebellianum in the position of an heir, was now placed in the position of a legatee, or, to speak more strictly, of a legatarius partiaris, that is, of a legatee who had a legacy, not of a thing, but of a share in the inheritance. When legacies of a share were given, actions belonging to the inheritance were brought by, and against, the heir, but the heir stipulated that the legatee should contribute to all outgoings in proportion to his share, and bound himself to pay what was due to the legatee for his share. Similar stipulations were, subsequently to the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, made between the heir and the fideicommissarius (stipulationes partis et pro parte). (5.)

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum was, however, still in force, for it operated (a) if the fideicommissa did not exceed three-fourths of the inheritance, and (b) if the heir refused to enter in spite of being sure of his fourth under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, the prætor made him enter, and then all the actions were transferred to, or against, the fideicommissarius, and he was in the position in which he would have been if the heir had entered under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. (6.)

Justinian united the two senatusconsulta, retaining the name of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. The heir was to retain his fourth, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum; but actions were to be brought by or against the heir, or the fideicommissarius, according to their shares, as under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, so that the fideicommissarius was, as to his share, in loco heredis. If the heir would not enter, he was compelled to do so, being protected against all loss, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum. The heir could, under Justinian, but could not previously, redemand the fourth if he had paid it over. (7.)

If the heir had a specific thing given him to retain, equal in value to, or greater in value than, a fourth of the inheritance, he retained it as if he had had a specific legacy of the thing, and all actions as to the whole inheritance passed to, or against, the fideicommissarius. If the specific thing to be retained by the heir was less in value than a fourth, then the heir retained also enough to make up the fourth, and the actions for and against passed to the heir, as to the share retained to make up the difference. (9.)

A fideicommissarius might himself be turned into a fiduciarius, and be requested to give up to another all, or a part, of what he received; and he was not allowed, like the heir, to retain a fourth. (11.)

Fideicommissa might also be imposed by a person about to die on his heredes ab intestato (10), either by a written or oral declaration. If, under Justinian, such an oral declaration was made of his wishes to the heir, before five witnesses, the proof was sufficient. But if it was alleged to have been made before less than five witnesses, or before none at all, the fideicommissarius, having previously sworn to his own good faith, might call on the heir to deny, on his oath, that the fideicommissum had been made as alleged. (12.)

Fideicommissa of particular things.—An heir or a legatee might be charged by a fideicommissum to give up a particular thing specified by the testator (Tit. 24. pr.), and even a particular thing belonging to another person, the fiduciarius being thus obliged, if he could, to buy it for the fideicommissarius, or, if he could not buy it, to give its value to the fideicommissarius. (1.) Freedom, too, might be given to the slave of another person by a fideicommissum, and, if the fiduciarius could not at once purchase the freedom of the slave, he must wait to see if any opportunity of doing so might arise. The slave so enfranchised was the freedman of the fideicommissarius, whereas slaves who received their freedom directly by testament (and only those who were slaves of the testator, both at the time of his making the testament and at the time of his death, could so receive their freedom) were the freedmen of the dead man, and hence were called orcini. (2.)

Codicils.—Codicilli, or small tablets containing memoranda addressed to the heir, were held to create binding fideicommissa in the time of Augustus, on the authority of Trebatius and Labeo. (Tit. 25. pr.) If there was no testament, they were binding on the heres ab intestato. (2.) If there was a testament, then being considered as attached to the testament, they failed if it failed, but a testator could, by inserting in his testament an express clause to that effect (clausula codicillaris), provide that his testament should, if invalid as a testament, be valid as a codicil. (Tit. 25. pr., note.) If the codicils were made before the testament, and not confirmed by it, they were binding, unless a contrary intention appeared in the testament. If made after the testament and not confirmed by anticipation in it, they were binding as creating fideicommissa; but by codicils made before or after the testament, and confirmed by it, not only fideicommissa could be created, but legacies given or a tutor appointed. (1, note.)

No form was necessary for codicils. The joint effect of enactments of Theodosius and Justinian was that they were to be made in the presence of five witnesses, who were to subscribe them. If they were not so made, the fideicommissarius might, having sworn to his own good faith, call on the heir to deny them on oath. (3, note.)

by Labeo

and the actions for and against passed to the heir, as to the share retained to make up the difference. (9.)

A fideicommissarius might himself be turned into a fiduciarius, and be requested to give up to another all, or a part, of what he received; and he was not allowed, like the heir, to retain a fourth. (11.)

Fideicommissa might also be imposed by a person about to die on his heredes ab intestato (10), either by a written or oral declaration. If, under Justinian, such an oral declaration was made of his wishes to the heir, before five witnesses, the proof was sufficient. But if it was alleged to have been made before less than five witnesses, or before none at all, the fideicommissarius, having previously sworn to his own good faith, might call on the heir to deny, on his oath, that the fideicommissum had been made as alleged. (12.)

Fideicommissa of particular things.—An heir or a legatee might be charged by a fideicommissum to give up a particular thing specified by the testator (Tit. 24. pr.), and even a particular thing belonging to another person, the fiduciarius being thus obliged, if he could, to buy it for the fideicommissarius, or, if he could not buy it, to give its value to the fideicommissarius. (1.) Freedom, too, might be given to the slave of another person by a fideicommissum, and, if the fiduciarius could not at once purchase the freedom of the slave, he must wait to see if any opportunity of doing so might arise. The slave so enfranchised was the freedman of the fideicommissarius, whereas slaves who received their freedom directly by testament (and only those who were slaves of the testator, both at the time of his making the testament and at the time of his death, could so receive their freedom) were the freedmen of the dead man, and hence were called pecuni. (2.)

Codicils.—Codicilli, or small tablets containing memoranda addressed to the heir, were held to create binding fideicommissa in the time of Augustus, on the authority of Trebatius and Labeo. (Tit. 25. pr.) If there was no testament, they were binding on the heres ab intestato. (2.) If there was a testament, then being considered as attached to the testament, they failed if it failed, but a testator could, by inserting in his testament an express clause to that effect (clausula codicillaris), provide that his testament should, if invalid as a testament, be valid as a codicil. (Tit. 25. pr., note.) If the codicils were made before the testament, and not confirmed by it, they were binding, unless a contrary intention appeared in the testament. If made after the testament and not confirmed by anticipation in it, they were binding as creating fideicommissa; but by codicils made before or after the testament, and confirmed by it, not only fideicommissa could be created, but legacies given or a tutor appointed. (1, note.)

No form was necessary for codicils. The joint effect of enactments of Theodosius and Justinian was that they were to be made in the presence of five witnesses, who were to subscribe them. If they were not so made, the fideicommissarius might, having sworn to his own good faith, call on the heir to deny them on oath. (3, note.)

BOOK III.

INTESTATE SUCCESSION.

WE now come to the second mode of acquiring universitates rerum, that is, intestate succession. In this there were three ranks:—1, sui heredes; 2, agnati; 3, in substitution for the gentiles of the old law, cognati.

I. SUI HEREDES.—When a person died intestate, which might happen in five ways,—by (a) his having made no testament, (b) his testament not being legally valid, (c) its being revoked, or (d) made useless by change of status, or (e) no heir entering under it,—the inheritance passed, by the law of the Twelve Tables, in the first place, to the sui heredes (Tit. 1. pr., 1), i.e. the children, natural, adoptive, or made legitimate, in the power of the deceased at the time of his death (2), or, to speak more accurately, at the time when it is established that he died intestate (7); a grandson, however, the son of a deceased son, both conceived and born after the grandfather's death, but before the fact of intestacy becoming established, not ranking as a suus heres, as not having been connected with the deceased while alive by any tie of relationship. (8.) A child, however, might become a suus heres, though not in the power of the deceased at the time of his death, if he was a captive, and, returning subsequently to his father's death, was made a suus heres by postliminy. (4.) And, on the other hand, a child, though in the power of the deceased at the time of death, might not be a suus heres; for the deceased might be adjudged, even after his death, to have been guilty of perduellio (treason), and then, as the fiscus took his estate, there could be no suus heres. (5.) Sui heredes were, under the old law, obliged to take the inheritance (necessarii), and, as they could take it without their knowledge or assent, the sanction of a tutor of a pupil, or of the curator of an insane person, was not required, but the prætor gave sui heredes the beneficium abstinendi, and enforced against them as against all heredes ab intestato, when necessary for the protection of creditors, the beneficium separationis. All children, of both sexes, took equally; more remote descendants per stirpes. (6.)

The prætor, by giving the possessio bonorum unde liberi, placed in the rank of sui heredes (a) emancipated children (9); (b) if the emancipated father was dead, grandchildren conceived after his emancipation (9, note); (c) if the de cuius was an emancipated son, his unemancipated children conceived before the emancipation; emancipated children bringing into the inheritance their property, and married daughters

BOOK III.

INTESTATE SUCCESSION.

WE now come to the second mode of acquiring universitates rerum, that is, intestate succession. In this there were three ranks:—1, sui heredes; 2, agnati; 3, in substitution for the gentiles of the old law, cognati.

I. SUI HEREDES.—When a person died intestate, which might happen in five ways,—by (a) his having made no testament, (b) his testament not being legally valid, (c) its being revoked, or (d) made useless by change of status, or (e) no heir entering under it,—the inheritance passed, by the law of the Twelve Tables, in the first place, to the sui heredes (Tit. 1. pr., 1), i.e. the children, natural, adoptive, or made legitimate, in the power of the deceased at the time of his death (2), or, to speak more accurately, at the time when it is established that he died intestate (7); a grandson, however, the son of a deceased son, both conceived and born after the grandfather's death, but before the fact of intestacy becoming established, not ranking as a suus heres, as not having been connected with the deceased while alive by any tie of relationship. (8.) A child, however, might become a suus heres, though not in the power of the deceased at the time of his death, if he was a captive, and, returning subsequently to his father's death, was made a suus heres by postliminy. (4.) And, on the other hand, a child, though in the power of the deceased at the time of death, might not be a suus heres; for the deceased might be adjudged, even after his death, to have been guilty of perduellio (treason), and then, as the fiscus took his estate, there could be no suus heres. (5.) Sui heredes were, under the old law, obliged to take the inheritance (necessarii), and, as they could take it without their knowledge or assent, the sanction of a tutor of a pupil, or of the curator of an insane person, was not required, but the prætor gave sui heredes the beneficium abstinendi, and enforced against them as against all heredes ab intestato, when necessary for the protection of creditors, the beneficium separationis. All children, of both sexes, took equally; more remote descendants per stirpes. (6.)

The prætor, by giving the possessio bonorum unde liberi, placed in the rank of sui heredes (a) emancipated children (9); (b) if the emancipated father was dead, grandchildren conceived after his emancipation (9, note); (c) if the de cuius was an emancipated son, his unemancipated children conceived before the emancipation; emancipated children bringing into the inheritance their property, and married daughters their dowry (9, note); (2) sui heredes restituti in integrum after a capitis deminutio. (9, note.) The prætor also preserved in their rank of sui heredes those who were improperly disinherited. (12.) Those raised to the rank of sui heredes had the option of taking or refusing the inheritance within a given time. (Tit. 1. pr., note.)

Children given in adoption, or emancipated, and then giving themselves in arrogation, were, if emancipated by the adoptive father in the lifetime of the natural father, allowed by the prætor to rank among his sui heredes, but had no claim on the inheritance of the adoptive father. If emancipated by the adoptive father after the death of the natural father, they had no claim on the inheritance of the adoptive father, and only that of cognati on that of the natural father. (10, 11, 13.) Under Justinian the adopted son always, unless adopted by an ascendant, remained in the family of the natural father, and succeeded as a suus heres to his adoptive father, if intestate, but had no claim to be benefited by his adoptive father's testament. (14.)

A constitution of Theodosius permitted the children and descendants of deceased daughters to succeed to the portion their mothers would have received as sui heredes, giving up one-third of it to other sui heredes, if there were any, and, if not, one-fourth to the agnati. (15.)

Under Justinian these persons succeeded to the whole share of the deceased daughter, without any deduction. (16.)

II. AGNATI.—When there was no suus heres or any one called to rank with sui heredes, or none who entered on the inheritance, then the inheritance passed by the law of the Twelve Tables to the nearest agnati, i.e. those related to the de cujus through males by birth or adoption (Tit. 2. pr., 1, 2); by nearest being meant nearest at the time when the fact of intestacy was established. (6.) If the nearest agnatus did not enter, or if there were more than one in the same degree, then if none of the nearest agnati (5) entered, the inheritance passed, not to more remote agnati, but at once to the cognati or blood relations, among whom the more remote agnati were included by the prætors. (7.) For there was no devolution among agnati, just as there was none among those called to rank with sui heredes. Justinian altered this, and permitted devolution among agnati. (7.)

There are four special points to be noticed in the history of the changes made in the law of agnatic succession.

1. The Position of Females.—The law of the Twelve Tables placed males and females descended through males on an equality. The media jurisprudentia, i.e. the opinions of the jurists, excluded altogether females descended through males except sisters so descended (consanguineæ). The prætors allowed those excluded to come in as cognatæ. Justinian restored them to the place they held as agnatæ under the law of the Twelve Tables. (3.)

2. The Position of Emancipated and Uterine Brothers and Sisters and their Children.—Under the old law such persons had nothing to their dowry (9, note); (2) sui heredes restituti in integrum after a capitis deminutio. (9, note.) The prætor also preserved in their rank of sui heredes those who were improperly disinherited. (12.) Those raised to the rank of sui heredes had the option of taking or refusing the inheritance within a given time. (Tit. 1. pr., note.)

Children given in adoption, or emancipated, and then giving themselves in arrogation, were, if emancipated by the adoptive father in the lifetime of the natural father, allowed by the prætor to rank among his sui heredes, but had no claim on the inheritance of the adoptive father. If emancipated by the adoptive father after the death of the natural father, they had no claim on the inheritance of the adoptive father, and only that of cognati on that of the natural father. (10, 11, 13.) Under Justinian the adopted son always, unless adopted by an ascendant, remained in the family of the natural father, and succeeded as a suus heres to his adoptive father, if intestate, but had no claim to be benefited by his adoptive father's testament. (14.)

A constitution of Theodosius permitted the children and descendants of deceased daughters to succeed to the portion their mothers would have received as sui heredes, giving up one-third of it to other sui heredes, if there were any, and, if not, one-fourth to the agnati. (15.)

Under Justinian these persons succeeded to the whole share of the deceased daughter, without any deduction. (16.)

II. AGNATI.—When there was no suus heres or any one called to rank with sui heredes, or none who entered on the inheritance, then the inheritance passed by the law of the Twelve Tables to the nearest agnati, i.e. those related to the de cujus through males by birth or adoption (Tit. 2. pr., 1, 2); by nearest being meant nearest at the time when the fact of intestacy was established. (6.) If the nearest agnatus did not enter, or if there were more than one in the same degree, then if none of the nearest agnati (5) entered, the inheritance passed, not to more remote agnati, but at once to the cognati or blood relations, among whom the more remote agnati were included by the prætors. (7.) For there was no devolution among agnati, just as there was none among those called to rank with sui heredes. Justinian altered this, and permitted devolution among agnati. (7.)

There are four special points to be noticed in the history of the changes made in the law of agnatic succession.

1. The Position of Females.—The law of the Twelve Tables placed males and females descended through males on an equality. The media jurisprudentia, i.e. the opinions of the jurists, excluded altogether females descended through males except sisters so descended (consanguineæ). The prætors allowed those excluded to come in as cognatæ. Justinian restored them to the place they held as agnatæ under the law of the Twelve Tables. (3.)

2. The Position of Emancipated and Uterine Brothers and Sisters and their Children.—Under the old law such persons had nothing to do with the agnatic succession. They were introduced into it under the later empire. Anastasius gave the rights of agnation to emancipated brothers and sisters, one-fourth of what they would have received if they had remained in the family being deducted. Their children remained cognati. Justinian gave the rights of agnation to uterine brothers and sisters and their children; and subsequently admitted as agnati emancipated brothers and sisters, without deduction of a fourth, and their children. (4, note.)

3. The Position of the Ascendants.—The ascendant had under the old law no place in the agnatic succession, as he would take by virtue of his patria potestas, unless the deceased descendant had been emancipated. If emancipation had taken place with an understanding that the nominal emancipator should take everything he got as patron in trust for the emancipating ascendant (and, under Justinian, every emancipation was taken to be made on these terms), then this ascendant took as patron in default of sui heredes, but Justinian placed the brothers and sisters of the de cuius before him. (8, note.)

Under the later empire the goods coming from his mother to the de cuius passed (a) to his children and other descendants, (b) then to his brothers and sisters, and (c) to his father in preference to his grandfather. This too, under Justinian, was the order of succession to the peculium of a deceased son, except that here the rights given by the patria potestas were so far preserved that the father took after, not before, the grandfather. (8, note.)

4. The reciprocal Succession of Mothers and Children.—The mother was allowed to succeed to her children by the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, and children to their mother by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum. (A summary of the changes in the law under this head is given under Tit. iv. 4.)

III. COGNATI.—After the sui heredes and the agnati came, in the old law, the gentiles, or members of the same gens. But the succession of the gentiles became obsolete, and the prætor substituted the cognati, that is, persons bound together by blood relationship. (Tit. 5.) The cognati included those who had undergone a minima capitis deminutio (1), i.e. emancipated children, and children in an adoptive family (3), collaterals by the female line (2), and children born of the same mother, but of an uncertain father. (4.) Later legislation, as has been shown in the first four Titles of the Book, took many persons out of the rank (ordo) of cognati, and made them rank with sui heredes or agnati. (1.) There was no limit to the remoteness in which agnation was recognised, but the prætor only gave the possessio bonorum unde cognati to blood relations within the sixth degree, or, in the one case of children of a second cousin, to those in the seventh degree. (5.) The degrees of relationship of ascendants and descendants are calculated by the stages of ascent or descent. There is a stage to the father or the child, a second to the grandfather or the grandson. The degrees of collateral relationship are calculated by going up to and do with the agnatic succession. They were introduced into it under the later empire. Anastasius gave the rights of agnation to emancipated brothers and sisters, one-fourth of what they would have received if they had remained in the family being deducted. Their children remained cognati. Justinian gave the rights of agnation to uterine brothers and sisters and their children; and subsequently admitted as agnati emancipated brothers and sisters, without deduction of a fourth, and their children. (4, note.)

3. The Position of the Ascendants.—The ascendant had under the old law no place in the agnatic succession, as he would take by virtue of his patria potestas, unless the deceased descendant had been emancipated. If emancipation had taken place with an understanding that the nominal emancipator should take everything he got as patron in trust for the emancipating ascendant (and, under Justinian, every emancipation was taken to be made on these terms), then this ascendant took as patron in default of sui heredes, but Justinian placed the brothers and sisters of the de cuius before him. (8, note.)

Under the later empire the goods coming from his mother to the de cuius passed (a) to his children and other descendants, (b) then to his brothers and sisters, and (c) to his father in preference to his grandfather. This too, under Justinian, was the order of succession to the peculium of a deceased son, except that here the rights given by the patria potestas were so far preserved that the father took after, not before, the grandfather. (8, note.)

4. The reciprocal Succession of Mothers and Children.—The mother was allowed to succeed to her children by the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, and children to their mother by the senatusconsultum Orphitianum. (A summary of the changes in the law under this head is given under Tit. iv. 4.)

III. COGNATI.—After the sui heredes and the agnati came, in the old law, the gentiles, or members of the same gens. But the succession of the gentiles became obsolete, and the prætor substituted the cognati, that is, persons bound together by blood relationship. (Tit. 5.) The cognati included those who had undergone a minima capitis deminutio (1), i.e. emancipated children, and children in an adoptive family (3), collaterals by the female line (2), and children born of the same mother, but of an uncertain father. (4.) Later legislation, as has been shown in the first four Titles of the Book, took many persons out of the rank (ordo) of cognati, and made them rank with sui heredes or agnati. (1.) There was no limit to the remoteness in which agnation was recognised, but the prætor only gave the possessio bonorum unde cognati to blood relations within the sixth degree, or, in the one case of children of a second cousin, to those in the seventh degree. (5.) The degrees of relationship of ascendants and descendants are calculated by the stages of ascent or descent. There is a stage to the father or the child, a second to the grandfather or the grandson. The degrees of collateral relationship are calculated by going up to and down from a common ancestor, and adding up the total number of stages. (Tit. 6. pr.) Justinian, altering the old law, so far recognised ties of cognation among slaves, that in the case of the parents and the children being enfranchised, they had reciprocal rights of succession, and the children were in the position of children born in a regular marriage (10). It is scarcely necessary to add that among persons of the same natural degree (gradus) of relationship, those are preferred who belong to a higher rank (ordo), i.e. who are, or rank with, sui heredes or agnati. (11, 12.)

Before quitting the subject of intestate succession, we have to notice two subsidiary points connected with it: (1) the succession (modified by the assignation) of freedmen, and (2) the machinery by which the prætor modified intestate succession, bonorum possessio.

1. (A.) SUCCESSION OF FREEDMEN.—Under the law of the Twelve Tables the sui heredes of the freedman, including adopted children and a wife passing in manum, excluded the patron, who, and whose children, succeeded only if there were no sui heredes, and the freedman might make what testament he pleased and exclude the patron. A freedwoman, however, being in the patron's tutela, could only make a testament with her patron's consent, and as she could have no sui heredes he necessarily succeeded to her if she died intestate. (Tit. 7. pr.) Under the prætorian system, the prætor thinking it hard that the patron should be excluded by adoptive sui heredes, or a wife married in manum, gave the patron possession of half the goods, whether the freedman died testate or intestate; the patron being still excluded altogether by natural children, although they had passed out of the freedman's family, unless they were properly disinherited. This change, however, did not apply in favour of a patrona or the daughter of a patronus; but by the lex Papia Poppæa, women having the jus liberorum were placed on a level with men in this respect. (1.) The lex Papia Poppæa also introduced a change in favour of patrons. If a freedman left a fortune of 100,000 sesterces, and fewer than three children, the patron took a virile part (i.e. half if there was one child, and a third if there were two) of the inheritance, whether the freedman died testate or intestate. (2.) Justinian did away with all distinction between the patrona and the patronus, and between the liberta and the libertus, and regulated the succession of freed persons as follows:—First came the children of the freedman (to speak only of a man), whether in his power or not, or even if born before he was enfranchised. Then, if he had no children, came the patron and his descendants; in default of these the collaterals of the patron to the fifth degree. If the freedman had children, he could make any testament he pleased; if he had not, he could only make what testament he pleased if his fortune was less than 100 aurei; if it was more, he must leave one third to the patron. (3.) By a change, subsequent to the date of the Institutes, Justinian, in case the freedman left no children, preferred the father and mother, and the brothers and sisters, down from a common ancestor, and adding up the total number of stages. (Tit. 6. pr.) Justinian, altering the old law, so far recognised ties of cognation among slaves, that in the case of the parents and the children being enfranchised, they had reciprocal rights of succession, and the children were in the position of children born in a regular marriage (10). It is scarcely necessary to add that among persons of the same natural degré (gradus) of relationship, those are preferred who belong to a higher rank (ordo), i.e. who are, or rank with, sui heredes or agnati. (11, 12.)

Before quitting the subject of intestate succession, we have to notice two subsidiary points connected with it: (1) the succession (modified by the assignation) of freedmen, and (2) the machinery by which the prætor modified intestate succession, bonorum possessio.

1. (A.) SUCCESSION OF FREEDMEN.—Under the law of the Twelve Tables the sui heredes of the freedman, including adopted children and a wife passing in manum, excluded the patron, who, and whose children, succeeded only if there were no sui heredes, and the freedman might make what testament he pleased and exclude the patron. A freedwoman, however, being in the patron's tutela, could only make a testament with her patron's consent, and as she could have no sui heredes he necessarily succeeded to her if she died intestate. (Tit. 7. pr.) Under the prætorian system, the prætor thinking it hard that the patron should be excluded by adoptive sui heredes, or a wife married in manum, gave the patron possession of half the goods, whether the freedman died testate or intestate; the patron being still excluded altogether by natural children, although they had passed out of the freedman's family, unless they were properly disinherited. This change, however, did not apply in favour of a patrona or the daughter of a patronus; but by the lex Papia Poppæa, women having the jus liberorum were placed on a level with men in this respect. (1.) The lex Papia Poppæa also introduced a change in favour of patrons. If a freedman left a fortune of 100,000 sesterces, and fewer than three children, the patron took a virile part (i.e. half if there was one child, and a third if there were two) of the inheritance, whether the freedman died testate or intestate. (2.) Justinian did away with all distinction between the patrona and the patronus, and between the liberta and the libertus, and regulated the succession of freed persons as follows:—First came the children of the freedman (to speak only of a man), whether in his power or not, or even if born before he was enfranchised. Then, if he had no children, came the patron and his descendants; in default of these the collaterals of the patron to the fifth degree. If the freedman had children, he could make any testament he pleased; if he had not, he could only make what testament he pleased if his fortune was less than 100 aurei; if it was more, he must leave one third to the patron. (3.) By a change, subsequent to the date of the Institutes, Justinian, in case the freedman left no children, preferred the father and mother, and the brothers and sisters, of the deceased to the patron. While, before Justinian, there were still Latini Juniani, their goods were treated as a peculium, which passed in all cases on their death to the manumittor, who could deal with it by testament as he pleased; but by the senatusconsultum Larianum the children of the patron, unless duly disinherited, were preferred to extranei heredes; and by an edict of Trajan, if a slave, against the will or without the knowledge of the patron, was made a Roman citizen by imperial rescript, he was considered, indeed, during his life a Roman citizen, but at the moment of death became a Latinus, and the rights of the patron were restored. (4.)

(B.) ASSIGNATION OF FREEDMEN.—A patron having two or more children in his power (Tit. 8. 2) might instead of allowing the goods of a freedman to go equally to all the patron's children in the same degree as they otherwise would do (Tit. 8. pr.), assign, by or without a testament, and in any terms (3), to any person in his power (2), a freed man or woman, so that after the death of the parent the person to whom the freed person is assigned is alone considered the patron, and excludes all other children. (Tit. 8. pr.) But if the assignee died or was emancipated (2.), the force of the assignment was at an end.

II. BONORUM POSSESSIONES.—The prætor placed the person best entitled in possession of the hereditas, in case the possession was disputed, and then in process of time regulated this admission as he thought best to amend, to correct, or to supplement, the civil law (Tit. 9. 1); and usucapion ripened into ownership the possession he gave. The possessor was ordinarily protected by the interdict quorum bonorum; and to obtain this protection, the heir who had under the civil law an indisputable title often demanded the bonorum possessio; the prætor generally acting under his executive authority and giving possession according to his edict (possessio edictalis), and sometimes giving a special possession (possessio decretalis) after hearing the parties, and then sometimes only giving an interdict forbidding violent eviction. (1, note.)

The various kinds of possession of goods are divided according as there was, or was not a testament; out of ten kinds known before Justinian, two referred to testate, and eight to intestate succession.

To testate succession belonged (a) possessio contra tabulas, given to children passed over; (b) possessio secundum tabulas, given (but only after it had been ascertained that the possessio contra tabulas was not due) when the heir, under a duly made and valid will, wished for protection of the interdict quorum bonorum, when the prætor wished to uphold a testament defectively made, or in other cases, as that of the institution of a posthumous stranger, or of an heir under an unfulfilled condition.

To intestate succession belonged eight, four relating to the succession of freemen, four to that of freedmen. A summary is given of these eight kinds of possession under Tit. 9. 3. If there was no one to whom possession could be given, the ærarium, or, later, the fiscus, took the goods. (3.)

of the deceased to the patron. While, before Justinian, there were still Latini Juniani, their goods were treated as a peculium, which passed in all cases on their death to the manumittor, who could deal with it by testament as he pleased; but by the senatusconsultum Largianum the children of the patron, unless duly disinherited, were preferred to extranei heredes; and by an edict of Trajan, if a slave, against the will or without the knowledge of the patron, was made a Roman citizen by imperial rescript, he was considered, indeed, during his life a Roman citizen, but at the moment of death became a Latinus, and the rights of the patron were restored. (4.)

(B.) ASSIGNATION OF FREEDMEN.—A patron having two or more children in his power (Tit. 8. 2) might instead of allowing the goods of a freedman to go equally to all the patron's children in the same degree as they otherwise would do (Tit. 8. pr.), assign, by or without a testament, and in any terms (3), to any person in his power (2), a freed man or woman, so that after the death of the parent the person to whom the freed person is assigned is alone considered the patron, and excludes all other children. (Tit. 8. pr.) But if the assignee died or was emancipated (2.), the force of the assignment was at an end.

II. BONORUM POSSESSIONES.—The prætor placed the person best entitled in possession of the hereditas, in case the possession was disputed, and then in process of time regulated this admission as he thought best to amend, to correct, or to supplement, the civil law (Tit. 9. 1); and usucapion ripened into ownership the possession he gave. The possessor was ordinarily protected by the interdict quorum bonorum; and to obtain this protection, the heir who had under the civil law an indisputable title often demanded the bonorum possessio; the prætor generally acting under his executive authority and giving possession according to his edict (possessio edictalis), and sometimes giving a special possession (possessio decretalis) after hearing the parties, and then sometimes only giving an interdict forbidding violent eviction. (1, note.)

The various kinds of possession of goods are divided according as there was, or was not a testament; out of ten kinds known before Justinian, two referred to testate, and eight to intestate succession.

To testate succession belonged (a) possessio contra tabulas, given to children passed over; (b) possessio secundum tabulas, given (but only after it had been ascertained that the possessio contra tabulas was not due) when the heir, under a duly made and valid will, wished for protection of the interdict quorum bonorum, when the prætor wished to uphold a testament defectively made, or in other cases, as that of the institution of a posthumous stranger, or of an heir under an unfulfilled condition.

To intestate succession belonged eight, four relating to the succession of freemen, four to that of freedmen. A summary is given of these eight kinds of possession under Tit. 9. 3. If there was no one to whom possession could be given, the ærarium, or, later, the fiscus, took the goods. (3.)

Out of the ten kinds of possession just mentioned, Justinian suppressed four of those relating to intestate succession, viz., the unde decem personæ, suppressed because under his system parents were themselves the manumitters of their children (4); the tum quem ex familia, the unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum (5), and the unde cognati manumissoris (6), rendered obsolete by his system, and regulating the rights of patronage. He, however, retained a kind of possession, known to the previous law, though not reckoned in the ten ordinary kinds; that, namely, tum quibus ex legibus, when possession was given in pursuance of a direct enactment, as, e.g., when the patron shared with the children of the libertus under the lex Papia Poppæa. (7.)

Possession of goods had to be demanded by parents and children within a year, and by all others within a hundred days of the time of their knowing of their rights (8), dies utiles alone being counted. (9.) If not demanded, then the rights of possession of the person not demanding at the time fixed, or refusing it, passed to those in the same degree, and if there were none, then to those in the next degree. (9.) Demand was made before a magistrate, and special terms of demand, da mihi hanc possessionem, were necessary, until Constantius permitted any terms to be used, and Justinian did away with the necessity of an application to a magistrate. If a person having, as civil heir, right to demand possession, did not demand it, accepting the inheritance under his civil right, and the next in the order of prætorian succession did, after the delay had expired, demand possession, it was given him, but only sine re as opposed to cum re: he got the technical possessio, but not an interest in the goods conclusive against the heir. (10.)

SYSTEM OF THE NOVELS.—In the years 543 and 547, by the 118th and 127th Novels, Justinian introduced a totally new scheme of intestate succession, a summary of which is given under Tit. 9. 10.

OTHER MODES OF ACQUIRING A UNIVERSITAS RERUM.

We now pass to the four remaining modes by which a universitas rerum was acquired, in addition to testamentary and intestate succession.

i. ARROGATION.—The first is arrogation, which is specially mentioned as forming part of the customary law. (Tit. 10. pr.) By arrogation all the property and all the debts due to the arrogated passed to the arrogator, except only those things which were extinguished by the capitis deminutio which arrogation involved, such as the rights of agnation, and the services which a freedman bound himself by oath, as the price of his freedom, to pay to the patron, and which, being personal to the patron, were extinguished if the patron was arrogated. (1.) The arrogator was not bound to pay the debts of the arrogated, just as a paterfamilias was not bound to pay the debts of the son; but the property of the arrogated was made answerable, the prætor, by a sort of restitutio in integrum, allowing the creditors to proceed against the arrogated as if

Out of the ten kinds of possession just mentioned, Justinian suppressed four of those relating to intestate succession, viz., the unde decem personæ, suppressed because under his system parents were themselves the manumitters of their children (4); the tum quem ex familia, the unde liberi patroni patronæque et parentes eorum (5), and the unde cognati manumissoris (6), rendered obsolete by his system, and regulating the rights of patronage. He, however, retained a kind of possession, known to the previous law, though not reckoned in the ten ordinary kinds; that, namely, tum quibus ex legibus, when possession was given in pursuance of a direct enactment, as, e.g., when the patron shared with the children of the libertus under the lex Papia Poppæa. (7.)

Possession of goods had to be demanded by parents and children within a year, and by all others within a hundred days of the time of their knowing of their rights (8), dies utiles alone being counted. (9.) If not demanded, then the rights of possession of the person not demanding at the time fixed, or refusing it, passed to those in the same degree, and if there were none, then to those in the next degree. (9.) Demand was made before a magistrate, and special terms of demand, da mihi hanc possessionem, were necessary, until Constantius permitted any terms to be used, and Justinian did away with the necessity of an application to a magistrate. If a person having, as civil heir, right to demand possession, did not demand it, accepting the inheritance under his civil right, and the next in the order of prætorian succession did, after the delay had expired, demand possession, it was given him, but only sine re as opposed to cum re: he got the technical possessio, but not an interest in the goods conclusive against the heir. (10.)

SYSTEM OF THE NOVELS.—In the years 543 and 547, by the 118th and 127th Novels, Justinian introduced a totally new scheme of intestate succession, a summary of which is given under Tit. 9. 10.

OTHER MODES OF ACQUIRING A UNIVERSITAS RERUM.

We now pass to the four remaining modes by which a universitas rerum was acquired, in addition to testamentary and intestate succession.

i. ARROGATION.—The first is arrogation, which is specially mentioned as forming part of the customary law. (Tit. 10. pr.) By arrogation all the property and all the debts due to the arrogated passed to the arrogator, except only those things which were extinguished by the capitis deminutio which arrogation involved, such as the rights of agnation, and the services which a freedman bound himself by oath, as the price of his freedom, to pay to the patron, and which, being personal to the patron, were extinguished if the patron was arrogated. (1.) The arrogator was not bound to pay the debts of the arrogated, just as a paterfamilias was not bound to pay the debts of the son; but the property of the arrogated was made answerable, the prætor, by a sort of restitutio in integrum, allowing the creditors to proceed against the arrogated as if the arrogation had not taken place, and unless the arrogator satisfied them the prætor gave them possession of the goods, and allowed them to be sold. (3.) Under Justinian's legislation, if any property was acquired by the arrogated from any source except the arrogator, the usufruct only went to the arrogator, and if the arrogator died, the property in it passed to the children, and, if none, to the brothers and sisters of the deceased, and only in default of them to the arrogator. (2.) What is said of arrogation as a mode of acquiring a universitas rerum is true of the conventio in manum of a wife under the old law. (1, note.)

ii. BONORUM ADDICTIO.—The mode next noticed of acquiring a universitas rerum is the bonorum addictio, introduced by a constitution of Marcus Aurelius. (Tit. 11. pr.) If a testator (even by codicils) gave liberty to any slaves, then, after the inheritance had been successively (4) rejected by the heredes ex testamento, the heredes ab intestato, and the fiscus, any of these slaves, or, under a constitution of Gordian, any one else (1, note), might apply to have the goods given over to him (bonorum addictio), on his undertaking to satisfy the creditors in full, the application being entertained both in favour of liberty, and to spare the deceased the disgrace of a sale of his goods. (2.) The slaves enfranchised by the testament were, when manumitted, the freedmen of the deceased (orcini), unless there was only a fiduciary direction to manumit them, or the slaves had agreed to be the freedmen of the person to whom the addictio was made. The constitution further directed that even when, in such a case, the fiscus accepted, the directions as to liberty should be carried out. (1.) If a person while under twenty-five years did not accept as heres ab intestato an inheritance, and liberty was acquired by the addictio bonorum, then, although when he was twenty-five he might be restitutus in integrum and accept, yet the liberty once given could not be taken away. (5.) Justinian extended the addictio to cases where freedom was given not by testament but inter vivos or mortis causa (6), and also provided that the addictio might be made after a sale by the creditors had taken place, if the application was made within a year from the sale, which was then rescinded; and that a composition accepted by the creditors, or only enfranchisement of some of the slaves directed to be enfranchised, should be accepted, if necessary, as satisfactory; and that if those entitled to apply for an addictio did not all apply at the same time, the first applicant should have the possession. (7, note.)

iii. BONORUM VENDITIO.—The mode next noticed of acquiring a universitas rerum is the bonorum venditio, one of the prætorian modes of execution by which a transfer of the entire property of a debtor was made to the person who, in consideration of receiving it, would pay the largest proportion of the creditors' claims. A summary of the mode in which, and the circumstances under which, this process was carried out, is given under Tit. 12. pr. In the time of Justinian this process had become obsolete, and the goods of the debtor, being handed the arrogation had not taken place, and unless the arrogator satisfied them the prætor gave them possession of the goods, and allowed them to be sold. (3.) Under Justinian's legislation, if any property was acquired by the arrogated from any source except the arrogator, the usufruct only went to the arrogator, and if the arrogator died, the property in it passed to the children, and, if none, to the brothers and sisters of the deceased, and only in default of them to the arrogator. (2.) What is said of arrogation as a mode of acquiring a universitas rerum is true of the conventio in manum of a wife under the old law. (1, note.)

ii. BONORUM ADDICTIO.—The mode next noticed of acquiring a universitas rerum is the bonorum addictio, introduced by a constitution of Marcus Aurelius. (Tit. 11. pr.) If a testator (even by codicils) gave liberty to any slaves, then, after the inheritance had been successively (4) rejected by the heredes ex testamento, the heredes ab intestato, and the fiscus, any of these slaves, or, under a constitution of Gordian, any one else (1, note), might apply to have the goods given over to him (bonorum addictio), on his undertaking to satisfy the creditors in full, the application being entertained both in favour of liberty, and to spare the deceased the disgrace of a sale of his goods. (2.) The slaves enfranchised by the testament were, when manumitted, the freedmen of the deceased (orcini), unless there was only a fiduciary direction to manumit them, or the slaves had agreed to be the freedmen of the person to whom the addictio was made. The constitution further directed that even when, in such a case, the fiscus accepted, the directions as to liberty should be carried out. (1.) If a person while under twenty-five years did not accept as heres ab intestato an inheritance, and liberty was acquired by the addictio bonorum, then, although when he was twenty-five he might be restitutus in integrum and accept, yet the liberty once given could not be taken away. (5.) Justinian extended the addictio to cases where freedom was given not by testament but inter vivos or mortis causa (6), and also provided that the addictio might be made after a sale by the creditors had taken place, if the application was made within a year from the sale, which was then rescinded; and that a composition accepted by the creditors, or only enfranchisement of some of the slaves directed to be enfranchised, should be accepted, if necessary, as satisfactory; and that if those entitled to apply for an addictio did not all apply at the same time, the first applicant should have the possession. (7, note.)

iii. BONORUM VENDITIO.—The mode next noticed of acquiring a universitas rerum is the bonorum venditio, one of the prætorian modes of execution by which a transfer of the entire property of a debtor was made to the person who, in consideration of receiving it, would pay the largest proportion of the creditors' claims. A summary of the mode in which, and the circumstances under which, this process was carried out, is given under Tit. 12. pr. In the time of Justinian this process had become obsolete, and the goods of the debtor, being handed over to the creditors, were sold by them separately as occasion might offer (bonorum distractio).

iv. FORFEITURE UNDER THE SENATUSCONSULTUM CLAUDIANUM.—A universitas rerum was acquired under the senatusconsultum Claudianum, when a free woman was denounced three times by the master of a slave as having formed a disgraceful connection with the slave. A magisterial decree reduced her to the condition of an ancilla, and she and her property passed to the owner of the slave. If it was a freed-woman who formed such a connection, she became again the slave of her patron, unless he had assented to her conduct, in which case she became the slave of the owner of the slave with whom she had disgraced herself. Justinian abolished all this as unworthy of his empire. (Tit. 12. 1.)

OBLIGATIONS.

We now pass to obligations. A summary is given in the text, under Tit. 13. 2, of the meaning of the term obligation, and of the main features of Roman law with regard to the sources of obligations, contracts, culpa, interest, and the actions attached to obligations.

Of the ten recognised heads of contracts, the first noticed are those made re.

CONTRACTS RE.—There were four kinds of contracts made re, i.e. by the delivery of the thing: mutuum, commodatum, depositum, pignus. In mutuum the receiver became the owner, in pignus he became the possessor, in commodatum and depositum he became in possession of the thing delivered. (Tit. 14. pr.)

Mutuum.—Here the deliverer of the thing makes over the thing as the property of the recipient, who by receiving it binds himself to return an exact equivalent in genere, and who, if he fails to do this, can be sued by a condictio certi (1), although the thing handed over to him may have perished through mere accident. (2.)

Commodatum.—Here the deliverer gratuitously puts the recipient in possession of a thing which the recipient wishes to make use of. As it is the recipient who benefits by the contract, he has to take the care of it which a bonus paterfamilias exercises, and not merely the care he takes of his own property; but he is not answerable if the thing is lost through causes wholly beyond his control. He can, when the term for which the thing was lent has expired, be made to restore this identical thing or its value by the actio commodati directa, having in turn an actio commodati contraria (both actions being bonæ fidei) for any extraordinary expenses or for losses through the fault of the deliverer. (2.)

Depositum.—Here the deliverer for his own benefit puts the recipient (who receives gratuitously) in possession of a thing which the deliverer wishes to have kept for him. The recipient, as he is conferring a benefit, is answerable not for carelessness, but only for negligence so great as to amount to fraud. When, however, the deposit over to the creditors, were sold by them separately as occasion might offer (bonorum distractio).

iv. FORFEITURE UNDER THE SENATUSCONSULTUM CLAUDIANUM.—A universitas rerum was acquired under the senatusconsultum Claudianum, when a free woman was denounced three times by the master of a slave as having formed a disgraceful connection with the slave. A magisterial decree reduced her to the condition of an ancilla, and she and her property passed to the owner of the slave. If it was a freed-woman who formed such a connection, she became again the slave of her patron, unless he had assented to her conduct, in which case she became the slave of the owner of the slave with whom she had disgraced herself. Justinian abolished all this as unworthy of his empire. (Tit. 12. 1.)

OBLIGATIONS.

We now pass to obligations. A summary is given in the text, under Tit. 13. 2, of the meaning of the term obligation, and of the main features of Roman law with regard to the sources of obligations, contracts, culpa, interest, and the actions attached to obligations.

Of the ten recognised heads of contracts, the first noticed are those made re.

CONTRACTS RE.—There were four kinds of contracts made re, i.e. by the delivery of the thing: mutuum, commodatum, depositum, pignus. In mutuum the receiver became the owner, in pignus he became the possessor, in commodatum and depositum he became in possession of the thing delivered. (Tit. 14. pr.)

Mutuum.—Here the deliverer of the thing makes over the thing as the property of the recipient, who by receiving it binds himself to return an exact equivalent in genere, and who, if he fails to do this, can be sued by a condictio certi (1), although the thing handed over to him may have perished through mere accident. (2.)

Commodatum.—Here the deliverer gratuitously puts the recipient in possession of a thing which the recipient wishes to make use of. As it is the recipient who benefits by the contract, he has to take the care of it which a bonus paterfamilias exercises, and not merely the care he takes of his own property; but he is not answerable if the thing is lost through causes wholly beyond his control. He can, when the term for which the thing was lent has expired, be made to restore this identical thing or its value by the actio commodati directa, having in turn an actio commodati contraria (both actions being bonæ fidei) for any extraordinary expenses or for losses through the fault of the deliverer. (2.)

Depositum.—Here the deliverer for his own benefit puts the recipient (who receives gratuitously) in possession of a thing which the deliverer wishes to have kept for him. The recipient, as he is conferring a benefit, is answerable not for carelessness, but only for negligence so great as to amount to fraud. When, however, the deposit

was made in circumstances of sudden calamity, as fire or shipwreck, the recipient had to pay double the value of the thing if he denied that he had received it. The identical thing can be reclaimed at any time by the deliverer, and must not be made use of by the recipient. The deliverer had the actio depositi directa for the restitution of the thing, and the recipient the actio depositi contraria (both actions being bonæ fidei) for all expenses incurred and losses sustained through the fault of the deliverer. (3.)

Pignus.—Here the deliverer, the debtor, puts the recipient, the creditor, in possession of the thing; but the creditor cannot make use of it, and although he may apply the fruits in reduction of principal, he cannot take them except by special agreement for interest. The creditor was bound to use the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias, but he was not liable for loss by accident. The creditor was compelled by the actio pigneraticia directa to restore the thing when his claim was settled, and could bring the actio pigneraticia contraria (both actions being bonæ fidei) to recoup himself for expenses and for losses caused by the debtor. (4.)

CONTRACTS MADE VERBIS.—There were two forms of contract made verbis, besides stipulations, known to the old law, but obsolete in the time of Justinian, the dictio dotis and the jurata promissio liberti (Tit. 15. pr. note); but it is only of stipulations that any notice need be taken.

STIPULATIONS.—Stipulations were a form of unilateral contract, in which the stipulator or questioner asked the promissor whether he would enter into the engagement proposed, and on the promissor replying that he would, the contract was complete. Originally the peculiar words, spondesne, spondeo, could only be used by Roman citizens, but in later times no special form of words was necessary as long as there was a question and an answer. (1.)

A stipulation may be made simply (pure), or may be modified, either with reference to a term (in diem), or by being subjected to a condition. (2.)

When a stipulation is made in diem, as to give on a future day named, the interest in the stipulation is at once fixed (cessit dies); and if the promissor pays before the day named, he cannot get his money back; but the time for enforcing the obligation does not come (non venit dies) until the whole of the future day fixed has expired. (2.) If a person promises to give in a distant place, a delay sufficient to make the execution of the promise possible is implied. (5.) Lapse of time was not a means recognised by law for the extinction of an obligation or promise to pay so much to a man every year while he lived: it was therefore theoretically never extinguished, but the heir of the stipulator would be prevented by an exception from enforcing the promise after the stipulator's death. (3.)

When a stipulation is made conditionally, the interest of the stipulator is not fixed till the condition is fulfilled. He has only a hope.

was made in circumstances of sudden calamity, as fire or shipwreck, the recipient had to pay double the value of the thing if he denied that he had received it. The identical thing can be reclaimed at any time by the deliverer, and must not be made use of by the recipient. The deliverer had the actio depositi directa for the restitution of the thing, and the recipient the actio depositi contraria (both actions being bonæ fidei) for all expenses incurred and losses sustained through the fault of the deliverer. (3.)

Pignus.—Here the deliverer, the debtor, puts the recipient, the creditor, in possession of the thing; but the creditor cannot make use of it, and although he may apply the fruits in reduction of principal, he cannot take them except by special agreement for interest. The creditor was bound to use the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias, but he was not liable for loss by accident. The creditor was compelled by the actio pigneraticia directa to restore the thing when his claim was settled, and could bring the actio pigneraticia contraria (both actions being bonæ fidei) to recoup himself for expenses and for losses caused by the debtor. (4.)

CONTRACTS MADE VERBIS.—There were two forms of contract made verbis, besides stipulations, known to the old law, but obsolete in the time of Justinian, the dictio dotis and the jurata promissio liberti (Tit. 15. pr. note); but it is only of stipulations that any notice need be taken.

STIPULATIONS.—Stipulations were a form of unilateral contract, in which the stipulator or questioner asked the promissor whether he would enter into the engagement proposed, and on the promissor replying that he would, the contract was complete. Originally the peculiar words, spondesne, spondeo, could only be used by Roman citizens, but in later times no special form of words was necessary as long as there was a question and an answer. (1.)

A stipulation may be made simply (pure), or may be modified, either with reference to a term (in diem), or by being subjected to a condition. (2.)

When a stipulation is made in diem, as to give on a future day named, the interest in the stipulation is at once fixed (cessit dies); and if the promissor pays before the day named, he cannot get his money back; but the time for enforcing the obligation does not come (non venit dies) until the whole of the future day fixed has expired. (2.) If a person promises to give in a distant place, a delay sufficient to make the execution of the promise possible is implied. (5.) Lapse of time was not a means recognised by law for the extinction of an obligation or promise to pay so much to a man every year while he lived: it was therefore theoretically never extinguished, but the heir of the stipulator would be prevented by an exception from enforcing the promise after the stipulator's death. (3.)

When a stipulation is made conditionally, the interest of the stipulator is not fixed till the condition is fulfilled. He has only a hope.

that the thing will be owed to him, but this hope (spes debitum iri) passes to his heirs, and they can enforce the contract when he could have enforced it. A promise to give if a man does not do something in his power is equivalent to a promise to give when he dies, and, as he must die some day, is made in diem. (4.) If the condition relates to past or present time, the knowledge of the parties as to the event is immaterial. Either the condition has not been fulfilled and the stipulation is of no effect, or it has been fulfilled and the stipulation can be enforced at once. (6.) Where the promise is to do something or not to do something, the proper course is to fix in the stipulation the penalty to be paid if the thing is not done or is done, as this avoids uncertainty as to what amount ought to be paid for the breach of promise. (7.)

Co-stipulators. Co-promissors.—A verbal contract might be made so that more than one person should be joined in the stipulation, the promissor undertaking to give to each, or in the promise, each promissor answering affirmatively the question. These contracts might also be made so as to create joint creditors or joint debtors (Tit. 16. pr.), and one promissor might answer so as to bind himself simply; the others in a modified manner. (2.) The thing was due to each co-stipulator and from each co-promissor. If the thing was given by or to any of the joint parties, the obligation was at an end. If one co-promissor ceased, as by deminutio capitis, to be bound, the other co-parties remained bound. If, however, an action was brought on the contract, then the obligation was at an end, but, under Justinian, if the co-promissor sued could not pay entirely, the others might be sued for the deficiency. (1, note.) The co-promissors who had paid all could recover their shares from the other joint debtors, either as a partner, if there was a partnership, or if not, by so paying, or by the law allowing him to feign that he had so paid, that the actions of the creditors were made available for his benefit. (1, note.)

Stipulations of Slaves.—A slave can stipulate (though he cannot promise) for his owner (Tit. 17. pr.), whether he names his owner or not (1); and if a slave stipulates after his owner's death and before the entry of the heir, he acquires for the inheritance. (Tit. 17. pr.) He may stipulate, however, for a personal right for himself, as for leave to cross a field, but he exercises this for his master's benefit. (2.) When a slave is held in common, he acquires for his joint owners in proportion to their interests in him, unless he is acting by the orders or in the name of one only of them, or unless the thing cannot be acquired by one of them, as, e.g., if it is already owned by one of his owners. (3.)

Division of Stipulations.—Stipulations may be divided according as they are voluntary or not. (Tit. 18. pr.) Those that are not voluntary are, 1, judicial, required by the judge; 2, praetorian, required by the praetor or aedile; 3, common, required properly by the praetor, but often, for the sake of avoiding delay, by the judge. Instances of those required by the judge are the security required de dolo, that a person that the thing will be owed to him, but this hope (spes debitum iri) passes to his heirs, and they can enforce the contract when he could have enforced it. A promise to give if a man does not do something in his power is equivalent to a promise to give when he dies, and, as he must die some day, is made in diem. (4.) If the condition relates to past or present time, the knowledge of the parties as to the event is immaterial. Either the condition has not been fulfilled and the stipulation is of no effect, or it has been fulfilled and the stipulation can be enforced at once. (6.) Where the promise is to do something or not to do something, the proper course is to fix in the stipulation the penalty to be paid if the thing is not done or is done, as this avoids uncertainty as to what amount ought to be paid for the breach of promise. (7.)

Co-stipulators. Co-promissors.—A verbal contract might be made so that more than one person should be joined in the stipulation, the promissor undertaking to give to each, or in the promise, each promissor answering affirmatively the question. These contracts might also be made so as to create joint creditors or joint debtors (Tit. 16. pr.), and one promissor might answer so as to bind himself simply; the others in a modified manner. (2.) The thing was due to each co-stipulator and from each co-promissor. If the thing was given by or to any of the joint parties, the obligation was at an end. If one co-promissor ceased, as by deminutio capitis, to be bound, the other co-parties remained bound. If, however, an action was brought on the contract, then the obligation was at an end, but, under Justinian, if the co-promissor sued could not pay entirely, the others might be sued for the deficiency. (1, note.) The co-promissors who had paid all could recover their shares from the other joint debtors, either as a partner, if there was a partnership, or if not, by so paying, or by the law allowing him to feign that he had so paid, that the actions of the creditors were made available for his benefit. (1, note.)

Stipulations of Slaves.—A slave can stipulate (though he cannot promise) for his owner (Tit. 17. pr.), whether he names his owner or not (1); and if a slave stipulates after his owner's death and before the entry of the heir, he acquires for the inheritance. (Tit. 17. pr.) He may stipulate, however, for a personal right for himself, as for leave to cross a field, but he exercises this for his master's benefit. (2.) When a slave is held in common, he acquires for his joint owners in proportion to their interests in him, unless he is acting by the orders or in the name of one only of them, or unless the thing cannot be acquired by one of them, as, e.g., if it is already owned by one of his owners. (3.)

Division of Stipulations.—Stipulations may be divided according as they are voluntary or not. (Tit. 18. pr.) Those that are not voluntary are, 1, judicial, required by the judge; 2, praetorian, required by the praetor or aedile; 3, common, required properly by the praetor, but often, for the sake of avoiding delay, by the judge. Instances of those required by the judge are the security required de dolo, that a person condemned to restore a thing shall restore it without fraudulently lessening its value; and de persequendo servo, that a defendant will pursue or pay the price of a slave the subject of litigation, who has, through the defendant's fault, escaped out of the defendant's possession. (1.) Instances of those required by the prætor are damni infecti, security against apprehended injury, and legatorum, security by the heir that he will pay the legacies. (2.) Instances of those required sometimes by the prætor, sometimes by the judex, are rem salvam fore pupillo, security for the property of a pupil, and de rato, that a principal will ratify what the procurator does for him. (4.)

STIPULATIONES INUTILES.—Stipulations are invalid for various reasons, which may be classed under the following heads:—

i. On account of their object, as when the stipulation is (a) for a thing that does not or cannot exist (Tit. 19. 1); or (b) for a thing of which the stipulator has not the commercium, as for a res sacra or a freeman; and in such cases the stipulation is invalid at once, though the thing may afterwards become such as he is capable of holding, as it also becomes void if the thing, without the fault of the promissor, becomes such as the stipulator cannot hold (2); (c) for a thing belonging to the stipulator or in case it may belong to him (2, 22); or (d) ex turpi causa, as to commit murder. (24.)

ii. On account of the persons by, for, or between whom they are made.—1. Stipulations are invalid when made by (a) dumb or wholly deaf persons (7); (b) madmen (8); (c) an infant pupil; or (d) a filius-familias below the age of puberty. (9, 10.)

2. Stipulations are invalid when made for (a) a third person other than a person in whose power the stipulator is. (4.) But such a stipulation may be made valid by adding that, if payment to the third person is not made, a penalty shall be payable to the stipulator (19); and whenever the stipulator has an interest in the payment to a third person being made, as if it is a co-tutor who on retiring stipulates, to save himself, that the property of the pupil shall be safely administered by the remaining tutors, or if the third person is a procurator or creditor of the stipulator, the stipulation is valid. (20.) If a stipulator engaged for payment to himself or another, payment to the other extinguished the obligation. If he stipulated for payment to himself and another, he could recover half the sum stipulated for. (4.) (b) The stipulation was also invalid if the promise was so made to bind a third person as that this third person should give or do something (3, 21); but the stipulation might be made valid either by the promissor promising that he would manage that the third person gave or did the thing, or that he himself would pay a penalty in case the third person did not give or do the thing. (3, 19.)

3. Masters cannot stipulate with their slaves, nor fathers with their children in their power. (6.)

iii. On account of the manner in which they are made.—The parties must consent to the same thing (5, 23); and if several things are in-

condemned to restore a thing shall restore it without fraudulently lessening its value; and de persequendo servo, that a defendant will pursue or pay the price of a slave the subject of litigation, who has, through the defendant's fault, escaped out of the defendant's possession. (1.) Instances of those required by the prætor are damni infecti, security against apprehended injury, and legatorum, security by the heir that he will pay the legacies. (2.) Instances of those required sometimes by the prætor, sometimes by the judex, are rem salvam fore pupillo, security for the property of a pupil, and de rato, that a principal will ratify what the procurator does for him. (4.)

STIPULATIONES INUTILES.—Stipulations are invalid for various reasons, which may be classed under the following heads:—

i. On account of their object, as when the stipulation is (a) for a thing that does not or cannot exist (Tit. 19. 1); or (b) for a thing of which the stipulator has not the commercium, as for a res sacra or a freeman; and in such cases the stipulation is invalid at once, though the thing may afterwards become such as he is capable of holding, as it also becomes void if the thing, without the fault of the promissor, becomes such as the stipulator cannot hold (2); (c) for a thing belonging to the stipulator or in case it may belong to him (2, 22); or (d) ex turpi causa, as to commit murder. (24.)

ii. On account of the persons by, for, or between whom they are made.—1. Stipulations are invalid when made by (a) dumb or wholly deaf persons (7); (b) madmen (8); (c) an infant pupil; or (d) a filius-familias below the age of puberty. (9, 10.)

2. Stipulations are invalid when made for (a) a third person other than a person in whose power the stipulator is. (4.) But such a stipulation may be made valid by adding that, if payment to the third person is not made, a penalty shall be payable to the stipulator (19); and whenever the stipulator has an interest in the payment to a third person being made, as if it is a co-tutor who on retiring stipulates, to save himself, that the property of the pupil shall be safely administered by the remaining tutors, or if the third person is a procurator or creditor of the stipulator, the stipulation is valid. (20.) If a stipulator engaged for payment to himself or another, payment to the other extinguished the obligation. If he stipulated for payment to himself and another, he could recover half the sum stipulated for. (4.) (b) The stipulation was also invalid if the promise was so made to bind a third person as that this third person should give or do something (3, 21); but the stipulation might be made valid either by the promissor promising that he would manage that the third person gave or did the thing, or that he himself would pay a penalty in case the third person did not give or do the thing. (3, 19.)

3. Masters cannot stipulate with their slaves, nor fathers with their children in their power. (6.)

iii. On account of the manner in which they are made.—The parties must consent to the same thing (5, 23); and if several things are included in the question, the promissor is, unless he gives a general assent, only bound as to those things to which he bound himself by his answer. (18.) The question is inferred from the record of the answer in a written document embodying a stipulation. (17.)

iv. On account of the time or the condition subject to which they are made. (a.) Time.—A stipulation was invalid that a thing should be given after the death of the stipulator or the possessor, because the right to have the engagement performed would then accrue not to the party to the contract, but to his heirs, who were in the position of third persons. (13.) An engagement to give the day before death was equally invalid, as until the death occurred it could not be known when the day was. (13.) But an engagement to give at the time of death was valid, as the performance was considered to become due before the heir occupied his position as heir (15), and a stipulation to give after the death of a third person was valid as being merely an uncertain term. (16.) A preposterous stipulation, that is, 'If something happens to-morrow, will you give me to-day?' was invalid. (14.) Under Justinian, however, all the causes of invalidity under this head and as to the time of death were removed. (13, 14.)

(b) Condition.—An impossible condition makes a stipulation void, but a stipulation is valid and the thing is due at once, if it is given in case an impossible condition is not performed. (11.) The heirs of the stipulator and the promissor could sue and be sued if the condition of a properly made conditional stipulation was fulfilled after the death of the party to whom they were heirs. (25.)

Intercessio

FIDEJUSSORES.—The general term for becoming surety was intercessio, and the principal modes of intercessio were (1) adpromissio, (2) fidejussio, (3) giving a mandate credende pecunie, or a pactum constituta pecunie, an engagement to pay the ascertained debt of the principal. The Institutes only treat of fidejussores. The correi stipulandi et promittendi, mentioned in Title 16, were parties to the same verbal contract. But it was also possible for persons to enter into a contract as accessories to the principal contract. If one of these accessories, or the principal, was sued, no further action could, until Justinian's time, be brought by the creditors against those not sued, the debt being extinguished by the litis contestatio, and payment to the accessory of the creditor was a good payment as against his principal. (Tit 20. pr.)

In stipulations there could be added an adstipulator, and the principal use of adding one was, before procurators were recognised to put a person in the position of a procurator, and, after procurators were recognised, to make valid a stipulation for something after the death of the stipulator. The rights of the adstipulator did not pass to his heirs.

The adpromissores (sponsores if Roman citizens, fidepromissores if peregrini) might bind themselves for as much as, or for less than, their principal bound himself, not for more. Their heirs were not bound, and they had against their principal an actio mandati. Several laws

cluded in the question, the promissor is, unless he gives a general assent, only bound as to those things to which he bound himself by his answer. (18.) The question is inferred from the record of the answer in a written document embodying a stipulation. (17.)

iv. On account of the time or the condition subject to which they are made. (a.) Time.—A stipulation was invalid that a thing should be given after the death of the stipulator or the possessor, because the right to have the engagement performed would then accrue not to the party to the contract, but to his heirs, who were in the position of third persons. (13.) An engagement to give the day before death was equally invalid, as until the death occurred it could not be known when the day was. (13.) But an engagement to give at the time of death was valid, as the performance was considered to become due before the heir occupied his position as heir (15), and a stipulation to give after the death of a third person was valid as being merely an uncertain term. (16.) A preposterous stipulation, that is, 'If something happens to-morrow, will you give me to-day?' was invalid. (14.) Under Justinian, however, all the causes of invalidity under this head and as to the time of death were removed. (13, 14.)

(b) Condition.—An impossible condition makes a stipulation void, but a stipulation is valid and the thing is due at once, if it is given in case an impossible condition is not performed. (11.) The heirs of the stipulator and the promissor could sue and be sued if the condition of a properly made conditional stipulation was fulfilled after the death of the party to whom they were heirs. (25.)

Intercessio

FIDEIUSORES.—The general term for becoming surety was intercessio, and the principal modes of intercessio were (1) adpromissio, (2) fidejussio, (3) giving a mandate credenda pecunia, or a pactum constituta pecunia, an engagement to pay the ascertained debt of the principal. The Institutes only treat of fidejussores. The correi stipulandi et promittendi, mentioned in Title 16, were parties to the same verbal contract. But it was also possible for persons to enter into a contract as accessories to the principal contract. If one of these accessories, or the principal, was sued, no further action could, until Justinian's time, be brought by the creditors against those not sued, the debt being extinguished by the litis contestatio, and payment to the accessory of the creditor was a good payment as against his principal. (Tit 20. pr.)

In stipulations there could be added an adstipulator, and the principal use of adding one was, before procurators were recognised, to put a person in the position of a procurator, and, after procurators were recognised, to make valid a stipulation for something after the death of the stipulator. The rights of the adstipulator did not pass to his heirs.

The adpromissores (sponsores if Roman citizens, fidepromissores if peregrini) might bind themselves for as much as, or for less than, their principal bound himself, not for more. Their heirs were not bound, and they had against their principal an actio mandati. Several laws were made for their protection. By the lex Apuleia any one of them who had paid the whole debt could recover all beyond his share from the others by an actio pro socio. By a law of uncertain name the creditor had to give notice beforehand for what amount he was going to exact security, and how many accessories there were to be. By the lex Furia the obligation was only binding for two years, and the amount of the liability of all was divided equally among all living when the guarantee could be enforced. The lex Publilia gave a special privilege to sponsors (not to fidepromissores), allowing them, unless reimbursed in six months, to bring against their principal a special action, actio depensi, and, if he denied his liability, to recover double, or to take his person in execution. The lex Cornelia provided that no one should bind himself for the same debtor, to the same creditor, in the same year, for more than 20,000 sesterces.

The lex Cornelia applied, however, not only to adpromissores, but to fidejussores, which marks the first introduction of a form of suretyship which, at last, superseded entirely the use of adpromissores. The fidejussor bound himself by saying in Latin or in Greek (7) that he also ordered the thing on his faith, but no strictness of the formula was here necessary. Like the adpromissor, the fidejussor could not bind himself for more than his principal (5), and had an actio mandati, or, if he had intervened without the principal's authority, an actio negotiorum gestorum, against the principal for what he paid for him. (6.)

The advantages of having fidejussores over adpromissores were : (a) They could be used to guarantee any kind of obligation, including obligations arising out of delicts and natural obligations, whereas adpromissores could only guarantee verbal contracts. (1.) (b) The fidejussor bound his heirs, the adpromissor did not. (2.) (c) There was no limit to the time during which fidejussores were bound, whereas adpromissores were only bound for two years from the time when the obligation could have been enforced against them. (2, note.) (d) The fidejussio might be made beforehand to guarantee a principal contract not yet made—adpromissio could not. (3.)

The fidejussores were each liable for the whole debt, and one who paid had no means of making the others contribute, except by taking advantage of the beneficium cedendarum actionum, that is, the surety who was willing to pay in full could repel the creditor by an exceptio doli mali, unless the creditor would cede his actions to the surety who paid him ; and by means of these actions the surety could force the principal, or his co-sureties, to pay him what he was entitled to receive. Hadrian, however, enacted that, if any fidejussor was sued, he should have what was termed the beneficium divisionis, i.e. he might force the creditor to divide his demand among all the fidejussores who were solvent at the time of the litis contestatio ; but the fidejussor must make this demand formally, since the beneficium did not take place ipso jure, as the provisions of the lex Furia did in favour of adpromissores. And it might still be more to the interest of the surety to take advan-

were made for their protection. By the lex Apuleia any one of them who had paid the whole debt could recover all beyond his share from the others by an actio pro socio. By a law of uncertain name the creditor had to give notice beforehand for what amount he was going to exact security, and how many accessories there were to be. By the lex Furia the obligation was only binding for two years, and the amount of the liability of all was divided equally among all living when the guarantee could be enforced. The lex Publilia gave a special privilege to sponsores (not to fidepromissores), allowing them, unless reimbursed in six months, to bring against their principal a special action, actio depensi, and, if he denied his liability, to recover double, or to take his person in execution. The lex Cornelia provided that no one should bind himself for the same debtor, to the same creditor, in the same year, for more than 20,000 sesterces.

The lex Cornelia applied, however, not only to adpromissores, but to fidejussores, which marks the first introduction of a form of suretyship which, at last, superseded entirely the use of adpromissores. The fidejussor bound himself by saying in Latin or in Greek (7) that he also ordered the thing on his faith, but no strictness of the formula was here necessary. Like the adpromissor, the fidejussor could not bind himself for more than his principal (5), and had an actio mandati, or, if he had intervened without the principal's authority, an actio negotiorum gestorum, against the principal for what he paid for him. (6.)

The advantages of having fidejussores over adpromissores were : (a) They could be used to guarantee any kind of obligation, including obligations arising out of delicts and natural obligations, whereas adpromissores could only guarantee verbal contracts. (1.) (b) The fidejussor bound his heirs, the adpromissor did not. (2.) (c) There was no limit to the time during which fidejussores were bound, whereas adpromissores were only bound for two years from the time when the obligation could have been enforced against them. (2, note.) (d) The fidejussio might be made beforehand to guarantee a principal contract not yet made—adpromissio could not. (3.)

The fidejussores were each liable for the whole debt, and one who paid had no means of making the others contribute, except by taking advantage of the beneficium cedendarum actionum, that is, the surety who was willing to pay in full could repel the creditor by an exceptio doli mali, unless the creditor would cede his actions to the surety who paid him ; and by means of these actions the surety could force the principal, or his co-sureties, to pay him what he was entitled to receive. Hadrian, however, enacted that, if any fidejussor was sued, he should have what was termed the beneficium divisionis, i.e. he might force the creditor to divide his demand among all the fidejussores who were solvent at the time of the litis contestatio ; but the fidejussor must make this demand formally, since the beneficium did not take place ipso jure, as the provisions of the lex Furia did in favour of adpromissores. And it might still be more to the interest of the surety to take advantage of the beneficium cedendarum actionum, as he thus took over any property pledged to the creditor, and might satisfy his claim in this way. (4.)

Justinian introduced what was termed the beneficium ordinis, by which a surety might require that the principal should be sued first, and the sureties only called on to pay what could not be recovered from him. (4, note.)

By the senatusconsultum Velleianum women were forbidden to bind themselves for another person. (Tit. 20. pr. note.) A fidejussor who signs a writing (cautio), by which he binds himself as fidejussor, is taken to have gone through all the necessary forms. (8.)

CONTRACTS MADE LITTERIS.—A contract was made litteris when an entry, expensilatio, under the name of the debtor, was made in the ledger (codex) of the creditor with the assent of the debtor, to the effect that the creditor had paid, and the debtor received, a certain sum of money. The best evidence of the assent of the debtor was his making a corresponding entry in his ledger, but this was not necessary. As the contract was for a sum certain advanced, it was enforced by a condictio; and as the remedy by condictio was a short and simple one, other debts, as e.g. what was owing under a sale, were changed by novation into debts due under a literal contract (transcriptio a re in personam), by the debtor owing to having received as a loan the sum due from him on the sale; and, in the same way, the debtor might take, under a literal contract, the debt of a third person (transcriptio a persona in personam), by assenting to an entry that he, the debtor, had received a loan to the amount of the sum owed by the third person.

Contracts litteris were peculiar to Roman citizens. Peregrini had as a substitute syngraphæ, signed by both parties, and chirographæ, signed by the debtor only. These were not merely documentary evidence, but were writings on which an action could be brought; but if there was a stipulation this was always looked on as the contract, and the writing was only evidentiary. If the creditor sued on a contract litteris, the defendant might plead the exceptio non numerate pecunie, in case he could state that he never really had received the money, and then the creditor had to prove that he had really paid. Subsequently mere acknowledgments of debt (cautiones) were protected by the same exception, and superseded contracts litteris. This exception could only be pleaded within a period fixed first at one year, then at five years, and by Justinian at two years; and within the same period, if the debtor could show that he had not had the money, he could ask to have the writing, on which he was sought to be charged, given up to him. After this period had elapsed, the debtor was conclusively bound by any written admission of debt, but, under Justinian, the debtor, by going through certain forms, at any time during the two years, might get his exception made perpetual; and Justinian also made a person falsely denying his written acknowledgment of debt liable to pay double the amount. (Tit. 21, and note.)

tage of the beneficium cedendarum actionum, as he thus took over any property pledged to the creditor, and might satisfy his claim in this way. (4.)

Justinian introduced what was termed the beneficium ordinis, by which a surety might require that the principal should be sued first, and the sureties only called on to pay what could not be recovered from him. (4, note.)

By the senatusconsultum Velleianum women were forbidden to bind themselves for another person. (Tit. 20. pr. note.) A fidejussor who signs a writing (cautio), by which he binds himself as fidejussor, is taken to have gone through all the necessary forms. (8.)

CONTRACTS MADE LITTERIS.—A contract was made litteris when an entry, expensilatio, under the name of the debtor, was made in the ledger (codex) of the creditor with the assent of the debtor, to the effect that the creditor had paid, and the debtor received, a certain sum of money. The best evidence of the assent of the debtor was his making a corresponding entry in his ledger, but this was not necessary. As the contract was for a sum certain advanced, it was enforced by a condictio; and as the remedy by condictio was a short and simple one, other debts, as e.g. what was owing under a sale, were changed by novation into debts due under a literal contract (transcriptio a re in personam), by the debtor owing to having received as a loan the sum due from him on the sale; and, in the same way, the debtor might take, under a literal contract, the debt of a third person (transcriptio a persona in personam), by assenting to an entry that he, the debtor, had received a loan to the amount of the sum owed by the third person.

Contracts litteris were peculiar to Roman citizens. Peregrini had as a substitute syngraphæ, signed by both parties, and chirographæ, signed by the debtor only. These were not merely documentary evidence, but were writings on which an action could be brought; but if there was a stipulation this was always looked on as the contract, and the writing was only evidentiary. If the creditor sued on a contract litteris, the defendant might plead the exceptio non numeratæ pecuniæ, in case he could state that he never really had received the money, and then the creditor had to prove that he had really paid. Subsequently mere acknowledgments of debt (cautiones) were protected by the same exception, and superseded contracts litteris. This exception could only be pleaded within a period fixed first at one year, then at five years, and by Justinian at two years; and within the same period, if the debtor could show that he had not had the money, he could ask to have the writing, on which he was sought to be charged, given up to him. After this period had elapsed, the debtor was conclusively bound by any written admission of debt, but, under Justinian, the debtor, by going through certain forms, at any time during the two years, might get his exception made perpetual; and Justinian also made a person falsely denying his written acknowledgment of debt liable to pay double the amount. (Tit. 21, and note.)

CONSENSUAL CONTRACTS.—We now come to the four kinds of contracts made simply by consent. No writing nor earnest is necessary; they may be made inter absentes, and all give rise to bonæ fidei actions. They are all bi-lateral, i.e. both parties are bound by them, whereas contracts under the three former heads were unilateral, except so far as commodatum, depositum, and pignus might give rise to actiones contrariæ. These four kinds of contract are sale, letting and hiring, partnership, and mandate. (Tit. 22.)

i. SALE.—The contract of sale is formed as soon as the price, i.e. a definite sum of money, not anything else than money, is fixed on. Earnest (arrhæ), previously to Justinian, only served as a proof that the contract had been made. (Tit. 23. pr.)

Justinian made two changes. 1. If the parties chose to reduce their contract to writing, which they need not do, he enacted that they should not be bound until it had been reduced to writing, and one of three conditions had been fulfilled: viz. that the writing was (a) written by the parties, or (b) signed by them, or (c) formally written by a notary. 2. The earnest (arrhæ), instead of a proof of the contract, became a measure of damages for not fulfilling the contract, whether written or unwritten, the purchaser forfeiting the earnest if he retracted, and the seller if he retracted forfeiting double.

I The thing sold must be defined in some way, but it might be defined in many ways, as, e.g., by selling at so much a head the fish to be caught on a day, rei speratæ emptio, or the chance of the whole take of fish on a day, spei emptio. (Tit. 23. pr., and note.)

II The price must be fixed and certain. If a thing is sold at the price at which Titius shall value the thing, Justinian decides that if Titius does fix a value this is a contract of sale; but if he does not, there is no contract of sale. (1.)

III The price must be in money, or else the contract is one of exchange (permutatio), not sale, the difference being that, if a contract of sale was made, the consent was the basis of the contract, but in exchange the contract was made re, by the delivery of one thing in exchange for which the other thing was to be given. (2.)

The duties of the seller were, 1, to deliver the thing and to give lawful and undisturbed possession of it (not to give the dominium of it). 2. To recompense the buyer, if evicted. 3. To secure the buyer against secret faults. If secret faults were discovered, the buyer might at his option, (a) by an actio æstimatoria recover damages, greater or less, according as the seller knew (or did not know) of the faults, or (b), by what was termed redhibitio, get the contract rescinded, and return the thing to the seller. But this was not all. In order to fortify himself, the buyer frequently exacted by stipulation a promise from the seller that he would give him the dominium, and that if the buyer was evicted, he would pay him double the purchase money. After the use of this fortifying stipulation had become familiar, it was held that custom so far imported such a stipulation into the contract, that the

CONSENSUAL CONTRACTS.—We now come to the four kinds of contracts made simply by consent. No writing nor earnest is necessary; they may be made inter absentes, and all give rise to bonæ fidei actions. They are all bi-lateral, i.e. both parties are bound by them, whereas contracts under the three former heads were unilateral, except so far as commodatum, depositum, and pignus might give rise to actiones contrariæ. These four kinds of contract are sale, letting and hiring, partnership, and mandate. (Tit. 22.)

i. SALE.—The contract of sale is formed as soon as the price, i.e. a definite sum of money, not anything else than money, is fixed on. Earnest (arrhæ), previously to Justinian, only served as a proof that the contract had been made. (Tit. 23. pr.)

Justinian made two changes. 1. If the parties chose to reduce their contract to writing, which they need not do, he enacted that they should not be bound until it had been reduced to writing, and one of three conditions had been fulfilled: viz. that the writing was (a) written by the parties, or (b) signed by them, or (c) formally written by a notary. 2. The earnest (arrhæ), instead of a proof of the contract, became a measure of damages for not fulfilling the contract, whether written or unwritten, the purchaser forfeiting the earnest if he retracted, and the seller if he retracted forfeiting double.

I The thing sold must be defined in some way, but it might be defined in many ways, as, e.g., by selling at so much a head the fish to be caught on a day, rei sperata emptio, or the chance of the whole take of fish on a day, spei emptio. (Tit. 23. pr., and note.)

II The price must be fixed and certain. If a thing is sold at the price at which Titius shall value the thing, Justinian decides that if Titius does fix a value this is a contract of sale; but if he does not, there is no contract of sale. (1.)

III The price must be in money or else the contract is one of exchange (permutatio), not sale, the difference being that, if a contract of sale was made, the consent was the basis of the contract, but in exchange the contract was made re, by the delivery of one thing in exchange for which the other thing was to be given. (2.)

The duties of the seller were, 1, to deliver the thing and to give lawful and undisturbed possession of it (not to give the dominium of it). 2. To recompense the buyer, if evicted. 3. To secure the buyer against secret faults. If secret faults were discovered, the buyer might at his option, (a) by an actio æstimatoria recover damages, greater or less, according as the seller knew (or did not know) of the faults, or (b), by what was termed redhibitio, get the contract rescinded, and return the thing to the seller. But this was not all. In order to fortify himself, the buyer frequently exacted by stipulation a promise from the seller that he would give him the dominium, and that if the buyer was evicted, he would pay him double the purchase money. After the use of this fortifying stipulation had become familiar, it was held that custom so far imported such a stipulation into the contract, that the buyer, who had not demanded such a promise, and who, therefore, could not sue ex stipulatio if evicted, yet, if evicted, could, in the bonae fidei actio empti, recover double the purchase money, on the ground that the seller ought to put the buyer in as good a position as if the stipulation had been made.

The buyer was bound, 1, to make the seller the receiver of the money fixed as the price, and, 2, to pay interest from the day of receiving the thing until he paid the price. (2, note.)

The contract of sale was complete when the price was fixed, but the thing sold remained in the ownership of the seller until he delivered it. If, after the sale was made, the thing bought improved in value, the buyer profited, and if it lost in value without the fault of the seller the buyer had to take it as it was. The risk, after the price was paid, was that of the buyer, and if the thing was wholly lost, by some cause beyond the control of the seller, the loss fell on the buyer, not on the seller, although the seller was the dominus, while generally it is true that res domino perit. But then the seller had to take the care of a good paterfamilias of the thing while it was in his custody, and if he did not, the buyer could sue him for damages; and, if the seller chose, he might take even a further responsibility and specially engage to be answerable even beyond the measure of responsibility of a bonus paterfamilias, as, e.g., that a slave purchased should not in any case escape out of his custody. If the thing, while retained by the seller, was injured or stolen by a third person, the seller had to cede to the buyer the action which, as dominus, he had against the wrongdoer or thief. (3.)

The contract of sale might be made to be fulfilled on a condition happening, or to be at an end on a condition happening, or with a subsidiary agreement added to it, such as (a) that it might be rescinded if the seller had a better offer before a given day (in diem addictio), or (b) a lex commissoria, a general agreement for the rescission of the contract, if not executed, this agreement being specially used to enable the seller to get back the thing if he had delivered it, and was not paid by a certain day. A seller could, under Justinian, have a sale rescinded, or the difference made up to him, if he had sold for less than half the value. (4.)

If the seller knowingly sold something that cannot be sold, as a res publica, or a freeman, the buyer, if he bought in ignorance, could recover from the seller all he had lost by entering into the bargain; he could, e.g., get interest on his purchase money.

The bonae fidei actio of the buyer was termed ex empto or empti, that of the seller ex vendito or venditi. (5.)

ii. LETTING ON HIRE.—The contract of letting and hiring (locatio-conductio) is the second of the consensual contracts, and was formed as soon as the price of the letting (merces) was fixed. The three heads of this contract were, 1, locatio-conductio rerum, where one person let and another hired a thing; 2, locatio-conductio operarum, where one person let his services and another hired them; 3, locatio-conductio buyer, who had not demanded such a promise, and who, therefore, could not sue ex stipulatio if evicted, yet, if evicted, could, in the bonae fidei actio empti, recover double the purchase money, on the ground that the seller ought to put the buyer in as good a position as if the stipulation had been made.

The buyer was bound, 1, to make the seller the receiver of the money fixed as the price, and, 2, to pay interest from the day of receiving the thing until he paid the price. (2, note.)

The contract of sale was complete when the price was fixed, but the thing sold remained in the ownership of the seller until he delivered it. If, after the sale was made, the thing bought improved in value, the buyer profited, and if it lost in value without the fault of the seller the buyer had to take it as it was. The risk, after the price was paid, was that of the buyer, and if the thing was wholly lost, by some cause beyond the control of the seller, the loss fell on the buyer, not on the seller, although the seller was the dominus, while generally it is true that res domino perit. But then the seller had to take the care of a good paterfamilias of the thing while it was in his custody, and if he did not, the buyer could sue him for damages; and, if the seller chose, he might take even a further responsibility and specially engage to be answerable even beyond the measure of responsibility of a bonus paterfamilias, as, e.g., that a slave purchased should not in any case escape out of his custody. If the thing, while retained by the seller, was injured or stolen by a third person, the seller had to cede to the buyer the action which, as dominus, he had against the wrongdoer or thief. (3.)

The contract of sale might be made to be fulfilled on a condition happening, or to be at an end on a condition happening, or with a subsidiary agreement added to it, such as (a) that it might be rescinded if the seller had a better offer before a given day (in diem addictio), or (b) a lex commissoria, a general agreement for the rescission of the contract, if not executed, this agreement being specially used to enable the seller to get back the thing if he had delivered it, and was not paid by a certain day. A seller could, under Justinian, have a sale rescinded, or the difference made up to him, if he had sold for less than half the value. (4.)

If the seller knowingly sold something that cannot be sold, as a res publica, or a freeman, the buyer, if he bought in ignorance, could recover from the seller all he had lost by entering into the bargain; he could, e.g., get interest on his purchase money.

The bonae fidei actio of the buyer was termed ex empto or empti, that of the seller ex vendito or venditi. (5.)

ii. LETTING ON HIRE.—The contract of letting and hiring (locatio-conductio) is the second of the consensual contracts, and was formed as soon as the price of the letting (merces) was fixed. The three heads of this contract were, 1, locatio-conductio rerum, where one person let and another hired a thing; 2, locatio-conductio operarum, where one person let his services and another hired them; 3, locatio-conductio

opere faciendi, where one person, the ^{owner} locator, delivered over a thing, to have something done to it for a price, by another person, the conductor. (Tit. 24. pr., and note.) The price must be fixed, but might be left to be fixed by another person (1), but if no price was fixed the contract was not technically one of locatio-conductio, but was an innominate contract. The price must be in money, and so if one man lets his ox in exchange for the hirer in turn letting his ox to the first letter, this is not locatio-conductio, but an innominate contract. (2.) Emphyteusis, which resembles sale in regard to the largeness of the interest passed by it, and locatio-conductio inasmuch as the property still remains in the creator of the emphyteusis, was declared to be a separate form of contract by Zeno. In the absence of special agreement to the contrary, the risk in emphyteusis of a total loss fell on the owner, the risk of a partial loss fell on the occupier. (3.) If a man gives his gold to a goldsmith to have rings made of it for a fixed price, this is locatio-conductio; but if the rings are to be made of the gold of the goldsmith, it is a sale. (4.) The hirer has to bestow on the thing hired the care of a bonus paterfamilias, but fortuitous loss falls on the owner, that is, the letter (5); a distinction being thus established between the contract of locatio-conductio and that of sale, where the risk of fortuitous loss is not with the dominus, the seller, but with the buyer who still remained possessor in the eyes of the law. The duties of the letter were, 1, to give the hirer the free use of the thing; 2, to guarantee him against eviction; 3, to reimburse him for necessary or useful expenses. The duties of the hirer were, 1, to give the care of a bonus paterfamilias to the custody of the thing; 2, to give the thing up when the term of hiring was at an end; and 3, to pay the agreed price of hiring. (Tit. 24. pr.)

The contract was terminated, 1, by the death of a person who had contracted to let out his personal services or who specially was to do a thing; but it was not terminated in other cases by the death of the locator or conductor, the contract passing to the heirs of each (6); 2, by the sale of the thing, the conductor having a right to damages against the locator for being turned out, but having no title to hold against a purchaser; 3, by rent being two years in arrear; or by gross misuse on the part of the conductor; 4, by the locator having indispensable need of it; and, 5, by the conductor being prevented from getting benefit from it, as by armed force. (6, note.)

The hirer had the actio conducti; the letter had, 1, the actio locati, and, 2, a real action, actio Serviana, by which he was enabled to seize on the farming instruments of the hirer of land if rent was not paid; and, 3, could apply for the interdictum Salvianum, by which he got possession of things pledged for the rent of land. (Tit. 24. pr.)

iii. PARTNERSHIP.—The third kind of consensual contracts, partnership, may be considered under the following heads:—

1. The objects of the partnership.—Partnership might be (a) universorum bonorum (κοινοπραξία), of everything belonging or accruing

opere faciendi, where one person, the ^{owner} locator, delivered over a thing, to have something done to it for a price, by another person, the conductor. (Tit. 24. pr., and note.) The price must be fixed, but might be left to be fixed by another person (1), but if no price was fixed the contract was not technically one of locatio-conductio, but was an innominate contract. The price must be in money, and so if one man lets his ox in exchange for the hirer in turn letting his ox to the first letter, this is not locatio-conductio, but an innominate contract. (2.) Emphyteusis, which resembles sale in regard to the largeness of the interest passed by it, and locatio-conductio inasmuch as the property still remains in the creator of the emphyteusis, was declared to be a separate form of contract by Zeno. In the absence of special agreement to the contrary, the risk in emphyteusis of a total loss fell on the owner, the risk of a partial loss fell on the occupier. (3.) If a man gives his gold to a goldsmith to have rings made of it for a fixed price, this is locatio-conductio; but if the rings are to be made of the gold of the goldsmith, it is a sale. (4.) The hirer has to bestow on the thing hired the care of a bonus paterfamilias, but fortuitous loss falls on the owner, that is, the letter (5); a distinction being thus established between the contract of locatio-conductio and that of sale, where the risk of fortuitous loss is not with the dominus, the seller, but with the buyer who still remained possessor in the eyes of the law. The duties of the letter were, 1, to give the hirer the free use of the thing; 2, to guarantee him against eviction; 3, to reimburse him for necessary or useful expenses. The duties of the hirer were, 1, to give the care of a bonus paterfamilias to the custody of the thing; 2, to give the thing up when the term of hiring was at an end; and 3, to pay the agreed price of hiring. (Tit. 24. pr.)

The contract was terminated, 1, by the death of a person who had contracted to let out his personal services or who specially was to do a thing; but it was not terminated in other cases by the death of the locator or conductor, the contract passing to the heirs of each (6); 2, by the sale of the thing, the conductor having a right to damages against the locator for being turned out, but having no title to hold against a purchaser; 3, by rent being two years in arrear; or by gross misuse on the part of the conductor; 4, by the locator having indispensable need of it; and, 5, by the conductor being prevented from getting benefit from it, as by armed force. (6, note.)

The hirer had the actio conducti; the letter had, 1, the actio locati, and, 2, a real action, actio Serviana, by which he was enabled to seize on the farming instruments of the hirer of land if rent was not paid; and, 3, could apply for the interdictum Salvianum, by which he got possession of things pledged for the rent of land. (Tit. 24. pr.)

iii. PARTNERSHIP.—The third kind of consensual contracts, partnership, may be considered under the following heads:—

1. The objects of the partnership.—Partnership might be (a) universorum bonorum (κοινοπραξία), of everything belonging or accruing to each partner in any way, and goods belonging to the partners at the time of the contract passed to all without delivery; (b) universorum quæ ex quæstu veniunt, of things acquired in the course of business, but not of inheritances, legacies, &c.; (c) negotiationis alicujus; (d) vectigalis, for farming the public revenues; (e) rei unius. (Tit. 25. pr., note.)

2. The shares of the partners.—In the absence of special agreement each partner has an equal share in the profit and loss. (1.) But they may agree that one-third of the profits and one-third of the loss shall belong to one partner—or one may have the profit after a balance has been struck and not be responsible for loss—or one may contribute money and another only services; but a leonine partnership, by which one partner took all the profit, was not permitted. (2.) If a share of gain is assigned to one partner, he has, in the absence of special agreement, to take an equal share of loss. (3.)

3. The dissolution of the partnership.—A partnership was dissolved (a) ex personis, when one partner was dead or incapacitated. As to death, it may be remarked that the death of one of many partners dissolved the whole partnership, but that a societas vectigalis passed to the heirs. (5, note.) Incapacity might under Justinian be caused by publicatio or confiscation, when the fiscus was looked on as the successor; and this was one of the consequences of the maxima or media capitis diminutio. (8, note.) (b) Ex rebus, when the purpose of the partnership has been accomplished, or the condition to which it was made subject, for partnership might be made conditionally, has been fulfilled (4 note), or when the subject matter of the partnership has ceased to exist, as in the case of a cessio bonorum, when the goods of the insolvent were all lost to him. (7.) But the outgoing partner might form a new partnership with his old partners, and as partnership, being a contract jus gentium, could be formed with a peregrinus, a new partnership might be formed even with a person who, having undergone the media capitis diminutio, had lost his civitas. The minima capitis diminutio did not dissolve a partnership, and a person arrogated or emancipated was still a partner. (8.) (c) Ex voluntate, when one partner wished to retire; but if, when the partnership is universorum bonorum, he renounces from a desire to profit exclusively by some gain, as an inheritance accruing to himself, he is compelled to share this gain with his partners. (4.) (d) Ex actione, when one partner compelled a dissolution by action. (e) Tempore, by the time during which the partnership was to last having expired.

4. The powers and duties of the partners.—Each partner was the mandatary of the others, but, for anything beyond mere ordinary administration, required an express mandatum. Properly, only the particular partner who was party to a contract could sue or be sued by third parties, but the prætor, if necessary, allowed actions to be brought by or against the other partners. Each partner had a bonæ fidei action pro socio against the others to recover his just expenses to each partner in any way, and goods belonging to the partners at the time of the contract passed to all without delivery; (b) universorum quæ ex questu veniunt, of things acquired in the course of business, but not of inheritances, legacies, &c.; (c) negotiationis alicujus; (d) vectigalis, for farming the public revenues; (e) rei unius. (Tit. 25. pr., note.)

2. The shares of the partners.—In the absence of special agreement each partner has an equal share in the profit and loss. (1.) But they may agree that one-third of the profits and one-third of the loss shall belong to one partner—or one may have the profit after a balance has been struck and not be responsible for loss—or one may contribute money and another only services; but a leonine partnership, by which one partner took all the profit, was not permitted. (2.) If a share of gain is assigned to one partner, he has, in the absence of special agreement, to take an equal share of loss. (3.)

3. The dissolution of the partnership.—A partnership was dissolved (a) ex personis, when one partner was dead or incapacitated. As to death, it may be remarked that the death of one of many partners dissolved the whole partnership, but that a societas vectigalis passed to the heirs. (5, note.) Incapacity might under Justinian be caused by publicatio or confiscation, when the fiscus was looked on as the successor; and this was one of the consequences of the maxima or media capitis diminutio. (8, note.) (b) Ex rebus, when the purpose of the partnership has been accomplished, or the condition to which it was made subject, for partnership might be made conditionally, has been fulfilled (4 note), or when the subject matter of the partnership has ceased to exist, as in the case of a cessio bonorum, when the goods of the insolvent were all lost to him. (7.) But the outgoing partner might form a new partnership with his old partners, and as partnership, being a contract jus gentium, could be formed with a peregrinus, a new partnership might be formed even with a person who, having undergone the media capitis diminutio, had lost his civitas. The minima capitis diminutio did not dissolve a partnership, and a person arrogated or emancipated was still a partner. (8.) (c) Ex voluntate, when one partner wished to retire; but if, when the partnership is universorum bonorum, he renounces from a desire to profit exclusively by some gain, as an inheritance accruing to himself, he is compelled to share this gain with his partners. (4.) (d) Ex actione, when one partner compelled a dissolution by action. (e) Tempore, by the time during which the partnership was to last having expired.

4. The powers and duties of the partners.—Each partner was the mandatary of the others, but, for anything beyond mere ordinary administration, required an express mandatum. Properly, only the particular partner who was party to a contract could sue or be sued by third parties, but the prætor, if necessary, allowed actions to be brought by or against the other partners. Each partner had a bonæ fidei action pro socio against the others to recover his just expenses and make them answerable for his losses or their negligence. (2, note.) Each partner was bound to take as much care of goods belonging to the partnership as he did of his own, and to this extent he was answerable, not only for dolus, but culpa. (9.)

There was such a fraternitas between partners, that while on the one hand a partner could not in an actio pro socio be condemned beyond his means (beneficium competentiae), yet condemnation in this action carried infamy with it. If a partner committed a delict against his partners, they had the appropriate actio ex delicto against him, and a partition of the partnership property could be enforced by an actio communi dividundo. (9, note.)

iv. MANDATE.—The fourth of the consensual contracts is mandate, by which one person charges another to do something: originally, one friend (the mandator) charges another friend, in whom he has confidence (the mandatarius), to do something for him, and as a pledge places his hand in his friend's (manus datio). The relations thus created were afterwards enforced by the bonæ fidei actions mandati directa, by which the mandator compelled the mandatarius to account to him, and mandati contraria, by which the mandatarius compelled the mandator to reimburse him for expenses and losses. (Tit. 26. pr., note.) The original character of the contract was traceable in mandate always remaining a gratuitous contract (13), and the mandatarius who was adjudged in an action to have failed to discharge his duty was stamped with infamy. (Tit. 26. pr., note.)

Gradually the scope of mandate was much enlarged by the prætor allowing third parties with whom the mandatarius had contracted to sue or be sued by the mandator, in the form of actiones utiles. There were still some acts, such as making a testament, or entering on an inheritance, which every man must do for himself; but, in general terms, it may be said, that a law of agency was thus created, as these actions could be brought without the concurrence of the agent or procurator, and thus the principal and third parties were placed in direct relations. (Tit. 26. pr., note.)

Forms of mandate.—Mandate may assume five forms, according to the persons interested in the contract. It may be made (a) for the benefit of the mandator only, as when he charges the mandatarius to buy an estate for him. (1.) (b) For the benefit of the mandator and the mandatarius, as, 1, when the mandator guarantees a loan which the mandatarius makes with interest to a third party, but for the benefit of the mandator; or, 2, when the mandator, being already a fidejussor, gives the mandatarius, who is about to sue him as such, a mandate to sue the principal at the risk of the mandator (here both gain, or rather, before Justinian introduced the beneficium ordinis, they gained, the mandator by having the principal sued first, and the mandatarius by having two persons to sue, one after the other); or 3, when the debtor gives the creditor a mandate to stipulate for something owed to the mandator by a third party. (Here again both benefit: the

and make them answerable for his losses or their negligence. (2, note.) Each partner was bound to take as much care of goods belonging to the partnership as he did of his own, and to this extent he was answerable, not only for dolus, but culpa. (9.)

There was such a fraternitas between partners, that while on the one hand a partner could not in an actio pro socio be condemned beyond his means (beneficium competentie), yet condemnation in this action carried infamy with it. If a partner committed a delict against his partners, they had the appropriate actio ex delicto against him, and a partition of the partnership property could be enforced by an actio communi dividundo. (9, note.)

iv. MANDATE.—The fourth of the consensual contracts is mandate, by which one person charges another to do something: originally, one friend (the mandator) charges another friend, in whom he has confidence (the mandatarius), to do something for him, and as a pledge places his hand in his friend's (manus datio). The relations thus created were afterwards enforced by the bonæ fidei actions mandati directa, by which the mandator compelled the mandatarius to account to him, and mandati contraria, by which the mandatarius compelled the mandator to reimburse him for expenses and losses. (Tit. 26. pr., note.) The original character of the contract was traceable in mandate always remaining a gratuitous contract (13), and the mandatarius who was adjudged in an action to have failed to discharge his duty was stamped with infamy. (Tit. 26. pr., note.)

Gradually the scope of mandate was much enlarged by the prætor allowing third parties with whom the mandatarius had contracted to sue or be sued by the mandator, in the form of actiones utiles. There were still some acts, such as making a testament, or entering on an inheritance, which every man must do for himself; but, in general terms, it may be said, that a law of agency was thus created, as these actions could be brought without the concurrence of the agent or procurator, and thus the principal and third parties were placed in direct relations. (Tit. 26. pr., note.)

Forms of mandate.—Mandate may assume five forms, according to the persons interested in the contract. It may be made (a) for the benefit of the mandator only, as when he charges the mandatarius to buy an estate for him. (1.) (b) For the benefit of the mandator and the mandatarius, as, 1, when the mandator guarantees a loan which the mandatarius makes with interest to a third party, but for the benefit of the mandator; or, 2, when the mandator, being already a fidejussor, gives the mandatarius, who is about to sue him as such, a mandate to sue the principal at the risk of the mandator (here both gain, or rather, before Justinian introduced the beneficium ordinis, they gained, the mandator by having the principal sued first, and the mandatarius by having two persons to sue, one after the other); or 3, when the debtor gives the creditor a mandate to stipulate for something owed to the mandator by a third party. (Here again both benefit: the mandator gets his debt collected for him, and the mandatarius has two persons to sue.) (2.) (c) For the benefit of a third person, as a mandate to manage the affairs of Titius. (d) For the benefit of the mandator and a third person, as when the mandatarius is charged to buy an estate for Titius and the mandator jointly. (e) For the benefit of the mandatarius and a third person, as when the mandator charges the mandatarius to lend money at interest to Titius, an opportunity of lending money at interest being here, as above in (b 1), treated as a benefit to the lender. (5.) A mandate for the benefit of the mandatarius only, as to invest his money in the purchase of an estate, is merely a piece of advice, and cannot be reckoned a mandate at all, unless the mandator meant to say that if his advice was followed, he, and not the mandatarius, was to take the risk. (6.) A mandate may be made conditionally, or to have effect from a particular time. (12.)

Mandate used as a mode of Suretyship.—A mandate was almost the same as fidejussio as a means of creating suretyship, and was subject to the same general rules as to the inability of women, under the senatusconsultum Velleianum, to enter into it for this purpose, and as to the benefits of discussion (ordinis), i.e. that the principal should be sued first, under Justinian, and of division, that is, that the liabilities of co-sureties should be divided among them, under Hadrian's rescript, and, to some extent, of the cession of actions. But the mandator and fidejussor differed in some respects. 1. The mandator was considered sometimes more responsible. It was, for instance, doubted by the jurists whether, if an adolescent who had borrowed under a guarantee was restitutus in integrum, the creditor or the fidejussor was to suffer the loss, but it was considered clear that the mandator rather than the creditor was to suffer. 2. Before the time of Justinian, who placed them on an equality, the fidejussor was released by the principal being sued—not so the mandator, as his contract was a separate one. 3. The fidejussor could not demand that the actions against the debtor and the co-sureties should be ceded to him after a litis contestatio in a suit by the creditor against the fidejussor; but the mandator was not affected by a litis contestatio or judgment in an action against the debtor. 4. The mandator was released if the creditor had wilfully abandoned any of the remedies the mandator could call on him to cede, while the fidejussor could only call on the creditor to cede such as he had to cede. (6, note.)

Duties and powers of the Mandatarius.—No one need accept a mandate, but, if accepted, it must be executed, unless renounced soon enough for the mandator to carry out his purpose himself or through another. Otherwise the mandatarius will be liable to an actio mandati, unless some such reason as a sudden illness or enmity has prevented him from renouncing or renouncing soon enough. (11.) If the mandator revokes before execution, the mandate is at an end. (9.) A mandate is also extinguished, if, before it is executed, either the mandator or mandatarius dies, but the mandatarius has an actio mandati, offences

when the jussor &
mandator

mandator gets his debt collected for him, and the mandatarius has two persons to sue.) (2.) (c) For the benefit of a third person, as a mandate to manage the affairs of Titius. (d) For the benefit of the mandator and a third person, as when the mandatarius is charged to buy an estate for Titius and the mandator jointly. (e) For the benefit of the mandatarius and a third person, as when the mandator charges the mandatarius to lend money at interest to Titius, an opportunity of lending money at interest being here, as above in (b 1), treated as a benefit to the lender. (5.) A mandate for the benefit of the mandatarius only, as to invest his money in the purchase of an estate, is merely a piece of advice, and cannot be reckoned a mandate at all, unless the mandator meant to say that if his advice was followed, he, and not the mandatarius, was to take the risk. (6.) A mandate may be made conditionally, or to have effect from a particular time. (12.)

Mandate used as a mode of Suretyship.—A mandate was almost the same as fidejussio as a means of creating suretyship, and was subject to the same general rules as to the inability of women, under the senatusconsultum Velleianum, to enter into it for this purpose, and as to the benefits of discussion (ordinis), i.e. that the principal should be sued first, under Justinian, and of division, that is, that the liabilities of co-sureties should be divided among them, under Hadrian's rescript, and, to some extent, of the cession of actions. But the mandator and fidejussor differed in some respects. 1. The mandator was considered sometimes more responsible. It was, for instance, doubted by the jurists whether, if an adolescent who had borrowed under a guarantee was restitutus in integrum, the creditor or the fidejussor was to suffer the loss, but it was considered clear that the mandator rather than the creditor was to suffer. 2. Before the time of Justinian, who placed them on an equality, the fidejussor was released by the principal being sued—not so the mandator, as his contract was a separate one. 3. The fidejussor could not demand that the actions against the debtor and the co-sureties should be ceded to him after a litis contestatio in a suit by the creditor against the fidejussor; but the mandator was not affected by a litis contestatio or judgment in an action against the debtor. 4. The mandator was released if the creditor had wilfully abandoned any of the remedies the mandator could call on him to cede, while the fidejussor could only call on the creditor to cede such as he had to cede. (6, note.)

C Duties and powers of the Mandatarius.—No one need accept a mandate, but, if accepted, it must be executed, unless renounced soon enough for the mandator to carry out his purpose himself or through another. Otherwise the mandatarius will be liable to an actio mandati, unless some such reason as a sudden illness or enmity has prevented him from renouncing or renouncing soon enough. (11.) If the mandator revokes before execution, the mandate is at an end. (9.) A mandate is also extinguished, if, before it is executed, either the mandator or mandatarius dies, but the mandatarius has an actio mandati, offences

when the jussor &
mandator

if he executes the mandate when the mandator is really, but not to his knowledge, dead; just as a payment to a steward, enfranchised or ceasing to have power to act as steward, is good against his master if the person paying the money does not know that the steward is not still a slave or has ceased to have power to act as steward. (10.) A mandate contra bonos mores, as to commit theft, is not obligatory; the mandatarius may have to pay a penalty in such a case, but he has no remedy against the person who charges him to commit the theft. (7.) The mandatarius must not exceed the limits of his mandate. If a mandator charges the mandatarius to spend 100 aurei, the mandatarius may spend less, but not more; and he can make the mandator responsible up to 100 aurei, though not for the excess. (8.) In the execution of the mandate, the mandatarius was bound to exercise the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (11, note.)

Gratuitous character of the Contract.—A mandate is always gratuitous; and a contract which, if gratuitous, would be a mandate, will, if not gratuitous, almost always take the form of locatio-conductio, and so vice versa, if a person gives out his materials to be done something with, but does not fix the price, an actio mandati may be brought. But although the mandate was gratuitous, yet an honorary payment (honorarium) might be arranged for and given, as to doctors, &c., and although the payment could not be enforced by an action, yet the magistrate in the exercise of his extraordinary jurisdiction would regulate it and see it was paid. (13.)

OBLIGATIONS QUASI EX CONTRACTU.—We now come to cases where an obligation exists, not arising from a contract, but from such a state of things that one man is bound to another as if there was a contract. These obligations, moreover, resemble not only obligations generally, but those arising from some particular form of contract. The first three of the examples that follow, for instance, closely approach obligations arising from a mandate. The next two closely approach obligations arising from a societas. The last closely approaches the obligation arising from mutuum. (Tit. 27. pr. 6.)

The following are the examples (which are merely examples) given in the Institutes.

1. If one man manages the affairs of another who is absent, without being charged to do so, there is no contract between them, but, in order that the affairs of absent people might not be neglected, the law treated the parties as if a mandate had been given, the person whose affairs had been managed having an actio negotiorum gestorum against the gestor to make him account, and the gestor having an actio contraria against him, but (in distinction to the case of a mandate) only for what he has usefully expended, not for all his expenses. The gestor has to show the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (1.)

2. Tutors and, 3, curators are bound to the pupil or adolescent, who have a direct action to make them account, and are subject to a contrary action for losses and all expenses. (2.)

if he executes the mandate when the mandator is really, but not to his knowledge, dead; just as a payment to a steward, enfranchised or ceasing to have power to act as steward, is good against his master if the person paying the money does not know that the steward is not still a slave or has ceased to have power to act as steward. (10.) A mandate contra bonos mores, as to commit theft, is not obligatory; the mandatarius may have to pay a penalty in such a case, but he has no remedy against the person who charges him to commit the theft. (7.) The mandatarius must not exceed the limits of his mandate. If a mandator charges the mandatarius to spend 100 aurei, the mandatarius may spend less, but not more; and he can make the mandator responsible up to 100 aurei, though not for the excess. (8.) In the execution of the mandate, the mandatarius was bound to exercise the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (11, note.)

Gratuitous character of the Contract.—A mandate is always gratuitous; and a contract which, if gratuitous, would be a mandate, will, if not gratuitous, almost always take the form of locatio-conductio, and so vice versa, if a person gives out his materials to be done something with, but does not fix the price, an actio mandati may be brought. But although the mandate was gratuitous, yet an honorary payment (honorarium) might be arranged for and given, as to doctors, &c., and although the payment could not be enforced by an action, yet the magistrate in the exercise of his extraordinary jurisdiction would regulate it and see it was paid. (13.)

OBLIGATIONS QUASI EX CONTRACTU.—We now come to cases where an obligation exists, not arising from a contract, but from such a state of things that one man is bound to another as if there was a contract. These obligations, moreover, resemble not only obligations generally, but those arising from some particular form of contract. The first three of the examples that follow, for instance, closely approach obligations arising from a mandate. The next two closely approach obligations arising from a societas. The last closely approaches the obligation arising from mutuum. (Tit. 27. pr. 6.)

The following are the examples (which are merely examples) given in the Institutes.

1. If one man manages the affairs of another who is absent, without being charged to do so, there is no contract between them, but, in order that the affairs of absent people might not be neglected, the law treated the parties as if a mandate had been given, the person whose affairs had been managed having an actio negotiorum gestorum against the gestor to make him account, and the gestor having an actio contraria against him, but (in distinction to the case of a mandate) only for what he has usefully expended, not for all his expenses. The gestor has to show the diligence of a bonus paterfamilias. (1.)

2. Tutors and, 3, curators are bound to the pupil or adolescent, who have a direct action to make them account, and are subject to a contrary action for losses and all expenses. (2.)

4. If two persons, not being partners, have a thing in common, and one has received the fruits or borne necessary or useful expenses, he can be sued or sue as if the other had been a partner (3); and 5, the same may be said of two co-heirs, who have a right to apply to have the inheritance divided. (4.)

6. The heir, though not bound by a contract to the legatee, is under an obligation to him, quasi ex contractu, to carry out the dispositions of the testator, and the legatee had an actio ex testamento to make him do this; having also, if a particular thing was so given as a legacy as to give the legatee the right to bring a vindictio, the choice between the real and the personal action. (5.)

7. A person to whom money not due is paid by mistake, is not bound by a contract, for payment is generally rather the fulfilment than the origin of a contract, but he is bound to repay it by an obligation quasi ex contractu. (6.)

In order that the person paying might be able to recover, three conditions must be fulfilled: (a) the payment must be really not due; a person could not recover if what he paid was due, although by a merely natural obligation, or if he paid sooner than necessary what he must some day pay; but he might recover what he paid under a conditional undertaking before the event happened; (b) he must have paid under a mistake arising from ignorance of fact or, perhaps, of law; for if he paid knowingly he was treated as having made a gift. (6.) In one case, money paid when not due could not be recovered; viz., when he who paid was liable, on denying liability, to pay double the amount claimed, as he would be if he denied that a judgment pronounced against him had been pronounced, or in actions under the lex Aquilia, or, before Justinian, in cases of legacies given per damnationem. Justinian put all legacies and fideicommissa on the same footing in this respect, but only in favour of certain legatees, such as churches, asylums, monasteries, and so forth. If a person in such cases chose to pay the simple sum claimed, he could not recover it, as he was taken to have paid it to obtain security from the penalty. (7.)

The person who had paid money by mistake was much in the position of a person who had made a mutuum, and the condictio indebiti, by which he recovered, closely resembled the actio ex mutuo. But the solutio indebiti extended to many other things than the payment of money. It comprehended anything done or given over by mistake, and the analogy to the mutuum ceased to be apparent. (6, note.)

ACQUISITION OF OBLIGATIONS THROUGH OTHERS.—Fathers and masters acquire obligations, i.e. are creditors, and can bring actions, through sons in potestate (subject to the changes made by Justinian as to the peculium, the father, however, having alone the right to bring the action when he had the usufruct) and slaves. (Tit. 28. pr.) In the cases of slaves, or of persons supposed to be slaves, of whom there is bona fide possession or a usufruct, the master acquires the obligations as to all that arises from their labours or from something belonging

4. If two persons, not being partners, have a thing in common, and one has received the fruits or borne necessary or useful expenses, he can be sued or sue as if the other had been a partner (3); and 5, the same may be said of two co-heirs, who have a right to apply to have the inheritance divided. (4.)

6. The heir, though not bound by a contract to the legatee, is under an obligation to him, quasi ex contractu, to carry out the dispositions of the testator, and the legatee had an actio ex testamento to make him do this; having also, if a particular thing was so given as a legacy as to give the legatee the right to bring a vindictio, the choice between the real and the personal action. (5.)

7. A person to whom money not due is paid by mistake, is not bound by a contract, for payment is generally rather the fulfilment than the origin of a contract, but he is bound to repay it by an obligation quasi ex contractu. (6.)

In order that the person paying might be able to recover, three conditions must be fulfilled: (a) the payment must be really not due; a person could not recover if what he paid was due, although by a merely natural obligation, or if he paid sooner than necessary what he must some day pay; but he might recover what he paid under a conditional undertaking before the event happened; (b) he must have paid under a mistake arising from ignorance of fact or, perhaps, of law; for if he paid knowingly he was treated as having made a gift. (6.) In one case, money paid when not due could not be recovered; viz., when he who paid was liable, on denying liability, to pay double the amount claimed, as he would be if he denied that a judgment pronounced against him had been pronounced, or in actions under the lex Aquilia, or, before Justinian, in cases of legacies given per damnationem. Justinian put all legacies and fideicommissa on the same footing in this respect, but only in favour of certain legatees, such as churches, asylums, monasteries, and so forth. If a person in such cases chose to pay the simple sum claimed, he could not recover it, as he was taken to have paid it to obtain security from the penalty. (7.)

The person who had paid money by mistake was much in the position of a person who had made a mutuum, and the condictio indebiti, by which he recovered, closely resembled the actio ex mutuo. But the solutio indebiti extended to many other things than the payment of money. It comprehended anything done or given over by mistake, and the analogy to the mutuum ceased to be apparent. (6, note.)

ACQUISITION OF OBLIGATIONS THROUGH OTHERS.—Fathers and masters acquire obligations, i.e. are creditors, and can bring actions, through sons in potestate (subject to the changes made by Justinian as to the peculium, the father, however, having alone the right to bring the action when he had the usufruct) and slaves. (Tit. 28. pr.) In the cases of slaves, or of persons supposed to be slaves, of whom there is bona fide possession or a usufruct, the master acquires the obligations as to all that arises from their labours or from something belonging to the master. In the case of slaves of whom the master has the use, the master acquires the obligations as to all that arises from their labours expended on the master's property. (1, 2.) The slave held in common acquires, in the absence of something to show the contrary, for his masters in proportion to their interest in him. (3) The institutes do not notice the acquisition of obligations through procurators.

DISSOLUTION OF OBLIGATIONS.—The last Title of this book treats of the dissolution of obligations, and the case of obligations being dissolved ipso jure must be distinguished from that of the right to sue on an obligation being met by an exception, a subject reserved for the 4th Book. There are three modes of the dissolution of contracts noticed in the Institutes: 1. Payment; 2. Novation; 3. Use of a form of dissolution corresponding to the form of the obligation. (Tit. 29.)

i. Payment.—Solutio, a term applicable generally to every mode of loosening the tie of the obligation, is specially applied to payment in its widest sense, i.e. executing the contract. There are as to this three questions to be answered: 1. Who may pay? Either the debtor himself may pay, or any third person with or without the debtor's knowledge, or even against his will, may pay for him. If the debtor pays, the fidejussor is released, and if the fidejussor pays and does not require the actions to be ceded to him, the principal is released. 2. To whom might the payment be made? To the creditor himself, his authorised agent, to the tutor, curator, or authorised pupil. 3. What might be given in payment? Not only the thing itself, but, with the consent of the creditor, something else in lieu of it. (Tit. 29. pr.)

ii. Novation.—Novatio is the dissolution of one obligation by the formation of another. Any contract, civil or natural, could be extinguished by a new contract, operating either civilly or naturally, being formed; the new contract being one either litteris, or (so generally as to be spoken of as the one recognised mode) verbis. The new contract must be different from the old, and might be different in three ways: 1. The terms might be altered; 2. A new debtor might be introduced, and even if the new debtor is unable, as e.g. an unauthorised pupil, to contract, still, though the new contract, except as a natural obligation, is void, yet the first is extinguished; but it would be otherwise if the new contract had been made with an unauthorised slave, for then there would be no new contract at all. The new debtor might be substituted even without the consent of the old debtor; this new debtor was termed expromissor, in the strict sense of that word. If the old debtor substituted another person as the new debtor in his own place, this was termed delegatio. A new creditor might also be introduced. 3. If the parties remained the same, then, if the preceding contract was not a stipulation, the forming the same contract by stipulation operated as a novation of the first contract; but if the preceding contract is a stipulation, something new must be introduced; conditions of time or fidejussores, for example, must be added or taken away. If the second contract is made conditionally, the first is not extinguished until the

to the master. In the case of slaves of whom the master has the use, the master acquires the obligations as to all that arises from their labours expended on the master's property. (1, 2.) The slave held in common acquires, in the absence of something to show the contrary, for his masters in proportion to their interest in him. (3) The institutes do not notice the acquisition of obligations through procurators.

DISSOLUTION OF OBLIGATIONS.—The last Title of this book treats of the dissolution of obligations, and the case of obligations being dissolved ipso jure must be distinguished from that of the right to sue on an obligation being met by an exception, a subject reserved for the 4th Book. There are three modes of the dissolution of contracts noticed in the Institutes: 1. Payment; 2. Novation; 3. Use of a form of dissolution corresponding to the form of the obligation. (Tit. 29.)

i. Payment.—Solutio, a term applicable generally to every mode of loosening the tie of the obligation, is specially applied to payment in its widest sense, i.e. executing the contract. There are as to this three questions to be answered: 1. Who may pay? Either the debtor himself may pay, or any third person with or without the debtor's knowledge, or even against his will, may pay for him. If the debtor pays, the fidejussor is released, and if the fidejussor pays and does not require the actions to be ceded to him, the principal is released. 2. To whom might the payment be made? To the creditor himself, his authorised agent, to the tutor, curator, or authorised pupil. 3. What might be given in payment? Not only the thing itself, but, with the consent of the creditor, something else in lieu of it. (Tit. 29. pr.)

ii. Novation.—Novation is the dissolution of one obligation by the formation of another. Any contract, civil or natural, could be extinguished by a new contract, operating either civilly or naturally, being formed; the new contract being one either litteris, or (so generally as to be spoken of as the one recognised mode) verbis. The new contract must be different from the old, and might be different in three ways: 1. The terms might be altered; 2. A new debtor might be introduced, and even if the new debtor is unable, as e.g. an unauthorised pupil, to contract, still, though the new contract, except as a natural obligation, is void, yet the first is extinguished; but it would be otherwise if the new contract had been made with an unauthorised slave, for then there would be no new contract at all. The new debtor might be substituted even without the consent of the old debtor; this new debtor was termed expromissor, in the strict sense of that word. If the old debtor substituted another person as the new debtor in his own place, this was termed delegatio. A new creditor might also be introduced. 3. If the parties remained the same, then, if the preceding contract was not a stipulation, the forming the same contract by stipulation operated as a novation of the first contract; but if the preceding contract is a stipulation, something new must be introduced; conditions of time or fidejussores, for example, must be added or taken away. If the second contract is made conditionally, the first is not extinguished until the second becomes operative by the condition having been fulfilled. (3. and note.)

Justinian enacted that no contract should be extinguished by a new one being formed, unless the parties clearly expressed their intention that this should be the effect of the new contract. (3.)

Both the litis contestatio and a judgment produced a novatio, but the effect was not exactly the same as in novatio proper, as the beneficial accessories of the old contract, such as pledges and interest, were continued. (3, note.)

iii. Form of Dissolution corresponding to the Forms of the Obligation.—If payment was not made, nor novation made by a new stipulation, and the parties had made a contract of nexum, or verbis, or litteris, a form (imaginaria solutio) had to be gone through to get rid of the contract, corresponding to the form in which the obligation had been contracted. A nexum was dissolved by the debtor striking the scale with a piece of money and giving it to the creditor as representing the debt; and this form was used to remit payment of a legacy per damnationem, or of money due on a judgment, or of anything certain, pondere, numero mensurave. (Tit. 29. pr. note.) A contract verbis was dissolved by acceptilatio, i.e. by the creditor saying Habeo to the debtor's question Habesne acceptum? (1.) A contract litteris was dissolved by the debtor making the expensilatio of an imaginary payment in his books.

A contract re was dissolved by the thing being returned, and one made consensu was dissolved by consent, if each party could be put in his former position. (4.)

If a contract had been made in some other way than verbis, and the parties subsequently went through an acceptilatio, this operated as giving an exception preventing the creditor from suing. But in order that the preceding obligation might be extinguished, and not merely an exception allowed, there was invented what was termed the Aquilian stipulation. The terms of the former contract were thrown into the form of a stipulation, which extinguished the old contract by novation, and then this new stipulation was dissolved by acceptilatio. (2.) Acceptilatio may be applied to a part of a debt as well as to the whole. (1.)

There were also the following modes in which an obligation might be dissolved besides the three above mentioned: 1. The obligation becoming impossible to execute, as if the thing perished. 2. Confusio, i.e. the personæ of the creditor and the debtor becoming merged, as if the debtor became heir to the creditor. 3. Compensatio, or set-off, in the sense that it was taken notice of in bonæ fidei actions without an exception. (4, note.)

second becomes operative by the condition having been fulfilled. (3. and note.)

Justinian enacted that no contract should be extinguished by a new one being formed, unless the parties clearly expressed their intention that this should be the effect of the new contract. (3.)

Both the litis contestatio and a judgment produced a novatio, but the effect was not exactly the same as in novatio proper, as the beneficial accessories of the old contract, such as pledges and interest, were continued. (3, note.)

iii. Form of Dissolution corresponding to the Forms of the Obligation.—If payment was not made, nor novation made by a new stipulation, and the parties had made a contract of nexum, or verbis, or litteris, a form (imaginaria solutio) had to be gone through to get rid of the contract, corresponding to the form in which the obligation had been contracted. A nexum was dissolved by the debtor striking the scale with a piece of money and giving it to the creditor as representing the debt; and this form was used to remit payment of a legacy per damnationem, or of money due on a judgment, or of anything certain, pondere, numero mensurave. (Tit. 29. pr. note.) A contract verbis was dissolved by acceptilatio, i.e. by the creditor saying Habeo to the debtor's question Habesne acceptum? (1.) A contract litteris was dissolved by the debtor making the expensilatio of an imaginary payment in his books.

A contract re was dissolved by the thing being returned, and one made consensu was dissolved by consent, if each party could be put in his former position. (4.)

If a contract had been made in some other way than verbis, and the parties subsequently went through an acceptilatio, this operated as giving an exception preventing the creditor from suing. But in order that the preceding obligation might be extinguished, and not merely an exception allowed, there was invented what was termed the Aquilian stipulation. The terms of the former contract were thrown into the form of a stipulation, which extinguished the old contract by novation, and then this new stipulation was dissolved by acceptilatio. (2.) Acceptilatio may be applied to a part of a debt as well as to the whole. (1.)

There were also the following modes in which an obligation might be dissolved besides the three above mentioned: 1. The obligation becoming impossible to execute, as if the thing perished. 2. Confusio, i.e. the personæ of the creditor and the debtor becoming merged, as if the debtor became heir to the creditor. 3. Compensatio, or set-off, in the sense that it was taken notice of in bonæ fidei actions without an exception. (4, note.)

BOOK IV.

DELICTS.

WE now proceed to notice obligations arising ex delicto, or quasi ex delicto.

DELICTS.—Obligations arising from delicts—i.e. violations of the rights of property, or of any of the other rights in rem, such as liberty, security, or reputation—arise from the thing done (ex re), without necessary reference to an evil intent, and the kinds of delicts recognised by the law are four:—Furtum, rapina, damni injuria, injuria. (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. pr.)

FURTUM.—Theft is the fraudulent dealing with a moveable thing, including things moved from the soil, or with its use or its possession. (1.) By fraudulent is meant 'with the intention of committing a theft.' and among impuberes it was only a person pubertati proximus who was held old enough to have such an intention. (18.) If a borrower converts the thing borrowed to a purpose other than that for which it was lent, he does not commit a theft, if he honestly thinks the owner would permit it (7), or, whether he thinks so or not, if the owner would, as a matter of fact, have permitted it. (8.) But a person tempting a slave to bring him the property of his master, and then receiving the things by direction of the master to whom the slave has revealed the facts, is guilty both of theft and of corrupting a slave. (8.) There is theft of the use of a thing, as when a creditor or a depositary uses for his own purposes the thing committed to him as a pledge or in deposit, or a borrower uses a thing for a purpose other than that for which it is lent, e.g. borrowing a horse for a ride, and takes it into battle. (6.) There is theft of the possession, as if a debtor takes from the creditor the thing he has pledged to him. Free persons, as, e.g., children in potestate, are among the things that may come within the law of theft. (10.) A person who assists in a theft, as by placing a ladder by which the thief mounts, is liable to an action of theft, but not so if he only counsels the theft. (11.) If persons in the power of another steal from that person, they cannot be sued for theft by that person, but the thing is furtiva, and cannot be acquired by usucapion, and a person assisting them is liable to an action of theft. (12.)

In case of theft the owner of the thing could sue for the thing, if in the possession of the thief, by the ordinary means, vindicatio, or an action ad exhibendum, and, if the thing was no longer in the possession of the thief, he could recover the value of the thing stolen and interest by a condictio furtiva, or he might, if he pleased, bring this action

BOOK IV.

DELICTS.

WE now proceed to notice obligations arising ex delicto, or quasi ex delicto.

DELICTS.—Obligations arising from delicts—i.e. violations of the rights of property, or of any of the other rights in rem, such as liberty, security, or reputation—arise from the thing done (ex re), without necessary reference to an evil intent, and the kinds of delicts recognised by the law are four:—Furtum, rapina, damni injuria, injuria. (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. pr.)

FURTUM.—Theft is the fraudulent dealing with a moveable thing, including things moved from the soil, or with its use or its possession. (1.) By fraudulent is meant 'with the intention of committing a theft.' and among impuberes it was only a person pubertati proximus who was held old enough to have such an intention. (18.) If a borrower converts the thing borrowed to a purpose other than that for which it was lent, he does not commit a theft, if he honestly thinks the owner would permit it (7), or, whether he thinks so or not, if the owner would, as a matter of fact, have permitted it. (8.) But a person tempting a slave to bring him the property of his master, and then receiving the things by direction of the master to whom the slave has revealed the facts, is guilty both of theft and of corrupting a slave. (8.) There is theft of the use, of a thing, as when a creditor or a depositary uses for his own purposes the thing committed to him as a pledge or in deposit, or a borrower uses a thing for a purpose other than that for which it is lent, e.g. borrows a horse for a ride, and takes it into battle. (6.) There is theft of the possession, as if a debtor takes from the creditor the thing he has pledged to him. Free persons, as, e.g., children in potestate, are among the things that may come within the law of theft. (10.) A person who assists in a theft, as by placing a ladder by which the thief mounts, is liable to an action of theft, but not so if he only counsels the theft. (11.) If persons in the power of another steal from that person, they cannot be sued for theft by that person, but the thing is furtiva, and cannot be acquired by usucapion, and a person assisting them is liable to an action of theft. (12.)

In case of theft the owner of the thing could sue for the thing, if in the possession of the thief, by the ordinary means, vindicatio, or an action ad exhibendum, and, if the thing was no longer in the possession of the thief, he could recover the value of the thing stolen and interest by a condictio furtiva, or he might, if he pleased, bring this action

although the thing was in the thief's possession. But, besides these actions, he had an actio furti, an action to recover a penalty for the wrong done him; but this, though it could be brought by the heirs of the owner, could not be brought against those of the thief. (19, and note.) It could, as we have just seen, be brought against the accomplices of the thief. (11.)

Two questions arise as to this action. 1. What was the amount of the penalty? 2. Who could bring the action?

actio furti

1. The amount of the penalty varied according as the theft was manifest or not manifest. A manifest theft is one in which the thief is detected in the act, or in the place of the theft, or with the thing on him before he reaches his destination. The penalty for a manifest theft, which had been under the Twelve Tables for a slave death, and for a freeman being given over as a slave to the person injured, was fixed by the praetors at four times the value of the thing stolen. The penalty for non-manifest theft was twice the value. Any accidental circumstance that, at the time of the theft, gave a special value to the thing, was reckoned in the value, the quadruple or double of which was to be given. (3, 5.) In the older law there had been other variations of theft, or concealing stolen property, to which actions had been attached, with varying penalties, under the heads of furtum conceptum, oblatum, prohibitum, and non exhibitum. (4.)

2. The person or persons who were interested in the thing not being lost could bring the actio furti. In the case of a thing subjected to a usufruct, both the dominus and the usufructuary had such an interest, and both could bring the action. (13, note.) The creditor, from whom a thing given in pledge is stolen, even if the debtor is the thief, may bring it, because to have the thing pledged in possession is a gain, although the debtor may be able to pay. (14.) The bona fide purchaser, too, has the action, although he is not the dominus. (15.) The conductor operis, the tailor or fuller who has clothes to mend or clean, can bring the action, if he is solvent, and the owner cannot; for as he has his remedy against the tailor, the owner has not an interest; but if the tailor is insolvent the owner can bring the action. (15.) The same rule applied before Justinian to the borrower under a commodatum, but under Justinian the lender had his choice. If he chose to bring the action against the thief, the borrower was freed from responsibility. If, knowing of the theft, he chose to sue the borrower, then the borrower had the action against the thief so far as he paid, but the lender had not, whether the borrower was solvent or not. If the lender, ignorant of the theft, brought an action against the borrower, he might, on knowing the facts, desist from that action, and sue the thief, and then the borrower was free, whatever the result of the action against the thief might be. (16.) A depositary, not being answerable for culpa levis, had no interest sufficient to support the action, and the owner only could bring it. (17.) A mere interest in a thing not delivered being safe, such as that of a person to whom a thing was due under a stipulation, although the thing was in the thief's possession. But, besides these actions, he had an actio furti, an action to recover a penalty for the wrong done him; but this, though it could be brought by the heirs of the owner, could not be brought against those of the thief. (19, and note.) It could, as we have just seen, be brought against the accomplices of the thief. (11.)

Two questions arise as to this action. 1. What was the amount of the penalty? 2. Who could bring the action?

actio furti

1. The amount of the penalty varied according as the theft was manifest or not manifest. A manifest theft is one in which the thief is detected in the act, or in the place of the theft, or with the thing on him before he reaches his destination. The penalty for a manifest theft, which had been under the Twelve Tables for a slave death, and for a freeman being given over as a slave to the person injured, was fixed by the praetors at four times the value of the thing stolen. The penalty for non-manifest theft was twice the value. Any accidental circumstance that, at the time of the theft, gave a special value to the thing, was reckoned in the value, the quadruple or double of which was to be given. (3, 5.) In the older law there had been other variations of theft, or concealing stolen property, to which actions had been attached, with varying penalties, under the heads of furtum conceptum, oblatum, prohibitum, and non exhibitum. (4.)

2. The person or persons who were interested in the thing not being lost could bring the actio furti. In the case of a thing subjected to a usufruct, both the dominus and the usufructuary had such an interest, and both could bring the action. (13, note.) The creditor, from whom a thing given in pledge is stolen, even if the debtor is the thief, may bring it, because to have the thing pledged in possession is a gain, although the debtor may be able to pay. (14.) The bona fide purchaser, too, has the action, although he is not the dominus. (15.) The conductor operis, the tailor or fuller who has clothes to mend or clean, can bring the action, if he is solvent, and the owner cannot; for as he has his remedy against the tailor, the owner has not an interest: but if the tailor is insolvent the owner can bring the action. (15.) The same rule applied before Justinian to the borrower under a commodatum, but under Justinian the lender had his choice. If he chose to bring the action against the thief, the borrower was freed from responsibility. If, knowing of the theft, he chose to sue the borrower, then the borrower had the action against the thief so far as he paid, but the lender had not, whether the borrower was solvent or not. If the lender, ignorant of the theft, brought an action against the borrower, he might, on knowing the facts, desist from that action, and sue the thief, and then the borrower was free, whatever the result of the action against the thief might be. (16.) A depositary, not being answerable for culpa levis, had no interest sufficient to support the action, and the owner only could bring it. (17.) A mere interest in a thing not delivered being safe, such as that of a person to whom a thing was due under a stipulation, or that of a creditor in anything belonging to his debtor, was not sufficient to support the action. (13, note.) A separate action against each offender could be brought for the full penalty. (17, note.)

BONA VI RAPTA.—The prætor instituted an action to meet the case of goods being taken by violence, the plaintiff being allowed to recover, if he brought his action within a year, the thing or its value, and also three times its value as a penalty; or, if he brought his action after a year, the thing, or its value, only. It was necessary that the act should be committed dolo malo, and not through an honest mistake, but the value of the thing was immaterial, and one person acting alone could commit the act; nor did it make any difference whether the robber was or was not taken while committing the robbery, but the action, being partly penal, could not be brought against the heirs of the wrongdoer. (Tit. 2. pr., 1.) It was not necessary that the thing taken should have been among the goods of the plaintiff. If it was taken from among his goods, that was enough; and so even the depositary might bring this action, as could all those who could bring an actio furti. (3.) The actio vi bonorum raptorum only applied in case moveables were taken, but a constitution of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius provided that if moveables were taken, or immoveables seized on by force, the wrongdoer, if he was the owner, lost the property in the thing; if he was not the owner, he had to give up the thing and to pay its value by way of penalty. (1, note.)

R LEX AQUILIA.—The lex Aquilia consisted of three heads, the second of which had reference to acceptilatio, and it is only the first and third which bear on the subject of delicts. (Tit. 4. pr.)

1. The first head gave an action damni injuriæ to the owner of a slave or any quadruped reckoned among cattle, i.e. horses, asses, swine, &c., but not dogs or wild animals (1), killed without right, but without reference to the intent of the wrongdoer. Was the person killing the slave in fault? was the question asked. A soldier throwing a javelin in a place appropriated to military exercises, and accidentally killing a slave, would not be liable, but if he was in any other place he would be. (4.) A person cutting down a tree near a public path would be liable if he did not give warning, but not if he gave warning, supposing the tree fell on and killed a slave. If the tree was in the middle of a field, he would not be in fault, and therefore not liable, even though he gave no warning. (5.) Neglect or unskilful treatment on the part of a physician, leading to the death of a slave, would make the physician liable (6, 7), and a muleteer, killing a slave by his mules running away, would be liable if a stronger man could have held them in. (8.)

The penalty was the greatest value of the slave or animal killed at any time within a year, not the actual value at the time of death, and, as the action was thus penal, it did not lie against the heirs of the wrongdoer. Interpretation of the law decided that in the greatest value was to be included all consequential loss, as if the slave, had he lived, could have entered on an inheritance for the owner; or if a set or pair of slaves or that of a creditor in anything belonging to his debtor, was not sufficient to support the action. (13, note.) A separate action against each offender could be brought for the full penalty. (17, note.)

BONA VI RAPTA.—The prætor instituted an action to meet the case of goods being taken by violence, the plaintiff being allowed to recover, if he brought his action within a year, the thing or its value, and also three times its value as a penalty; or, if he brought his action after a year, the thing, or its value, only. It was necessary that the act should be committed dolo malo, and not through an honest mistake, but the value of the thing was immaterial, and one person acting alone could commit the act; nor did it make any difference whether the robber was or was not taken while committing the robbery, but the action, being partly penal, could not be brought against the heirs of the wrongdoer. (Tit. 2. pr., 1.) It was not necessary that the thing taken should have been among the goods of the plaintiff. If it was taken from among his goods, that was enough; and so even the depositary might bring this action, as could all those who could bring an actio furti. (3.) The actio vi bonorum raptorum only applied in case moveables were taken, but a constitution of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius provided that if moveables were taken, or immoveables seized on by force, the wrongdoer, if he was the owner, lost the property in the thing; if he was not the owner, he had to give up the thing and to pay its value by way of penalty. (1, note.)

R LEX AQUILIA.—The lex Aquilia consisted of three heads, the second of which had reference to acceptilatio, and it is only the first and third which bear on the subject of delicts. (Tit. 4. pr.)

1. The first head gave an action damni injuriæ to the owner of a slave or any quadruped reckoned among cattle, i.e. horses, asses, swine, &c., but not dogs or wild animals (1), killed without right, but without reference to the intent of the wrongdoer. Was the person killing the slave in fault? was the question asked. A soldier throwing a javelin in a place appropriated to military exercises, and accidentally killing a slave, would not be liable, but if he was in any other place he would be. (4.) A person cutting down a tree near a public path would be liable if he did not give warning, but not if he gave warning, supposing the tree fell on and killed a slave. If the tree was in the middle of a field, he would not be in fault, and therefore not liable, even though he gave no warning. (5.) Neglect or unskilful treatment on the part of a physician, leading to the death of a slave, would make the physician liable (6, 7), and a muleteer, killing a slave by his mules running away, would be liable if a stronger man could have held them in. (8.)

The penalty was the greatest value of the slave or animal killed at any time within a year, not the actual value at the time of death, and, as the action was thus penal, it did not lie against the heirs of the wrongdoer. Interpretation of the law decided that in the greatest value was to be included all consequential loss, as if the slave, had he lived, could have entered on an inheritance for the owner; or if a set or pair of slaves or animals was spoiled by one perishing (10), and if the defendant denied his liability, the penalty was doubled. The owner, besides the action under the lex Aquilia, might also bring a criminal charge against the person who killed a slave. (11.)

2. The third head provided for every kind of damage (damnum) done wrongfully to a slave, or any four-footed beast, including dogs and wild animals, or to goods, as by mixing anything that spoils wine or oil. (13.) But the penalty under this head was the greatest value of the thing, not within a year, but within thirty days.

For a direct action to lie under either head of the lex Aquilia the injury must be done bodily by the wrongdoer to the body of the slave or thing injured. If it was not done bodily by the wrongdoer, if he only did something by which the body of the slave or thing was injured, as if he shut up a slave or animal, and let death come from starvation, then the prætor gave an actio utilis under the lex Aquilia. If the injury was done to the owner, not by the body of the wrongdoer, nor to the body of the slave or animal, as, e.g., if a person loosed the fetters of a slave to allow him to escape, the lex Aquilia did not apply at all, and the owner must have recourse to an actio in factum, by which he would obtain compensation according to the value of the thing to him, if there had been dolus or culpa lata, or the ordinary value if not. (16, note.)

The utilis actio, under the lex Aquilia, was also given to persons having an interest less than ownership in the slave or animal, as to a possessor or a usufructuary. (16, note.)

The whole penalty could be recovered from each offender, if there was more than one. If the person injured could also bring, and brought, an action, under a contract, for the injury, he could afterwards bring an action under the lex Aquilia to recover the excess which that law would give him as a penalty beyond what he could recover on his contract. (16, note.)

Besides damnum factum the prætor took cognisance of damnum infectum, threatened damage, and forced the owner of the property from which damage was apprehended to give security against possible loss. (16, note.)

INIURIA—This term, which may be applied to any wrongful act, or to any judgment given against law, has the special meaning of an outrage or affront, and it is in this sense that it is here used. (Tit. 4. pr.) It is the insult that is the gist of the offence. Examples of an injury in this sense are striking any one, publicly insulting him, falsely pretending that he is the insulter's debtor, libelling him, soliciting chastity, &c. (1.) The paterfamilias, as himself insulted, might bring an action if any of those in his power was insulted; and often several persons might have the right of action at the same time; as, if a married woman was insulted, while she and her husband were both in potestate, she, her own father, her husband, and her husband's father all had a right of action, and, as the penalty was in proportion to the gravity of the insult, and this partly depended on the rank of the person insulted, the son, if of or animals was spoiled by one perishing (10), and if the defendant denied his liability, the penalty was doubled. The owner, besides the action under the lex Aquilia, might also bring a criminal charge against the person who killed a slave. (11.)

2. The third head provided for every kind of damage (damnum) done wrongfully to a slave, or any four-footed beast, including dogs and wild animals, or to goods, as by mixing anything that spoils wine or oil. (13.) But the penalty under this head was the greatest value of the thing, not within a year, but within thirty days.

For a direct action to lie under either head of the lex Aquilia the injury must be done bodily by the wrongdoer to the body of the slave or thing injured. If it was not done bodily by the wrongdoer, if he only did something by which the body of the slave or thing was injured, as if he shut up a slave or animal, and let death come from starvation, then the prætor gave an actio utilis under the lex Aquilia. If the injury was done to the owner, not by the body of the wrongdoer, nor to the body of the slave or animal, as, e.g., if a person loosed the fetters of a slave to allow him to escape, the lex Aquilia did not apply at all, and the owner must have recourse to an actio in factum, by which he would obtain compensation according to the value of the thing to him, if there had been dolus or culpa lata, or the ordinary value if not. (16, note.)

The utilis actio, under the lex Aquilia, was also given to persons having an interest less than ownership in the slave or animal, as to a possessor or a usufructuary. (16, note.)

The whole penalty could be recovered from each offender, if there was more than one. If the person injured could also bring, and brought, an action, under a contract, for the injury, he could afterwards bring an action under the lex Aquilia to recover the excess which that law would give him as a penalty beyond what he could recover on his contract. (16, note.)

Besides damnum factum the prætor took cognisance of damnum infectum, threatened damage, and forced the owner of the property from which damage was apprehended to give security against possible loss. (16, note.)

INIURIA—This term, which may be applied to any wrongful act, or to any judgment given against law, has the special meaning of an outrage or affront, and it is in this sense that it is here used. (Tit. 4. pr.) It is the insult that is the gist of the offence. Examples of an injury in this sense are striking any one, publicly insulting him, falsely pretending that he is the insulter's debtor, libelling him, soliciting chastity, &c. (1.) The paterfamilias, as himself insulted, might bring an action if any of those in his power was insulted; and often several persons might have the right of action at the same time; as, if a married woman was insulted, while she and her husband were both in potestate, she, her own father, her husband, and her husband's father all had a right of action, and, as the penalty was in proportion to the gravity of the insult, and this partly depended on the rank of the person insulted, the son, if of higher rank than his father, might obtain more by bringing the action, or having it brought in his name. (3.) It was only if the insult was atrox, very grave, as e.g. a severe flogging, that an injury to a slave was considered an injury to the master. (3.) If the slave, in such a case, belonged to several masters, the insult was taken to be done in proportion, not to their interests in the slave, but to their rank (4), and, except the contrary appeared, the insult was taken to be to the owner, not to the usufructuary, of a slave. (5.) If it is a freeman in the employ of another, who is injured, he alone can bring the action, unless the injury to him was caused simply for the purpose of insulting the employer. (6.) The old penalty was a limb for a limb, but the prætor substituted the penalty of allowing the parties injured to fix the damages, subject to reduction by the judge. Regard was had to the rank of the person insulted, and to the class to which, in case it was to a slave that the injury was done, the slave belonged. (7.)

Atrox injuria.—Besides injuria simple, we have to consider atrox injuria, or aggravated insult; the aggravation arising from the nature of the insult, the place where it was done, the rank or office of the insulted, or the part of the body affected, e.g. the eye. (9.) The consequences of the injuria being atrox were two. 1. Persons, who could not otherwise, might bring the action, as (a) the owners of slaves; (b) freedmen against a patron; (c) an emancipated son against his father. 2. The damage was fixed by the prætor, and the judge could not reduce it. (9.)

A criminal charge might also be brought for injuries, and persons of very high rank might bring such a charge by a procurator. (10.) Not only the actual wrongdoer, but any contriver of the injury, was liable to the actio injuriarum. (11.) But if the person injured showed no indignation at the time, or, though showing indignation, took no steps to obtain reparation within a year, he could not afterwards bring the action. (12.) Unless the stage of the litis contestatio had been reached, the action did not pass to the heirs of the person injured. (12, note.)

OBLIGATIONS QUASI EX DELICTO.—The remaining head of obligations is that of obligations arising from acts which, though not technically coming under the recognised heads of delicts, gave rise under the prætors to similar actions, i.e. to penal actions in factum not passing against the heirs.

The instances given are, (a) when a judge has made a cause his own, i.e. has given a wrong sentence through favour or corruption or merely ignorance of law (e.g. has condemned a defendant in a sum different from that fixed in the formula), he is liable to an amount to be fixed by the judge. (Tit. 5. pr.) (b) When anything has been thrown or poured down from an apartment, the occupier of the apartment is liable to an action that any one might bring (actio popularis) for double the damage. If a freeman is killed thereby, there is a penalty of 50 aurei. If a freeman is only hurt thereby, compensation is given; his medical expenses and loss of employment being considered. A person keeping anything suspended where there was a public way, likely to fall or do damage higher rank than his father, might obtain more by bringing the action, or having it brought in his name. (3.) It was only if the insult was atrox, very grave, as e.g. a severe flogging, that an injury to a slave was considered an injury to the master. (3.) If the slave, in such a case, belonged to several masters, the insult was taken to be done in proportion, not to their interests in the slave, but to their rank (4), and, except the contrary appeared, the insult was taken to be to the owner, not to the usufructuary, of a slave. (5.) If it is a freeman in the employ of another, who is injured, he alone can bring the action, unless the injury to him was caused simply for the purpose of insulting the employer. (6.) The old penalty was a limb for a limb, but the praetor substituted the penalty of allowing the parties injured to fix the damages, subject to reduction by the judge. Regard was had to the rank of the person insulted, and to the class to which, in case it was to a slave that the injury was done, the slave belonged. (7.)

Atrox injuria.—Besides injuria simple, we have to consider atrox injuria, or aggravated insult; the aggravation arising from the nature of the insult, the place where it was done, the rank or office of the insulted, or the part of the body affected, e.g. the eye. (9.) The consequences of the injuria being atrox were two. 1. Persons, who could not otherwise, might bring the action, as (a) the owners of slaves; (b) freedmen against a patron; (c) an emancipated son against his father. 2. The damage was fixed by the praetor, and the judge could not reduce it. (9.)

A criminal charge might also be brought for injuries, and persons of very high rank might bring such a charge by a procurator. (10.) Not only the actual wrongdoer, but any contriver of the injury, was liable to the actio injuriarum. (11.) But if the person injured showed no indignation at the time, or, though showing indignation, took no steps to obtain reparation within a year, he could not afterwards bring the action. (12.) Unless the stage of the litis contestatio had been reached, the action did not pass to the heirs of the person injured. (12, note.)

OBLIGATIONS QUASI EX DELICTO.—The remaining head of obligations is that of obligations arising from acts which, though not technically coming under the recognised heads of delicts, gave rise under the praetors to similar actions, i.e. to penal actions in factum not passing against the heirs.

The instances given are, (a) when a judge has made a cause his own, i.e. has given a wrong sentence through favour or corruption or merely ignorance of law (e.g. has condemned a defendant in a sum different from that fixed in the formula), he is liable to an amount to be fixed by the judge. (Tit. 5. pr.) (b) When anything has been thrown or poured down from an apartment, the occupier of the apartment is liable to an action that any one might bring (actio popularis) for double the damage. If a freeman is killed thereby, there is a penalty of 50 aurei. If a freeman is only hurt thereby, compensation is given; his medical expenses and loss of employment being considered. A person keeping anything suspended where there was a public way, likely to fall or do damage was liable to a penalty of 10 aurei. It made no difference whether the occupier was occupying by one title or another. (1.) But if the occupier was a filiusfamilias, the father was not liable; nor was he if the judex who made a cause his own was a filiusfamilias. (2.) (c) The master of a ship, of an inn, or a stable, was liable to an action for double the value for any damage, fraud, or loss caused by fraud or theft on the part of his servants in his ship, inn, or stable.

ACTIONS.

We now come to the last division of the Institutes, which treats of Actions, and, subordinately, of Exceptions and Interdicts.

The mode in which the subject of actions (Tit. 6-12) is treated is this: The Sixth Title discusses the different kinds of actions. The Seventh and Eighth discuss actions to enforce obligations arising from contracts with, or delicts committed by, persons alieni juris, and the Ninth treats of injuries done by animals. Then in the Tenth the subject of bringing or defending actions through other persons, and in the Eleventh that of the securities to be given by the parties, are discussed; and lastly, in the Twelfth, the subject of the duration of the right to bring an action, and the question whether actions passed or did not pass to or against heirs, are treated of.

A summary is given, in the note to the introductory paragraph of Tit. 6, of the main divisions of actions under the formulary system.

The first division of actions noticed in the Sixth Title is that of actions in rem and actions in personam. But it is mixed up with the second division according as actions came from the old civil law or were created by the prætor. The general word for a real action was vindicatio, but this word was used in a special sense, as a civil, i.e. non-prætorian, action for a corporeal thing. The general word for a personal action was condictio, but the word was used in a special sense, as a personal action, stricti juris, excluding bona fidei actions, actions ex delicto, and actions in factum (see note to introductory paragraph). (15.) Generally speaking, if a man claimed a thing as his own, he could not bring a personal action for the thing, but odio furum a plaintiff could, although he had a real action, bring a condictio if a thing was stolen. (14.)

The civil real actions noticed are five. 1. Vindicatio, in the special sense of a claim for a corporeal thing. 2. Confessoria; 3. Negatoria, actions to obtain or protect the enjoyment of servitudes. 4. Causa liberalis, an actio præjudicialis, to determine whether a person was or was not a freeman. 5. Petitio hereditatis. There are also five kinds of prætorian real actions noticed: actio Publiciana, quasi Publiciana, Pauliana, Serviana, and quasi Serviana, and two prætorian kinds of actiones præjudiciales are also noticed. The subject of personal actions is treated of in this part of the Title only by giving three examples of personal actions created by the prætor, de pecunia constituta, de peculio, de jurejurando. Further, there are certain actions which are said to be mixte, i.e. partly real and partly personal.

was liable to a penalty of 10 aurei. It made no difference whether the occupier was occupying by one title or another. (1.) But if the occupier was a filiusfamilias, the father was not liable; nor was he if the judex who made a cause his own was a filiusfamilias. (2.) (c) The master of a ship, of an inn, or a stable, was liable to an action for double the value for any damage, fraud, or loss caused by fraud or theft on the part of his servants in his ship, inn, or stable.

ACTIONS.

We now come to the last division of the Institutes, which treats of Actions, and, subordinately, of Exceptions and Interdicts.

The mode in which the subject of actions (Tit. 6-12) is treated is this: The Sixth Title discusses the different kinds of actions. The Seventh and Eighth discuss actions to enforce obligations arising from contracts with, or delicts committed by, persons alieni juris, and the Ninth treats of injuries done by animals. Then in the Tenth the subject of bringing or defending actions through other persons, and in the Eleventh that of the securities to be given by the parties, are discussed; and lastly, in the Twelfth, the subject of the duration of the right to bring an action, and the question whether actions passed or did not pass to or against heirs, are treated of.

A summary is given, in the note to the introductory paragraph of Tit. 6, of the main divisions of actions under the formulary system.

The first division of actions noticed in the Sixth Title is that of actions in rem and actions in personam. But it is mixed up with the second division according as actions came from the old civil law or were created by the prætor. The general word for a real action was vindicatio, but this word was used in a special sense, as a civil, i.e. non-prætorian, action for a corporeal thing. The general word for a personal action was condictio, but the word was used in a special sense, as a personal action, stricti juris, excluding bona fidei actions, actions ex delicto, and actions in factum (see note to introductory paragraph). (15.) Generally speaking, if a man claimed a thing as his own, he could not bring a personal action for the thing, but odio furum a plaintiff could, although he had a real action, bring a condictio if a thing was stolen. (14.)

The civil real actions noticed are five. 1. Vindicatio, in the special sense of a claim for a corporeal thing. 2. Confessoria; 3. Negatoria, actions to obtain or protect the enjoyment of servitudes. 4. Causa liberalis, an actio præjudicialis, to determine whether a person was or was not a freeman. 5. Petitio hereditatis. There are also five kinds of prætorian real actions noticed: actio Publiciana, quasi Publiciana, Pavliana, Serviana, and quasi Serviana, and two prætorian kinds of actiones præjudiciales are also noticed. The subject of personal actions is treated of in this part of the Title only by giving three examples of personal actions created by the prætor, de pecunia constituta, de peculio, de jurejurando. Further, there are certain actions which are said to be mixte, i.e. partly real and partly personal.

i. CIVIL REAL ACTIONS.—1. Vindicatio, under which head may be noticed the characteristic of real actions, that the intentio ran, Si paret rem ex jure Quiritium Titii esse, if it appears that Titius has a right against all the world, without the name of any alleged violator of that right being mentioned. (1.) 2. Actio confessoria, brought to enforce a servitude contested or impeded, and brought indifferently whether the claimant was or was not in quasi-possession of the servitude. (2.) 3. Actio negatoria, brought by the owner of a thing to regain an alleged right of exercising a servitude over that thing, although the owner was in possession, whereas, as a rule, real actions could not be brought by a possessor. The possessor of a servitude had a concurrent remedy in a prohibitory interdict, so far as concerned the actio confessoria, and in a possessory interdict so far as concerned the actio negatoria. (2.) 4. Actio præjudicialis, a preliminary action to ascertain a fact, was an actio in rem, but only one such action, that to determine whether a man was or was not free, was civilis. This action, known as causa liberalis, was originally carried on by a person who, as assertor libertatis, claimed a slave as against a master, and liberty might be thrice asserted in this way, if on the first two occasions a decision was given for the master. Justinian allowed the slave himself to claim his liberty, and made the first decision final. (13.) 5. Petitio hereditatis, or a claim for an inheritance. This (contrary to what was the case with other actions in rem) was a bonæ fidei action: Justinian decided that dolus malus could be taken into consideration in it without any exception being pleaded. It had some affinity to a personal action, as (a) it could only be brought against two classes of persons, those possessing an inheritance pro herede, and those possessing pro possessore (i.e. avowedly without title), and (b) the plaintiff could recover by it moneys derived by the possessor from the inheritance, and could enforce by it debts due to the inheritance from debtors claiming to be heirs. (28, note.)

ii. PRÆTORIAN REAL ACTIONS.—Five instances are given, the first three being fictitious actions, in jus conceptæ, the two last being in factum. 1. Actio Publiciana, given to protect a person who, while the time of usucapion is running, loses the thing out of his possession, and to recover it is allowed to feign that his title by usucapion is complete. (4.) 2. Actio in rem rescissoria, given to protect a person against whom the time of usucapion has run, while he was unable through absence or other legitimate cause to attend to his affairs, or if the possessor in whose favour the term was running was absent, and so the usucapion could not while running have been stopped by legal means. The prætor allowed the owner in such a case to rescind the usucapion and to claim the thing by feigning that the usucapion had not been perfected. (5.) 3. Actio Pauliana, given to rescind alienation of goods in fraud of creditors. (6.) 4. Actio Serviana, by which possession was obtained of the effects of a farmer, looked on as mortgaged in law, to recover the payment of rent. 5. Actio quasi Serviana, by which creditors generally, and not landlords only, obtained things

i. CIVIL REAL ACTIONS.—1. Vindicatio, under which head may be noticed the characteristic of real actions, that the intentio ran, Si paret rem ex jure Quiritium Titii esse, if it appears that Titius has a right against all the world, without the name of any alleged violator of that right being mentioned. (1.) 2. Actio confessoria, brought to enforce a servitude contested or impeded, and brought indifferently whether the claimant was or was not in quasi-possession of the servitude. (2.) 3. Actio negatoria, brought by the owner of a thing to regain an alleged right of exercising a servitude over that thing, although the owner was in possession, whereas, as a rule, real actions could not be brought by a possessor. The possessor of a servitude had a concurrent remedy in a prohibitory interdict, so far as concerned the actio confessoria, and in a possessory interdict so far as concerned the actio negatoria. (2.) 4. Actio præjudicialis, a preliminary action to ascertain a fact, was an actio in rem, but only one such action, that to determine whether a man was or was not free, was civilis. This action, known as causa liberalis, was originally carried on by a person who, as assertor libertatis, claimed a slave as against a master, and liberty might be thrice asserted in this way, if on the first two occasions a decision was given for the master. Justinian allowed the slave himself to claim his liberty, and made the first decision final. (13.) 5. Petitio hereditatis, or a claim for an inheritance. This (contrary to what was the case with other actions in rem) was a bonæ fidei action: Justinian decided that dolus malus could be taken into consideration in it without any exception being pleaded. It had some affinity to a personal action, as (a) it could only be brought against two classes of persons, those possessing an inheritance pro herede, and those possessing pro possessore (i.e. avowedly without title), and (b) the plaintiff could recover by it moneys derived by the possessor from the inheritance, and could enforce by it debts due to the inheritance from debtors claiming to be heirs. (28, note.)

ii. PRÆTORIAN REAL ACTIONS.—Five instances are given, the first three being fictitious actions, in jus conceptæ, the two last being in factum. 1. Actio Publiciana, given to protect a person who, while the time of usucapion is running, loses the thing out of his possession, and to recover it is allowed to feign that his title by usucapion is complete. (4.) 2. Actio in rem rescissoria, given to protect a person against whom the time of usucapion has run, while he was unable through absence or other legitimate cause to attend to his affairs, or if the possessor in whose favour the term was running was absent, and so the usucapion could not while running have been stopped by legal means. The prætor allowed the owner in such a case to rescind the usucapion and to claim the thing by feigning that the usucapion had not been perfected. (5.) 3. Actio Pauliana, given to rescind alienation of goods in fraud of creditors. (6.) 4. Actio Serviana, by which possession was obtained of the effects of a farmer, looked on as mortgaged in law, to recover the payment of rent. 5. Actio quasi Serviana, by which creditors generally, and not landlords only, obtained things mortgaged or pledged to them. (7.) Two instances are also given of pre-judicial actions created by the prætor: that to decide whether a person is ingenuus or libertus, and that to decide whether a person is the son of his reputed father. (13.)

PERSONAL ACTIONS.—Three instances are given of personal actions created by the prætor: 1. De constituta pecunia, given to enforce a pact for the payment of a sum already due. Such a pact was advantageous to the creditor if the thing due was owed by another person, or if the antecedent obligation was a natural one, or if the time during which an action on this antecedent obligation might be brought was on the point of expiring; and this action was by Justinian made in all cases perpetual and allowed to be brought whatever was the nature of the thing promised, those qualities having previously belonged only to the actio receptitia, an action specially given to enforce an undertaking by an argentarius to pay what he owed. (8, 9.) 2. De peculio, given to make patresfamiliarum liable to the extent of the peculium of their sons in potestate and slaves, for the engagements of those sons and slaves. (10.) And, 3. De jurejurando, given to ascertain whether a party to a suit had, when challenged to do so, sworn that the facts on which he rested his claim or defence were true. (11.)

MIXED ACTIONS.—The actions familia erciscunda, communi dividundo, and finium regundorum are said to be mixed, i.e. both real and personal, because although they were otherwise personal actions in form, yet by the addition of an adjudicatio things were adjudged to belong to the different parties. (20.)

Before proceeding to notice the division of actions according to the latitude given to the judge, the Institutes notice two subsidiary divisions.

i. PENAL ACTIONS (many of which actions, as de albo corrupto, de parente aut patrono in jus vocato, and de in jus vocato vi exempto, were created by the prætor) (12) as distinguished from actions brought to get the thing only (rei persecutorie) and those in which both these objects were united (mixta).—As a rule, all actions in rem or ex contractu were only rei persecutorie, except that when an actio depositi was brought against a person, or against his heir if personally guilty of dolus malus, to whom things had been entrusted under the pressure of sudden calamity, such as fire or shipwreck, when the value of the things and also as much again was recoverable, and so the action was mixta. (17.) Actions arising from a delict always carried with them a penalty, and were simply penal in the case of theft, for then the value of the thing was recoverable by a separate action, or were mixte, as in actions vi bonorum raptorum, and under the lex Aquilia, and for legacies given but not duly paid to holy places, the value of the thing, and something more by way of penalty, being recoverable by such actions. (18, 19.)

ii. ACTIONS DIFFERING ACCORDING TO THE AMOUNT OF THE CONDEMNATION.—This goes very nearly over the same ground as the mortgaged or pledged to them. (7.) Two instances are also given of pre-judicial actions created by the prætor: that to decide whether a person is ingenuus or libertus, and that to decide whether a person is the son of his reputed father. (13.)

PERSONAL ACTIONS.—Three instances are given of personal actions created by the prætor: 1. De constituta pecunia, given to enforce a pact for the payment of a sum already due. Such a pact was advantageous to the creditor if the thing due was owed by another person, or if the antecedent obligation was a natural one, or if the time during which an action on this antecedent obligation might be brought was on the point of expiring; and this action was by Justinian made in all cases perpetual and allowed to be brought whatever was the nature of the thing promised, those qualities having previously belonged only to the actio receptitia, an action specially given to enforce an undertaking by an argentarius to pay what he owed. (8, 9.) 2. De peculio, given to make patresfamiliarum liable to the extent of the peculium of their sons in potestate and slaves, for the engagements of those sons and slaves. (10.) And, 3. De jurejurando, given to ascertain whether a party to a suit had, when challenged to do so, sworn that the facts on which he rested his claim or defence were true. (11.)

MIXED ACTIONS.—The actions familia erciscunda, communis dividundo, and finium regundorum are said to be mixed, i.e. both real and personal, because although they were otherwise personal actions in form, yet by the addition of an adjudicatio things were adjudged to belong to the different parties. (20.)

Before proceeding to notice the division of actions according to the latitude given to the judge, the Institutes notice two subsidiary divisions.

i. PENAL ACTIONS (many of which actions, as de albo corrupto, de parente aut patrono in jus vocato, and de in jus vocato vi exempto, were created by the prætor) (12) as distinguished from actions brought to get the thing only (rei persecutorie) and those in which both these objects were united (mixte).—As a rule, all actions in rem or ex contractu were only rei persecutorie, except that when an actio depositi was brought against a person, or against his heir if personally guilty of dolus malus, to whom things had been entrusted under the pressure of sudden calamity, such as fire or shipwreck, when the value of the things and also as much again was recoverable, and so the action was mixta. (17.) Actions arising from a delict always carried with them a penalty, and were simply penal in the case of theft, for then the value of the thing was recoverable by a separate action, or were mixte, as in actions vi bonorum raptorum, and under the lex Aquilia, and for legacies given but not duly paid to holy places, the value of the thing, and something more by way of penalty, being recoverable by such actions. (18, 19.)

ii. ACTIONS DIFFERING ACCORDING TO THE AMOUNT OF THE CONDEMNATION.—This goes very nearly over the same ground as the previous division. i. Actions rei persecutoriæ, to get the thing due, were in simplum. (22.) ii. Actions (a) for non-manifest theft, (b) for damnum injuriæ under the Aquilian law, (c) for deposit when the deposit was denied, if it had been made under pressure of calamity, (d) for corrupting a slave, and (e) for not paying a legacy given to a holy place, were in duplum. (23.) iii. An action given against a person who asked more than due, so that the officials of the court got a larger fee, was in triplum of the loss sustained by the payment of this fee, the amount improperly expended being, however, included in the condemnatio in triplum. (24.) iv. Actions (a) for manifest theft; (b) actions quod metus causa; (c) actions for money paid to hire a man to bring a vexatious suit, or to induce a man to desist from a vexatious suit which he threatens to bring; and (d) actions brought against officers of the court guilty of unjust exaction, were in quadruplum. (25.) Two observations, however, have to be made. Firstly, of those actions which are said above to be given in duplum, that under the lex Aquilia and that for deposit under pressure were in duplum only if the defendant denied his liability; and in the case of legacies given to holy places, if the defendant denies or will not pay until the magistrate makes an order that the action shall be brought. (26.) Secondly, the actio quod metus causa, given to a person who had been threatened or coerced into doing anything, was in quadruplum only if the defendant would not obey the preliminary order of the judge (arbitrium) and restore the thing. (27.)

We now come to the division of actions according to the latitude of the judge. According to this division, actions are bonæ fidei, stricti juris, or arbitrariæ.

1. ACTIONS BONÆ FIDEI.—In certain prætorian actions, principally those arising out of bilateral contracts, the words ex bona fide or some equivalent words were added to quicquid oportet in the intentio, which was always uncertain, and then the judge had to take all equitable considerations into view in determining the liability of the defendant. The judge in bonæ fidei actions took notice of dolus malus without an exceptio doli mali; noticed customs and usages; took into account counter claims arising out of the same set of circumstances (30); provided for future liabilities arising; and gave interest for the time the thing had been due. (28, note.) A list of actions bonæ fidei is given (28, 29): 1, Empti and venditi; 2, locati and conducti; 3, negotiorum gestorum; 4, mandati; 5, depositi; 6, pro socio; 7, tutela; 8, commodati; 9, pigneraticia; 10, familiæ erciscundæ; 11, communi dividundo; 12, de æstimato; 13, ex permutazione; 14, hereditatis petitio; 15, ex stipulatu in exactione dotis.

This last-mentioned action replaced a bonæ fidei action called rei uxoriæ, under which the husband had certain advantages when sued by his wife for the restitution of her dos. If the wife had stipulated for the restoration of the dos to her, she could bring an action on the stipulation which, being stricti juris, did not afford the husband those previous division. i. Actions rei persecutoriæ, to get the thing due, were in simplum. (22.) ii. Actions (a) for non-manifest theft, (b) for damnum injuriæ under the Aquilian law, (c) for deposit when the deposit was denied, if it had been made under pressure of calamity, (d) for corrupting a slave, and (e) for not paying a legacy given to a holy place, were in duplum. (23.) iii. An action given against a person who asked more than due, so that the officials of the court got a larger fee, was in triplum of the loss sustained by the payment of this fee, the amount improperly expended being, however, included in the condemnatio in triplum. (24.) iv. Actions (a) for manifest theft; (b) actions quod metus causa; (c) actions for money paid to hire a man to bring a vexatious suit, or to induce a man to desist from a vexatious suit which he threatens to bring; and (d) actions brought against officers of the court guilty of unjust exaction, were in quadruplum. (25.) Two observations, however, have to be made. Firstly, of those actions which are said above to be given in duplum, that under the lex Aquilia and that for deposit under pressure were in duplum only if the defendant denied his liability; and in the case of legacies given to holy places, if the defendant denies or will not pay until the magistrate makes an order that the action shall be brought. (26.) Secondly, the actio quod metus causa, given to a person who had been threatened or coerced into doing anything, was in quadruplum only if the defendant would not obey the preliminary order of the judge (arbitrium) and restore the thing. (27.)

We now come to the division of actions according to the latitude of the judge. According to this division, actions are bonæ fidei, stricti juris, or arbitrariæ.

1. ACTIONS BONÆ FIDEI.—In certain prætorian actions, principally those arising out of bilateral contracts, the words ex bona fide or some equivalent words were added to quicquid oportet in the intentio, which was always uncertain, and then the judge had to take all equitable considerations into view in determining the liability of the defendant. The judge in bonæ fidei actions took notice of dolus malus without an exceptio doli mali; noticed customs and usages; took into account counter claims arising out of the same set of circumstances (30); provided for future liabilities arising; and gave interest for the time the thing had been due. (28, note.) A list of actions bonæ fidei is given (28, 29): 1, Empti and venditi; 2, locati and conducti; 3, negotiorum gestorum; 4, mandati; 5, depositi; 6, pro socio; 7, tutela; 8, commodati; 9, pigneraticia; 10, familiæ erciscundæ; 11, communi dividundo; 12, de æstimato; 13, ex permutatione; 14, hereditatis petitio; 15, ex stipulatu in exactione dotis.

This last-mentioned action replaced a bonæ fidei action called rei uxoriæ, under which the husband had certain advantages when sued by his wife for the restitution of her dos. If the wife had stipulated for the restoration of the dos to her, she could bring an action on the stipulation which, being stricti juris, did not afford the husband those advantages, the principal of which were, (a) that he had three years to make restitution of things quæ numero, pondere mensurave constant; (b) he had the beneficium competentiæ; (c) he could deduct the useful as well as the necessary expenses he had been put to in the management of the dotal property (37); (d) the wife could not transmit the action to her heir; (e) she could not ask for her dos, and also for any benefit by her husband's testament. Justinian amalgamated the two actions, calling the new action ex stipulatu, although in fact no stipulation might have been made. But he made it bonæ fidei, and the husband under it had a year for the restoration of all moveables, and he had the beneficium competentiæ, and could deduct necessary though not useful expenses; but he could recover the impensæ utiles by a separate action. Justinian, on the other hand, gave the wife a tacit jus hypothecæ on all the husband's effects for her dos, but this was only available when she herself sued for her dos. (29, note.)

2. ACTIONES STRICTI JURIS, i.e. real actions and condictiones.—In these actions, dolus malus or counter claim could only be taken notice of, if pleaded by an exception, and interest, except by express agreement, only ran from the litis contestatio. (28, note.)

3. ACTIONES ARBITRARIÆ.—In these actions the judge made a preliminary order on the defendant to do something, as to restore or exhibit a thing, or to pay a sum. If this order was not obeyed, then the defendant was to pay a sum fixed in the condemnatio so as to meet all the circumstances of the case. If the defendant had the thing in his possession, and had fraudulently put it out of his power to restore the thing, the plaintiff fixed on oath the amount justly due to him, and the manus militaris was employed by the direction of the judge to compel him to give it up. All real actions were arbitrariæ, and the following personal actions: (a) quod metus causa; (b) de dolo malo; (c) ad exhibendum; (d) de eo quod certo loco promissum est. (31.)

The action de dolo malo, given when there was no other means of avoiding the consequences of dolus malus, was in simplex, carried infamy with the condemnatio, and had to be brought within a year. The actio de eo quod certo loco was an action brought by a creditor against a debtor who, having promised and failed to pay in a particular place, was not to be found, and so could not be sued there, and the judge allowed the creditor in this case to sue elsewhere without risk of plus-petitio. But the debtor had this advantage; he was given the option of paying or giving security for paying what was due in the right place under an arbitrium, and then, if he did not obey the arbitrium, he was condemned in an amount in which the benefit it would have been to him to pay in the place named was taken into consideration. (31, note.)

It was the business of the judge to make the condemnatio in the formulary system for a sum certain, and under the judicia extraordinaria for a thing certain or a sum certain. (32.) And this leads us to advantages, the principal of which were, (a) that he had three years to make restitution of things quæ numero, pondere mensurave constant; (b) he had the beneficium competentiæ; (c) he could deduct the useful as well as the necessary expenses he had been put to in the management of the dotal property (37); (d) the wife could not transmit the action to her heir; (e) she could not ask for her dos, and also for any benefit by her husband's testament. Justinian amalgamated the two actions, calling the new action ex stipulatu, although in fact no stipulation might have been made. But he made it bonæ fidei, and the husband under it had a year for the restoration of all moveables, and he had the beneficium competentiæ, and could deduct necessary though not useful expenses; but he could recover the impensæ utiles by a separate action. Justinian, on the other hand, gave the wife a tacit jus hypothecæ on all the husband's effects for her dos, but this was only available when she herself sued for her dos. (29, note.)

2. ACTIONES STRICTI JURIS, i.e. real actions and condictiones.—In these actions, dolus malus or counter claim could only be taken notice of, if pleaded by an exception, and interest, except by express agreement, only ran from the litis contestatio. (28, note.)

3. ACTIONES ARBITRARIÆ.—In these actions the judge made a preliminary order on the defendant to do something, as to restore or exhibit a thing, or to pay a sum. If this order was not obeyed, then the defendant was to pay a sum fixed in the condemnatio so as to meet all the circumstances of the case. If the defendant had the thing in his possession, and had fraudulently put it out of his power to restore the thing, the plaintiff fixed on oath the amount justly due to him, and the manus militaris was employed by the direction of the judge to compel him to give it up. All real actions were arbitrariæ, and the following personal actions: (a) quod metus causa; (b) de dolo malo; (c) ad exhibendum; (d) de eo quod certo loco promissum est. (31.)

The action de dolo malo, given when there was no other means of avoiding the consequences of dolus malus, was in simplex, carried infamy with the condemnatio, and had to be brought within a year. The actio de eo quod certo loco was an action brought by a creditor against a debtor who, having promised and failed to pay in a particular place, was not to be found, and so could not be sued there, and the judge allowed the creditor in this case to sue elsewhere without risk of plus-petitio. But the debtor had this advantage; he was given the option of paying or giving security for paying what was due in the right place under an arbitrium, and then, if he did not obey the arbitrium, he was condemned in an amount in which the benefit it would have been to him to pay in the place named was taken into consideration. (31, note.)

It was the business of the judge to make the condemnatio in the formulary system for a sum certain, and under the judicia extraordinaria for a thing certain or a sum certain. (32.) And this leads us to consider three special matters which affected the result of the action.

1. Plus-petitio. 2. Beneficium competentiæ. 3. Compensatio.

1. PLUS-PETITIO.—Under the formulary system, if the plaintiff asked in the intentio of an actio stricti juris for a thing certain, and asked for more than he was entitled to, he could not succeed in the action at all, and the claimant being barred in most personal actions by the novation operated by the litis contestatio, he had no further remedy, unless the prætor chose to give him a restitutio in integrum, which was granted as a matter of course to plaintiffs under 25 years, but to persons over that age only if the mistake had been such as a most careful man might have made: as if a legatee had asked for his whole legacy, and then codicils had been discovered by which he lost part or had to share with others. A plaintiff might ask too much in four ways: 1, re, in regard to the thing asked for, as if when ten aurei were due he asked for twenty, or if when part was due he asked for the whole; 2, tempore, in regard to time, as if he asked before the day of payment, or before the fulfilment of a condition; 3, loco, in regard to place, as if a creditor sues at Rome for what is due at Ephesus, thus depriving the debtor of any advantages he might have from goods being cheaper or interest lower at Ephesus. But if the debtor absented himself from the place named, the creditor had the actio arbitraria de eo quod certo loco mentioned above; 4, causâ, in regard to the circumstances of the contract, as if, when the debtor promised to give either one thing or another, the creditor sued depriving him of the choice. It made no difference, even if the thing he asked for was of less value than the other thing. (33.)

If too much was stated in the demonstratio, the plaintiff was not prejudiced, and if too much was fixed in the condemnatio, the defendant could get the formula rectified. (33, note.)

Under the later emperors, the effects of a plus-petitio, i.e. any excess in the libellus conventionis, were changed, the plaintiff being no longer shut out from his legal remedy, but being punished for his mistake. If the plus-petitio was tempore, the plaintiff was, under a constitution of Zeno, obliged to wait double the time he ought to have waited, and to reimburse the defendant all expenses for his loss through the action having been improperly brought. If the plus-petitio was in any other way, Justinian made the plaintiff pay three times the amount of loss sustained by the defendant through the action having been improperly brought. (33.)

If the plaintiff claimed in the intentio less than was due, he could under the formulary system bring another action for the surplus when another prætor came into office. Zeno allowed the judex to add the surplus in condemning the defendant. (34.) If the plaintiff asked for one thing when another was due, he could, under the formulary system, bring another actio for the right thing, and under Justinian he could have the mistake corrected. (35.)

In certain actions which may be made a sixth division of actions, consider three special matters which affected the result of the action.

1. Plus-petitio. 2. Beneficium competentiæ. 3. Compensatio.

1. PLUS-PETITIO.—Under the formulary system, if the plaintiff asked in the intentio of an actio stricti juris for a thing certain, and asked for more than he was entitled to, he could not succeed in the action at all, and the claimant being barred in most personal actions by the novation operated by the litis contestatio, he had no further remedy, unless the prætor chose to give him a restitutio in integrum, which was granted as a matter of course to plaintiffs under 25 years, but to persons over that age only if the mistake had been such as a most careful man might have made: as if a legatee had asked for his whole legacy, and then codicils had been discovered by which he lost part or had to share with others. A plaintiff might ask too much in four ways: 1, re, in regard to the thing asked for, as if when ten aurei were due he asked for twenty, or if when part was due he asked for the whole; 2, tempore, in regard to time, as if he asked before the day of payment, or before the fulfilment of a condition; 3, loco, in regard to place, as if a creditor sues at Rome for what is due at Ephesus, thus depriving the debtor of any advantages he might have from goods being cheaper or interest lower at Ephesus. But if the debtor absented himself from the place named, the creditor had the actio arbitraria de eo quod certo loco mentioned above; 4, causâ, in regard to the circumstances of the contract, as if, when the debtor promised to give either one thing or another, the creditor sued depriving him of the choice. It made no difference, even if the thing he asked for was of less value than the other thing. (33.)

If too much was stated in the demonstratio, the plaintiff was not prejudiced, and if too much was fixed in the condemnatio, the defendant could get the formula rectified. (33, note.)

Under the later emperors, the effects of a plus-petitio, i.e. any excess in the libellus conventionis, were changed, the plaintiff being no longer shut out from his legal remedy, but being punished for his mistake. If the plus-petitio was tempore, the plaintiff was, under a constitution of Zeno, obliged to wait double the time he ought to have waited, and to reimburse the defendant all expenses for his loss through the action having been improperly brought. If the plus-petitio was in any other way, Justinian made the plaintiff pay three times the amount of loss sustained by the defendant through the action having been improperly brought. (33.)

If the plaintiff claimed in the intentio less than was due, he could under the formulary system bring another action for the surplus when another prætor came into office. Zeno allowed the judex to add the surplus in condemning the defendant. (34.) If the plaintiff asked for one thing when another was due, he could, under the formulary system, bring another actio for the right thing, and under Justinian he could have the mistake corrected. (35.)

In certain actions which may be made a sixth division of actions, the defendant was condemned in less than was due to him. 1. In the actio de peculio a paterfamilias could only be condemned in the amount of the peculium of his son or slave. (36.) 2. In certain actions the defendant had the BENEFICIUM COMPETENTIE, i.e. he was only condemned in so far as he could pay without being reduced to destitution. The instances given are, (a) the husband in a suit brought by his wife to get back her dos (37); (b) an ascendant sued by a descendant; (c) a patron sued by a libertus; (d) one partner sued by another; (e) a donor sued for his gift (38); (f) a debtor who has made a cessio bonorum sued by his creditors after he has subsequently acquired property. (40.) We may add a brother sued by a brother, and all cases, except delicts, when one of two married persons is sued by the other. In all these cases, if the debtor could subsequently pay in full without being reduced to destitution, he had to do so; and in the estimation of what he could pay, his assets only, without deduction for debts, were looked to, except in the one case of the donor, who might deduct his debts.

COMPENSATIO.—In bonae fidei actions, the judge, without any exception being pleaded, set off any debt due from the defendant to the plaintiff from the same set of circumstances (ex eadem re). In actions stricti juris, the plaintiff could be repelled by an exceptio doli mali, if he asked for what was due without having taken into consideration what he owed. It is uncertain whether the exception stopped the action altogether, or whether the plaintiff only recovered any surplus due to him. An argentarius who sued a customer without giving credit for what was due of the same kind, as money or wine (in eadem re), was guilty of a plus-petitio under the formulary system, and failed altogether in his action. A bonorum emptor had also, in suing a debtor of the insolvent, to deduct what was due from the insolvent to that debtor; but as the deductio was inserted in the condemnatio, not, as compensation in the case of the argentarius, in the intentio, the risk of plus-petitio was not run. Deductio varied also from compensatio, as it included debts of things of different kinds and debts not yet due. Except, perhaps, in this case of the argentarius, the two debts did not extinguish each other, until Justinian made them so operate, ipso jure, and under Justinian it no longer made any difference whether the two debts were due from the same set of circumstances, or whether things of the same kind were payable, but the defendant's claim was to be a causa liquida, i.e. clearly ascertainable. (39, and note.) Justinian allowed no set-off to an action of deposit. (30.)

The subject next treated is that of the responsibility of domini and paterfamilias for the contracts or delicts of those in their power. What is said is, however, chiefly devoted to the contracts and delicts of slaves; what is to be said as to slaves being, with some slight exceptions, applicable to sons in potestate. (Tit. 7. pr.)

i. CONTRACTS OF PERSONS ALIENI JURIS.—If the slave was merely the instrument of the master, merely received, e.g., pieces of money made in payment, this was not a contract of a person alieni juris at the defendant was condemned in less than was due to him. 1. In the actio de peculio a paterfamilias could only be condemned in the amount of the peculium of his son or slave. (36.) 2. In certain actions the defendant had the BENEFICIUM COMPETENTIE, i.e. he was only condemned in so far as he could pay without being reduced to destitution. The instances given are, (a) the husband in a suit brought by his wife to get back her dos (37); (b) an ascendant sued by a descendant; (c) a patron sued by a libertus; (d) one partner sued by another; (e) a donor sued for his gift (38); (f) a debtor who has made a cessio bonorum sued by his creditors after he has subsequently acquired property. (40.) We may add a brother sued by a brother, and all cases, except delicts, when one of two married persons is sued by the other. In all these cases, if the debtor could subsequently pay in full without being reduced to destitution, he had to do so; and in the estimation of what he could pay, his assets only, without deduction for debts, were looked to, except in the one case of the donor, who might deduct his debts.

COMPENSATIO.—In bonæ fidei actions, the judge, without any exception being pleaded, set off any debt due from the defendant to the plaintiff from the same set of circumstances (ex eadem re). In actions stricti juris, the plaintiff could be repelled by an exceptio doli mali, if he asked for what was due without having taken into consideration what he owed. It is uncertain whether the exception stopped the action altogether, or whether the plaintiff only recovered any surplus due to him. An argentarius who sued a customer without giving credit for what was due of the same kind, as money or wine (in eadem re), was guilty of a plus-petitio under the formulary system, and failed altogether in his action. A bonorum emptor had also, in suing a debtor of the insolvent, to deduct what was due from the insolvent to that debtor; but as the deductio was inserted in the condemnatio, not, as compensation in the case of the argentarius, in the intentio, the risk of plus-petitio was not run. Deductio varied also from compensatio, as it included debts of things of different kinds and debts not yet due. Except, perhaps, in this case of the argentarius, the two debts did not extinguish each other, until Justinian made them so operate, ipso jure, and under Justinian it no longer made any difference whether the two debts were due from the same set of circumstances, or whether things of the same kind were payable, but the defendant's claim was to be a causa liquida, i.e. clearly ascertainable. (39, and note.) Justinian allowed no set-off to an action of deposit. (30.)

The subject next treated is that of the responsibility of domini and paterfamilias for the contracts or delicts of those in their power. What is said is, however, chiefly devoted to the contracts and delicts of slaves; what is to be said as to slaves being, with some slight exceptions, applicable to sons in potestate. (Tit. 7. pr.)

i. CONTRACTS OF PERSONS ALIENI JURIS.—If the slave was merely the instrument of the master, merely received, e.g., pieces of money made in payment, this was not a contract of a person alieni juris at

all. (1, note.) The cases in which the slave did contract may be grouped under four heads.

1. The slave contracts under the directions of the master.—Here the prætor gives an action quod jussu against the master for the whole of the debt. (1.)

2. The slave contracts as a magister navis or institor.—The master sets the slave up as the master of a vessel, or the keeper of a shop, or the conductor of any business. The master thus authorises the slave to do all things necessary for his master. Here the prætor gives an actio exercitoria or institoria against the master for the whole of the debt. (2.)

3. The slave trades with his peculium to the knowledge of the master. If debts are to be satisfied and the master is a creditor of the slave, the peculium and its proceeds are to be divided proportionately between him and the other creditors. The master makes the division, and if he does not make it fairly, any creditor prejudiced has an actio tributoria against him. (3.)

4. The slave contracts without the direction or authorisation of the master.—Here an action is given against the master, not for the whole debt, but 1, so far as he has profited by what the slave has expended, and, 2, to the extent of the slave's peculium. The action is de peculio et in rem verso, and the condemnation is double; the judge first taking into account the profitable outlay, and then the peculium: but from the peculium is first deducted what the slave owes the master or any one in his power: unless, indeed, he owes it to a vicarius, who is part of the peculium, for deduction would then be useless. (4.)

The actio exercitoria or institoria must always be better for the creditor than that de peculio et in rem verso; for in the former action the master is bound for the whole debt. But the actio tributoria may be sometimes more favourable than that de peculio, sometimes less so to the creditor, and he must judge which he will bring. In the actio tributoria the creditor gains by there being no deduction made from the peculium of that which is due to the master. On the other hand, the actio de peculio affects the whole peculium, while the actio tributoria only affects that part of it engaged in trade. (5.)

What is said of the slave may be nearly, but not quite, said of the son in power. There are three points of difference to be noticed.

1. A father was bound to the extent of the son's peculium by the son's becoming a fidejussor. 2. The filiusfamilias could be sued civilly, and if he was condemned to pay, an actio judicati could be brought against the father to the extent of the son's peculium. There was no corresponding liability in either of these cases as to the slave. (6, note.) 3. By the senatusconsultum Macedonianum, prohibiting money to be lent to children or grandchildren of either sex in potestate, an action was refused for money so lent against the child, either while in potestate or become sui juris, and against the paterfamilias. If there was any doubt as to the facts, the action was permitted, and the senatusconsultum allowed on the ground of an exception. (7.)

all. (1, note.) The cases in which the slave did contract may be grouped under four heads.

1. The slave contracts under the directions of the master.—Here the prætor gives an action quod jussu against the master for the whole of the debt. (1.)

2. The slave contracts as a magister navis or institor.—The master sets the slave up as the master of a vessel, or the keeper of a shop, or the conductor of any business. The master thus authorises the slave to do all things necessary for his master. Here the prætor gives an actio exercitoria or institoria against the master for the whole of the debt. (2.)

3. The slave trades with his peculium to the knowledge of the master. If debts are to be satisfied and the master is a creditor of the slave, the peculium and its proceeds are to be divided proportionately between him and the other creditors. The master makes the division, and if he does not make it fairly, any creditor prejudiced has an actio tributoria against him. (3.)

4. The slave contracts without the direction or authorisation of the master.—Here an action is given against the master, not for the whole debt, but 1, so far as he has profited by what the slave has expended, and, 2, to the extent of the slave's peculium. The action is de peculio et in rem verso, and the condemnation is double; the judge first taking into account the profitable outlay, and then the peculium: but from the peculium is first deducted what the slave owes the master or any one in his power: unless, indeed, he owes it to a vicarius, who is part of the peculium, for deduction would then be useless. (4.)

The actio exercitoria or institoria must always be better for the creditor than that de peculio et in rem verso; for in the former action the master is bound for the whole debt. But the actio tributoria may be sometimes more favourable than that de peculio, sometimes less so to the creditor, and he must judge which he will bring. In the actio tributoria the creditor gains by there being no deduction made from the peculium of that which is due to the master. On the other hand, the actio de peculio affects the whole peculium, while the actio tributoria only affects that part of it engaged in trade. (5.)

What is said of the slave may be nearly, but not quite, said of the son in power. There are three points of difference to be noticed.

1. A father was bound to the extent of the son's peculium by the son's becoming a fidejussor. 2. The filiusfamilias could be sued civilly, and if he was condemned to pay, an actio judicati could be brought against the father to the extent of the son's peculium. There was no corresponding liability in either of these cases as to the slave. (6, note.)

3. By the senatusconsultum Macedonianum, prohibiting money to be lent to children or grandchildren of either sex in potestate, an action was refused for money so lent against the child, either while in potestate or become sui juris, and against the paterfamilias. If there was any doubt as to the facts, the action was permitted, and the senatusconsultum allowed on the ground of an exception. (7.)

The actions above mentioned, quod jussu, exercitoria, and de peculio, &c., were not properly separate actions. They were rather modifications of the prætorian actions under which, according to the nature of the contract, the master was sued. In process of time the prætors permitted not only prætorian actions, but condictiones, to be brought against the master or father, where, had he contracted himself, a condictio would have been the appropriate remedy. (8.)

ii. DELICTS OF PERSONS ALIENI JURIS.—A master could be sued under the prætorian or civil law, according to the origin of the actio (Tit. 8. pr.), for the delicts (noxie) of the slave, but he had the choice of paying the penalty, or giving up the wrongdoer (noxæ) (1), to the persons injured (Tit. 8. pr., 2), before or after the litis contestatio (the action being arbitraria, i.e. to give the slave up or pay) (Tit. 8. pr.); and the slave, if given up, became the property of the person injured, unless he could procure money to pay the penalty, and then he became free, even if his new master would have preferred to keep him. (3.) The action always followed the person of the delinquent, and was brought against his master for the time being, or against the slave if he was manumitted; and so if a freeman became a slave after having committed a delict, the action was against his master. (5.) The master had no action against his slave for a delict, nor the slave any action against his master for injury, nor did any right of action arise subsequently, though the slave was transferred to another master or became free; and if a slave who had committed a delict became the property of the person injured, the right of action was extinguished. (6.) In old times children in potestate might be abandoned like slaves if they committed delicts. In later times this was considered barbarous. The son could be sued for the delict, and then an action judicati brought against the father to the extent of the son's peculium. (7.)

Pauperies.—By the Twelve Tables when an animal (quadrupes, extended by interpretation to all animals) of vicious habits did harm (pauperies), the owner might, instead of paying for the damage, deliver up the animal. (Tit. 9. pr.) If an animal of fierce nature, such as a bear, was kept where there was a public way, got loose, and did injury, then, if it was a freeman that was injured, the amount of the condemnation was left to the discretion of the judge; if a slave or anything else was injured, the condemnation was for double the damage done. (1.)

A delict might consist really of two offences, and then a separate action lay for each; or it might come under two heads of delict, and then, although an action lay under each head, the plaintiff could only recover in the second anything which under that action happened to be recoverable beyond what he had recovered in the first. (1, note.)

The discussion of the heads of actions is now interrupted to notice two points of procedure.

REPRESENTATION IN SUITS.—Under the old law one man could not sue in the name of another. To this rule there were exceptions.

The actions above mentioned, quod jussu, exercitoria, and de peculio, &c., were not properly separate actions. They were rather modifications of the prætorian actions under which, according to the nature of the contract, the master was sued. In process of time the prætors permitted not only prætorian actions, but condictiones, to be brought against the master or father, where, had he contracted himself, a condictio would have been the appropriate remedy. (8.)

ii. DELICTS OF PERSONS ALIENI JURIS.—A master could be sued under the prætorian or civil law, according to the origin of the actio (Tit. 8. pr.), for the delicts (noxie) of the slave, but he had the choice of paying the penalty, or giving up the wrongdoer (noxæ) (1), to the persons injured (Tit. 8. pr., 2), before or after the litis contestatio (the action being arbitraria, i.e. to give the slave up or pay) (Tit. 8. pr.); and the slave, if given up, became the property of the person injured, unless he could procure money to pay the penalty, and then he became free, even if his new master would have preferred to keep him. (3.) The action always followed the person of the delinquent, and was brought against his master for the time being, or against the slave if he was manumitted; and so if a freeman became a slave after having committed a delict, the action was against his master. (5.) The master had no action against his slave for a delict, nor the slave any action against his master for injury, nor did any right of action arise subsequently, though the slave was transferred to another master or became free; and if a slave who had committed a delict became the property of the person injured, the right of action was extinguished. (6.) In old times children in potestate might be abandoned like slaves if they committed delicts. In later times this was considered barbarous. The son could be sued for the delict, and then an action judicati brought against the father to the extent of the son's peculium. (7.)

Pauperies.—By the Twelve Tables when an animal (quadrupes, extended by interpretation to all animals) of vicious habits did harm (pauperies), the owner might, instead of paying for the damage, deliver up the animal. (Tit. 9. pr.) If an animal of fierce nature, such as a bear, was kept where there was a public way, got loose, and did injury, then, if it was a freeman that was injured, the amount of the condemnation was left to the discretion of the judge; if a slave or anything else was injured, the condemnation was for double the damage done. (1.)

A delict might consist really of two offences, and then a separate action lay for each; or it might come under two heads of delict, and then, although an action lay under each head, the plaintiff could only recover in the second anything which under that action happened to be recoverable beyond what he had recovered in the first. (1, note.)

The discussion of the heads of actions is now interrupted to notice two points of procedure.

REPRESENTATION IN SUITS.—Under the old law one man could not sue in the name of another. To this rule there were exceptions.

in the cases of, 1, an actio popularis; 2, an assertio libertatis; 3, actions brought by tutors for their pupils. 4. The lex Hostilia permitted an actio furti to be brought in the names of (a) persons in captivity; (b) persons absent on the service of the State; (c) those in the tutela of such persons. (Tit. 10. pr.) Subsequently this rule was relaxed, and a person was allowed to appear in a suit; as (1) a cognitor; (2) a procurator. The cognitor had to be appointed formally and in the presence of the adversary. When sentence was given, the actio iudicati lay against, not the cognitor, but the party to the suit. The procurator, whose introduction was of a later date, was appointed by simple mandate and without communication with the adversary, and originally acted in his own name, giving security that the party in the suit for whom he was acting would ratify what he did, and, if he was acting for the defendant, that the sentence should be carried out. A person desirous of representing another might be admitted to act as negotiorum gestor, although he could not show his mandate, if he gave security. The actio iudicati was given for or against the procurator. At a later period, if the mandate was clearly proved, the procurator was considered to represent his principal; and this was extended to the case of a negotiorum gestor, who, acting at first without authority, afterwards showed that his principal ratified his action. The actio iudicati was then given for or against the principal, and the procurator was in the position of the cognitor (Tit. 10. pr., note), only that the mode of his appointment was not necessarily formal or made in the presence of the adversary. (1.) The tutor or curator represented the pupil or adolescent, to, or against, whom the actio iudicati was given, unless the tutor or curator had intervened unnecessarily, and then it was given to or against him. (2.)

GIVING SECURITY.—There were certain securities exacted from the parties to suits or their representatives. Considerable changes in this respect were made by Justinian. We have to consider, 1, whether the action was real or personal; 2, whether the party appeared personally or by a representative; 3, the law before and after Justinian. (Tit. 11. pr.)

i. Before Justinian. (A) The action is in rem.

(a) The plaintiff had to give no security. The procurator of the plaintiff, while still looked on as a simple mandatary, had to give security, rem ratam dominum (the party was termed dominus litis) habiturum, i.e. that the plaintiff would not bring another action in his own name. The cognitor and the procurator, when the procurator came to be looked on as a mere representative, had to give no security. The tutor or curator had to give security, rem ratam dominum habiturum; but this security was, as regards these persons, often dispensed with, when they were plaintiffs. (Tit. 11. pr.)

(b) The defendant had to give the cautio iudicatum solvi, that he would either restore the thing or pay its value (litis æstimatio). If he did not give this security, the plaintiff, if willing to give it, was put by

in the cases of, 1, an actio popularis; 2, an assertio libertatis; 3, actions brought by tutors for their pupils. 4. The lex Hostilia permitted an actio furti to be brought in the names of (a) persons in captivity; (b) persons absent on the service of the State; (c) those in the tutela of such persons. (Tit. 10. pr.) Subsequently this rule was relaxed, and a person was allowed to appear in a suit; as (1) a cognitor; (2) a procurator. The cognitor had to be appointed formally and in the presence of the adversary. When sentence was given, the actio iudicati lay against, not the cognitor, but the party to the suit. The procurator, whose introduction was of a later date, was appointed by simple mandate and without communication with the adversary, and originally acted in his own name, giving security that the party in the suit for whom he was acting would ratify what he did, and, if he was acting for the defendant, that the sentence should be carried out. A person desirous of representing another might be admitted to act as negotiorum gestor, although he could not show his mandate, if he gave security. The actio iudicati was given for or against the procurator. At a later period, if the mandate was clearly proved, the procurator was considered to represent his principal; and this was extended to the case of a negotiorum gestor, who, acting at first without authority, afterwards showed that his principal ratified his action. The actio iudicati was then given for or against the principal, and the procurator was in the position of the cognitor (Tit. 10. pr., note), only that the mode of his appointment was not necessarily formal or made in the presence of the adversary. (1.) The tutor or curator represented the pupil or adolescent, to, or against, whom the actio iudicati was given, unless the tutor or curator had intervened unnecessarily, and then it was given to or against him. (2.)

GIVING SECURITY.—There were certain securities exacted from the parties to suits or their representatives. Considerable changes in this respect were made by Justinian. We have to consider, 1, whether the action was real or personal; 2, whether the party appeared personally or by a representative; 3, the law before and after Justinian. (Tit. 11. pr.)

i. Before Justinian. (A) The action is in rem.

(a) The plaintiff had to give no security. The procurator of the plaintiff, while still looked on as a simple mandatary, had to give security, rem ratam dominum (the party was termed dominus litis) habiturum, i.e. that the plaintiff would not bring another action in his own name. The cognitor and the procurator, when the procurator came to be looked on as a mere representative, had to give no security. The tutor or curator had to give security, rem ratam dominum habiturum; but this security was, as regards these persons, often dispensed with, when they were plaintiffs. (Tit. 11. pr.)

(b) The defendant had to give the cautio iudicatum solvi, that he would either restore the thing or pay its value (litis æstimatio). If he did not give this security, the plaintiff, if willing to give it, was put by an interdict in possession of the thing. The judicatum solvi contained three clauses : 1, de re judicata, that the thing should be given up or its value paid ; 2, de re defendenda, that the defendant would properly defend the action, and appear and receive the sentence of the judge ; 3, de dolo malo, that there should be no dolus malus, e.g. the thing should not be restored in a deteriorated condition. The defendant as well as his surety gave the cautio judicatum solvi in order that the plaintiff might have the easy remedy of suing on a stipulation. Naturally, as the defendant had to give this cautio, his representative had. (Tit. 11. pr.)

(B) The action is in personam.

(a) As to the plaintiff the rules are the same as when the action is in rem.

(b) The defendant, appearing personally, had not, unless in some exceptional cases, to give the cautio judicatum solvi. If he appeared by a cognitor, the defendant had to give the judicatum solvi on behalf of the cognitor. If he appeared by a procurator, the procurator, while still a mandatary, had himself to give the judicatum solvi. (1.)

ii. Under Justinian.—There was, under Justinian, no difference whether the action was real or personal. The plaintiff appearing personally had to give no security. The defendant appearing personally had not, in either a real or a personal action, to give the judicatum solvi; but, in both, he had to engage that he would appear and receive the sentence of the judge. If, however, he was a vir illustris, it was enough that he engaged to do this by oath, cautio juratoria, or even by a simple promise. (2.)

If the plaintiff appeared by a procurator, whose mandate was registered officially, or given by the plaintiff personally before the judge, the procurator had to give no security. If the plaintiff appeared by a procurator not so appointed, the procurator had to give security rem ratam dominum habiturum; and this rule applied to tutors and curators. (3.)

If the defendant appeared by a procurator, whom he appointed personally before the judge, the procurator had not to give security, but the defendant had to bind himself, on behalf of the procurator, to all the three clauses of the judicatum solvi. If he appeared by a procurator not appointed before the judge, both the procurator and the defendant, as fidejussor of the procurator, had to give the judicatum solvi, with all its three clauses made binding on each. The defendant further, whether the procurator was appointed before the judge or not, had, as a guarantee for the judicatum solvi, to subject all his property to a hypothec. This obligation passed to his heirs, and he had also to give security that he himself would appear personally to receive the sentence of the judge. (4.)

If the defendant did not appear, but some one volunteered to defend the action for him, this was allowed, if this voluntary defensor gave security judicatum solvi. (5.)

an interdict in possession of the thing. The judicatum solvi contained three clauses : 1, de re judicata, that the thing should be given up or its value paid ; 2, de re defendenda, that the defendant would properly defend the action, and appear and receive the sentence of the judge ; 3, de dolo malo, that there should be no dolus malus, e.g. the thing should not be restored in a deteriorated condition. The defendant as well as his surety gave the cautio judicatum solvi in order that the plaintiff might have the easy remedy of suing on a stipulation. Naturally, as the defendant had to give this cautio, his representative had. (Tit. 11. pr.)

(B) The action is in personam.

(a) As to the plaintiff the rules are the same as when the action is in rem.

(b) The defendant, appearing personally, had not, unless in some exceptional cases, to give the cautio judicatum solvi. If he appeared by a cognitor, the defendant had to give the judicatum solvi on behalf of the cognitor. If he appeared by a procurator, the procurator, while still a mandatary, had himself to give the judicatum solvi. (1.)

ii. Under Justinian.—There was, under Justinian, no difference whether the action was real or personal. The plaintiff appearing personally had to give no security. The defendant appearing personally had not, in either a real or a personal action, to give the judicatum solvi; but, in both, he had to engage that he would appear and receive the sentence of the judge. If, however, he was a vir illustris, it was enough that he engaged to do this by oath, cautio juratoria, or even by a simple promise. (2.)

If the plaintiff appeared by a procurator, whose mandate was registered officially, or given by the plaintiff personally before the judge, the procurator had to give no security. If the plaintiff appeared by a procurator not so appointed, the procurator had to give security rem ratam dominum habiturum; and this rule applied to tutors and curators. (3.)

If the defendant appeared by a procurator, whom he appointed personally before the judge, the procurator had not to give security, but the defendant had to bind himself, on behalf of the procurator, to all the three clauses of the judicatum solvi. If he appeared by a procurator not appointed before the judge, both the procurator and the defendant, as fidejussor of the procurator, had to give the judicatum solvi, with all its three clauses made binding on each. The defendant further, whether the procurator was appointed before the judge or not, had, as a guarantee for the judicatum solvi, to subject all his property to a hypothec. This obligation passed to his heirs, and he had also to give security that he himself would appear personally to receive the sentence of the judge. (4.)

If the defendant did not appear, but some one volunteered to defend the action for him, this was allowed, if this voluntary defensor gave security judicatum solvi. (5.)

The subject of actions is resumed, and concluded, by noticing two more distinctions.

1. ACTIONES PERPETUÆ, TEMPORALES.—Actions differed in the time during which they could be brought. Actions arising from the law, or a senatusconsultum, or constitutions, were perpetuæ, i.e. could be brought without limit of time, until Theodosius II. imposed a general limit of thirty years on all actions real or personal, a limit subsequently, in some few exceptional instances, as in that of actions on hypothec, extended to forty years. Prætorian actions were annual, i.e. must be brought before the close of an annus utilis from the time when they could first have been brought. To this, however, there were so many exceptions that we may say that prætorian actions also were perpetuæ, except when they were penal (the actio furti manifesti being, however, perpetual), or when they were for the value of the thing, but were in opposition to, not in extension of, the civil law, like the actio in rem rescissoria. (Tit. 12. pr.)

2. ACTIONS PASSING TO OR AGAINST THE HEIR.—It is only penal actions that are to be noticed, as all other actions passed to and against the heir. Penal actions do not pass against the heirs of the wrongdoer, except to make them account for any benefit they may have derived from the delict. But penal actions do pass to the heir of the person injured, except in such cases as that of injuriarum (personal insult). After the litis contestatio, however, all penal actions pass both to and against the heir. (1.)

Finally, it may be remarked that all actions are absolutoria, that is, if, after the proceedings have commenced, the formula has been given, or an equivalent stage reached, the defendant satisfies the plaintiff, the judge must absolve the defendant, and need not go on in any case to give sentence. (2.)

EXCEPTIONS.—If the plaintiff's action is well founded, but there is any reason why it is unjust that it should be effective against the defendant, he can avoid its effect by the introduction of an exception, allowed by some particular law, or by the prætor (Tit. 13. 7), into the formula while the formulary system lasted. In actions bonæ fidei it was not necessary that the exception should be pleaded, as the judex took cognisance of all matters that would form the groundwork of an exception. In other actions, actiones stricti juris, in factum, arbitraria, including actions in rem (Tit. 13. 4), and penal, the exception had to be pleaded, and the defendant had to prove it, just as the plaintiff had to prove his case. Under Justinian an exception meant any defence other than a denial of the subsistence of the alleged right of action. (Tit. 13. pr. note.)

The following instances of exceptions are given, and are all supposed to be pleaded to an action ex stipulatu. 1. Error, a mistake not as to the subject of the stipulation, but as to some fact which was not known to the defendant, and which, if known, would have prevented his promising; 2, metus causa, a general exception, fear caused by

The subject of actions is resumed, and concluded, by noticing two more distinctions.

1. ACTIONES PERPETUÆ, TEMPORALES.—Actions differed in the time during which they could be brought. Actions arising from the law, or a senatusconsultum, or constitutions, were perpetuæ, i.e. could be brought without limit of time, until Theodosius II. imposed a general limit of thirty years on all actions real or personal, a limit subsequently, in some few exceptional instances, as in that of actions on hypothec, extended to forty years. Prætorian actions were annual, i.e. must be brought before the close of an annus utilis from the time when they could first have been brought. To this, however, there were so many exceptions that we may say that prætorian actions also were perpetuæ, except when they were penal (the actio furti manifesti being, however, perpetual), or when they were for the value of the thing, but were in opposition to, not in extension of, the civil law, like the actio in rem rescissoria. (Tit. 12. pr.)

2. ACTIONS PASSING TO OR AGAINST THE HEIR.—It is only penal actions that are to be noticed, as all other actions passed to and against the heir. Penal actions do not pass against the heirs of the wrongdoer, except to make them account for any benefit they may have derived from the delict. But penal actions do pass to the heir of the person injured, except in such cases as that of injuriarum (personal insult). After the litis contestatio, however, all penal actions pass both to and against the heir. (1.)

Finally, it may be remarked that all actions are absolutoriæ, that is, if, after the proceedings have commenced, the formula has been given, or an equivalent stage reached, the defendant satisfies the plaintiff, the judge must absolve the defendant, and need not go on in any case to give sentence. (2.)

EXCEPTIONS.—If the plaintiff's action is well founded, but there is any reason why it is unjust that it should be effective against the defendant, he can avoid its effect by the introduction of an exception, allowed by some particular law, or by the prætor (Tit. 13. 7), into the formula while the formulary system lasted. In actions bonæ fidei it was not necessary that the exception should be pleaded, as the judex took cognisance of all matters that would form the groundwork of an exception. In other actions, actiones stricti juris, in factum, arbitrarie, including actions in rem (Tit. 13. 4), and penal, the exception had to be pleaded, and the defendant had to prove it, just as the plaintiff had to prove his case. Under Justinian an exception meant any defence other than a denial of the subsistence of the alleged right of action. (Tit. 13. pr. note.)

The following instances of exceptions are given, and are all supposed to be pleaded to an action ex stipulatu. 1. Error, a mistake not as to the subject of the stipulation, but as to some fact which was not known to the defendant, and which, if known, would have prevented his promising; 2, metus causa, a general exception, fear caused by any one; 3, doli mali, the bad faith of the plaintiff himself, either when the obligation was formed or subsequently; 4, in factum, that is, the prætor merely stated a circumstance which, if established, was to bar the action of such exceptions. (1.) The following examples of exceptions in factum are given:—(a) Pecuniæ non numeratæ, when a person agreeing to lend money, and stipulating for its repayment, does not really pay it. Here the plaintiff had to prove that he had really paid the money, but the exception could only be pleaded within five years before Justinian, and two years under Justinian (2); (b) pacti conventi, when the plaintiff has agreed not to demand payment, but the contract, as being verbis or re, could still be sued on (3); (c) jurisjurandi, when, the plaintiff having challenged the defendant, and the defendant having denied his liability, the plaintiff went on with the action. (4.) The exceptio doli mali covered all cases of exceptions in factum, and might be pleaded in lieu of them, except that, as its being found true carried infamy with it, the magistrate would not allow it to be employed when the plaintiff was a patron or ascendant (1, note); 5, rei judicatæ, that judgment had already been given in the matter, it being necessary that there should have been in the former action the same subject matter of litigation, the same quantity, the same right, the same ground of action, the same parties. If the former action was a judicium legitimum in personam with an intentio juris civilis, the right of action was extinguished, and no exception was necessary. If it was a judicium legitimum in rem, or in factum, or was a judicium imperio continens, the right of action not being extinguished by novation, the exceptio rei judicatæ was necessary to stop the second action. Under Justinian the exception was in every case necessary. Gaius also mentions the exceptio rei in judicium deductæ, i.e. that the case was already before the tribunal, the time within which sentence was obliged to be given not having elapsed. (5, note.)

Exceptiones perpetuæ, temporariæ, peremptoriæ, dilatoriæ.—Exceptions were either perpetuæ, i.e. could be used by the defendant without restriction of time, or temporariæ, i.e. were subject to such a restriction; and they were peremptoriæ, i.e. put an end to the litigation, or dilatoriæ, i.e. only stopped it for a time. (8.) Perpetual exceptions were always peremptory; as instances are given the exceptions doli mali, metus causa, and pacti conventi, if the agreement has been that no demand shall be at any time made. Temporary exceptions were always dilatory. As an instance is given that of pacti conventi, when the agreement has been that no demand shall be made during a given time, e.g. five years. If he sued before the five years had elapsed, the plaintiff might be repelled by an exceptio. Previously, if the plaintiff was thus repelled, he was guilty of plus-petitio in regard of time, and could take no further proceedings. Under a constitution of Zeno, the plaintiff suing prematurely had to wait twice as long as he ought to have waited, and he must reimburse the defendant for all losses sustained through the demand being premature. (10.) As any one; 3, doli mali, the bad faith of the plaintiff himself, either when the obligation was formed or subsequently; 4, in factum, that is, the prætor merely stated a circumstance which, if established, was to bar the action of such exceptions. (1.) The following examples of exceptions in factum are given:—(a) Pecuniæ non numeratæ, when a person agreeing to lend money, and stipulating for its repayment, does not really pay it. Here the plaintiff had to prove that he had really paid the money, but the exception could only be pleaded within five years before Justinian, and two years under Justinian (2); (b) pacti conventi, when the plaintiff has agreed not to demand payment, but the contract, as being verbis or re, could still be sued on (3); (c) jurisjurandi, when, the plaintiff having challenged the defendant, and the defendant having denied his liability, the plaintiff went on with the action. (4.) The exceptio doli mali covered all cases of exceptions in factum, and might be pleaded in lieu of them, except that, as its being found true carried infamy with it, the magistrate would not allow it to be employed when the plaintiff was a patron or ascendant (1, note); 5, rei judicatæ, that judgment had already been given in the matter, it being necessary that there should have been in the former action the same subject matter of litigation, the same quantity, the same right, the same ground of action, the same parties. If the former action was a judicium legitimum in personam with an intentio juris civilis, the right of action was extinguished, and no exception was necessary. If it was a judicium legitimum in rem, or in factum, or was a judicium imperio continens, the right of action not being extinguished by novation, the exceptio rei judicatæ was necessary to stop the second action. Under Justinian the exception was in every case necessary. Gaius also mentions the exceptio rei in judicium deductæ, i.e. that the case was already before the tribunal, the time within which sentence was obliged to be given not having elapsed. (5, note.)

Exceptiones perpetuæ, temporariæ, peremptoriæ, dilatoriæ.—Exceptions were either perpetuæ, i.e. could be used by the defendant without restriction of time, or temporariæ, i.e. were subject to such a restriction; and they were peremptoriæ, i.e. put an end to the litigation, or dilatoriæ, i.e. only stopped it for a time. (8.) Perpetual exceptions were always peremptory; as instances are given the exceptions doli mali, metus causa, and pacti conventi, if the agreement has been that no demand shall be at any time made. Temporary exceptions were always dilatory. As an instance is given that of pacti conventi, when the agreement has been that no demand shall be made during a given time, e.g. five years. If he sued before the five years had elapsed, the plaintiff might be repelled by an exceptio. Previously, if the plaintiff was thus repelled, he was guilty of plus-petitio in regard of time, and could take no further proceedings. Under a constitution of Zeno, the plaintiff suing prematurely had to wait twice as long as he ought to have waited, and he must reimburse the defendant for all losses sustained through the demand being premature. (10.) As another instance, Gaius gives the exceptio litis dividuæ given to repel a plaintiff suing under the same prætorship for another part of a thing (10, note), for one part of which he had already sued. Some dilatory exceptions have regard, not to the thing sued for, but to the person, as when objection was taken to a procurator, that he or she was a soldier or a woman, as neither could act as procurator, or that he was an improper person, as having been stamped with infamy; but Justinian did away with exceptions on this last ground. (11.)

Prescriptions.—Gaius notices prescriptions after noticing exceptions, i.e. limitations of the action entered on behalf of the plaintiff, as, for example, to confine the action to so much of the plaintiff's right as had produced an existing liability, or for the defendant, as the prescriptio longi temporis; but prescriptions for the defendant had already, in the time of Gaius, been classed among exceptions. (11, note.)

REPLICATIONS.—There might be an exception to an exception, i.e. there might be grounds on which the exception, although founded on fact, could not be allowed to operate, as if an agreement had been made not to sue, and then this agreement had been rescinded. In this case a replication that the agreement had been rescinded would be inserted, to do away with the effect of the exceptio pacti conventi (Tit. 14. pr.), and so there might be a duplicatio (1) to a replicatio, and there might be even, if necessary, a triplicatio. (2.)

Exceptions may be divided into rei cohærentes, affecting the rights to claim, as the exceptio doli mali, or the exceptio pacti conventi, when it was a general pact not to sue; and personæ cohærentes, protecting the debtor personally, as the exceptio pacti conventi, when it was a pact not to sue the particular debtor. As a general rule, the fidejussores of the defendant could use all the exceptions the defendant could use; but this was not universally true of exceptiones cohærentes personæ. For a debtor who had made a cessio bonorum was protected from the actions of his creditors by the exception nisi cesserit bonis, which was personæ cohærens; but his fidejussores could not use this exception, as the very object of their suretyship was to guard against the debtor not being able to pay. (4, note.)

INTERDICTS.—We now come to what became a preliminary step under the prætorian system to the commencement of one kind of actions, those that regarded possession and quasi-possession, i.e. the possession of servitudes. (Tit. 15. pr.) The prætor issued an interdict or decree regulating possession, and then, if the facts on which the applicant relied were contested by the other party, the prætor threw the decree into the shape of an action to be decided according to the real facts. Probably the prætor interfered by interdict to protect and determine possession before he gave actions to try the right to possession, and not improbably the interests arising out of the possession of the ager publicus may have first suggested the prætorian intervention by interdicts. Gradually the action was regarded as the point of real importance, although, as the granting of the action depended on the rules as to interdicts, the study

another instance, Gaius gives the exceptio litis dividuæ given to repel a plaintiff suing under the same prætorship for another part of a thing (10, note), for one part of which he had already sued. Some dilatory exceptions have regard, not to the thing sued for, but to the person, as when objection was taken to a procurator, that he or she was a soldier or a woman, as neither could act as procurator, or that he was an improper person, as having been stamped with infamy; but Justinian did away with exceptions on this last ground. (11.)

Prescriptions.—Gaius notices prescriptions after noticing exceptions, i.e. limitations of the action entered on behalf of the plaintiff, as, for example, to confine the action to so much of the plaintiff's right as had produced an existing liability, or for the defendant, as the prescriptio longi temporis; but prescriptions for the defendant had already, in the time of Gaius, been classed among exceptions. (11, note.)

REPLICATIONS.—There might be an exception to an exception, i.e. there might be grounds on which the exception, although founded on fact, could not be allowed to operate, as if an agreement had been made not to sue, and then this agreement had been rescinded. In this case a replication that the agreement had been rescinded would be inserted, to do away with the effect of the exceptio pacti conventi (Tit. 14. pr.), and so there might be a duplicatio (1) to a replicatio, and there might be even, if necessary, a triplicatio. (2.)

Exceptions may be divided into rei cohærentes, affecting the rights to claim, as the exceptio doli mali, or the exceptio pacti conventi, when it was a general pact not to sue; and personæ cohærentes, protecting the debtor personally, as the exceptio pacti conventi, when it was a pact not to sue the particular debtor. As a general rule, the fidejussores of the defendant could use all the exceptions the defendant could use; but this was not universally true of exceptiones cohærentes personæ. For a debtor who had made a cessio bonorum was protected from the actions of his creditors by the exception nisi cesserit bonis, which was personæ cohærens; but his fidejussores could not use this exception, as the very object of their suretyship was to guard against the debtor not being able to pay. (4, note.)

INTERDICTS.—We now come to what became a preliminary step under the prætorian system to the commencement of one kind of actions, those that regarded possession and quasi-possession, i.e. the possession of servitudes. (Tit. 15. pr.) The prætor issued an interdict or decree regulating possession, and then, if the facts on which the applicant relied were contested by the other party, the prætor threw the decree into the shape of an action to be decided according to the real facts. Probably the prætor interfered by interdict to protect and determine possession before he gave actions to try the right to possession, and not improbably the interests arising out of the possession of the ager publicus may have first suggested the prætorian intervention by interdicts. Gradually the action was regarded as the point of real importance, although, as the granting of the action depended on the rules as to interdicts, the study of these rules preserved its importance. By the time of Justinian interdicts had become wholly obsolete, and all questions as to possession were determined by actions without recourse being had to the preliminary step of interdicts.

The interdict was issued by the magisterial authority of the prætor, and interdicts always bore traces of their origin in two ways. 1. First issued as special edicts to meet special cases, they were afterwards issued under standing regulations incorporated in the prætorian edict, but they were always, perhaps, theoretically grounded on infractions of public order, and the time in which some possessory interdicts had to be applied for (one year) connects them with the law of delicts. 2. They were all, directly or indirectly, connected with possession, with keeping things as they ought to be. (Tit. 15. pr., note.)

They were of three main kinds:—(a) Prohibitory, (b) Restitutory, and (c) Exhibitory. By the first the prætor ordered something not to be done which infringed the use of something public, as a road, or of something which, for the sake of public order, he protected, as the right of possession of individuals. By the second the prætor ordered things to be put into the state they were in before something wrong had been done, as, e.g., buildings to be demolished, which impeded the use of a public river or its banks; or possession to be given or restored to the right person. By the third the prætor ordered the thing or person, if it was a person that formed the subject of contest, to be produced by the person who had got hold of it, so that the claimant might not be prejudiced by the thing being concealed. (1.)

Gaius understood interdicere as 'to prohibit,' and says that prohibitory interdicts alone ought strictly to be called interdicts, and interdicts of the other kinds ought to be called decreta. Justinian says, all may be called interdicts, as he considers interdicere to mean to pronounce between two parties, inter duos. (Tit. 15. pr. note.)

If the interdict was prohibitory, the parties in the time of Gaius bound themselves by a wager, in a sum to be paid by the losing party in the action. In the case of interdicts restitutory or exhibitory, this had become obsolete; instead, an actio arbitraria was given, and the iudex issued his preliminary order against the party concerned, and, in the event of its not being obeyed, gave a condemnatio quanti ea res erat. (8, note.)

Those interdicts, which distinctly referred to the possessory rights of private persons, were given to acquire, to retain, or to recover possession, those to retain possession being prohibitory, and those to acquire or to restore being restitutory. (2.)

1. Adipiscendæ possessionis causa.—The chief interdict under this head was that known as quorum bonorum, given to secure the possession of an inheritance as a universitas to those whom the prætor, contrary to the rules of civil law, treated as having a right to an inheritance. It was given against two classes of persons: (a) persons possessing pro herede, i.e. thinking themselves to be the real heirs; (b) persons pos-

of these rules preserved its importance. By the time of Justinian interdicts had become wholly obsolete, and all questions as to possession were determined by actions without recourse being had to the preliminary step of interdicts.

The interdict was issued by the magisterial authority of the prætor, and interdicts always bore traces of their origin in two ways. 1. First issued as special edicts to meet special cases, they were afterwards issued under standing regulations incorporated in the prætorian edict, but they were always, perhaps, theoretically grounded on infractions of public order, and the time in which some possessory interdicts had to be applied for (one year) connects them with the law of delicts. 2. They were all, directly or indirectly, connected with possession, with keeping things as they ought to be. (Tit. 15. pr., note.)

They were of three main kinds:—(a) Prohibitory, (b) Restitutory, and (c) Exhibitory. By the first the prætor ordered something not to be done which infringed the use of something public, as a road, or of something which, for the sake of public order, he protected, as the right of possession of individuals. By the second the prætor ordered things to be put into the state they were in before something wrong had been done, as, e.g., buildings to be demolished, which impeded the use of a public river or its banks; or possession to be given or restored to the right person. By the third the prætor ordered the thing or person, if it was a person that formed the subject of contest, to be produced by the person who had got hold of it, so that the claimant might not be prejudiced by the thing being concealed. (1.)

Gaius understood interdicere as 'to prohibit,' and says that prohibitory interdicts alone ought strictly to be called interdicts, and interdicts of the other kinds ought to be called decreta. Justinian says, all may be called interdicts, as he considers interdicere to mean to pronounce between two parties, inter duos. (Tit. 15. pr. note.)

If the interdict was prohibitory, the parties in the time of Gaius bound themselves by a wager, in a sum to be paid by the losing party in the action. In the case of interdicts restitutory or exhibitory, this had become obsolete; instead, an actio arbitraria was given, and the iudex issued his preliminary order against the party concerned, and, in the event of its not being obeyed, gave a condemnatio quanti ea res erat. (8, note.)

Those interdicts, which distinctly referred to the possessory rights of private persons, were given to acquire, to retain, or to recover possession, those to retain possession being prohibitory, and those to acquire or to restore being restitutory. (2.)

1. Adipiscendæ possessionis causa.—The chief interdict under this head was that known as quorum bonorum, given to secure the possession of an inheritance as a universitas to those whom the prætor, contrary to the rules of civil law, treated as having a right to an inheritance. It was given against two classes of persons: (a) persons possessing pro herede, i.e. thinking themselves to be the real heirs; (b) persons possessing pro possessore (prædones), i.e. persons merely possessing without any claim of title. It was given against both classes, even if the term of usucapion had run in their favour, and also against them if they had through their own dolus malus ceased to possess. (3.)

This interdict was never given except to a person getting possession for the first time, so that restituas, the word in the formula, must be used (as well as the term restitutory applied to interdicts) in a very wide sense. (3.)

Under this head was also given the interdictum Salvianum, by which an owner of a rural estate got possession of the goods of the occupier (and probably even if they had passed into third hands) in case of non-payment of rent. This interdict was a step historically to the actio Serviana. (3.)

2. Retinendæ possessionis causa.—The two main interdicts under this head were those uti possidetis and utrubi possidetis, the former applying to immoveables and the latter to moveables. The object of these interdicts was to determine which of two disputants as to ownership was entitled to the possession, and to have this point determined in his favour was of great advantage to a disputant, as he remained in possession if his adversary failed to show he was the real owner. The interdict uti possidetis had to be applied for within a year after the possession had been in any way threatened. Previously to Justinian the interdict utrubi possidetis was given to that disputant who himself, or by any one through whom he claimed, had been in possession during the greater part of the preceding year. Under Justinian possession was confirmed to the person in possession at the time of the litis contestatio, provided (which had always been a condition as to both interdicts) that he had not obtained his possession as against his adversary vi, clam, or precario, the last term meaning by permission, and at the will of the adversary. (4.)

Only persons having civilis possessio or naturalis possessio, with the animus of ownership, could obtain these interdicts. Persons simply in possessione, detaining the thing without the animus possidendi, could not obtain them, but the person on behalf of whom such persons were in possessione, possessed through them: thus the owner possessed through the tenant, or the depositor through the depositary, or the lender through the borrower. Without the animus there can be no interdictory possession, but if a person has the animus he need not always have the corporeal detention, as, for example, if a man uses in the season an alpine pasture and leaves it when the season is over with the intention of returning to it, he still possesses it. (5.)

3. Reciperandæ possessionis causa.—The main interdict under this head was that unde vi. Here, there having been an illegal use of violence, the wrongdoer had to restore possession, although the person to whom he restored it had himself got it from him vi, clam, or precario. In the days of the Republic there had been a distinction according to the kind of violence used. If the violence had been ordinary (quotidiana), sessing pro possessore (prædones), i.e. persons merely possessing without any claim of title. It was given against both classes, even if the term of usucapion had run in their favour, and also against them if they had through their own dolus malus ceased to possess. (3.)

This interdict was never given except to a person getting possession for the first time, so that restituas, the word in the formula, must be used (as well as the term restitutory applied to interdicts) in a very wide sense. (3.)

Under this head was also given the interdictum Salvianum, by which an owner of a rural estate got possession of the goods of the occupier (and probably even if they had passed into third hands) in case of non-payment of rent. This interdict was a step historically to the actio Serviana. (3.)

2. Retinendæ possessionis causa.—The two main interdicts under this head were those uti possidetis and utrubi possidetis, the former applying to immoveables and the latter to moveables. The object of these interdicts was to determine which of two disputants as to ownership was entitled to the possession, and to have this point determined in his favour was of great advantage to a disputant, as he remained in possession if his adversary failed to show he was the real owner. The interdict uti possidetis had to be applied for within a year after the possession had been in any way threatened. Previously to Justinian the interdict utrubi possidetis was given to that disputant who himself, or by any one through whom he claimed, had been in possession during the greater part of the preceding year. Under Justinian possession was confirmed to the person in possession at the time of the litis contestatio, provided (which had always been a condition as to both interdicts) that he had not obtained his possession as against his adversary vi, clam, or precario, the last term meaning by permission, and at the will of the adversary. (4.)

Only persons having civilis possessio or naturalis possessio, with the animus of ownership, could obtain these interdicts. Persons simply in possessione, detaining the thing without the animus possidendi, could not obtain them, but the person on behalf of whom such persons were in possessione, possessed through them: thus the owner possessed through the tenant, or the depositor through the depositary, or the lender through the borrower. Without the animus there can be no interdictory possession, but if a person has the animus he need not always have the corporeal detention, as, for example, if a man uses in the season an alpine pasture and leaves it when the season is over with the intention of returning to it, he still possesses it. (5.)

3. Reciperandæ possessionis causa.—The main interdict under this head was that unde vi. Here, there having been an illegal use of violence, the wrongdoer had to restore possession, although the person to whom he restored it had himself got it from him vi, clam, or precario. In the days of the Republic there had been a distinction according to the kind of violence used. If the violence had been ordinary (quotidiana),

The first step in an action was the vocatio in jus, the summons to the defendant to appear before the magistrate. Children, however, cannot summon ascendants, nor freedmen patrons or the children or ascendants of patrons, without having first received the permission of the prætor. If they act without this permission, they are liable to a fine of fifty solidi. (3.)

2. THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE.—The Institutes first lay down the general duty of the judge, which is to judge according to the law, the constitutions, and customary usage. (Tit. 17. pr.) If the judge gave a sentence wrong on the face of it, or fixed the condemnation below what the prætor had fixed it, the sentence was void and no appeal was necessary. If the judge was supposed to be wrong otherwise, notice of appeal had to be given within two days (or, if the defendant had appeared by a procurator, three days), enlarged by Justinian to ten days. The Emperor was the final judge of appeal, but Hadrian made the decisions of the Senate final, and Constantine those of the prætorian præfect.

Secondly, the Institutes point out what judgment ought to be given in certain actions :

(a) In a noxal action the judge ought to state the condemnation by ordering a sum to be paid, or the noxæ abandoned. (1.)

(b) In a real action, if he determines against the claimant, he ought to absolve the possessor; if against the possessor, he ought to order the thing and its fruits to be given up, and, after the time of Hadrian, all the fruits consumed had to be accounted for, whether the possession was bona fide or mala fide, if the thing possessed was an inheritance. Before Hadrian as to inheritance, and before and after his time as to single objects, the rule was that a bona fide possessor had to account for fruits after the bringing of the action, the mala fide possessor for all. If the possessor showed that he could not give up the possession at once, he obtained a delay on giving security to give up within a time allowed him. (2, and note.)

(c) In an action ad exhibendum the defendant must exhibit the thing, his title to it, and everything derived from it, as e.g. the fruits, since the bringing of the action; nor will usucapion accomplished subsequently avail him. If he states that he cannot exhibit at once, he can obtain a delay on giving security, but if he neither exhibits nor gives security, he is to be condemned in an amount representing the interest of the plaintiff in having the thing exhibited at once. (3.)

(d, e, f) In the actions familiæ erciscundæ, communis dividundo, and finium regundorum, the judge ought, if he gives to one more than to another, and one thus receives more than another, to make this favoured person pay a pecuniary equivalent. (4, 5, 6.) In the action finium regundorum, a person ought to be condemned who has destroyed boundary marks, or opposed, in defiance of the judge's order, the measurement of the land. (6.)

The first step in an action was the vocatio in jus, the summons to the defendant to appear before the magistrate. Children, however, cannot summon ascendants, nor freedmen patrons or the children or ascendants of patrons, without having first received the permission of the prætor. If they act without this permission, they are liable to a fine of fifty solidi. (3.)

2. THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE.—The Institutes first lay down the general duty of the judge, which is to judge according to the law, the constitutions, and customary usage. (Tit. 17. pr.) If the judge gave a sentence wrong on the face of it, or fixed the condemnation below what the prætor had fixed it, the sentence was void and no appeal was necessary. If the judge was supposed to be wrong otherwise, notice of appeal had to be given within two days (or, if the defendant had appeared by a procurator, three days), enlarged by Justinian to ten days. The Emperor was the final judge of appeal, but Hadrian made the decisions of the Senate final, and Constantine those of the prætorian præfect.

Secondly, the Institutes point out what judgment ought to be given in certain actions :

(a) In a noxal action the judge ought to state the condemnation by ordering a sum to be paid, or the noxæ abandoned. (1.)

(b) In a real action, if he determines against the claimant, he ought to absolve the possessor; if against the possessor, he ought to order the thing and its fruits to be given up, and, after the time of Hadrian, all the fruits consumed had to be accounted for, whether the possession was bona fide or mala fide, if the thing possessed was an inheritance. Before Hadrian as to inheritance, and before and after his time as to single objects, the rule was that a bona fide possessor had to account for fruits after the bringing of the action, the mala fide possessor for all. If the possessor showed that he could not give up the possession at once, he obtained a delay on giving security to give up within a time allowed him. (2, and note.)

(c) In an action ad exhibendum the defendant must exhibit the thing, his title to it, and everything derived from it, as e.g. the fruits, since the bringing of the action; nor will usucapion accomplished subsequently avail him. If he states that he cannot exhibit at once, he can obtain a delay on giving security, but if he neither exhibits nor gives security, he is to be condemned in an amount representing the interest of the plaintiff in having the thing exhibited at once. (3.)

(d, c, f) In the actions familiæ erciscundæ, communii dividundo, and finium regundorum, the judge ought, if he gives to one more than to another, and one thus receives more than another, to make this favoured person pay a pecuniary equivalent. (4, 5, 6.) In the action finium regundorum, a person ought to be condemned who has destroyed boundary marks, or opposed, in defiance of the judge's order, the measurement of the land. (6.)

In all these three actions anything adjudged becomes at once the property of the person to whom it is adjudged. (7.)

CRIMES.—The subject of public prosecutions being altogether outside the general subject of the Institutes, which treat of private law (Tit. 18. pr.), may be omitted here. A sketch of Roman criminal law is given in the last section of the Introduction.

INDEX.

ABS

ABSTINENDI beneficium, 217
 Acceptilatio, 393 *
 Accessio, lii, 98
 Accrescendi jus, 153, 198
 Actio, lxi, 325, 394, 426
 divisions of actions, lxxii, 426 * ad exhibendum, lxxiii, 156, 408, 451, * 502 æstimatoria, 365
 arbitraria, lxx, lxxiii, 429, 450
 bonæ fidei, lxxiii, 326, 429 *
 calumniæ, 499
 commodati, 330 *
 communi dividundo, 104, 124, 503
 confessoria, 431
 contraria, 499
 damni injuriæ, 412
 de æstimato, 448
 de constituta pecunia, 437
 de dolo malo, 451
 de inofficioso, 211, 213
 de peculio et in rem verso, 462
 de tigno juncto, 105
 depensi, 355
 depositi, 331
 directa, lxxiii, 428
 empti, 368
 exercitoria, 460
 ex testamento, 388
 familie eriscundæ, 124, 387, 502
 fictitia, 428
 finium regundorum, 503
 furti, 405, 445
 hypothecaria, 475 *
 in duplum, 441, 444
 in factum concepta, lxxii, 428
 in factum præscriptis verbis, lxxiii, 428 in jus concepta, lxxiii, 428
 in personam, 426
 in rem, 426
 in supplementum legitimæ, 212
 injuriarum, 419
 institoria, 460
 judicati, 463, 467, 470
 legis, lxi, lxxvii
 mandati, 378
 mixta, 441, 443

AGN

Actio negativa, 431
 negotiorum gestorum, 386
 noxalis, 465
 Pauliana, 435
 perpetua, 474
 persecutoria rei, 441
 pigneratitia, 332
 pœnalis, 442
 popularis, 425
 præjudicialis, 439
 Publiciana, 123, 433 *
 quasi institoria, 379
 quasi Serviana, 135, 369, 437, 451
 quod dolo malo, 451
 quod jussu, 460
 quod metus causa, 446
 receptitia, 437
 redhibitoria, 365
 rei uxoriæ, 448
 rescissoria (in rem), 435
 servi corrupti, 404
 Serviana, 369, 436, 451
 stricti juris, lxxiii, 327, 429
 temporalis, 474
 tributoria, 461
 tutelæ, 68, 73
 utilis, lxxiii, 428
 venditi, 368
 vi bonorum raptorum, 411
 Actus, 118
 Addictio, 15
 bonorum, 313
 Ademptio legatorum, 244
 Aditio hereditatis, 191, 221
 Adjudicatio, liii, lxi, 124
 Adjunctio, 103
 Adoption, xl, 40-47, 186 *
 plena, minus plena, 42
 Adpromissor, 354
 Adstipulator, 354
 Adversaria, 359
 Aerarium, lxi, 229
 Affinitas, 35
 Agency, 114, 162, 469 *
 Ager publicus, 488 *
 vectigalis, 92 *
 Agnati, xli, lv; succession of, 276-*

INDEX.

ABS

ABSTINENDI beneficium, 217
 Acceptilatio, 393 *
 Accessio, lii, 98
 Accrescendi jus, 153, 198
 Actio, lxi, 325, 394, 426
 divisions of actions, lxxii, 426 *
 ad exhibendum, lxxiii, 156, 408, 451, * 502
 æstimatoria, 365
 arbitraria, lxx, lxxiii, 429, 450
 bonæ fidei, lxxiii, 326, 429 *
 calumniæ, 499
 commodati, 330 *
 communi dividundo, 104, 124, 503
 confessoria, 431
 contraria, 499
 damni injuriæ, 412
 de æstimato, 448
 de constituta pecunia, 437
 de dolo malo, 451
 de inofficioso, 211, 213
 de peculio et in rem verso, 462
 de tigno juncto, 105
 depensi, 355
 depositi, 331
 directa, lxxiii, 428
 empti, 368
 exercitoria, 460
 ex testamento, 388
 familie eriscundæ, 124, 387, 502
 fictitia, 428
 finium regundorum, 503
 furti, 405, 445
 hypothecaria, 475 *
 in duplum, 441, 444
 in factum concepta, lxxii, 428
 in factum præscriptis verbis, lxxiii, 428
 in jus concepta, lxxiii, 428
 in personam, 426
 in rem, 426
 in supplementum legitimæ, 212
 injuriarum, 419
 institoria, 460
 judicati, 463, 467, 470
 legis, lxi, lxxvii
 mandati, 378
 mixta, 441, 443

AGN

Actio negativa, 431
 negotiorum gestorum, 386
 noxalis, 465
 Pauliana, 435
 perpetua, 474
 persecutoria rei, 441
 pigneratitia, 332
 pœnalis, 442
 popularis, 425
 præjudicialis, 439
 Publiciana, 123, 433 *
 quasi institoria, 379
 quasi Serviana, 135, 369, 437, 451
 quod dolo malo, 451
 quod jussu, 460
 quod metus causa, 446
 receptitia, 437
 redhibitoria, 365
 rei uxoriæ, 448
 rescissoria (in rem), 435
 servi corrupti, 404
 Serviana, 369, 436, 451
 stricti juris, lxxiii, 327, 429
 temporalis, 474
 tributoria, 461
 tutelæ, 68, 73
 utilis, lxxiii, 428
 venditi, 368
 vi bonorum raptorum, 411
 Actus, 118
 Addictio, 15
 bonorum, 313
 Ademptio legatorum, 244
 Aditio hereditatis, 191, 221
 Adjudicatio, liii, lxi, 124
 Adjunctio, 103
 Adoption, xl, 40-47, 186 *
 plena, minus plena, 42
 Adpromissor, 354
 Adstipulator, 354
 Adversaria, 359
 Aerarium, lxi, 229
 Affinitas, 35
 Agency, 114, 162, 469 *
 Ager publicus, 488 *
 vectigalis, 92 *
 Agnati, xli, lv; succession of, 276-*

AGR

Agri limitati, 99
 Album, xxi, 439
 Alluvio, 99
 Animus domini, 95, 137, 494
 Animus possidendi, 137, 494
 revertendi, 96
 Annus utilis, 475
 Appeal, xii, lxxv, 500
 Aquæ ductus, 118
 Aquilius Gallus, 394
 Aquiliana stipulatio, 393
 Arbitr, lxiii, 326
 Arbitraria formula, 450
 Argentarius, 438, 457
 Arra, 363
 Arrogatio, xl, liii, 43; acquisition by, 312
 As, 193
 Ascripti glebæ, 16
 Assertor libertatis, lxvi, 18, 440
 Aureus, 67

BENEFICIUM abstinendi, 217

 cedendarum actionum, 338, 357
 competentia, 377, 449, 456
 deliberandi, 219
 discussionis, 357
 divisionis, 357
 excussionis, 357
 inventarii, 220
 legis Cornelia, 181, 355
 ordinis, 357
 S. C. Velleiani, 356
 separationis, 215
 Bona fides, 143
 Bona vacantia, 142
 Bona vi rapta, 409
 Bonitarium dominium, l, 304
 Bonorum addictio, 313; cessio, 317
 distractio, 318
 emptio, 317
 possessio, 70, 167, 208, 303-311; sine
 re, 311
 sectio, 376
 Buildings, 105
 Burden of proof, 225, 361, 478, 480

CADUCA, 198, 228

 Calata, comitia, 164
 Calumnia, 259, 499
 Capitis deminutio, xliii, 48, 60, 207
 Capito, xxvii
 Captivi, 180
 Caput, 60
 Catoniana regula, 231, 242
 Causa, 453, 482; causa justa, 143
 Cautio, 349, 361
 judicatum solvi, 471
 Census, 18
 Centumviri, xxi, lxii, lxvii, 210
 Cessio bonorum, 317
 in jure, liii, lxvii, 90, 124

CUS

Chirographum, lviii, 360
 Civitas, xxxvii, 14
 Clausula codicillaris, 262
 Code, Theodosian, xxxi
 Justinian's, xxxi, xxxiii
 Codicils, lv, 261
 Cœlebs, 228
 Coemptio, xlii, 31
 Cognati, xlii, lv; succession of, 289
 degrees of, 292
 Cognitio extraordinaria, xxx
 Cognitor, 469
 Co-heir, 198
 Co-legatee, 226, 230
 Collatio bonorum, 270
 Colonus, 16, 111, 369, 436, 494
 Comitia calata, 164
 centuriata, xl, xii, lxxvii
 curiata, x, xii, lxxvii
 tributa, xiii, xvii, lxxvii
 Commercium, xxxviii, 168
 Commissoria lex, 367
 Commixtio, 104
 Commodatum, lvii, 329
 Compensatio, 398, 457
 Concubinage, xlii
 Condemnatio, lxix, 452, 501 Conductio, lxx, lxxii, 326
 furtiva, 408
 triticaria, 427
 Conditions, 195, 367
 Conductor, 369
 Confarreatio, xlii, 30
 Confusio, 104
 Connubium, xvii, xxxviii, 32
 Consanguinei, 278, 289
 Consensus, 322
 Consilium, 24
 Constitutum, 430
 Contract, lvi, 321
 bilateral, 322
 consensual, lviii, 362
 formal, lviii, 322
 formless, lviii, 322
 literal, lviii, 359
 real, lvii, 327
 unilateral, 322
 verbal, lviii, 332
 Contractus innominati, lix, 322
 fiduciæ, 136
 Contubernium, 36
 Conventio in manum, 31
 Conventus, lxvii
 Correi promittendi, 337
 stipulandi, 337
 Creditor, lvi, 320
 Cretio, 219, 221
 Crime, lxxvii, 504
 Culpa, 323
 Curator, xl, 73; suspected, 84
 Curatorium satisfactio, 76
 excusationes, 79
 Curia, x
 Customary law, 12

AGR

Agri limitati, 99
 Album, xxi, 439
 Alluvio, 99
 Animus domini, 95, 137, 494
 Animus possidendi, 137, 494
 revertendi, 96
 Annus utilis, 475
 Appeal, xii, lxxv, 500
 Aquæ ductus, 118
 Aquilius Gallus, 394
 Aquiliana stipulatio, 393
 Arbiter, lxxiii, 326
 Arbitraria formula, 450
 Argentarius, 438, 457
 Arra, 363
 Arrogatio, xl, liii, 43; acquisition by, 312
 As, 193
 Ascripti glebæ, 16
 Assertor libertatis, lxvi, 18, 440
 Aureus, 67

BENEFICIUM abstinendi, 217

cedendarum actionum, 338, 357
 competentia, 377, 449, 456
 deliberandi, 219
 discussionis, 357
 divisionis, 357
 excussionis, 357
 inventarii, 220
 legis Cornelia, 181, 355
 ordinis, 357
 S. C. Velleiani, 356
 separationis, 215
 Bona fides, 143
 Bona vacantia, 142
 Bona vi rapta, 409
 Bonitarium dominium, l, 304
 Bonorum addictio, 313; cessio, 317
 distractio, 318
 emptio, 317
 possessio, 70, 167, 208, 303-311; sine
 re, 311
 sectio, 376
 Buildings, 105
 Burden of proof, 225, 361, 478, 480

CADUCA, 198, 228

Calata, comitia, 164
 Calumnia, 259, 499
 Capitis deminutio, xliii, 48, 60, 207
 Capito, xxvii
 Captivi, 180
 Caput, 60
 Catoniana regula, 231, 242
 Causa, 453, 482; causa justa, 143
 Cautio, 349, 361
 judicatum solvi, 471
 Census, 18
 Centumviri, xxi, lxii, lxvii, 210
 Cessio bonorum, 317
 in jure, liii, lxvii, 90, 124

CUS

Chirographum, lviii, 360
 Civitas, xxxvii, 14
 Clausula codicillaris, 262
 Code, Theodosian, xxxi
 Justinian's, xxxi, xxxiii
 Codicils, lv, 261
 Cœlebs, 228
 Coemptio, xlii, 31
 Cognati, xlii, lv; succession of, 289
 degrees of, 292
 Cognitio extraordinaria, xxx
 Cognitor, 469
 Co-heir, 198
 Co-legatee, 226, 230
 Collatio bonorum, 270
 Colonus, 16, 111, 369, 436, 494
 Comitia calata, 164
 centuriata, xl, xli, lxxvii
 curiata, x, xii, lxxvii
 tributa, xiii, xvii, lxxvii
 Commercium, xxxviii, 168
 Commissoria lex, 367
 Commixtio, 104
 Commodatum, lvii, 329
 Compensatio, 398, 457
 Concubinage, xlii
 Condemnatio, lxix, 452, 501 Conductio, lxx, lxxii, 326
 furtiva, 408
 triticaria, 427
 Conditions, 195, 367
 Conductor, 369
 Confarreatio, xlii, 30
 Confusio, 104
 Connubium, xvii, xxxviii, 32
 Consanguinei, 278, 289
 Consensus, 322
 Consilium, 24
 Constitutum, 430
 Contract, lvi, 321
 bilateral, 322
 consensual, lviii, 362
 formal, lviii, 322
 formless, lviii, 322
 literal, lviii, 359
 real, lvii, 327
 unilateral, 322
 verbal, lviii, 332
 Contractus innominati, lix, 322
 fiducie, 136
 Contubernium, 36
 Conventio in manum, 31
 Conventus, lxvii
 Correi promittendi, 337
 stipulandi, 337
 Creditor, lvi, 320
 Cretio, 219, 221
 Crime, lxxvii, 504
 Culpa, 323
 Curator, xl, 73; suspected, 84
 Curatorum satisfactio, 76
 excusationes, 79
 Curia, x
 Customary law, 12

DAM

DAMNUM, 417
 infectum, 341, 417
 Damnum injuria datum, 412
 Dare, lvi, 320
 Debitor, lvi, 320
 Decemvirs, xiii, xvii
 Decretum, 10
 Dediticii, 19, 21
 Dēductio, 458
 Deliberandi jus, 219
 Delict, lvi, lix, 399
 Demonstratio, lxi, 428, 455
 Deportatio, 48
 Depositum, lviii, 330
 miserabile, 331, 441, 445
 Derelicts, 115
 Detentio, 137, 494
 Dies cedit, 227, 235
 continui, 83
 fasti et nefasti, 310
 utiles, 83, 310
 venit, 235
 Digest, xxxii
 Diligentia, 323
 Discussionis beneficium, 357
 Disinheriting, liv, 181-188
 Distractio bonorum, 318
 Divisionis beneficium, 357
 Divorce, 39
 Dolus, 323, 441, 478
 Dominica potestas, 27
 Dominium, xlix, 88
 bonitarium, l
 Quiritarium, xlix
 Donations, lii, 147
 inter vivos, 149
 mortis causa, liii, 147
 ante nuptias, 151
 propter nuptias, 151
 Dos, 151, 233
 Duplicatio, 486

EDICTUM, xxi
 perpetuum, xxi, xxvii, 11
 repentinum, 11
 Emancipatio, xl, 51
 Emancipated children, 51, 185, 203, 270
 Emphyteusis, li, 134, 371
 Emperor, xxv, 10
 Emptio et venditio, lviii, 113, 362
 Emptio bonorum, 317
 Epistola, 10
 Exchange, 365
 Exceptio, lxx, 477
 dilatoria, lxxvi, 484
 doli mali, 107, 478
 jurisjurandi, 480
 metus causa, 478
 non numeratæ pecuniæ, 360, 479
 pacti conventi, 484
 peremptoria, 483
 personæ cohærens, 487
 procuratoria, 485

IMA

Exceptio rei cohærens, 487
 rei in judicium deductæ, 482
 rei judicatæ, 481
 restitutæ hereditatis, 252
 Excusationes, 79-84
 Excussionis beneficium, 357
 Execution, lxvi, lxxiv
 Executor, lxxvi, 445
 Exercitor, 460
 Exhereditatio, liv, 181-188
 Existimatio, xliii, 210
 Expensilatio, 359
 Extranei, 220
 Extraordinaria judicia, lxxiv, lxxv, 445.
 452, 489

FACERE, lvi, 320
 Falcidia quarta, 212, 247
 Familia, xxxviii, 14, 27
 Familiæ emptor, 165, 171
 Feræ, 95
 Fictions, 428
 Fideicommissa, liv, 249-263, 265
 Fidejussor, 353
 Fidepromissor, 354
 Fiduciarius, 251
 Fiduciary tutor, 64
 Filiusfamilias, 158, 178, 425, 459, 465.
 467
 Fiscus, 142, 147, 227, 268, 315
 Formula, lxviii
 Formulary system, lxviii
 Freedmen, 17, 19, 298, 383, 388, 422, 439
 Fructus, 125, 131, 501
 Fundus, 230
 Furiosi, 74
 Furti vitium, 141
 Furtiva conditio, 409
 Furtum, 141, 399
 manifestum, 400
 nec manifestum, 400

GAIUS, xxviii
 Gentes, x, 290
 Gentilis, xlii, lv, 290

HABITATIO, 131
 Hereditatis petitio, 447
 Heres, liv, 214
 extraneus, 220
 intestati, 264
 necessarius, liv, 23, 214
 suus, lv, 181, 214, 266; ranking with, 275
 Honorarium, 384
 Hypotheca, li, 77, 135, 331, 436, 450, 473

IGNORANTIA, 388
 Illustris, 423
 Imaginaria solutio, 392

DAM

DAMNUM, 417
 infectum, 341, 417
 Damnum injuria datum, 412
 Dare, lvi, 320
 Debitor, lvi, 320
 Decemvirs, xiii, xvii
 Decretum, 10
 Dediticii, 19, 21
 Deductio, 458
 Deliberandi jus, 219
 Delict, lvi, lix, 399
 Demonstratio, lxi, 428, 455
 Deportatio, 48
 Depositum, lviii, 330
 miserabile, 331, 441, 445
 Derelicts, 115
 Detentio, 137, 494
 Dies cedit, 227, 235
 continui, 83
 fasti et nefasti, 310
 utiles, 83, 310
 venit, 235
 Digest, xxxii
 Diligentia, 323
 Discussionis beneficium, 357
 Disinheriting, liv, 181-188
 Distractio bonorum, 318
 Divisionis beneficium, 357
 Divorce, 39
 Dolus, 323, 441, 478
 Dominica potestas, 27
 Dominium, xlix, 88
 bonitarium, l
 Quiritarium, xlix
 Donations, lii, 147
 inter vivos, 149
 mortis causa, liii, 147
 ante nuptias, 151
 propter nuptias, 151
 Dos, 151, 233
 Duplicatio, 486

EDICTUM, xxi

perpetuum, xxi, xxvii, 11
 repentinum, 11
 Emancipatio, xl, 51
 Emancipated children, 51, 185, 203, 270
 Emphyteusis, li, 134, 371
 Emperor, xxv, 10
 Emptio et venditio, lviii, 113, 362
 Emptio bonorum, 317
 Epistola, 10
 Exchange, 365
 Exceptio, lxx, 477
 dilatoria, lxxvi, 484
 doli mali, 107, 478
 jurisjurandi, 480
 metus causa, 478
 non numeratæ pecuniæ, 360, 479
 pacti conventi, 484
 peremptoria, 483
 personæ cohærens, 487
 procuratoria, 485

IMA

Exceptio rei cohærens, 487
 rei in judicium deductæ, 482
 rei judicatæ, 481
 restitutæ hereditatis, 252
 Excusationes, 79-84
 Excussionis beneficium, 357
 Execution, lxvi, lxxiv
 Executor, lxxvi, 445
 Exercitor, 460
 Exhereditatio, liv, 181-188
 Existimatio, xliii, 210
 Expensilatio, 359
 Extranei, 220
 Extraordinaria judicia, lxxiv, lxxv, 445.
 452, 489

FACERE, lvi, 320

Falcidia quarta, 212, 247
 Familia, xxxviii, 14, 27
 Familiæ emptor, 165, 171
 Feræ, 95
 Fictions, 428
 Fideicommissa, liv, 249-263, 265
 Fidejussor, 353
 Fidepromissor, 354
 Fiduciarius, 251
 Fiduciary tutor, 64
 Filiusfamilias, 158, 178, 425, 459, 465.
 467
 Fiscus, 142, 147, 227, 268, 315
 Formula, lxviii
 Formulary system, lxviii
 Freedmen, 17, 19, 298, 383, 388, 422, 439
 Fructus, 125, 131, 501
 Fundus, 230
 Furiosi, 74
 Furti vitium, 141
 Furtiva conditio, 409
 Furtum, 141, 399
 manifestum, 400
 nec manifestum, 400

GAIUS, xxviii

Gentes, x, 290
 Gentilis, xlii, lv, 290

HABITATIO, 131

Hereditatis petitio, 447
 Heres, liv, 214
 extraneus, 220
 intestati, 264
 necessarius, liv, 23, 214
 suus, lv, 181, 214, 266; ranking with, 275
 Honorarium, 384
 Hypotheca, li, 77, 135, 331, 436, 450, 473

IGNORANTIA, 388

Illustris, 423
 Imaginaria solutio, 392

LEX

- Lex Julia de maritandis, 228
 de peculatu, 507
 de residuis, 508
 de vi publica, 495, 507
 majestatis, 504
 repetundarum, 508
 Julia et Titia, 65
 Julia et Plautia, 140
 Junia, xix
 Junia Norbana, 19
 Junia Velleia, 184
 Papia Poppæa, xxvi, 37, 68, 80, 198, 223, 236
 Petronia, 28
 Plætoria, 73
 Plautia, xix
 Plautia (Julia et Plautia), 140
 Pompeia, 506
 Publilia, 9
 de sponsu, 355
 Regia, 10
 Scribonia, 124
 Sempronia, xxi
 Silia, lxxv, 326, 427
 Valeria, xii
 Valeria Horatia, 9
 Voconia, 169, 246, 250, 278
 Libellus conventionis, lxxvii, 445
 Liberalis causa, 440
 Liberorum jus, 288
 Libertas, xxxvii, 14
 Libertinus, 17-21
 Libertus, succession to, 298
 assignment of, 302
 Libripens, lvii, 165
 Lis et vindiciæ, lxxv
 Lis sua, 423
 Litis contestatio, lxiii, lxxi, lxxvi, 397, 423, 482
 Litis dominus, 472
 Locatio et conductio, lviii, 368
 Longi temporis possessio, 124, 133, 162
 Longissimi temporis possessio, 146

MAGISTRATE, lxi

- Mala fide possessor, 107, 501
 Mancipatio, xlvii, lvii
 Mancipi res, xlvii
 Mancipium, 27
 • Mandator compared with fidejussor, 381
 Mandatum, lviii, 10, 377
 Manumission, 17-25
 Manus, xlii, xlvii, 31
 Manus injectio, lxxvi, 355
 Manuum consortio, lxiv
 Marriage, 29, 30
 Materfamilias, 26, 31
 Matrimonium, 16, 37
 Merces, 369
 Missio in possessionem, lxxiv
 Modestinus, xxix
 Mora, 325
 Multa, 402
 Mutuum, lvii, 327

PET

- NATURAL law, xxii, 7
 Necessarius heres, liv, 23, 214
 Negligence, 324
 Negotiorum gestio, 337
 Nexum, lvii, 321
 Nomen transcriptitium, 360
 Novatio, lx, 395
 Novels, xxxiv
 Noxa, 465
 Noxalis causa, 465
 Nudum pactum, 323
 Nuncupatio, 172
 Nuptiæ, 29; justæ, 30, 37

OATHS, lxxvii, 480, 493, 499

- Oblation to the Curia, 39
 Obligatio, lvi, lix
 ex contractu, lvi, 327
 ex delicto, lix, 399
 naturalis, 323
 quasi ex contractu, lix, 385
 quasi ex delicto, lx, 423
 Obligation, definition of, lvi, 319, 320
 dissolution of, lx
 sources of, 321
 Occupatio, lii, 94
 Onus probandi, 225, 361, 478, 480
 Operæ liberti, 312, 333, 388, 489
 Operarum locatio, 369
 Orbi, 228
 Oreinus, 260
 Ordinis beneficium, 357

PACTUM, lvi, 323, 367

- adjectum, 323, 367
 legitimum, 323
 nudum, 323
 prætorium, 323
 Papinian, xxviii
 Partnership, 372
 Paterfamilias, 26
 Patria potestas, xxxviii, 29
 dissolution of, 47
 Patricians, 49
 Patrimonium nostrum, things in or not in, xlviii, 90
 Patrona, 301
 Patronus, 63, 299
 Paulus, xxix
 Pauperies, 467
 Peculium, 158, 459 ✓
 adventitium, 159
 castrense, 157, 169, 176
 profectitium, 159
 quasi castrense, 158, 176
 Pensio, li, 134, 369
 Peregrini, 14, 149, 250, 344, 354, 360
 Permutatio, 365
 Persecutio, 394
 Persona, xxxvi, xlv, 13
 incerta, 115, 239, 240
 Petitio, 394

LEX

Lex Julia de maritandis, 228
 de peculatu, 507
 de residuis, 508
 de vi publica, 495, 507
 majestatis, 504
 repetundarum, 508
Julia et Titia, 65
Julia et Plautia, 140
Junia, xix
Junia Norbana, 19
Junia Velleia, 184
Papia Poppæa, xxvi, 37, 68, 80, 198, 223, 236
Petronia, 28
Plætoria, 73
Plautia, xix
Plautia (Julia et Plautia), 140
Pompeia, 506
Publilia, 9
 de sponsu, 355
Regia, 10
Scribonia, 124
Sempronia, xxi
Silia, lxxv, 326, 427
Valeria, xii
Valeria Horatia, 9
Voconia, 169, 246, 250, 278
Libellus conventionis, lxxvii, 445
Liberalis causa, 440
Liberorum jus, 288
Libertas, xxxvii, 14
Libertinus, 17-21
Libertus, succession to, 298
 assignation of, 302
Libripens, lvii, 165
Lis et vindiciæ, lxxv
Lis sua, 423
Litis contestatio, lxiii, lxxi, lxxvi, 397, 423, 482
Litis dominus, 472
Locatio et conductio, lviii, 368
Longi temporis possessio, 124, 133, 162
Longissimi temporis possessio, 146

MAGISTRATE, lxi

Mala fide possessor, 107, 501
Mancipatio, xlvii, lvii
Mancipi res, lvii
Mancipium, 27
 • Mandator compared with fidejussor, 381
Mandatum, lviii, 10, 377
Manumission, 17-25
Manus, xlii, xlvii, 31
Manus injectio, lxxi, 355
Manuum consortio, lxiv
Marriage, 29, 30
Materfamilias, 26, 31
Matrimonium, 16, 37
Merces, 369
Missio in possessionem, lxxiv
Modestinus, xxix
Mora, 325
Multa, 402
Mutuum, lvii, 327

PET

N*NATURAL law*, xxii, 7
Necessarius heres, liv, 23, 214
Negligence, 324
Negotiorum gestio, 337
Nexum, lvii, 321
Nomen transcriptitium, 360
Novatio, lx, 395
Novels, xxxiv
Noxa, 465
Noxalis causa, 465
Nudum pactum, 323
Nuncupatio, 172
Nuptiæ, 29; justæ, 30, 37

OATHS, lxxvii, 480, 493, 499

Oblation to the Curia, 39
Obligatio, lvi, lix
 ex contractu, lvi, 327
 ex delicto, lix, 399
naturalis, 323
 quasi ex contractu, lix, 385
 quasi ex delicto, lx, 423
Obligation, definition of, lvi, 319, 320
 dissolution of, lx
 sources of, 321
Occupatio, lii, 94
Onus probandi, 225, 361, 478, 480
Operæ liberti, 312, 333, 388, 489
Operarum locatio, 369
Orbi, 228
Oreinus, 260
Ordinis beneficium, 357

PACTUM, lvi, 323, 367

adjectum, 323, 367
legitimum, 323
nudum, 323
pretorium, 323
Papinian, xxviii
Partnership, 372
Paterfamilias, 26
Patria potestas, xxxviii, 29
 dissolution of, 47
Patricians, 49
Patrimonium nostrum, things in or not in, xlviii, 90
Patrona, 301
Patronus, 63, 299
Paulus, xxix
Pauperies, 467
Peculium, 153, 459 ✓
 adventitium, 159
 castrense, 157, 169, 176
 profectitium, 159
 quasi castrense, 158, 176
Pensio, li, 134, 369
Peregrini, 14, 149, 250, 344, 354, 360
Permutatio, 365
Persecutio, 394
Persona, xxxvi, xlv, 13
 incerta, 115, 239, 240
Petitio, 394

SEA

- Seashore, 91
 Sectio bonorum, 376
 Semel heres semper heres, 196
 Senate, x, xxiv, lxxv
 Senatusconsultum, xxiv, 9
 Claudianum, 15, 318
 Hadrianum, 239
 Largianum, 301
 Libonianum, 172
 Macedonianum, 463
 Neronianum, 223
 Orphitianum, 286
 Pegasianum, 250, 253
 Tertullianum, 253
 Trebellianum, 252, 253
 Velleianum, 356
 Separationis beneficium, 215
 Servitudes, 1, 118-136
 personal, li, 125
 prædial, li, 118
 rural, li, 118
 urban, li, 119
 Servius, xi
 Servus poenæ, 49
 Slavery, 14
 Slaves, acquisition through, 159, 391, 460
 institution of, 190
 stipulations of, 338
 abandonment of, for delicts, 465
 Societas, lviii, 372
 negotiationis alicujus, 373
 rei unius, 373
 universorum bonorum, 373
 universorum quæ ex quæstu veniunt, 373
 vectigalis, 373
 Solidus, 67
 Solutio, lx, 391
 imaginary, 392
 indebiti, 388
 Specificatio, 98
 Sponsalia, 36
 Sponsio, lxxviii, 440, 498
 Sponsor, 354
 Sportulæ, 445, 454
 Spurii, 38
 Status, xxxvii, 14
 statu liber, 18
 Stipulatio, lviii, 332
 Aquiliana, 393
 emptæ et venditæ hereditatis, 252
 inutiles, 342
 partis et pro parte, 254
 Subscriptio, 167
 Substitutio pupillaris, 200
 quasi-pupillaris, 201
 vulgaris, 197
 cession, testamentary, liv, 164
 tate, iv, 264
 xl, 54, 215 li, 135 ven, 84
 vi, 360

VIT

- TESTAMENTI factio, liv, 56, 168, 178, 218, 238
 Testamentum, liv, 164
 calatis comitiis, 164
 in procinctu, 164
 inofficiosum, 187, 209
 irritum, 176, 205, 207
 militare, 173-177
 non jure factum, 205
 nuncupatum, 172
 per æs et libram, 165
 ruptum, 205
 tripartitum, 167
 Theodosius, xxx
 Theophilus, xxxiii
 Theft, 140
 Thesaurus, 111
 Traditio, lii, 115
 Transcriptio, 360
 Trebatius, xxvii, 261
 Tribes, Roman, x
 Tribonian, xxxii
 Tribunes, xiii
 Triplicatio, 486
 Tutela, xl, 54, 71
 of freedmen, 63
 of women, 68
 Tutor Atilianus, 65
 dativus, 65
 fiduciarius, 64
 legitimus, 59
 testamentarius, 56
 Tutor, removal of, 84
 Tutoris auctoritas, 68
 excusationes, 79
 satisfactio, 76
 Twelve Tables, xiii-xvii

ULPIAN, xxix

- Universitas, 92
 Universitas rerum, xlv, lii, lv, 89
 Usucapio, liii, 136, 405, 434, 491
 libertatis, 129
 Usufruct, li, 110, 125-131
 Usur, xvi, 325
 Usurpatio, 146
 Usus, li, 31, 181
 Uterini, 279, 289
 Utilis actio, lxxiii, 428

VADIMONIUM, xiii

- Venditio bonorum, 317
 Vernæ, 15
 Vi bona rapta, 409
 Via, 118
 Vindex, lxiv
 Vindicatio, lxiv, lxxii
 Vindicta, lxv
 Vindicta, 17, 25
 Vis, 495
 Vitia possessionis, 141

SEA

- Seashore, 91
 Sectio bonorum, 376
 Semel heres semper heres, 196
 Senate, x, xxiv, lxxv
 Senatusconsultum, xxiv, 9
 Claudianum, 15, 318
 Hadrianum, 239
 Largianum, 301
 Libonianum, 172
 Macedonianum, 463
 Neronianum, 223
 Orphitianum, 286
 Pegasianum, 250, 253
 Tertullianum, 233
 Trebellianum, 252, 253
 Velleianum, 356
 Separationis beneficium, 215
 Servitudes, l, 118-136
 personal, li, 125
 predial, li, 118
 rural, li, 118
 urban, li, 119
 Servius, xi
 Servus poenæ, 49
 Slavery, 14
 Slaves, acquisition through, 159, 391, 460
 institution of, 190
 stipulations of, 338
 abandonment of, for delicts, 465
 Societas, lviii, 372
 negotiationis auctoris, 373
 rei unius, 373
 universorum bonorum, 373
 universorum quæ ex quæstu veniunt, 373
 vectigalis, 373
 Solidus, 67
 Solutio, lx, 391
 imaginaria, 392
 indebiti, 388
 Specificatio, 98
 Sponsalia, 36
 Sponsio, lxxiii, 440, 498
 Sponsor, 354
 Sportulæ, 445, 454
 Spurii, 38
 Status, xxxvii, 14
 statu liber, 18
 Stipulatio, lviii, 332
 Aquiliana, 393
 emptæ et venditæ hereditatis, 252
 inutiles, 342
 partis et pro parte, 254
 Subscriptio, 167
 Substitutio pupillaris, 200
 quasi-pupillaris, 201
 vulgaris, 197
 cession, testamentary, liv, 164
 tate, iv, 264
 xl, 54, 215 li, 135
 ven, 84
 vii, 360

VIT

- TESTAMENTI factio, liv, 56, 168, 178, 218, 238
 Testamentum, liv, 164
 calatis comitiis, 164
 in procinctu, 164
 inofficiosum, 187, 209
 irritum, 176, 205, 207
 militare, 173-177
 non jure factum, 205
 nuncupatum, 172
 per æs et libram, 165
 ruptum, 205
 tripartitum, 167
 Theodosius, xxx
 Theophilus, xxxiii
 Theft, 140
 Thesaurus, 111
 Traditio, lii, 115
 Transcriptio, 360
 Trebatius, xxvii, 261
 Tribes, Roman, x
 Tribonian, xxxii
 Tribunes, xiii
 Triplicatio, 486
 Tutela, xl, 54, 71
 of freedmen, 63
 of women, 68
 Tutor Atilianus, 65
 dativus, 65
 fiduciarius, 64
 legitimus, 59
 testamentarius, 56
 Tutor, removal of, 84
 Tutoris auctoritas, 68
 excusationes, 79
 satisfactio, 76
 Twelve Tables, xiii-xvii

ULPIAN, xxix

- Universitas, 92
 Universitas rerum, xlv, lii, lv, 89
 Usucapio, liii, 136, 405, 434, 491
 libertatis, 129
 Usufruct, li, 110, 125-131
 Usura, xvi, 325
 Usurpatio, 146
 Usus, li, 31, 131
 Uterini, 279, 289
 Utilis actio, lxxiii, 428

VADIMONIUM, xiii

- Venditio bonorum, 317
 Vernæ, 15
 Vi bona rapta, 409
 Via, 118
 Vindex, lxiv
 Vindicatio, lxiv, lxxii
 Vindicta, lxv
 Vindicta, 17, 25
 Vis, 495
 Vitia possessionis, 141

